adjutant was instructing the officers in tactics, having arranged beforehand the week, day, and hour, when an Order came down from the dépôt to say that he was to attend a Court of Inquiry. Of course, he had to throw over his appointment with the officers in order to attend to the Order from the dépôt. If the right hon. Gentleman would take this matter into consideration he would confer a benefit on some of the adjutants. One other question he should like to draw attention to—namely, the position of the sergeant instructors. The right hon. Gentleman was, no doubt, aware that at present first-class sergeant instructors were not allowed to be employed in a civil trade. Beyond their duty with the Volunteers they were only allowed to drill schools, and for that they had to obtain the sanction of the commanding officer. Second-class sergeant instructors, however, were allowed to be employed in any trade with the sanction of the commanding officer, provided the sanction was confirmed by the General of the district. If the right hon. Gentleman could see his way to putting first-class sergeant instructors in the position of second-class sergeant instructors, it would do no harm, and would be very advantageous to the men concerned. There would always be the safeguard of the sanction of the commanding officer confirmed by the General of the district. He would not detain the Committee any longer, but would conclude by thanking the right hon. Gentleman for what he had done for the Volunteers during the two years he had been in Office. They appreciated his endeavours to improve the efficiency of the Force, but, at the same time, wished to impress upon him the desirability of keeping them as distinct as possible from the other Services of the Crown.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, that, as was usual and natural on the Army Estimates, most of those who had addressed the Committee were connected with the Army or the Auxiliary Forces. And, also, as was usual and natural, these Gentlemen had made suggestions, no doubt very useful suggestions, but suggestions which would add to the already very great expenditure on the Army. Now, the noble Lord the Member for West Essex (Lord Eustace Cecil), complained that no Radical had addressed the Committee on this subject.

Colonel Walrond

The reason, he took it, why the Radicals had not engaged in the discussion was that they were in despair at the great, excessive, and increasing expenditure that took place on the Army. They came down to the House to protest, but they found that their protests were not listened to; and every year, now under one pretext and now under another, the expenditure on the Army increased. He spoke as a taxpayer and as a Representative of taxpayers. At that late hour—12.45 A.M.—he was not going into all the different abuses that existed, and which might be pointed out in the Estimates which had been submitted to the Committee. He would only point out three, and respecting each he would ask for some explanation from the right hon. Gentleman. He had taken them rather as test questions, in order to show how wasteful the expenditure was on the Army. The first was with respect to the Life Guards. He wanted to know what in the name of goodness was the use of three regiments of Life Guards, two of which were in London, the other usually being quartered at Windsor? He found, on reference to the Estimates, that the pay of these men was £70,540; and, if that was a proper estimate, he took it that the total expenditure on the three regiments was £150,000. These regiments had never been out of the country since the battle of Waterloo, and he presumed they never would be sent out of the country again. It was now generally admitted that these very heavy horses and men were almost useless in time of war. There were some notable charges during the Franco-Prussian War, he believed; but now-a-days a charge of such a body as a regiment of Life Guards would lead almost to its total destruction. As he had said, although we had been several times at war during late years, the Life Guards had never been used. All they did was to provide two men for the sentry boxes at Whitehall, and to act as escorts to Her Majesty when she came down to London, or drove about Windsor. He had been told, and had seen it stated in the newspapers, that these heavy troops could not keep pace with Her Majesty's carriages, and that a regiment of Lancers had to be employed as escort when the Queen came to London. He hoped, therefore, the right hon. Gentleman would give some reason why these three regiments of Life Guards were maintained. In the late Imperial Court of France, where things were done on a grander scale, perhaps, than they were in England, all the ornamental objects of these three regiments were fulfilled by a body which was called the sond garde; and in England, if it were necessary rather as an ornament to the Court than anything else to have a body of Cavalry—consisting of large men and large horses—the same results could be obtained by having 100 men, and quartering them in London when Her Majesty was in London, and in Windsor when there was any occasion for their presence there. His next point was as to the Foot Guards. He did not suppose they were any better or any worse than any other regiments in the Service. What did he find in the Estimates? He found that the special pay of the Foot Guards was £18,250, whereas the special pay of all other regiments of Infantry, exclusive of the Foot Guards, was £10,500. The band allowances for the Foot Guards were £1,200, whilst for all the rest of the Infantry they were £7,300; and the mess allowances were £5,300, whilst those for all the other Infantry regiments only amounted to £23,000. Of course, these figures made the average infinitely greater for the regiments of Foot Guards than for the rest of the Infantry; and he wished to ask this question—Why was all this extra expenditure? If there was a reason for it, well and good; but he did not see any valid reason for this excessive expenditure; and if there was not, he would ask the right hon. Gentleman why, as an economist, and as a Member of a Government pledged to economy, and as a Representative of the Liberal Party, he maintained this expenditure, and did not put an end to it? There was another point to which he would draw attention, and that was with respect to the bands—and he had no doubt many hon. Members would agree with him in what he had to say. The bands were divided into two classes, the useful and the ornamental. The useful consisted of what were called “drummers;” but half of them, he believed, were buglers. There were light drummers and light buglers in each battalion, and their duty was to give the signals, and to go to the front in battle. [A laugh.] Hon. Members might smile, but he could assure them it was a fact that only these buglers and drummers went to the front, and remained at the front to give signals. The rest of the band kept to the rear, and were employed, or were supposed to be employed, in carrying off the field those who were wounded. They consisted of about 20 performers. Each battalion was allowed to take these 20 men from the ordinary soldiers of the line. He would take the number of battalions at 120; that would give 2,400 men in the Army who were absolutely neutralized. He did not think it was pretended they were necessary, or that they did anything that was needful beyond playing music. The music, no doubt, was very pleasant for the officers and others to hear; but the bands were not necessary from a military point of view. If they took the expenditure upon them at £40 per man they would find the cost, beyond the drummers, £96,000. In addition to this, he found that £10,000 was also put down in the Estimates as some sort of allowance to the bands, and this would make a total of £106,000. Now, it was clear that where they had a number of regiments together in a garrison town, like Portsmouth or Aldershot for instance, there was no use, for any practical purpose, of having half-a-dozen bands playing of an evening. The question of the desirability of having these bands had been discussed in the French Army; and it had been maintained by many eminent French generals that great economy might be effected by doing away with them and keeping only the drummers and buglers. But if, in England, the War Office insisted on spending this large amount of money on bands in excess of that necessary for drummers and buglers, he would suggest that when a number of regiments or battalions were quartered together the bands should be sent to the different manufacturing towns and be allowed to play for the benefit and pleasure of those who paid for them. In the town he represented—Northampton—the people were very fond of music, and they did not object to pay their fair share of this £106,000, provided they benefited by it in some way. [“Hear, hear!”] An hon. Member said “Hear, hear!” but surely it would be more reasonable that these bands, instead of being locked up at Aldershot, should be allowed to play in the evening in the market places of our manufacturing towns. He did not wish to press the matter any further. The noble Lord (Lord Eustace Cecil) had complained that no Radical had spoken on the subject in the direction of economy. He could assure the noble Lord that the Radicals would be glad to go on discussing this matter to any hour in the morning, if they thought that by doing so they could obtain any reduction in the Expenditure. They did not complain of large amounts being spent on the Army in order that the country might be efficiently defended. They wished to have an Army, not for aggressive, but for defensive purposes; but they did hope, now that they had a Liberal Ministry in power, that that Ministry would take the greatest care not only to make the Army efficient, but to make it economical and cut off all these useless excrescences.

COLONEL STANLEY: I do not wish to interpose for more than two or three moments; but I desire to put a few questions to the right hon. Gentleman which cannot be put at any future stage of the proceedings or on any other Vote. I do not rise for the purpose of answering the hon. Member who has just spoken, as I presume what has fallen from him will be dealt with by the right hon. Gentleman. I only wish to ask, with regard to certain arrangements proposed for the Cavalry, whether we are to understand distinctly from my right hon. Friend that they are suspended for the moment—that he does not intend to take any further action until the matter has again been brought under the notice of Parliament. That, I think, does not quite clearly appear from the remarks he made the other evening, which I was not fortunate enough to hear. As to the question touched on by the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the County of Cork (Colonel Colthurst), with regard to allowing a certain number of old soldiers to re-engage, as I understand the hon. and gallant Gentleman, what he asked for was not that the Warrant should be altered in any degree, but merely that the Secretary of State should intimate, in whatever manner he thought fit, to the commanding officers that his view was that they must put a favourable interpretation on the terms of the Queen's Regulations, and that they were not to be tied and bound to the special classes which, at the present time, keep them from everything but a very partial selection. The hardship is considerable where men have no opportunity to go to the Reserve; and if the right hon. Gentleman finds himself able favourably to consider the matter he will confer a great benefit on a deserving and useful class of men. As to the officers' quarters, the right hon. Gentleman said, as I understood, that he hoped very largely to reduce the expense, both to the public and the officers themselves, by furnishing quarters for them. I would venture to point out, however, that it is not, perhaps, quite as simple a matter as it looks. The question has already been fully gone into, and it must be borne in mind that not only will you have to send officers to particular places where you will have furnished quarters for them, but that you will have to send them elsewhere where they will have to supply themselves with furniture. You will experience the danger of being called upon to incur great outlay without the officers receiving a corresponding benefit. It often happens, for instance, that at the last moment the destination of a portion of a regiment is changed; and it would be very small consolation to an officer ordered to Naas to find that a comfortable room had been furnished for him in Dublin. At present, officers take their furniture with them; and they are able, at fair expense, to shift for themselves. Then there is a question which I do not intend to go into at this time of night; but which, I think, is well worthy of the consideration of the right hon. Gentleman, and that is in respect to the stoppage of promotion at the present time in the Brigade of Guards. It is well known that the organization of the Guards is somewhat peculiar—that the number of mounted officers, strictly speaking, the number of majors and lieutenant colonels in the Brigade of Guards, is not precisely similar to that of the battalions in the Line; and it is clear that, unless the systems are assimilated, promotion in the Brigade of Guards must be retarded. I need not remind the right hon. Gentleman that the whole reason of the original Promotion Warrants was to prevent officers being blocked in the lower ranks and being hopelessly dispirited by the impossibility of rising from the lower to the higher ranks. That feeling prevails in the Brigade of Guards, as well as in other regiments; and I hope the right hon. Gentleman will consider, not whether the Brigade of Guards have received advantages—which I am not here to deny—but to see whether they have received such an organization and such terms of promotion as will place them at least in as favourable a position as the Brigades of the Line. There is another question which is of some importance—one connected with the extension of the ranges rendered necessary by the increased use of the Martini-Henry rifle. That question had arisen when I left Office. The zone of danger of the Martini-Henry rifle is so very much larger than that of the rifles in use by the Auxiliary Forces, that no doubt injunctions will be obtained against the use of that weapon at some of the existing inland ranges. I hope the right hon. Gentleman has taken steps to meet the difficulty. The first thing that suggests itself to one's mind is that ranges should be obtained close to the sea; but at these ranges you are not able to obtain that valuable practice—field firing. I can only express my regret that the right hon. Gentleman is unable to lay on the Table of the House some portions, at all events, of the Report of Sir Daniel Lysons' Committee, that Committee having been assembled to deliberate upon the field-firing of the Army. I regret he has not given us something to show in which direction the ideas of the Committee tended. Whatever else I may have to say upon Army matters I will postpone until a future occasion.

MR. CHILDERS: I think it will now be the wish of the Committee that I should reply to the various questions addressed to me from both sides of the House; and I may, in a word, say I am obliged to right hon. and hon. Gentlemen for the spirit in which those questions have been asked. The hon. and gallant Gentleman (Sir Robert Loyd Lindsay) has asked me if the Pay Department is working well. The organization of the Pay Department is one of the good deeds for which we are indebted to the late Government. It is the fact that the Department is working well; and we have every reason to believe it will continue to do so. With respect to the Medical Department I may say the same thing. There is no lack of officers, a matter which, in years past, we so much deplored in both Services. We have not found it even necessary to take advantage of the permission granted in the Warrant to go to the Medical Schools for a portion of the medical officers of the Army. My hon. and gallant Friend has spoken of the First Army Corps, and has asked me if I could give the Committee some information about it? He prefaced his remarks by the suggestion—which, however, he did not say he was prepared to propose—that the number of men of the Line at home might, with advantage, be raised by 10,000. I do not deny the advantage from one point of view; and if Parliament desires greatly to pay another £750,000 towards the Army it could be well laid out in that way. I, however, on my own responsibility, am not prepared to make such a proposal to Parliament. I have obtained precise information as to the condition of the First Army Corps at the present time, not only with respect to the Infantry, which I specially alluded to in moving the Estimates, and which I showed the Committee had reached their full strength within a mere trifle, but as to the rest of the Corps. In moving the Estimates I stated that what we wanted was not merely a satisfactory Infantry Establishment; but such a condition of the whole of the First Army Corps as would enable us within a few days, on an emergency, to send an efficient Army abroad. I am now in a position to say that whereas the Peace Establishment of the First Army Corps—Cavalry, Artillery, Engineers, Infantry, Guards, and Commissariat—is 27,285 men, the actual strength at this moment is 27,838, so that we have brought, though not without considerable labour on the part of those who are responsible for this part of the War Office business, the First Army Corps to above the Peace Establishment. We shall want another 5,000 men to bring the Corps up to a war footing; but, of course, they can be easily obtained from the First Class Army Reserve. My hon. and gallant Friend thinks we are attaching too much importance to public works at Aldershot, and says we would do well to spend more upon the depôts in the territorial districts, and less upon the accommodation of troops at Aldershot, and he spoke of housing the different regiments in barracks in their own districts. I may point out, it was never intended that territorial regiments should always be quartered in their own districts. They must, in turn, move from one to another station, so that it would be impossible to carry out our military system if battalions were always to be in their own territorial districts. I admit that, in past years, these moves have been excessive; but, out of the 16 years in which a battalion is to remain at home, there must be several necessary. What we are doing at Aldershot does not appear to have been quite understood. Many of the huts have become so dilapidated that some of them are hardly fit to put men in them; and what we are doing is, rebuilding the huts with more permanent material, without attempting to add to the accommodation. The rebuilding of the huts was not commenced by us, but by my right hon. and gallant Friend opposite (Colonel Stanley), and all we are doing is carrying on the work a little more rapidly. My hon. and gallant Friend (Sir Robert Loyd Lindsay) referred to the recruiting Report in detail, and I am glad he spoke too much in praise of the work done by the Department and General Bulwer. He said—though not quite consistently with the opinion expressed by my noble Friend (Lord Eustace Cecil)—he hoped we should not be too fast in raising the standard of age from 19 to 20. I should be glad if we could bring the minimum of age to 20; but I do not think it would be wise to run any risk in doing so prematurely. The hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for South Ayrshire (Colonel Alexander), and other hon. Members, have spoken to me about the reduction in the standard of height. The reduction of the standard of height does not at all mean that no men above 5 feet 4 inches enlist. As a matter of fact, the proportion who enlist at 5 feet 4 inches or 5 feet 5 inches is very small. But hon. Members are quite mistaken in thinking we have adopted a standard lower than formerly. For years past the standard of height has varied; it has been altered as recruiting has improved or fallen off. What we have thought is, that it is better to fix a certain standard and not to alter it; and we have fixed it at 5 feet 4 inches, which is above the standard of any other European Army. If it should become necessary to check recruiting, we think it would be well to do so in some other way than by changing the standard. That is the deliberate conclusion we arrived at, after consultation with our Military Advisers. My hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Kincardineshire (Sir George Balfour) has spoken about Cavalry organization, and recommended a reversion to the squadron formation which had been approved some years ago, but which shortly afterwards was changed back again to the troop formation. I think it too late to-night to enter into a discussion of so purely technical a question, although it is one on which there is considerable difference of opinion amongst military officers. There was weighty evidence in favour of reverting to troop formation; and I can only answer that at this moment we are not prepared to revert to the squadron formation. The hon. and gallant Gentleman also suggested that the principal officers under the Secretary of State should furnish independent Reports every year as to the work of their several Departments, and that the Secretary of State should lay those Reports with his own opinion before Parliament. I do not think that would conduce to harmonious working, but that, on the contrary, it would greatly interfere with the responsibility of the Minister and the confidential advice of his subordinates. Hon. Gentlemen have spoken of the prospects of subaltern officers in the Brigade of Guards; and I am bound to say that I am not prepared to close the door absolutely to some modification of the present system. What I will say is this—and I think those who offer their criticisms, or who know the story of the constitution of the Guards Regiment, will confirm me—that whatever disadvantages the officers of the Guards may be under at the present time is certainly not due to anything we did last year, but quite the reverse. By the Warrant of June, 1881, we improved the position of officers of the Guards more than we did that of officers of the Line. There is, I admit, a considerable disadvantage in respect to promotion in the Guards as compared with promotion with other regiments. I believe the real secret is this—that a large proportion of officers who go into the Guards do not take that step with the intention of remaining in the Service all their lives, but only with the intention of spending a short time there, and then following other careers. The hon. and gallant Colonel (Colonel Alexander) said that at Pontefract I entirely attributed the large recruiting we have witnessed to the improved position of the non-commissioned officers. I never used the word "entirely;" I never attributed the improvement in recruiting solely to any particular cause; neither does the Inspector General, in his Report, attribute it solely to the reduction in the standard of height or to localization. I have read the Report of the Inspector General of Recruiting, and he expressly says the better prospects of soldiers are bringing in more men and better men. The hon. and gallant Colonel asked me a question about the invitation to the First Class Reserve to enter military service in South Africa, and he said we were recklessly dispersing what we had got together with so much success. Quite recently the charge against us was that we were not getting them together; but now we are charged with dispersing them. I think that 200 Reserve men have accepted military service in South Africa; and surely that, out of 25,000 or 27,000, is not a very great dispersion of the Army Reserve. The hon. and gallant Gentleman used language as to the steps we are taking to obtain a better class of recruits which I regret. He said that the less we say about the character of the recruits the better. I deny this emphatically. We want to get out of the public mind the idea that the men who go into the Army are men who have been in some scrape or other. We wish to get men whose character will bear investigation; and I am very happy to say that during the last year we have been getting a better class of men—men whose character will stand inquiry, and who go into the Army, not to get out of scrapes, but because they think the Army is a good Profession, and that, with reference to their permanent prospects, they might as well enter it as follow any other employment. Then the hon. and gallant Gentleman said the territorial system had failed, because so few men were recruited territorially. If the hon. and gallant Gentleman had referred to the Inspector General's Report, he would see that 51 per cent of the recruits already come from the territorial districts of their battalions; and I think that is a very satisfactory result, considering the short time the system has been in force. Then I have been asked again whether I am prepared to allow privates, who have not become non-commissioned officers in their first term of service, to re-engage? To this I must again reply in the negative. If a man has not become a non-commissioned officer it is 10 to 1 that he is not worth re-engaging; and it must be remembered that the additional cost to the State of re-engaging a man who, at the end of his second term, will have a pension, is equivalent to a present payment of between £200 to £300. But, carrying out what I said in reply to the hon. and gallant Member the other day, if there is any misunderstanding in the minds of commanding officers as to the circumstances under which they may recommend men for re-engagement it shall be set right. I said, some days ago, that I thought already some 200 men had been re-engaged, and that if a special cause was assigned, and it was shown that a man was worth retaining, he would be re-engaged. I am told that there have been not more than one or two cases in which men have been refused. The noble Lord opposite (Lord Eustace Cecil) went into a question which it would be impossible at this time of night to answer; he repeated a comparison he made in 1881, not between the Estimates for this year and for former years, but between the Estimates of previous years and the Estimates of last year. Last year I went over each figure that the noble Lord has given to-night, and explained them, as I thought, to his satisfaction. Now, he has given some figures in the nature of a comparison between this year and two years ago, and says we have this year 2,671 men less than in 1880-1, and spent £500,000 more. I have looked over the Estimates, and I cannot find that diminution; on the contrary, we have 1,000 more men. The noble Lord must remember that two years ago the Estimates showed a reduction of 3,000; and, therefore, as between three years ago and the present time, there is, no doubt, a reduction—

Mr. Childers

LORD EUSTACE CECIL: I took into account the whole force.

MR. CHILDERS: The noble Lord, speaking of the comparative expenditure, said we had 2,671 fewer men, but greater expenditure. Our expenditure depends not on the number of men in a year—

LORD EUSTACE CECIL: What I wished to show was that the number of Regular Forces in this country and in India was, in point of fact, greater in 1880 than it now is.

MR. CHILDERS: I have nothing to say for the Force in India. We do not pay for it, and to refer to it in comparing what we do pay in different years is utterly beside the question. But the simple fact is that between 1880-1 and 1882-3 there is an increase of £400,000, with an increase in men of above 1,000. Of this £400,000, £300,000 is due to Naval Ordnance, £30,000 to the Autumn Manœuvres, and the rest to the Volunteers and automatic increase in Non-Effective Charges. As to this last, the noble Lord is quite wrong. He said that in 1880-1 the charge was £2,743,000; while last year it was £3,019,000, or a difference of £276,000. I explained last year that that apparent increase was caused by the transfer of items from one Vote to another—for instance, retired officers who were colonels of regiments used to be charged to the Effective Votes, and are now charged to Non-Effective. Of course there is, and must for some years be, an increase in these Votes, until the effects of short service on the Pension List are felt. The noble Lord also asked, what does "Royal" mean in connection with the Artillery Militia? Just what it means when a Militia regiment becomes a battalion of a Royal Line regiment. The noble Lord and one or two other hon. Members asked, with alarm, what were the contemplated reductions in regimental officers? I contemplate no further reductions. Last year, in doubling the number of field officers, we reduced the aggregate regimental officers by 400 or 500. My noble Friend also spoke about the abolition of regimental subscriptions. I have explained that we are endeavouring to keep down mess expenditure; but I did not say we proposed to abolish all regimental subscriptions. The noble Lord also spoke about the Committee on the change of uniform. I have had to meet Motions brought forward by hon. and gallant Members on the other side of the House—to resist which I had no assistance from the noble Lord—on the subject of soldiers' uniform, particularly in the case of men on active service. I said we had appointed a Committee to inquire whether any changes were required in the colour or character of uniforms on active service; and I was careful to explain that, whatever advantage one colour might have over another in point of visibility, that was not the only question. My noble Friend asked whether it was true that we were going to take away the patronage of the present colonels of the Guards? I have no such intention; but in process of time there will be no longer paid colonels of the Guards. As vacancies occur in these colonelcies, their successors will be honorary only; and other arrangements will be necessary as to the patronage they now have in first appointments. The noble Lord asked when the Ordnance Committee, which has been sitting for three years, would present their Report? The Committee has only been sitting one year, and it has done a great deal of work, and presented a number of most useful Reports, the result of a great variety of experiments; and I think it has done its work remarkably well, and rapidly. The hon. and gallant Baronet (Sir Henry Fletcher) raised two questions of grievance—one as to retired purchase captains, the other as to the supersession of certain Line officers. As to the first question, I am not prepared to increase the pay of officers who had finally retired under former Warrants. I could not venture to disturb the well-known arrangement in all Departments that, when an officer has retired under the Regulations then in force, his retired pay cannot be increased to the scale of subsequent Retirement Regulations. Any departure from this rule would raise thousands of claims, from not only Military, but Naval and Civil officers. Personally, I sympathize with some of these officers; but I cannot take any action in this direction. As to the question of supersession, the case is this. In the Line, promotion is regimental. It is extremely rapid in some regiments, but slow in others. That is one of the disadvantages of the regimental system; and in dealing with other corps, where promotion is by seniority, all we can possibly do is to see that, on the average, their promotion is equitable. By the great improvement made last year in the promotion of the

Mr. Childers

Line—when we doubled their field officers—we greatly disturbed the relative position of other corps, especially the Artillery and Engineers; and this inequality we have partially redressed. We effected this by, among other changes, allowing majors of Artillery and Engineers promoted before 1877 the Army rank of colonel after seven years, a privilege enjoyed by the Line. This put a few of these officers over some 25 of the Line officers whose promotion was slowest, and in their interest the hon. and gallant Baronet has spoken. But it is impossible to do anything for them; and, in fact, 19 out of the 25 have had slow promotion by their own voluntary action, such as exchanges to other regiments. The hon. Member for Nottingham (Mr. C. Seely) spoke of the insufficient proportion of Artillery to the rest of the Army. I have done nothing to disturb that proportion. The hon. and gallant Member for East Devon (Colonel Walrond) made some suggestions about the Volunteers which appear to me worth consideration. As I have said, we hope to be able to issue Martini-Henry rifles to Volunteers after the issue to the Militia is completed; and I have already expressed my hope that before long efficiency will be tested by some other rule than merely the expenditure of so many rounds. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Colonel Stanley) asked one or two questions, which I will answer. We have entirely suspended any decision as to changes in Cavalry organization, and no new plan will be adopted until Parliament has been informed. As to ranges, we are quite alive to the importance of their extension, and we are asking further provision for this purpose. Then the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) has made some suggestions, and I shall be happy to have his assistance in effecting economies. I shall always give a willing ear to the suggestions of any hon. Member who can suggest any direction in which I can effect economy. My hon. Friend proposes that we should abolish the Life Guards, and complains of the expense of the Foot Guards in London, and the military bands. As to the latter point, whatever some French unnamed Generals may have said, regimental bands are not abolished in Germany, France, Italy, or Austria, and I should hesitate very much to abolish them here. I do not think it would be wise to abolish the Household Cavalry, who form part of the small garrison of London, and who are probably the steadiest body of men in the Army. The expense of the Foot Guards is not so much in excess of the expense of Line regiments as my hon. Friend thinks. He has referred to the special pay and mess allowances to the Foot Guards; but the Foot Guards have not barracks as the Line officers have, and these extra allowances are intended to represent the difference, everything being considered, between the expenses of officers with quarters and others without quarters, but obliged to live in London.

SIR HENRY FLETCHER asked whether the right hon. Gentleman would consider the case of the colour sergeants?

MR. CHILDERS: Yes; I took down the suggestions of the hon. and gallant Member on that subject, and I think there is some force in them.

GENERAL BURNABY wished, in regard to the last explanation of the right hon. Gentleman, that the House should know the officers of the Foot Guards did not draw any lodging allowance. There was another subject, but which had not been touched upon in the course of the evening. In 1877 the right hon. Gentleman was Chairman of a Select Committee which inquired into the best means of providing civil employment for soldiers, sailors, and marines. He (General Burnaby) had always been an advocate for the employment of a certain proportion of soldiers, sailors, and marines in the Public Offices; and he hoped to hear from the right hon. Gentleman that some satisfactory steps in that direction had been taken. He had no desire to take the bread out of the mouths of any persons at present employed in the Public Offices; but he was satisfied that it would be greatly to the advantage of the soldiers if a certain proportion of them were able to find public employment in the manner distinctly recommended by the Committee presided over by the right hon. Gentleman. In the concluding paragraph of their Report, which had now been presented for some years, the Committee said—

“Your Committee desire to express an earnest hope that the recommendations we have made, and the evidence on which they have been made, may be taken into consideration by the Department concerned with as little delay as possible."

That Report was dated 1877, five years ago; and he (General Burnaby) really thought the time had now arrived when something should be done to give effect to the recommendations of the Committee. There was one short passage in the Report of the Committee which he thought was a very telling one, and which was likely to have considerable effect upon the men who were induced to offer their services to the Army. The passage he referred to was this—that if there were to be any inducements in regard to a future provision for the men entering the Military and Naval Service of the country, they should be made known at the time the men entered the Service, so that they might be made fully aware of all the inducements that were offered to them and the prospects they had to look forward to. The hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) proposed to reduce the expenditure upon the bands. The bands were an important element in the Army, and did much to stimulate the energies and revive the spirits of the men. The House should know that bandsmen were trained soldiers and regularly practised riflemen, and that the officers contributed large sums of money towards the support of the bands, and made no complaint. He would certainly protest against any proposition that was calculated to impair the existence or efficiency of the bands. The officers themselves had no wish to reduce the expenditure on the bands, and he did not think, in the absence of any representations from the officers, that any enforced reduction should be made; but, at the same time, he had no doubt it would be hailed as a boon if the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would, by making a grant from the State, do away with some of the contributions which the officers now found themselves compelled to make. He believed that such a relief would be highly acceptable to the officers. He did not presume the State would do this, and until it did the officers were perfectly willing to continue their subscriptions from their pay in order to provide that which they knew from experience to be so greatly appreciated by the men under their command. What, after a long and tedious march, when the men assembled round the camp fires, weary, wet, and footsore, was a greater enjoyment than to listen to the cheerful strains of the band? Therefore, he appealed to the right hon. Gentleman not on any account to take any step that might impair the efficiency of the bands, and do away with one of the institutions of the Service which was fully appreciated by the men and regarded by everyone with the highest satisfaction. There were one or two other points upon which he should like to say a few words. In the first place, in regard to the First Class Army Reserve, he was informed there were reports abroad that some men who were recently drafted into the First Class Army Reserve took ship and went to America; but he believed that it was confined to a few men of the Rifle Brigade now at Cork. Nevertheless, it was certainly whispered currently that many of the men who ought to be in the Reserve had left the country. Naturally the names of all the men who had evaded service in the Reserve would in due course be struck off the pay lists. Some remarks had been made in the course of the discussion in reference to the uniform of the regimental officers. Of course, the uniform was an expensive article; but he was not aware that the officers had made any complaint in any way, and, therefore, the matter should be allowed to rest until they did. The same might be said of the mess expenses. He believed that the right hon. Gentleman proposed that the mess allowances should not be in any way reduced or increased from the sum at which they were at present fixed; but it was suggested that an officer's messing should be limited to 4s. per day. He believed that that proposal was creating a feeling of discontent in some of the regiments. The officers naturally said—"If a friend asks me to dinner, he does not tell me what that dinner costs, nor do I ask him." The officers in this case certainly did not like the interference to which they were subjected; and the proposition to which he referred was undoubtedly creating an unpleasant feeling among them, and, if enforced, would drive officers out of the mess to get their meals, to restaurants and clubs at greater cost, and the loss of what had been a great bond of union in the English Army. Now, he happened to know what the largest maximum amount expended in mess expenses per month in connection with some regiments was. Take the case of the Rifle Brigade. He had been informed by one of the officers of that brigade, who happened to occupy the position of mess president of a Rifle Brigade battalion, that, after an experience of 17 years, it had been ascertained that the maximum cost was £13 a-month. The officer in question did not consider that that was an excessive sum, nor, he (General Burnaby) confessed, did he. Of course, the officers liked to be not only civil, but to be enabled to return hospitality towards those with whom they were brought into contact, and they invariably did all in their power to render the Army as popular as possible. The extraordinary expenditure of an officer serving in Ireland was put down at £50 a-year. [An hon. MEMBER: No!] He knew, as a positive fact, by experience, that the sum he mentioned was right. With regard to the Reserves, he should like to add to what he had said, that there was, at the present moment, much anxiety to know whether the 26,000 men now composing the Force would be called out for some period of service. When the men were called out under the old system two or three years ago, it was found that some of the men—and he was alluding to facts which came immediately under his own notice—were receiving pay, not only in one, but in two, and even three different districts. The very same man was drawing pay from various distinct localities. A great deal of good would be gained by calling out the Reserves, if it were only in enabling the War Office to ascertain whether the same practice were resorted to now. There would be a further advantage in showing the men that their services were really required. He did not think they ought to lull the men into a feeling that their services were useless, and that they were to rest and grow rusty, in the belief that they would never be called out at all. No doubt, many of the men who belonged to the Reserves had found employment in connection with the railways and in other directions. So far as the Railway Companies were concerned, he had taken some pains to ascertain how many men belonging to the Reserves were employed, believing that it might be desirable to class them separately, in regard to the time of the year when they were called out. There were times during the year when the Railway Companies could better spare them than at others. The largest number of these Reserve men were employed by the Midland Railway Company; but the Great Northern Company, although it possessed a personnel of about 17,500 employés, had probably the least—namely, 74. The feeling in the Army was that the experiment, so far as numbers were concerned, had failed. The original anticipation in regard to the Reserve Force was that by this time it would have amounted to some 50,000 men; whereas, according to the Army Estimates of the present year, it only amounted to 26,000. He had listened very carefully to the remarks which had been made in the course of the evening, not only in reference to a First Army Corps, but also to a Second Class Army Corps, and he had endeavoured to realize what the existence of this Force of 26,000 Reserve men meant. He was amazed how it was possible that the House could blind its eyes to the fact that at this moment the Continent was bristling with men under arms. Let it also think of the hammers at work in every dockyard and arsenal of Europe. He believed that altogether there were not less than 10,000,000 of armed men in Europe capable of being brought under arms at a very short notice; and without having more regard to Prince Bismarck's or Prince Gortschakoff's men, or those of any other Continental State, as compared to the intrinsic value of the men who composed our little Army, he asked the House to think of the ambitions, the plottings, the planings in the minds of those who had those forces under control, and to say if it was not absurd to suppose that nothing was likely to happen in the turn of intrigues and the clash of those mighty hosts to involve English interests. Such a position, for a country like this, and such interests at stake, was, in his opinion, a very serious thing to contemplate; and he had been seriously thinking, while the Committee had been engaged in discussing all this minutiae in regard to uniforms, rank, and the expenses of the mess and the bands, whether it would not have been much more advantageous to consider the propriety of practising the massing together a larger body of men, whose services might happen to be required at a moment's warning, and seeing that they were properly equipped?

General Burnaby

MR. DILLWYN said, the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had intimated that he would be thankful for any suggestion that might improve the condition of the Army. His hon. Friend the Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) had certainly made one which would be beneficial to the Army—namely, that something should be done to reduce the excessive expenditure which was incurred in connection with the Life Guards and the Horse Guards. The right hon. Gentleman said he did not agree with the view expressed by the hon. Member for Northampton; but he (Mr. Dillwyn) thought that his hon. Friend had made out a good case. The Royal Horse Guards were not soldiers for military purposes, but were used only for State purposes; and he certainly thought that, for State purposes, one regiment would be sufficient instead of two. He also thought that his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War should have gone into more detailed explanation in reference to the reason why so large a force was really required. It was very well known that these regiments were of no use, but that they were really employed for purposes of show; and he very much regretted that his right hon. Friend had not gone into more explanation than he had done.

Question put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Mr. Secretary Childers,)—put, and agreed to.

House resumed.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow.

Committee to sit again upon Wednesday.

ELECTRIC LIGHTING BILL.—[BILL 122.]

(Mr. Chamberlain, Mr. Ashley.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I beg to move the second reading of this Bill. I do not propose, at this late hour of the night, to offer any explanation of its provisions, although I shall be prepared, if hon. Members see fit to put any questions to me, to deal with any points that may be raised. If the measure is read a second time I propose to refer it to a Hybrid Committee of 15 Members, nine to be appointed by the House and six by the Committee of Selection. To the same Committee we propose that all Private Bills dealing with the same subject shall be referred.

General Burnaby

Motion made, and Question, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. Chamberlain,)—put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed to a Select Committee.

And, on April 19, Ordered, That the Select Committee on the Electric Lighting Bill do consist of Fifteen Members, Nine to be nominated by the House and Six by the Committee of Selection:—Committee nominated of Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, Mr. WHITLEY, Mr. SLAGO, Mr. BOORD, Mr. HENDERSON, Mr. HENRY NORTH-COTE, Mr. WILLIAM FOWLER, Mr. MOLLOY, and Mr. BROOKS:—With power to send for persons, papers, and records; Five to be the quorum.

House adjourned at a quarter after Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 18th April, 1882.

MINUTES.]—NEW MEMBER SWORN—Edward Sheil, esquire, for Meath County.

PRIVATE BILLS (by Order)—Second Reading—Aberdeen Lighting*; Dublin Electric Light and Power Company*; Edison's Electric Lighting*; Westgate and South Eastern Junction Railway*.

PUBLIC BILLS — Ordered — Local Government Provisional Orders (Poor Law) (No. 1); Local Government (Highways) Provisional Order (No. 1); Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 1)*.

QUESTIONS.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—CAPTAIN T. BOLTON JONES.

MR. HEALY asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, If the Mr. T. Bolton Jones, who was elected clerk of the Petty Sessions of Drumod and Drumsna, county Leitrim, on the 20th March, is the same person who was known in the Leitrim Militia as Captain T. Bolton

Jones; and, whether there was any charge against the latter as to the misappropriation of mess-money, in consequence of which he had to sever his connection with the regiment?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): Mr. Jones, formerly a captain in the Leitrim Militia, has been elected clerk of the Petty Sessions district of Drumod and Drumsna, in county Leitrim. I am not aware that any such charge as the Question suggests was ever made against him; but his appointment has not yet been ratified by His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant, and before it is ratified the Registrar of Petty Sessions Clerks must be in a position to satisfy His Excellency both as to Mr. Jones's efficiency and integrity.

MR. HEALY: Was there no charge against him of misappropriating mess-money?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): That question would necessarily be inquired into.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—THE LAND COURT, NEW ROSS.

MR. REDMOND asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether he is aware that the jurisdiction of the Land Court sitting at Waterford on the 17th April, includes "that part of the union of New Ross, in the counties of Wexford and Kilkeenny," and if he can state why the sixty or seventy cases arising in the union of New Ross cannot be heard in that town, where there is a commodious court house and good hotel accommodation, and why the suitors should be put to the inconvenience of having their cases heard at Waterford, which is over twenty miles distant from the homes of a great number of them; whether he is aware that the authorities in Merriion Street have refused all information to the tenants as to the hearing of their cases until a fortnight before the sitting begins; whether up to the 1st instant no list of cases has been published; whether, considering that valuers and surveyors have to be employed, and solicitors instructed in the several cases, a fortnight is sufficient to enable tenants to bring their cases properly into court; and, whether he will communicate with the Land Commission, with a view to having the professional gentlemen engaged in the several cases consulted in the making of future arrangements as to fixtures, and also in order that the cases arising in the union of New Ross may be heard in that town, it being the most convenient place for all the parties concerned?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): The Land Court, which sat at Waterford yesterday, is empowered by the Land Commission to hear cases in which applications may be made in towns in the unions other than the town appointed as the centre of the district. The cases referred to may, therefore, be heard at New Ross if application is made for that purpose to the Sub-Commission, and that Court grant the application. In reply to the second and third Questions, I am informed by the Secretary to the Land Commission that the authorities in Merriion Street have never refused information to parties applying for it, where it was possible to give it. In this instance the list of cases was published on the 4th of April. As to the fourth Question, there is no reason to think that a fortnight's notice of trial is not sufficient. It is a longer time than required for notice of trial in an action in the Supreme Court of Judicature; and professional gentlemen are usually employed, and proofs ready, even before notice of trial is served. As to the last Question, it would not be possible to meet the individual wishes of the several professional gentlemen engaged in these cases in the various counties in Ireland.

POOR LAW (IRELAND) — ELECTION OF POOR LAW GUARDIANS—MR. O'HALLORAN, A SUSPECT.

MR. HEALY asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether it is the fact that a voting paper for the election of guardians for the Kiltullagh Division, duly filled up by Mr. Martin O'Halloran, suspect in Kilmainham Gaol, was not forwarded in time for collection, although he had explained the necessity for its despatch, and obtained a promise that it would be attended to?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): The voting paper in question was posted immediately on its receipt from Mr. O'Halloran. There was no default on the part of the prison authorities.

PRISONS (IRELAND) — ENNISKILLEN GAOL—REGULATION AS TO VISITORS TO PRISONERS ON ST. PATRICK'S DAY.

MR. REDMOND asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether his attention has been drawn to a Letter from Mr. J. Moyle Mahony, a suspect in Enniskillen Gaol, published in the "Freeman's Journal" of 3rd instant; whether it is true that, on St. Patrick's Day, prisoners in the various gaols were deprived of their ordinary privileges of seeing visitors, as provided by the prison rules; whether, on Mr. Mahony making complaint on this matter to the Prisons Board, he received through the Governor a reply, to the effect that they approved of this departure from the prison rules, and that if he attempted to make the matter known to the Press, that he "would never again be permitted to visit anyone;" and, whether he will have this matter at once inquired into?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): The persons detained under the Protection Act in the various gaols in Ireland were not, on St. Patrick's Day, deprived of their ordinary privilege of seeing visitors as provided by the Prison Rules. In Clonmel Gaol alone (owing to the Governor's misapprehension of the Rules) were they deprived of that privilege; and, of course, this miscarriage will not occur again. It is the fact that no visitor was admitted to Mr. Mahony in Enniskillen Gaol on St. Patrick's Day; but this was simply because no visitor called to see him. He was, I believe, informed, in effect, that if he sent out letters contrary to the Rules his visits would be stopped for a time. There is nothing, so far as I can see, which calls for inquiry.

MR. REDMOND asked whether steps would be taken to make the Governors of the different prisons understand and act according to the Rules?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): In every case, with this one exception, the Rules have been acted upon and understood by the different Governors.

STATE OF IRELAND—ALLEGED OUTRAGE IN WEXFORD COUNTY.

MR. BARRY asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether any report has reached the Government of an outrage committed by the wife of the sub-inspector of police at Taghmon, county Wexford, who, it is alleged, on the 8th instant, fired a revolver at her servant man, whose face was scorched by the discharge, the bullet passing through a window and lodged in the woodwork of a house on the opposite side of the street; and, if the Government will cause inquiry to be made into this case?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): A civil action has been brought by the servant in this case, and, it being still pending, it is not my place to say anything on the subject.

MR. HEALY inquired whether it was not the duty of the right hon. and learned Gentleman to conduct criminal proceedings, instead of allowing the matter to be settled by a civil action?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): It is not my duty to do so.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—ARRESTS IN THE COUNTY OF WEXFORD.

MR. REDMOND asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether it is a fact that, on the 22nd December last, five men were arrested at Clonrocht, county Wexford, on the same charge; whether three of them have been released; whether the district is in a peaceful condition; and, whether, under these circumstances, he will order the release of the two men still detained from the same district and on the same charge?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): All these men have been released except one, named O'Neill, and he will be released to-morrow.

MR. REDMOND: There is another man named Doran still detained.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): I think not; but I will inquire.

CRIMINAL LAW—THE CONDEMNED PRISONER LAMSON.

MR. LEWIS asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he has received any representations showing that the further evidence stated to be on the way from America with reference to the propriety of interfering with the due course of Law in the case of the convict Lamson for the crime of murder, are of any different character from those already submitted to him, which he describes as affording no justification for advising any interference with the sentence of the Law; and, if not, whether he will state on what grounds he has inflicted on the criminal the additional punishment of ten days' further suspense and doubt?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: It is quite impossible for me to form an opinion on the nature and character of evidence which I have not yet seen. It is quite impossible, therefore, for me to express any opinion upon it.

MR. LEWIS: The right hon. and learned Gentleman has not answered my Question. I did not ask him to form an opinion; but whether he had received a representation showing that the evidence on its way from America was of a different character to that already submitted to him?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I have received no representations that will enable me to form an opinion as to the character of the evidence.

POST OFFICE—THE AUSTRALIAN MAILS.

MR. STEWART MACLIVER asked the Postmaster General, Whether it is true that, whenever the Mails from Australia and Queensland, brought respectively by the Orient and British India line of steamers, arrive at Plymouth in the day time, they are forwarded to London unsorted; that, whenever these Mails arrive during the night, they are detained at Plymouth until the 8.35 train in the morning, thus causing very considerable delay in their delivery in Ireland and the West and North of England; and, whether he will place these important Mails on a like footing to the other Colonial and Foreign Mails arriving at the same port, by despatching them in special trains when they arrive at night, and sorting them between Plymouth and Bristol?

MR. FAWCETT: Letters which arrive at Plymouth by the lines referred to in the Question of my hon. Friend are, if time permits, sorted at Plymouth, and, if not, sent to London unsorted by the ordinary trains. If a special train with sorting carriages were employed, as suggested, considerable expense would be incurred; and I do not think this would be justified in view of the fact that letters which are sent from Australia can, if the writers wish, be despatched when they reach Suez by quick route, via Brindisi, and arrive in England at least a week sooner than if they are sent by the long sea route by way of Gibraltar and Plymouth.

NAVY—INDIAN TROOPSHIPS— CHATHAM.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, If there is any truth in the statement that has appeared in some of the newspapers to the effect that arrangements are in progress for making Chatham, instead of Portsmouth, the future port of arrival and departure of the Indian troopships; and, if so, whether he can explain the reasons of the change?

MR. TREVELYAN: The Jumna has been sent to Chatham for repairs in order to reduce the pressure on Portsmouth; and it may in future years be found necessary to follow a similar course; but no arrangements are in progress for making Chatham the future port of arrival and departure of Indian troopships.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PRO- PERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—AMERI- CAN CITIZENS ARRESTED UNDER THE ACT.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If it is intended to lay upon the Table the Correspondence with the United States Government respecting the detention of suspects in Ireland claiming American nationality; and, if so, when?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: The Correspondence on the subject of the detention in Ireland of "suspects" of American nationality is being printed, and will be laid on the Table of the House; but I cannot yet say when.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked if the Government would produce at the same time the representations made last year?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he thought Notice had better be given on the subject.

MR. SEXTON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is true, as reported in the public press, that certain persons imprisoned under the Irish Coercion Act, and claiming citizenship of the United States, have been offered their release on condition of leaving the United Kingdom, and have refused to accept release on this condition; and, whether, in view of this offer and refusal, the United States Ambassador in this Country has been instructed by his Government to demand that the men in question be either released or put on trial; and, if so, what the Government propose to do in the matter?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I think that the Question contained in the first paragraph should be addressed to the Irish Office. With regard to the second paragraph, it is the case that representations have been made by the United States Minister as to the "suspects" of American nationality, the nature of which representations will be seen when the Correspondence on the subject comes to be laid before the House.

MR. SEXTON asked whether the American Government had been asked to undertake that the American "suspects," if released, would remain out of Ireland?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: It would be very inconvenient for me to make a statement on this matter that would necessarily be imperfect when the whole subject is not before the House.

MR. SEXTON said, he would ask a further Question on the subject on Thursday next.

POST OFFICE—THE PARCELS POST—OBLIGATIONS OF BRITISH SHIP-OWNERS.

MR. DILLWYN asked the Postmaster General, Whether, under the Act 1 Vic. c. 36, and 3 and 4 Vic. c. 96, secs. 36, 37, and 61, owners of British ships, not being under actual contract, can be compelled to carry parcels forwarded (under existing rules) through the Post Office to India, China, Australia, Cape of Good Hope, America, and other Countries, on the terms of a gratuity of not exceeding one penny for each parcel, irrespective of weight, payable to the master of the ship at the option of the Postmaster General; or, if not on these, on what other terms; if so, will these powers of compulsion be applicable to parcels forwarded under the proposed new Parcels Post; and, if this will not apply, do the Government intend to bring in a Bill to enable the Post Office to compel shipowners, so described, to convey to such Countries such parcels in addition to all other Postal matters which may be tendered on board the ships?

MR. FAWCETT: I am advised that the power can be legally exercised which reference is made in the Question of my hon. Friend; but I am sure that, when an International Parcels Post is established, there will be no desire on the part of the Government to deal otherwise than fairly with shipowners.

PARLIAMENT — BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—CORRUPT PRACTICES (DISFRANCHISEMENT) BILL.

MR. LEWIS asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether the Government prepared to fix a day for the Second Reading of the Corrupt Practices (Disfranchisement) Bill?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES), in reply, said, there was no prospect at present; he wished there was.

ARMY ESTIMATES—VOTE 23—PENSIONS.

COLONEL BARNE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he will inform the House what portion of the £1,760,500, asked for in Vote 23, Sub-Head 2, of Army Estimates, is required to pension men enlisted under the long service system, and what portion for men enlisted under the short service system?

MR. CHILDERS: In reply to the hon. and gallant Gentleman, I have to say that without analyzing at Chelsea the whole pension list of about 85,000 men, it would be impossible to give an exact answer to his Question. But practically, almost the whole of the £1,760,000 goes to long service men. There are a few cases of wounded short service men who are entitled to permanent pensions, and of invalided short service men receiving temporary pensions; but the amount going to them is inconsiderable.

BOARD OF MANUFACTURES AND FISHERIES (SCOTLAND).

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether

Mr. Sexton

he will lay upon the Table of the House a Copy of the Treasury Minute, of 1841, requiring the Board of Manufactures and the Board of Fishery in Scotland to appoint a joint secretary to carry on the duties of the two Boards?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH, in reply, said, that the Treasury Warrant appointing a joint establishment for the Boards of Fisheries and Manufactures in Scotland was a purely formal document, and did not appear to him to be of sufficient interest to be laid on the Table; but if his hon. and gallant Friend would like to see it, he should be very happy to show it him.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MR. PARNELL.

MR. LEWIS asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether Mr. C. S. Parnell, M.P., having been arrested on the 13th October last under the provisions of the Act 44 Vic. c. 4 s. 1, and having been released from custody on the 11th instant, can now be lawfully re-arrested or detained in custody under the original warrant; and, whether, if a new warrant be necessary for his re-arrest or further detention in custody, it can be issued in respect of the same offence?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): Mr. Parnell, on surrendering himself at Kilmainham, may lawfully be detained in custody under the original warrants.

PEACE PRESERVATION (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—ARMS LICENCES.

MR. HEALY asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether it is the fact that Mr. G. J. Stephens, of Leskinfin, Gorey, when recently applying for an arms licence, was first asked if he belonged to the Land League, and, having replied that he did when it was legal, the magistrate then inquired if he had subscribed to the fund for the suspects; and, upon stating that he did, was told that it was illegal, and, in consequence, was refused a licence; and, whether the Government approve of refusals to grant licences on such grounds?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): The local magistrates refused a certificate to Mr. Stephens; and the resident magistrate, who was the licensing officer, refused him an arms licence. These magistrates, in doing this, exercised the discretion with which the law has invested them; and even if I had the power, which I have not, I should not think of interfering with them, or reviewing their action in the matter.

MR. HEALY: That is no answer to my Question. Attention had been called to the circumstance that people had not arms with which to defend themselves against "Moonlighters," and yet licences were denied them when they wanted arms.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) thought it quite sufficient to say that the magistrates had exercised their discretion. It was not in his power to review what they had done, nor to ascertain their reasons if they gave any further decisions; but, so far as he could give an opinion, he thought that if there were fewer arms in Ireland, and the facilities for obtaining them much less, it would be much to the advantage of the country.

STATE OF IRELAND—POLICE VISITS.

MR. HEALY asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether it is the fact that Mr. Martin O'Sullivan, of Lacka Ballyduff, county Kerry, having been bound to be of good behaviour on a charge of "Boycotting," has his house constantly visited during the night by the police, to the great alarm of his family; and, whether this is necessary; and, if not, whether a stop can be put to the practice?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): An occasional visit to this man's house is considered necessary; but no inconvenience or alarm has been caused to his family.

MR. HEALY asked what was the usual hour of their visits?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) could not say; but he apprehended that they were made at the hour at which unlawful practices were most likely to be detected.

MR. LEAMY asked if they were to understand that the right hon. and learned Gentleman considered his police were at liberty to make domiciliary visits at any hour they thought fit?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) replied that these were police visits, and not domiciliary visits; and the police would be guilty of a dereliction of duty if they failed to make them.

Mr. HEALY said, he hoped the next time the police came there they would get a warm reception. ["Order!"]

STATE OF IRELAND—HOUSE SEARCHES BY THE CONSTABULARY.

Mr. REDMOND asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether it is a fact that on Sunday the 26th March, Constable Hayden and a body of police attempted to search the house of Mr. John Egan, of Ballinasloe, without warrant or authority; that on the following day they again visited his house, and in spite of his opposition proceeded to search the building, refusing to show any warrant to authorise them; whether the police were justified in taking this action; and, whether Mr. Egan would not have been acting legally had he ejected them by force from his house?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): This search was made by the Constabulary, under the orders of their officer, for dynamite, with which an abominable attempt was feloniously made to blow up a gentleman's house in the neighbourhood.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MR. JOHN O'CONNOR.

Mr. REDMOND asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Upon what grounds Mr. John O'Connor, of Cork, who has been imprisoned for nine months under the Coercion Act, was recently removed from Kilmainham to Clonmel Gaol; whether Mr. O'Connor had been previously transferred from Naas to Kilmainham, at the instance of his business employers, so that he might be able more conveniently to pursue his usual occupation; whether he was placed in a large cell by the Governor of Kilmainham, to afford him space and light to keep the books and ledgers appertaining to his business; whether the cell Mr. O'Connor now occupies in Clonmel is only five feet wide, and so dark that he is obliged to light a candle at noon to enable him to write; whether, in consequence, he has been obliged to give up his business correspondence; whether Mr. P. J. Murphy, T.C. of Cork, who was arrested shortly after Mr. O'Connor, and on a similar charge, has been released for some months; and, whether, under these circumstances, he will order the release of Mr. O'Connor, or his transfer to Kilmainham, to enable him to carry on his business?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): Mr. O'Connor was transferred to Clonmel Prison because it was considered necessary and expedient. The hon. Member will excuse me from giving any further reason. Mr. O'Connor had formerly been transferred from Naas to Kilmainham at the instance of his employers; and while in Kilmainham he was placed in the most convenient cell which could be appropriated to his use. I am informed that his cell in Clonmel is 13 feet by 5 feet 1 inch, and that there is sufficient light in it to read by; therefore, I should infer that there is sufficient light also to write by. Mr. Murphy, who was arrested two days before Mr. O'Connor, has been released, I understand, on his parole; and I am informed that Mr. O'Connor's case will be shortly reconsidered.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—BALLYCARY DISPENSARY DISTRICT AND LARNE WORKHOUSE.

Mr. BIGGAR asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, What is the largest number of paupers who have been inmates of Larne Workhouse from the Ballycary Dispensary district during the past year; and, how many persons have received outdoor relief from same district during that time?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): The number of paupers from the Ballycary Dispensary district relieved in the Larne poor-house for the year ending March 31 last was 19, the largest number at one time being 11. The number relieved out of the poor-house during the same period was 16.

SOUTH KENSINGTON MUSEUM—MUSEUM OF NATURAL HISTORY.

Mr. BIRKBECK asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether, in view of the opening of the International Fisheries Exhibition, on the 1st of May 1883, measures are being taken to complete, at an early date, the building proposed to be erected in connection with the new Natural History Museum in Cromwell Road, and intended to receive the Fish Collection, and other specimens preserved in spirit, now at the British Museum?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE, in reply, said, the building would be finished in November next.

STATE OF IRELAND—THE RECENT MURDERS.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, with reference to the late atrocious assassination of Mrs. Smythe, near Collinstown, and other similar outrages, Her Majesty's Government have had under consideration, during the Recess, any measures for vindicating the power and authority of the Law in Ireland; and, if so, if he will kindly state what measures the Government propose to adopt? At the same time, perhaps, he might ask the right hon. Gentleman if his attention had been drawn to another atrocious outrage which had since occurred in Limerick on Sunday last, when a lady, accompanied by another lady, was fired at, while returning from church, by three men with blackened faces who were concealed behind a hedge?

MR. GLADSTONE: The hon. Member seems disposed to think that all outrages are, in the first instance, reported to me when they take place in Ireland. That is not so. They are first reported to the Irish Government, and reports are only mentioned to me in certain cases. I have no detailed information of the outrage to which the hon. Member has last referred; but I understand it is not the case that the ladies were fired at. Her Majesty's Government had under consideration, and have constantly under consideration, all measures that they can take, and they have taken the best measures within their power, within the limits of the existing law. I include, of course, the extraordinary powers entrusted to them by Parliament. With regard to other measures, it is obviously quite impossible that I should state, in answer to a Question, what will be the policy of the Government with respect to that country. And I am bound to say this—that I think we should make a very great mistake if we entered upon a discussion of the subject till we have a plan to propose, and till we see our way to ask the House of Commons to give it effectual and continuous attention.

ENGLAND AND FRANCE — THE CHANNEL TUNNEL SCHEME.

MR. E. W. HARCOURT asked the First Lord of the Treasury, By whom are the expenses of guarding the tunnel between Dover and Calais to be borne, by the Nation or by the Railway Company?

MR. GLADSTONE: The question of the expense of guarding the Tunnel between Dover and Calais forms a part of the general question; and what, I presume, the hon. Gentleman desires is an assurance from Her Majesty's Government that they will do nothing that has any tendency to commit, directly or indirectly, by word or act, the taxpayers or ratepayers of this country to any expense, actual or contingent, in connection with the Tunnel, unless under the authority and with the full sanction of Parliament, and that assurance I can give him.

SIR HARRY VERNEY asked if the right hon. Gentleman would give the House an opportunity of discussing the question?

MR. GLADSTONE: I believe my hon. Friend has a more sure reliance in this matter than upon any statement I can make, for nothing, I apprehend, can possibly be done except with the authority of this House; and whether I wish it or not, it is quite certain there will be ample opportunity for discussing the subject.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—SECTION 8.

MR. LEAMY asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, If he will request the Land Commissioners, in those cases in which they are called on under the eighth section of the Land Act to place a value on the interest of a tenant, to ascertain if the tenant has purchased his interest from his predecessor, and in every case in which the tenant has so purchased, to state, in the Returns hereafter to be presented to the House, the amount of the purchase money paid by the tenant, as well as the value placed on the tenancy by the Court?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): My right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary has ascertained that, while in these cases the purchase-money alleged to have been paid by the tenant would most probably form part of the evidence, yet it cannot always be ascertained with certainty by the Court, and the Commissioners, therefore, cannot undertake to state it in their Returns.

Mr. HEALY asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether his attention has been called to the case of Cullen, tenant, Bunbury, landlord, reported in the "Freeman's Journal" of the 24th instant, in which Judge O'Hagan commented on the "extreme difficulty of the task imposed on the Land Commission" by section eight, sub-section five of the Land Act, which requires the Court, on application, to fix a specified value of a tenancy with a view to a subsequent sale, and expressed a wish that he could, if possible, evade the difficult task thus imposed on the Court; whether he is aware that the same difficulty has arisen before the Sub-Commissions all over Ireland, and resulted in extreme divergence of practice and procedure among those bodies; whether it is the case that one Sub-Commission has decided that its duty, under the circumstances referred to, is to fix the highest market value of the tenancy as the specified value, while Mr. Justice O'Hagan has expressed an opinion that the specified value should not be the highest market value; that another Sub-Commission was in the habit of fixing, as the specified value, the maximum amount of compensation for disturbance which the tenant would be entitled to if arbitrarily evicted, and without any reference to the tenant's improvements, but was subsequently compelled to change this practice; that one of the Sub-Commissions has refused to fix a specified value at all, unless specific evidence on the point is offered, while all the other Sub-Commissions fix the value without any evidence on the point having been offered, and discourage the practice of offering such evidence; whether it is the case that the Lord Chancellor and the Master of the Rolls, in their respective judgments in the case of Adams v. Dunseath, expressed contrary opinions as to the meaning of the phrase "true value" of a tenancy; whether it is a fact that the power of fixing a specified value does not apply at all when a holding is subject to the Ulster Custom; and, whether, having regard to the difficulties and contradictions which section eight, sub-section five of the Land Act has given rise to, the Government will take steps to have it repealed?

Mr. GLADSTONE: I am afraid I could not give a satisfactory and full answer to the hon. Member's Question within the proper limits of an answer to a Question; but I shall do the best in my power. It is quite true that Judge O'Hagan has commented on the difficulty of the task referred to—namely, the task imposed on the Commissioners by Section 8, sub-section 5, of the Land Act, which contemplates the fixing of the value of a tenancy during a statutory term. I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman intended to ascribe the use of the word "evade" to Judge O'Hagan—probably he did not—but Judge O'Hagan does not admit that he applied any such word in reference to any provision of the Act of Parliament. Moreover, he did state that as between the Commissioners and the Sub-Commissioners there is no complete understanding yet established as to the rule of procedure in dealing with that particular sub-section; and I may remind the hon. Member that, although he himself took a very active—and I must say a most highly-informed part—in the discussion of this Bill, yet there was no discussion in the House on this sub-section, so that the Sub-Commissioners have not the advantage of such guidance as possibly in some cases they may be able to draw from the lengthened debates in Parliament. Of course, there must be further official information before it can be stated whether there has been that "extreme divergence of practice" which the hon. Gentleman referred to; but the matter will be borne in mind with a view to a full and satisfactory reply. With regard to the statement that Mr. Justice O'Hagan had expressed an opinion that the specified value should not be the highest value, Justice O'Hagan's expression was that the specified value was to be held to be the true value, and I do not know that I could add anything to that statement of fact. I am not here to justify or explain any expression the Judge might use; nor would the Judge be a party to my undertaking one course or the other. With regard to the fifth point, we believe that it is not the case; but we have heard that one Sub-Commissioner has taken "specified value" as meaning the maximum compensation for disturbance, plus the compensation for improvements. With regard to the sixth point contained in the close of the third paragraph, the answer is in the affirmative, and appeals on the subject are now pending. With regard to the seventh point, the Lord Chancellor took the "true value" to mean what the holding would bond fide bring in the open market if sold to an unobjectionable person; and the Master of the Rolls stated the "true value" could not be the market value, but what, having regard to the interests of landlord and tenant respectively under this code, would be the true value as between them. With respect to the eighth point contained in the last paragraph but one, the answer is simply, "Yes, it is a fact;" and with respect to the ninth point, I must say that is a matter which I think could not be entered upon in answer to a Question; but there will be an early opportunity of again referring to it and of discussing it in the House.

In reply to Mr. BIGGAR,

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, he was not aware that Mr. Bomford was still a Sub-Commissioner acting in the county Cavan. He was under the impression Mr. Bomford was not.

MR. HEALY: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman state whether the Members of this House will get any official information as to the names of the Sub-Commissioners and their districts?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): The new ones is it?

MR. HEALY: All of them.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): They have all been published from time to time. [Cries of "Where, where?" and "Order!"] I shall ascertain and inform the hon. Member.

STATE OF IRELAND—LAND LEAGUE HUTS—MR. CLIFFORD LLOYD.

MR. SEXTON: I wish to address a Question to the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland on an urgent matter which has just been communicated to me by telegraph. My Question is, Whether he is aware that at Tulla, in the county Clare, where a number of families have been evicted and huts were being erected to shelter them, Mr. Clifford Lloyd interfered to-day, stating that the building of the huts was illegal, and ordered the builder to leave the place this evening, and informed him that unless he left he would be arrested? I also ask whether Mr. Clifford Lloyd acted within his legal rights; and, if so, under what statute he could arrest the builder in case he refused to leave?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): The first part of the Question deals with a matter of fact, and, as I have not had the advantage of seeing the telegram which the hon. Member quotes, I cannot answer it. Assuming that the facts are, as stated by the hon. Member, correct, if Mr. Clifford Lloyd found that those tenants, or others on their behalf, were building huts in which the evicted persons might carefully watch the farms from which they had been evicted for the purpose of doing mischief to any persons who might take them, or with the object of preventing persons taking those farms, then, in my opinion, Mr. Clifford Lloyd has acted rightly.

MR. SEXTON: Under what Act of Parliament?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): Under the Common Law, Sir. His duty is to protect life and property.

COAL MINES—THE WEARDALE COLLIERY EXPLOSION.

MR. BROADHURST asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he can give the House any further information with regard to the colliery explosion in Durham than that which appears in the evening papers?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Sir, I have received a telegram from Mr. Bell, the Government Inspector of Mines, and he says—

"I regret to inform you of an explosion of a colliery belonging to the Weardale Coal and Coke Company, which occurred at 1.30 this morning. Only the night shift, consisting of 40 men, was in the pit at the time. Twenty have been rescued alive. Six bodies have been recovered; hope to reach the remainder during the evening. The work of exploration is going on satisfactorily, there being plenty of engineering assistance at hand, and willing workmen. My colleague, Mr. Thomas, is with me. If necessary I will report further."

MOTIONS.

PAPAL SEE (DIPLOMATIC COMMUNICATIONS).—RESOLUTION.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF, in rising to call the attention of the House to the irregular and clandestine communications now passing between Her Majesty's Government and the Vatican; and to move—

"That, while recognizing the value of a good understanding between this Country and the Papal See, this House is of opinion that all communications between any of Her Majesty's Ministers and the authorities of the Vatican should be placed on official record in accordance with the constitutional practice in diplomatic affairs, and should be conducted with the cognizance of Parliament,"

said, he wished to explain, in the first instance, that he did not bring forward his Motion in any spirit of hostility to the Roman Catholic Church; he only desired that any communications which passed between this country and the Papal See should be carried on in a regular manner, and in accordance with what took place between the Representatives of other countries. But before entering upon that question, he desired to refer to what had fallen from the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. That hon. Gentleman had expressed himself aggrieved at his having charged the Government with defraying Mr. Errington's expenses out of the Secret Service Fund; but he had had that information on authority that left no doubt on his mind on the subject. The expenditure of the Secret Service money was perfectly Constitutional; but it ought not to be employed in the payment of a salary to a Diplomatic Agent. In "another place" Lord Granville had denied that Mr. Errington's expenses had been paid at all; but the denial was made in such a manner that it amounted to no denial at all. He said that Mr. Errington had not received any money. That might be perfectly true, for nobody supposed that when a gentleman was engaged on business of that kind he received the money for every pound of butter, and every cab he hired; at the conclusion of his mission he sent in his account, and the account was settled. But he would not lay stress upon that point; his contention was that they had no right to send a mission to any Foreign Potentate or Sovereign without the facts and circumstances being recorded in the archives of the Foreign Office. It was idle and immaterial to say that Mr. Errington was not paid; there were embassies upon which plenty of gentlemen would be perfectly ready to serve for the honour of the mission. Nor was the comparison made between the mission of Mr. Errington and the messages intrusted to Lord O'Hagan a fair one; it was quite erroneous. It was true that a gentleman like Lord O'Hagan might very well receive a message to deliver in case he met the person for whom it was intended; but it was quite different when a gentleman went to reside in Rome with a letter expressing the confidence of the Government in him as a medium of authentic communication. He would read a short extract in support of his view from a work which formed a proper complement to the work which they owed to Sir Erskine May. It was a book written by Mr. Alpheus Todd on the Constitutional history of this country. It was there pointed out that all the communications passing between the Foreign Secretary and the Representatives of the Crown abroad upon matters of public importance should be committed to writing, in order that a record might be preserved in the Foreign Office, and in due course submitted to Parliament. Now, he had never asked that any documents connected with Mr. Errington's mission should be submitted if it were inconvenient to do so. He had only contended that the Correspondence should be placed on record, so that when Her Majesty's Government came to leave Office they should leave in the archives of the Foreign Office some traces of the negotiations with the Vatican. There was another remarkable statement in another of Mr. Todd's works which had reference to the question of private letters. He said that communications frequently passed between the Foreign Secretary and diplomatic servants abroad. These letters were strictly secret; but, as Mr. Todd pointed out, they had been severely animadverted upon in Parliament. However, it was the opinion of Lord Wodehouse, Lord Clarendon, and others that these private letters were indispensable. He maintained that Lord Granville, in his recent dealings with the Vatican and the Court of Rome, had established a system of secret diplomacy. I was a system which he conceived to be dangerous to this country, not because Lord Granville obtained information that was not given to Parliament or to his Successors, but hereafter, when the Government was changed, sooner or later it might be found that certain assurances had been given to Rome or received by England which were not on record. Thus, the continuity of their diplomatic correspondence would be severed, and in a manner full of peril to the country. His first knowledge of this matter, after some private letters which he received, was derived from the Roman Catholic Bishop of Salford, who made a most eloquent speech on diplomatic relations between this country and the Vatican, making special allusion to Mr. Errington's mission. The Bishop said that Mr. Errington was in Rome, but had no strict mission from the Government. He held a letter of confidence, so that he might be a medium of direct communications between the Government and the Holy See, without any salary or regular appointment. Now, in the time of the late Pope it was a recognized thing that a Representative of Her Majesty's Government should be stationed at Rome; but all the despatches written to him or from him were laid on the Table of the House. He (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) stated on good authority the other day that Cardinal Jacobini had informed Mr. Errington that he would be received as the "recommended agent of the British Government." A great many people who had been to Rome stated that Mr. Errington was received in that capacity by the Vatican; and he should like to know whether Lord Granville ever saw the letter which verified these statements? Cardinal Jacobini received Mr. Errington in that capacity. Lord Granville, as everyone knew, wrote a letter with regard to Mr. Errington's mission. The Bishop of Salford said this letter had been written and submitted to Cardinal Jacobini. He (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) did not object to communications with the See of Rome. He believed it was absolutely necessary that there should be an understanding with the powers of the Vatican. He felt it the more because he knew that Mr. Errington had been sent to Rome with the view of arranging matters with regard to Ireland. Well, he was afraid Mr. Errington had not succeeded. At all events, he had tried to succeed. That he had been engaged in important negotiations no one could doubt, for had they not seen Mr. Errington, an Irish Member, coming to England in hot haste to vote for the clôture, and then hurrying back to Rome, after only a couple of days' stay in this country? Would this have happened had not Mr. Errington some very important business on hand? But, while he saw reasons for the appointment of Mr. Errington, he could not reconcile the statements made at different times by the Prime Minister with the statements made by the Bishop of Salford. The Bishop of Salford eloquently described the enormous power which the Pope exercised over the Christian community throughout the world. The Pope was spoken of by the Bishop as the Supreme Director of Men's Souls, and he added—"If there be a moral power on the earth, it resides in the Pope." And then the Bishop proceeded to say that it was an undisputed fact that the Pope exercised great moral power and authority through the territories of the British Empire. He could scarcely reconcile the reasons which the Bishop of Salford gave for the sending of Mr. Errington to Rome with the powerful protests against the influence of the Vatican made by the present Prime Minister when the late Government were in power. He had read a book on the Vatican decrees in their bearing on civil allegiance. It was there claimed that the loyalty of the subject and his civil duty were placed at the mercy of a Foreign Potentate; and in a subsequent work the right hon. Gentleman asserted with regard to the Vatican decrees that, in the strictest sense, they claimed for the Pope a supreme power over loyalty and civil duty of the subject. And these works were published as protests against that pretension. It was to the Pope that the right hon. Gentleman now appealed; and he must say that he did not wonder that the Government wished to conceal the Correspondence. There could be no doubt that the difficulty at Gibraltar helped to lead up to Mr. Errington's mission; and the Bishop of Salford made some significant allusions to that subject. It was in consequence of that understanding with the Pope that a most monstrous oppression, as he could prove from Blue Books laid before the House, had been committed by the Colonial Office against the Roman Catholic inhabitants of Gibraltar; and that had been done against the wishes and the advice of the Governor of Gibraltar himself. He would ask the House to allow him for one moment to enter into this Correspondence about the Gibraltar business, because he maintained that a great wrong had been done by Her Majesty's Government towards the Roman Catholic inhabitants of Gibraltar. For some time there had been a feeling of great bitterness between the laity and the clergy of the Roman Catholic Church in Gibraltar with regard to the administration of temporalities of their Church. The laity complained, on many occasions, that the clergy endeavoured to have the administration of property which did not belong to them. In September, 1869, Lord Granville, then Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in his enthusiasm for disestablishment, wanted to disestablish the Church at Gibraltar, and gave instructions that the churches and chapels there should be handed over to the different communions. On the death of the late Vicar Apostolic a new one was named, who, for different reasons, was unpalatable to the managing junta of elders. Until Mr. Errington went to Rome Her Majesty's Government had taken the part of the congregation, and made representations to the Holy See against the appointment of Dr. Canilla as the new Vicar Apostolic. In October, 1881, however, the Vatican having declined to accede to a Memorial that the appointment should be withdrawn, Lord Kimberley, in a despatch to Lord Napier of Magdala, as Governor, took a different view from that which the Ministry had previously held. It appeared that Mr. Weld was sent to Gibraltar to settle the dispute as to the appointment of Dr. Canilla. Lord Napier of Magdala, writing on the subject of Mr. Weld's mission, said it was not clear what his object or intentions were; but it seemed to be highly necessary that this Church scandal should come to an end; and it appeared that nobody would accept the appointment of Dr. Canilla as his pastor, and the dispute would probably lead to violence. The mission of Mr. Weld, so far from settling the question, very much aggravated the feeling against the appointment of Dr. Canilla. Mr. Weld said he would not leave Gibraltar until he had fulfilled his mission. He declined to produce any credentials from the Pope. That appeared from the Report of the Attorney General; and this also—that in consequence of the irritated feeling of the majority of the Roman Catholics, it would be necessary that the police and military should always be present at the ministrations of Dr. Canilla. It was shown that the Roman Catholics had, from time immemorial, had a right to the management of the temporalities of the Church, and that a feeling of great dissatisfaction prevailed as to the way in which those temporalities had been disposed of. It was for the Secretary of State to determine whether it was necessary or expedient for the Government to interfere with regard to the appointment, and it was shown that such a course as that threatened could only have the effect of bringing the local authorities in conflict with the inhabitants, and that the gravest consequences might ensue. What was the answer of Lord Kimberley? The noble Lord seemed to have acted in a manner which was quite inexplicable in the case of one of his enlightened judgment. He gave orders that measures should at once be taken to enforce obedience to the law and to enable the Vicar Apostolic, or other ecclesiastical authorities, legally constituted, to have access to the Church buildings from which one clergyman, who had gone over to take possession, had been expelled. But who had said that this Vicar Apostolic was legally constituted? The people said "No;" and yet Lord Kimberley, without giving any reasons for so doing, ordered the Governor of Gibraltar, in the most discourteous manner, to make use of force in order that this Vicar Apostolic might be installed. There was no despatch after that of Sir Augustus Paget; but it seemed as if there must have been some sort of secret communication with the Pope, whereby it was ascertained that he considered the new Vicar Apostolic properly constituted. Lord Kimberley, therefore, ordered the troops which on the last occasion had been employed ineffectually against the Boers to be more effectually employed against the inhabitants of Gibraltar. Lord Napier, who seemed to foresee the difficulties of the situation, then wrote that he regretted that the situation remained unchanged, and that there was no indication of conciliation. The course the local Government had taken from the commencement was with the object of not identifying the Government with a question of Church discipline, and of the appointment of a dignitary whose installation was strenuously opposed by the population. In reply to that letter, Lord Kimberley renewed his orders, and ignored the tone of remonstrance in which Lord Napier wrote. He said he had carefully considered the despatch of Lord Napier, and, while approving the general policy therein referred to, he must impress the paramount obligation of preventing disorder. He went on to say that his instructions contained in his last letter must be observed in their integrity, and maintained as long as required. In that despatch Lord Kimberley, who in 1869 had sought to disestablish the Church at Gibraltar for some secret reason, gave the most peremptory orders without, apparently, inquiring into the merits of the case, and against the opinion of Lord Napier, instructing him to take steps to force the congregation out of the church, and impose on them a Vicar Apostolic who was distasteful to them. The result was that the congregation were ejected, the troops violently invaded the Church, the doors were broken in, and many people arrested. And all that seemed to be done for no earthly reason except that which was stated by the Bishop of Salford—namely, that Mr. Errington might obtain a good understanding with the Church of Rome. He (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) made this Motion in no spirit of hostility towards the Church of Rome itself. On the contrary, he was of opinion that there should be a free and full understanding between the Government and the authorities of the Roman Catholic Church, and that we should try to conciliate the members of that communion in Ireland and in other parts; but he maintained that it was an unconstitutional and unfair act on the part of the Government to keep Papers concealed in such a manner that they would not be handed down to the successor of the present Minister at the Foreign Office. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

Sir William Harcourt

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, while recognising the value of a good understanding between this Country and the Papal See, this House is of opinion that all communications between any of Her Majesty's Ministers and the authorities of the Vatican should be placed on official record in accordance with the constitutional practice in diplomatic affairs, and should be conducted with the cognizance of Parliament."—(Sir Henry Wolff.)

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, it was the intention of my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir Charles W. Dilke) to have followed the hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir H. Drummond Wolff), because on various points he is more conversant with the particulars of this question than I am; but, at the same time, as regards the main points of the hon. Gentleman's speech, and the very decided objections that the Government entertain to his Motion, I think I may, without any fear, undertake to state them. Now, Sir, when I listened to the hon. Gentleman throughout his interesting statement, what I was struck with most was the power of imagination by which, having got hold of a very few fragmentary circumstances, being driven on by an intense suspicion of those with whom he is dealing, and being abundantly gifted with creative imagination, he has constructed a scheme and a system out of the very slenderest materials, which, when you come to notice and point out the defects of the evidence, entirely crumbles to the ground and vanishes. That I believe to be the state of the case with the hon. Gentleman; and he will be able to judge himself, in some degree, whether I am at all warranted in making a statement of that kind. The last moiety of the speech of the hon. Gentleman was taken up with, as it appears to me, an unwarrantable attack upon my noble Friend Lord Kimberley, with reference to a series of transactions in Gibraltar, which, no doubt, are of considerable interest. The hon. Gentleman founds his allusions to these transactions on a statement in the speech of a Roman Catholic Bishop in this country in reference to them; and this Roman Catholic Bishop gives his own opinion, or hypothesis, that something that has been done in Gibraltar has probably arisen from what the hon. Gentleman persists in calling the "mission" of Mr. Errington. Well, Sir, it is a fair enough point that is raised by the hon. Gentleman—a very fair and a very fit subject for discussion; but, at the same time, I cannot admit the correctness of his remarks upon it. His statement is that Lord Kimberley has insisted that the Governor of Gibraltar and the Roman Catholic community should accept Dr. Canilla as Vicar Apostolic. Now, Sir, that is a very serious affair, on which I must say it appeared to me that the extracts read by the hon. Gentleman did not, in the faintest degree, bear out his statement. No extract which the hon. Gentleman read contained any such instruction to the Governor of Gibraltar. Again, the hon. Gentleman says that Mr. Errington was at work as a secret agent in this matter. That is, doubtless, a very fair subject for discussion upon the Papers before us; but I would point out that in those Papers Mr. Errington does not at all appear, and that there is no evidence of any necessity for the Government to work through a secret agent, for there is a public agent, Sir Augustus Paget, who appears as the agent and the organ of the British Government. The hon. Gentleman has also referred to certain conduct of Lord Kimberley, founded on the proceedings of Sir Augustus Paget, and has stated that Mr. Errington was employed, with the sanction of the Secretary of State for the Colonies, in some communication which, it appears, he has been able to hold with the Vatican. I was not aware that he would have been able to hold such communication. There it is, and I see no reason to be ashamed of it. I see no reason to disapprove of it. There is a certain despatch of Lord Kimberley's, founded, apparently, upon Sir Augustus Paget's proceedings. I need not say that I do not admit the charges against Lord Kimberley which the hon. Gentleman has made; but I am not prepared to defend Lord Kimberley, simply because I know nothing about it. What I am in a position to say is, that I believe that a matter more purely imaginative than to say, as the hon. Gentleman has done, that Mr. Errington has been at work as the agent of the British Government in regard to this affair at Gibraltar never was concocted by an ingenious mind. I have the strongest conviction that Lord Kimberley never would, either by himself or in conjunction with Lord Granville, empower Mr. Errington to act in that capacity without making the circumstance known to me; and I can only say that, except by the hon. Gentleman, I have never in my life heard the name of Mr. Errington mentioned in connection with these proceedings at Gibraltar; and I beg, therefore, entirely to withhold my belief from that which the hon. Gentleman has, in perfect good faith, imagined, and my assent to his Motion in so far as that very important, if not main, prop of his Motion, which is founded upon this supposition—namely, that there has been a course of action by Mr. Errington in this matter on the part of the Government—is concerned. Well, then, the hon. Gentleman founds himself upon two suppositions. One of them is that Lord Granville had organized, through Mr. Errington, a system of secret diplomacy, and the other is that it is perfectly clear that Mr. Errington is now occupied at Rome in some important and secret business with the Vatican. Sir, with regard to Mr. Errington's return to Rome, I can only say that, so far as I am acquainted with the facts—and I apprehend if Lord Granville had organized this system of secret diplomacy he would have made me conversant with what he was about—Mr. Errington has returned to Rome upon purely private considerations. Moreover, I have heard—I rather think I have known—that Mr. Errington did acquaint Lord Granville, that there was a private consideration which made him anxious to return to Rome. He takes a very great interest, I believe, founded upon personal acquaintance—but I am not able to say whether that acquaintance is intimate or not—he takes a great interest in the promotion of Dr. M'Cabe, Archbishop of Dublin, to the Cardinalate, and as the ceremonial connected with Dr. M'Cabe's advancement was to take place after Easter, I believe Mr. Errington returned to Rome on that account. I am giving you this information merely as that which I have had no recent opportunity of verifying, so as to be precisely accurate. I merely give it as what I think to be the case; but what I will state positively to be the case, so far as I know—so far as my knowledge goes—is that Mr. Errington has no mission of any kind at this moment, and no purpose in view with regard to an agency of any kind in connection with Her Majesty's Government. I hope the hon. Gentleman will clearly and distinctly understand me in that sense; but, whether he does or does not so understand me, I trust the House will. The hon. Gentleman has done me the great honour to refer to certain publications of mine, and I am always very glad when I find that any individual, and especially if he happens to be an opponent, has conferred upon me the very great compliment of reading anything that I have written. But I am afraid the hon. Member, although he has quoted me, has not read the book. [SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: Yes; I have.] Then, sir, I am extremely sorry to say, if he has read the book, he has not profited by it. He has not remembered the book, for I am quite sure if he had remembered it he would not have made the citation that he has made. He would have made his citation such as to convey a true account of what was stated by me upon that occasion. He has quoted from me the statement that, under the decrees of the Vatican Council, the Pope had made claims upon the civil allegiance of English and Irish and Scotch Roman Catholics, which placed their civil allegiance at his mercy. Having made that half quotation, he says that I, who made that allegation when I was out of Office, now that I am in Office have committed myself upon those claims of the Pope of Rome, and have made a request to him to act upon those powers to which I have so greatly objected formerly; "and no wonder, therefore," says the hon. Gentleman, "the Prime Minister is very anxious, under these circumstances, to conceal the correspondence on this subject." Now, I am going to destroy the entire fabric of the hon. Gentleman's imagination. It is quite true that I stated in that publication that the claims made on behalf of His Holiness did amount to a claim of command over civil allegiance; but if the hon. Gentleman will kindly refer—though he has an advantage over me, for I am stating now from recollection of writings to which I have not recently referred—to those publications, and make himself thoroughly acquainted with them, he will find I stated that those claims of mastery over civil allegiance were not recognized by the Roman Catholic subjects of the Queen, and that their loyalty and civil allegiance were perfectly undisputed. Therefore, how could I appeal to those claims of the Pope over the Roman Catholic subjects of the Queen, when I myself had declared in print that the Roman Catholic subjects of the Queen, so far as I was able to judge, did not allow those claims? I hope, therefore, the hon. Gentleman will see that I have no great motive for concealing any correspondence, if there had been any—which there is not—between Mr. Errington and myself. The hon. Gentleman says there is no analogy between the case of Lord O'Hagan and Mr. Errington. There is a very great analogy between them. Essentially, they are precisely the same. Mr. Errington is not what the hon. Gentleman supposed. He says to-day he sees no importance in the question whether Mr. Errington is paid or not. He sees no importance in it now; but, unless I am mistaken, he did so a short time ago, when he came forward with a positive statement that the hon. Gentleman was paid for his services.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: I said that his expenses were paid, and I believe they were.

MR. GLADSTONE: Very well; the hon. Member says that his expenses were paid. The hon. Gentleman saw great importance in the point before; but my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, stretching a good deal—out of deference to the hon. Gentleman—the wise and salutary rule of public action, has stated that he was entirely mistaken with regard to it. To-day the hon. Member says that he dismisses that subject from his mind; but if he continues to believe that those expenses are paid, he ought to have some evidence to give in support of that belief. Really he is not entitled—it is not fair, it is not just—in the face of a distinct and official contradiction from my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, whom he has drawn into the field, to state as that which he believes that which my hon. Friend near me has taken upon himself to deny. I will say, then, for myself, that Mr. Errington is not a paid agent of Her Majesty's Government. I say that the hon. Gentleman is really quite mistaken in supposing that Lord Granville has organized a system of secret diplomacy, and for this plain reason, that he has organized no system whatever. Mr. Errington, as has been stated again and again in this House, went to Rome on his own account; and, as he went to Rome on his own account, Lord Granville availed himself of the opportunity offered by the journey to Rome of a Gentleman, a Member of Parliament, an Irishman, a man of high intelligence, and entirely to be trusted and relied on as deeply attached to his country, to carry certain communications with respect to the state of Ireland to the Vatican, and then to assist the Pope in completing his knowledge on the subject. Those communications were transmitted to the Vatican through Mr. Errington, without any reference to the claims of the Pope in 1870. The British Government has known for a very long time that the Pope was a great social power in every country, and perhaps in Ireland more than any other country, where there are a very large mass of Roman Catholic believers. He is a great social power, and in a time of great social disturbance, Lord Granville was desirous that the Pope should be well informed on the subject. He found more than one Gentleman going to Rome whom he could trust to carry this information, and he made use of both of the two channels referred to, the difference between Lord O'Hagan and Mr. Errington being that Mr. Errington went first, and that he stayed longer. But to convey information was not the purpose of Mr. Errington's visit, as far as the Government are acquainted with it, because we have no control over the private and personal action of Mr. Errington in Rome. To convey information was a purpose which he undertook to fulfil on the part of the Government; and I believe I am strictly correct in saying that, while conveying that information, we submitted no request whatever to the Pope at Rome. The hon. Gentleman's statement that secret communications were going on is wholly destitute of foundation. Mr. Errington has been in England, but I have not seen him. My belief is, that his return to Rome was a return for personal purposes, and, if I am rightly informed, he had a natural reason for going back to Rome. It is not for me to say—I have no reason to know—whether he intends to prolong his stay there or not; but it is quite plain that the hon. Gentleman is interested in the installation of a Cardinal there, and it has nothing to do with any secret system of diplomacy. The hon. Gentleman refers to an expression, which he seems to place great stress upon, that Mr. Errington was described, with the knowledge of Lord Granville, as an agente raccomandato, or "recommended agent," of the British Government. I cannot from recollection say whether that was so or not; but I believe it is perfectly possible that it was the fact. If the hon. Member will only limit the interpretation to be placed upon that phrase, it may be quite correct that the expression was used even with the knowledge of Lord Granville. That Mr. Errington was "recommended" is perfectly true; but then he was not a well-known public character, not a man like Lord O'Hagan, who had for many years played an important part in the Roman Catholic community of Ireland, and borne the Office, which he has only just surrendered, of Lord Chancellor of Ireland. Mr. Errington was recommended not, I believe, by any letter from Lord Granville with authority, but by a letter from Lord Granville to Mr. Errington himself, in which Lord Granville put Mr. Errington in a condition to show, if he found it necessary, that he was a man on whose honour and intelligence the most entire reliance could be placed by any Government. We may take it, then, that he was recommended. Was he an agent? Well, any Member can carry a message, and any man who carries a message for you is an agent. I was myself in 1845 an agent of Lord Aberdeen, and, as the agent of Lord Aberdeen, I undertook a commission which I think had reference to the question of International Copyright. That commission I was asked to fulfil, and I did fulfil, in Paris, by a communication with M. Guizot. I was a recommended agent at that moment. I stayed in Paris for 24 or 48 hours, and then, on leaving my agency and my commission alike, I fell to the ground. In this limited sense, therefore, I am prepared to admit that Mr. Errington is an agente raccomandato. He is a person recommended, because we have the attestation of Lord Granville as to his ability; but I am not aware that at this moment he has any agency whatever in his hands. Now, Sir, I hope I have in some degree fulfilled the promise I made to dissipate the vague shadows which have been cast over this subject on the conduct of Her

Mr. Gladstone

Majesty's Government through the active and powerful imagination of the hon. Gentleman. With regard to the Motion of the hon. Gentleman, I cannot agree to it for reasons which I will state in a very few words. First of all there is a Preamble to the Motion, in which the hon. Gentleman speaks of the "irregular and clandestine communications now passing between Her Majesty's Government and the Vatican." That Preamble is intended to give point to the Motion, and therefore I comment upon it to this extent, to say that I am not aware of any communications of any sort now going on upon these matters. There were communications connected with conveying any certain information which we thought it most desirable that the Vatican should be possessed of; but those communications are not, so far as I know, communications now going on. Then, Sir, comes the Motion of the hon. Gentleman, and he asks the House to commit itself to a declaration—

"That, while recognizing the value of a good understanding between this Country and the Papal See, this House is of opinion that all communications between any of Her Majesty's Ministers and the authorities of the Vatican should be placed on official record in accordance with the Constitutional practice in diplomatic affairs, and should be conducted with the cognizance of Parliament."

Now, Sir, I do not understand the meaning of those words. Does he mean that there ought to be distinct diplomatic relations with the Papal See? I have heard the hon. Gentleman declare himself to that effect. Well, Sir, that is an opinion which it is perfectly competent for him or for any Member of this House to hold; but it is one upon which possibly there may be great diversity of opinion amongst us. But this I will say—that it is a subject upon which, in my opinion, it would be most undesirable for the House to make any declaration in the shape of a formal vote, unless it perfectly knows what it means by that declaration, and unless, if there is a substantive meaning in the words, there be a disposition to give effect to the substantive meaning. Now, Sir, for my own part, I am not prepared to commit the Government to any opinion on the point without having taken the advice of my Colleagues in reference to it. I rather have an opinion about it myself, and my opinion would lead me to think twice or thrice before I concurred in the words of the hon. Gentleman. But that is not my point. My point is that no declaration could be wisely or prudently made. The hon. Member has, of course, a perfect right to his opinions; but the making of any such declaration, especially if in vague and ambiguous terms, would tend, I think, to create a good deal of misapprehension, and, perhaps, not a little suspicion out-of-doors, and would do a very great deal towards preventing a good understanding—if a good understanding means that we are always to deal with charity with all mankind, and to give everyone credit for doing that which he thinks to be right according to his character and constitution. That may be all very true; but I do not think that sort of good understanding would be at all promoted by passing this Motion. Then the hon. Member says, in his Motion, that he objects to certain communications between the Vatican and Her Majesty's Government—I believe there are none—because, he says, they ought all to be placed on official record. Well, the hon. Gentleman himself has let fall words in the course of his speech, and has even quoted authorities, showing that all communications are not placed upon official record. Surely he is perfectly well aware that very important private correspondence is carried on between a Minister of State and all the great Embassies and Missions of this country; but these private communications are never placed upon official record; and it would be perfectly untrue—I can hardly think the hon. Gentleman can suppose that everything is so recorded, although, as I have said, I did hear him let fall some expressions of the kind in one of his many speeches on this subject—but it is perfectly untrue to state that these communications are placed upon official record, either at the time that they are written, or at any subsequent period. These communications contain, undoubtedly, very important portions of the integral communications between the Foreign Minister and the agent abroad, but they are never placed upon record. The House of Commons ought not to commit itself to a proposition so precipitate and so much at variance with the perfectly well-understood practice of all Governments in all times, as the proposition that all communication between any of Her Majesty's Ministers and the authorities of the Vatican should be placed on special record. I will, however, go so far to meet the hon. Gentleman as this—that if Her Majesty's Government should see fit to organize what he calls a system of diplomacy, or anything that any right-minded man could call a system of communication between this country and the See of Rome, I then agree to join hands with the hon. Gentleman, and I will agree that these means ought to be taken. I do not say for giving in that case, more than in any other case, absolute publicity of everything that is said; but to place communications of that kind on the same official footing as communications with other Embassies and Missions, I cannot agree. But my point is, that nothing of the kind exists; that a special and temporary function was undertaken by Mr. Errington upon the happy and convenient occasion of his going to Rome, as it was on a similar occasion by Lord O'Hagan, and as it might be by any other Gentleman; and unless I am entirely ignorant of the proceedings of my Colleagues—and I think I am not so—no such communications now exist. The subject-matter upon which the hon. Gentleman has fastened his suspicion is no longer in a condition to be made the subject of comment, because the purpose of Mr. Errington's proceedings has been served in conveying the information that was to be conveyed, and that information neither involved any proposal on our part, or any request on our part, or any necessity for the conveyance of those proceedings. I hope, therefore, that the hon. Gentleman will not press his Motion further upon the House.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he concurred with the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister in the recommendation that his hon. Friend (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) should not press his Motion, for the proposal it contained was inconsistent with the Common Law, which established Her Majesty's supremacy, and with the Diplomatic Relations Act, which was passed in 1848 to establish commercial relations and other relations between this country and the then Sovereign of the Pontifical States. That Statute carefully declared the supremacy of Her Majesty. When that measure was before the House of Lords, a most important debate took place, in consequence of which that most loyal of Her Majesty's subjects whom he (Mr. Newdegate) ever knew, the late Duke of Wellington, deemed it necessary to insert the 3rd clause, guarding Her Majesty's supremacy in all parts of her Dominions, unless modified by Treaty. He (Mr. Newdegate) found that Gibraltar was ceded to the English Crown in full Sovereignty by the Treaty of 1814. He was not surprised, therefore, that Lord Napier, as Governor, was surprised, and found himself in a very awkward position, when he had to deal with a person who claimed to have been appointed Vicar Apostolic, and who would not produce his credentials but presumed to take upon himself the regulation of the Roman Catholic ecclesiastical property in Gibraltar. But there was another matter. He (Mr. Newdegate) could quite understand the suspicion which was very generally felt with regard to the position of Mr. Errington, because the public were perfectly aware of the state of the Common Law in this country, which retained to Her Majesty and to Parliament full Sovereignty in matters ecclesiastical as well as civil; and that was most carefully guarded by the Act of 1848. The Pope was no longer Sovereign of the Pontifical States; therefore, the Common Law excluding his ecclesiastical and spiritual authority was in full vigour to prevent any diplomatic relations with the Holy See. He could not vote for the Resolution of his hon. Friend, whose ability he so much respected, because he should be voting against the Diplomatic Relations Act of 1848; at the same time he thought his hon. Friend had done an eminently useful service in bringing the subject under the notice of the House. But his hon. Friend proposed that this country should enter into communications with the Pope with reference to the property and the rights of Her Majesty's subjects at Gibraltar, and he (Mr. Newdegate) could not vote for that, for it was contrary to the Common Law. His hon. Friend was, no doubt, right in calling the attention of Parliament to the fact that there was strong reason for believing that the Common Law had been evaded in this instance. That, however, was a totally different matter from the substance of his Motion; and he thought that the speech of the Roman Catholic Bishop of Salford, which his hon. Friend had quoted, was very cleverly devised to pave the way for breaking up the protection given by the Common Law. The Common Law protected all Roman Catholic property, excepting monastic property, most carefully; but it retained to itself the right of judging whether that property was duly, legally, and loyally appropriated; and he had no doubt the Roman Catholic Bishop of Salford would like to see that jurisdiction transferred to the Vatican. He (Mr. Newdegate) was quite sure that the House was not prepared for that transfer; and that his hon. Friend did not wish, under the cover of diplomatic relations, to sanction uncontrolled interference on the part of the Vatican in Gibraltar, the entire Sovereignty of which belonged to Her Majesty under the Treaty of 1814. Though he thanked his hon. Friend, then, most sincerely for having stated the grounds for the very strong suspicion that certain communications had been made to the Pope, which were inconsistent with the Common Law, and inconsistent, therefore, with Her Majesty's supremacy, he regretted that the Resolution was drawn up in terms which rendered it impossible for him (Mr. Newdegate) to support it.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he must confess that it was with considerable relief he heard the Prime Minister's statement disclaiming all knowledge as to the proceedings that had taken place in Gibraltar. A Motion was on the Paper in his (Sir George Campbell's) name which had fallen to the ground; but he was glad to know that whatever had been done had not been done by the authority of the Prime Minister or of the Government, but as a purely Departmental affair, and might be criticized as such. He was also very glad indeed to hear the ground on which the Prime Minister opposed the Motion of the hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir H. Drummond Wolff), for he (Sir George Campbell) himself was strongly opposed to the Motion on the grounds stated by the Prime Minister. Neither the House nor the country were prepared to resuscitate the long suppressed diplomatic relations between Her Majesty's Government and the See of Rome. On several occasions, when questions of that kind had been brought forward in the House, he expressed his opinion to that effect; and, while disclaiming acting on what was called Scotch prejudice in this matter, had done so on political grounds, and so adhered to the old principles of the country. He had served a good deal over the world, and had seen a good many religions, and it was on political grounds he adhered to the old principle that it was better this country should not interfere diplomatically with the Vatican, but keep civil matters entirely apart from ecclesiastical matters and power. In this country, as regarded Ireland, at least, we had adopted the principle of levelling down in matters of religion; and it would be an unwise departure from that principle to enter into special relations with any foreign ecclesiastical authority. The connection between Church and State had been injurious throughout the world; and he hoped that we should take that lesson to heart, and that there would be no disposition towards a renewal of the diplomatic communications between the Government of this country and Rome. There was great temptation in the circumstances of Ireland to use the social influence of the Pope, in the way which the Prime Minister had explained, for the purpose of quieting and conciliating Ireland; but, in that respect, he thought he might quote the old adage, that "bad cases make bad law," and so a temporary advantage might end in the adoption of a bad line of policy. He hoped and believed Her Majesty's Government would have no difficulty in avoiding entering into communication with Rome of such a nature in any degree as to cause the Pope to expect any return from them. With regard to the Gibraltar matter, they had been told it was not the action of the Government, but simply of a Department; and it seemed to him that they ought to be on their guard against supporting or countenancing, in such cases, the influence of a centralized ecclesiastical authority. There was a great temptation on the part of the Government to support authority; but the great objection to the centralized power of the Pope was that it had too great influence and authority in the affairs of this and other countries. It seemed to him that they ought to encourage the aspirations of those Roman Catholics who were not inclined to submit to the great centralization of the See of Rome and to the too infallible power of the Pope, but who were, on the contrary, rather inclined to assert the rights of the laity; they should respect the rights of a National Catholic Church as they would any other Church. There were several instances in which it had been made plain that the Roman Catholic laity were not inclined to submit to this foreign domination. An analogous case arose in Bombay, and he was glad that the India Office had taken a different view in the matter from that of the Government of Bombay, and refused to interfere. But in this case the Colonial Office had taken the part of the Pope's nominee, and put him in possession. He trusted this debate would lead the Prime Minister to consider the subject. They knew that, if he had not absolute authority over the different Departments, he had a moral authority; and he trusted the right hon. Gentleman would look into the matter, and see whether the India Office was right, or the Colonial Office was right. He hoped the matter would be settled, and that there would be no clashing between the Departments of the Government, and that a uniform policy would be followed. That policy, he hoped, would be in favour of a free Church, and non-interference with a Church not established by law and having no connection with the Government. That would be the only safe policy to pursue.

MR. COURTNEY said, the Motion of the hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) condemned certain irregular communications which were supposed to have passed between the Vatican and Her Majesty's Government; but the discussion had drifted into the question of the appropriate action of the Colonial Government in a matter arising at Gibraltar. He should almost have thought the discussion was not pertinent to that subject. The full extent of the connection of the Vatican with what happened at Gibraltar appeared in the Blue Book, and entirely disproved the assertion that the two questions had any relation, and showed that the visit of Mr. Errington to the Vatican was not in any way connected with Gibraltar. The question was a totally distinct one. As to the policy of the action taken in Gibraltar, he (Mr. Courtney) would confess that he thought, when the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) went into the matter more closely, and read the pages again, he would find that the conduct of Her Majesty's Government in the affair at Gibraltar entirely corresponded with the principles which he had laid down. In Gibraltar they had treated the authorities of the Roman Catholic Church in the same way as they would have done the trustees of a Particular Baptist Chapel. They had simply given notice that the peace should be preserved, and that Dr. Canilla should be freed from molestation on his way to and from the Cathedral. The Government looked upon the Roman Catholic Church as a free Church in a free State. The hon. Member for Portsmouth had said that the Government was prejudging the rights of the laity in the matter; but it was not a fact that the Government was prejudging those rights at all. The rights of the laity, as they had been established in Gibraltar, were far above the action of the Government.

MR. WARTON: I rise to Order; the hon. Gentleman is not addressing the House, but the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy.

MR. COURTNEY, in continuation, said, the Government did not, in the slightest degree, attempt to prejudge or interfere with the rights of the laity, who could appeal, first, to the Court at Gibraltar, and then to the Privy Council. The action of the Colonial Office had been simply confined to the preservation of peace and order at Gibraltar, and the rights of the laity to the Church or the temporalities of the Church remained precisely where they were. They could submit their claims, if they chose, to a legal tribunal.

MR. BELLINGHAM said, that he should like to know if there was any prospect of opening communications with the Vatican; for, at the present moment, there seemed great misconception on the point? The Act passed in 1848 contained a clause providing that no ecclesiastic of the Roman Catholic Church should be received in this country as Representative of the Vatican; but if that provision were repealed, there would be nothing to prevent diplomatic relations being established between this country and the Vatican. It was immaterial to Catholics whether a Liberal or a Conservative Administration brought such a change about, for it was the wish of the Holy See; and, considering the fact that Prince Bismarck, who had been one of the upholders of ultra-Protestantism in Germany, had been obliged lately to open communications with the Vatican, he did not see why communications should not be opened by this country with the Papal See.

Sir George Campbell

MR. WARTON said, he was sorry that the discussion on the Resolution of his hon. Friend (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) had involved matters which seemed to him extraneous to the important question that the House had to consider. He did not care to inquire whether they ought to have diplomatic relations with the Vatican, or even to have a good understanding with it. The real object of the discussion was to ascertain what the Government had been doing in that matter; and he should have preferred a more simple Resolution than that of his hon. Friend, one declaring that the House regretted the recent correspondence with the See of Rome through Mr. Errington, or words to that effect. His hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth had alleged a number of facts to show that diplomatic proceedings had taken place. The Prime Minister met those allegations—first, by treating them as if they rested entirely upon pure imagination, characterizing them as the baseless fabric of a vision; and then he went on, step by step, to admit everything that had been charged. Mr. Errington, he allowed, was an agent; he had a letter of recommendation from Lord Granville, and, therefore, he was a recommended agent. Next, it was admitted that Mr. Errington was the special agent of the Government for some purpose. For what purpose? To inform His Holiness the Pope of something? Was it from pure benevolence to the Pope that they wished to tell him something which he did not know? It was to be presumed that, there being so many of the Clergy of his communion in Ireland, the Pope was well informed of what went on in that country. The extraordinary thing was that when they made their communication to the Pope they did not want an answer. It was said there was no answer, and they were, at the same time, told that at this moment no correspondence was going on. That meant, he (Mr. Warton) supposed, that the answer had not yet come; and then the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) got up and expressed his great delight that the Prime Minister, by his lucid statement, had dissipated every apprehension or objection on that subject. The hon. Member had not the wit to see that the Prime Minister had admitted everything. He (Mr. Warton) wanted to know whether the Prime Minister would lay upon the Table of the House the orders to Mr. Errington; next, the information which he gave to the Pope; and also state—as they were told there was nothing now going on—whether it was intended that nothing should go on?

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF, in reply, said, he must adhere to his previous assertions, notwithstanding the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister. He (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) maintained that Lord Kimberley had ordered the Governor of Gibraltar to send troops to instal the Vicar Apostolic, and to enable him to have full and free access, without molestation of any kind, to the Cathedral and Presbytery. The right hon. Gentleman had now acknowledged that Mr. Errington was an agente raccomandato; and what he (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) maintained was, that if Mr. Errington was a recommended agent, there should have been some record placed in the Foreign Office to show in what capacity he had been recommended. The right hon. Gentlemen had gone on to say that private letters were constantly addressed to our recommended agents or other diplomatists abroad; but he (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) would contend that private letters ought only to be supplementary to a public despatch. He contended that the letter in question positively accredited Mr. Errington to Rome, and established him there as an agent. [MR. GLADSTONE: No.] It was no use discussing words in that way, and he would contend that the letter established Mr. Errington as an agent; that he was recommended by Her Majesty's Government; that that was a secret system of diplomacy; and that the Government were ashamed even to put on record in the Foreign Office what they had done. He had to complain that Lord Granville, speaking in "another place," had misquoted what he (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) had said in reference to Mr. Errington's expenses, and had given only a limited denial to it. He had never said that Mr. Errington's expenses had been paid out of the Secret Service Fund; but the right hon. Gentleman would not deny that they would be paid. Unless it was declared that Mr. Errington was never at any time to receive money from the Secret Service Fund for expenses, he would adhere to the statement that his expenses were a charge on that Fund. It was no use, he would admit, going on with the argument, as he was perfectly satisfied with the result of the debate. The right hon. Gentleman had endeavoured to involve the subject in mystery, but he had not succeeded. He had really admitted every statement he (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) had made, and was ashamed to put any of the communications which had passed on the Table. He begged to withdraw the Motion.

MR. GLADSTONE: No, no.

Question put, and negatived.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDERS (POOR LAW) (NO. 1) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. HIBBERT, Bill to confirm certain Orders of the Local Government Board under the provisions of "The Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1876," as amended and extended by "The Poor Law Act, 1879," relating to the parishes of Barmbrough, Burghwallis, Coleshill, Conisbrough, Forrest Hill, Hickleton, Inglesham, Kirk Bramwith, Kirk Sandall and Trumfleet, Shotover, and Shotover Hill Place, and to the townships of Adwick-le-Street, Askern, Barnby-upon-Don or Barnby Dunn, Campsall, Dalton, Ecclesfield, Helmington Row, Langthwaite-with-Tilts, Mexbrough, Moss, Owston, Thorpe-in-Balne, and Willington, ordered to be brought in by Mr. HIBBERT and Mr. DODSON.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (HIGHWAYS) PROVISIONAL ORDER (NO. 1) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. HIBBERT, Bill to confirm a Provisional Order of the Local Government Board under "The Highways and Locomotives (Amendment) Act, 1878," relating to the county of Kent, ordered to be brought in by Mr. HIBBERT and Mr. DODSON.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDERS (NO. 1) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. HIBBERT, Bill to confirm certain Provisional Orders of the Local Government Board relating to the City and County of Bristol, the Local Government District of Bromley, the Port of Cardiff, the Rural Sanitary District of the Glendale Union, the Borough of Hastings, the Local Government District of Merthyr Tydfil, the Boroughs of Newport (Monmouthshire) and Portsmouth, the Local Government District of Sandal Magna, and the Rural Sanitary District of the Ware Union, ordered to be brought in by Mr. HIBBERT and Mr. DODSON.

Sir H. Drummond Wolff

IMPERIAL TAXATION.

OBSERVATIONS.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA, in rising to call the attention of the House to the unequal Incidence of Imperial Taxation in Ireland; and to move for the appointment of a Select Committee—

"To inquire and report whether, since the year 1851, the new and additional Duties which have been levied off Ireland have not increased the pressure of Imperial Taxation on the population of that portion of the United Kingdom to such an extent, that, having regard to the total property and income of the inhabitants of each Island respectively, the Imperial Taxation of Ireland is now doubly heavier than that of Great Britain; whether the entire Imperial Taxation of Great Britain does not barely exceed the produce of an Income Tax of 2s. 6d. in the pound; and, whether that of Ireland does not exceed what would be produced by an Income Tax of 5s.," said, the case to which he asked their attention was quite distinct from that upon which a Committee of the House sat and reported in 1865. There was not any finding of that Committee which anticipated, answered, or decided in any way upon the issue raised by his present Motion, which was one for the appointment of a Committee to inquire into a state of facts without parallel in modern history, into a course of legislation for the last 29 years which had led to results without precedent in this or any other country in the world. Calling things by hard and bad names was not his habit, for that was neither proof nor argument; but it was almost impossible to find words in which to describe the financial policy pursued towards Ireland since 1853, unless one had recourse to very strong terms. His chief difficulty, however, was not to be moderate in referring to the injustice which had been done, but in finding words to describe the ignorance of hon. Members in former Parliaments and in this on the subject. Even this lack of information was scarcely so remarkable as the self-complacency with which those hon. Members seemed to contemplate the conduct of Great Britain and this Parliament towards Ireland in modern times, for it was not infrequent to hear the fiscal legislation for the United Kingdom referred to as if Ireland were in that respect a favoured and cherished sister. There never was a greater delusion. He (Sir Joseph M'Kenna) ought to know whether that was the true relation in which Ireland was dealt with or the true state of the case. He had no interest in misrepresenting England or Englishmen, and he said deliberately that he knew of no country in Europe, and that there was none except Ireland, in which so large a proportion of the total income of its people was levied by the State tax-man. He did not ascribe the evils of which he complained to intentional injustice. He could not believe that the injustice was designed, no matter how it had come about. He believed the right hon. Gentleman now at the head of Her Majesty's Government, when he instituted and led the way in 1853 to the system of taxation which had impoverished Ireland, deceived himself by assuming that identity of imposts was equivalent to, and almost synonymous with, equality of taxation. But this assumption was in the case of Great Britain and Ireland, and would probably be in the case of any two countries so linked together, a monstrous delusion. If there were but one tax on the inhabitants of both countries, and if that tax were an Income Tax, then he admitted that identity of impost would imply equitable distribution of burden. But when, as in the United Kingdom, a comparatively small portion of the Revenue was raised by an Income Tax, and the great bulk raised by sumptuary taxation levied on selected articles, equality could be ascertained only when they had analyzed and affirmed the fairness of the selection. And what was the test of the fairness of selection? It would be found when they had answered the following question:—Were the articles selected for taxation such as, under ordinary circumstances, were equally in demand, equally used, equally consumed in both countries? If they were not equally in demand and equally used in both countries, then identity of imposts might mean the very opposite to equality of taxation; and in the case of England and Ireland the selection made was the very reverse of equality. It was simply legalized injustice. But England and the English Minister had the selection, and they knew what had come of it. It would have been quite easy to have selected articles for taxation on an equally identical plan for the whole United Kingdom, which would have spared Ireland and worked unfairly against England. A moderate tax on cheese would fall heavily on the bulk of the English people, and scarcely affect the Irish in the least; a high scale of taxation on the alcohol of beer, and a lower one on the alcohol in distilled spirits, would be unfair towards the English people, and might be oppressively so. He mentioned these things to illustrate and explode the fallacy of assuming, as it was the habit to assume, that, as all the taxes affecting the Irish people also affected the English, there must be equality of taxation. He would show that these taxes were unequal and unfair in their incidence, that they favoured the richer country, and fell with extraordinary severity on the poorer and more temperate nation. He must now advert shortly to the relative taxation of Great Britain and Ireland anterior to the epoch of 1853. Could any hon. Member, who, from personal memory—as in his own case—or from authentic history, knew what was the condition of Ireland in 1841, or what it was in 1851, testify that Ireland was better able to pay the taxes then imposed upon her than Great Britain was to bear those which fell on herself? He did not apprehend that anyone would maintain seriously that Ireland was not in 1841, before the Famine, and in 1851, after the Famine, taxed as nearly to the full level of her ability to pay taxes as was Great Britain at either of those dates. But, lest there might be anyone ready to assert that Ireland was at either of those dates more lightly taxed relatively to her means than Great Britain, he would now inquire what was the total Revenue raised by the Imperial taxation of Ireland in 1841 and 1851? He referred to the Parliamentary Returns in his hands. In 1841 the Imperial Revenue raised by taxation in Ireland was slightly under £4,000,000. In 1851 it was slightly over £4,000,000. The Revenue raised by taxation of Great Britain in 1841 was over £46,000,000, and in 1851 it was over £49,000,000. At those dates, then, the Imperial taxation of Ireland amounted to a sum equal in round figures to one-twelfth of the sum raised in Great Britain. He would prove to any Committee of the House in more detail than was possible in his present statement that, relatively to the entire wealth of both Islands respectively, the contributions of Ireland to Imperial Revenue in 1841 and 1851 not only equalled but exceeded her equitable quota. Of that excess, however, he did not complain; it was not a proper subject for clamour or popular agitation, even if people understood it, which they did not. He merely referred now to the fact that even then the Irish quota was somewhat excessive in order to emphasize the statement and the fact that, nevertheless, in 1853 a new system was commenced for reducing the quota of taxation borne by England, and for securing the maximum contribution out of Ireland in relief of several Excise and Customs Duties of the United Kingdom, of which latter Ireland's share was scarcely equal to 5 per cent of the new burdens laid upon her. The financial result of the policy of 1853, which he would describe and explain before he sat down, was not long obscure nor long delayed. They would find by the Return in his hand that the Revenue raised by taxation in Ireland in 1861 was £6,420,378, as compared to £4,006,711 in 1851, forcing up on seven years' operation of the new policy the quota of the taxation of Ireland from a twelfth to a ninth, as compared to Great Britain. By the end of the next decennial period the taxation of Ireland was forced up to £7,086,593, or to within a fraction of one-eighth of the sum raised by taxation of Great Britain. This was the modern way of sowing dragon's teeth, with somewhat a parallel result to that of the ancient precedent. All this time illusory statements were being made under the auspices of Dublin Castle, not with the intention to deceive, but none the less deceptive on that account, and Ireland was represented as making great strides in material prosperity because her Revenue, or rather her tribute to the Imperial Revenue, was swollen by new taxes, and under favour of occasional good harvests, she struggled, and, as it turned out, struggled in vain, to make headway against the wasting process and the new impediments to her progress. There was, however, great joy in Downing Street as each fresh additional million was dredged out of Ireland, and poured into the abyss of the British Exchequer, in place of being allowed to remain with the people to reward Irish industry, and to help to fortify and provide the people against the lean years, bad harvests, and hard times which had since come with a vengeance. The vengeance, however, was not wholly for Ireland, for the problem of her pacification remained to be solved, and it would be well if all these millions rendered back could suffice for the solution in peace. He would now explain precisely how the new taxes came to be cast on Ireland in 1853, and how radically unjust they were. The explanation of what was done in that Session of Parliament practically explained the whole, for the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer then announced that he was going in for a system of identity of imposts, and it never appeared to dawn on his ingenuous mind that identity of imposts did not mean actual and equitable equality of taxation; and although other Chancellors of the Exchequer, other Governments, and other Parliaments had since then, from time to time, increased the Spirit Duties and varied the Income Tax, they merely proceeded in grooves defined and deeply cut for them by the legislation of 1853, which laid down the lines of a financial system which, save that it succeeded in extracting a greater Revenue from Ireland than ought ever to have been exacted, was at once unscientific, unjust, and unfortunate. He would next refer to the best records obtainable in an exact and statistical form of the total incomes of the inhabitants of the two Islands respectively, to the extent which the Income Tax Returns reached. He would not commence with the earliest years of the working of the Income Tax in Ireland, for all the sources of income were not at first made out; but he took the Returns for 1861, when the Income Tax had been seven years working. In that year the yield from Income Tax in Ireland was £715,269. In the same year the Income Tax for Great Britain was £9,755,938, which showed approximately taxable incomes 13 times greater in Great Britain than in Ireland. It should be borne in mind that these were the proportions they would find without descending to compare the earnings and incomes of the wage-earning classes in both Islands, in which he could show, were it necessary, that a still greater disparity existed; but he was not driven to force the figures by substituting estimates and hypothesis for statistics. On the contrary, he would make allowance for the fact that the rating of houses and lands in Ireland was made under the Poor Law, or Griffith's valuation, and, the rating in England was presumed to be taken at a fuller value, and, making other trivial allowances, he would adopt the conclusion that the rateable incomes of Great Britain under all the Schedules would indicate the relative ability of one Island to the other at that time as about 1 to 12. There was no rational theory to sustain an assumption that Ireland relatively to Great Britain was better able to bear taxes in 1853 than what the Returns of 1861 would denote; but, if such was the fact, so much the worse for those who argued in favour of the taxation scheme of 1853. It sufficed for him (Sir Joseph M'Kenna) to show that the taxation of Ireland in 1841 and 1851, being already as 1 to 12 of Great Britain, no fresh taxation should have been laid in 1853 on the poorer country, and he had explained that if Parliament were to have measured the taxation to be levied in Ireland by the Schedules prepared for the purposes of the Income Tax, the total contribution of Ireland to Revenue would have been laid down at a thirteenth of that of Great Britain. What excuse, therefore—what plausible pretext—what cogent reason was there for imposing upon unfortunate Ireland in the year 1853 a fresh burden destined to grow weightier and weightier year by year? He might answer that in truth there was, to his thinking, neither cogent reason, rational excuse, nor plausible pretext for doing what was then done; but that which stood in place of reason, excuse, and pretext was this sophism that indentity of imposts was equivalent to equality of taxation, and this corollary that indentity of imposts was to be established as speedily as possible. He gave the right hon. Gentleman now at the head of Her Majesty's Government credit for believing he was doing no injustice; but he was at best legislating in the dark, for there was then no Income Tax Schedule for Ireland to demonstrate the injustice of the scheme. What that scheme was, and how it was followed up, it was his (Sir Joseph M'Kenna's) duty to review by the clear and unsparing light of events. When the present Premier, then Chancellor of the Exchequer, on the 18th April, 1853—that day 29 years—introduced his Budget to Parliament, he had, from several points of view, a gratifying statement to make; but the case had, nevertheless, a shady side, and there was a spectre which it was his business to lay or banish somehow from the feast he was about to spread before an admiring Parliament and an appreciative British public. The spectre, which would have scared anyone else, rose before him in this way. There had been a grim Famine in Ireland in 1846-7. It was no portion of his (Sir Joseph M'Kenna's) present duty to review that terrible chapter of Irish history, some of the details of which would never vanish from his memory. But, as one of the results of that Famine, there were certain debts due by the famine-stricken districts to the Treasury, the greater portion of which a Committee of the House of Lords had already recommended to be treated on distinctly equitable grounds as Imperial Expenditure, and discharged from being a debt of the districts. They were called, in official language, "Consolidated Annuities," and the charge to extinguish them amounted to £260,000 a-year. As was natural under these circumstances, those who were made liable to repay were very fretful, and appealed to the good feeling and justice of Parliament to have them treated in accordance with the recommendation of the Lords' Committee. How this appeal was responded to hon. Members should hear, and how the Chancellor of the Exchequer improved the occasion by an apparent remission of the Famine Debt, whilst he added burdens to Ireland of fresh taxation to an immensely greater extent, laying the foundation or opening up the way for still further levies in the future, until it had come to pass that the drain from Ireland, poverty-stricken as she was, was ratably more than double the amount drawn from the more prosperous inhabitants of Great Britain. What he (Sir Joseph M'Kenna) described was carried out in this way. The Chancellor of the Exchequer made his statement with that matchless power of exposition which not only persuaded the majority of his audience that whatever he said was right, but actually appeared to have the same effect on his own mind. The Income of the year just closed was £53,000,000, the Expenditure something over £50,000,000, the Surplus £2,460,000. What would he do defect incidental to all schemes of taxation, except to Income Tax per se; what was complained of was the monstrous inequality brought about in their own time by an innovation made in 1853, which, under the pretence of making some sort of concession by forgiving a comparatively small debt, cast new burdens on the Irish people, already taxed to the full level of Great Britain. This question of the disparity of the incidence of Imperial taxation on Ireland was last brought under the notice of this House by the hon. Member for County Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) in the last Parliament. On that occasion the House heard a characteristic critique from a right hon. Member once himself Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Lowe), and now a noble Lord. His line of argument was peculiar and characteristic; he regarded Ireland and Great Britain as geographical expressions merely, and they were not taxed at all; and then he went on to say it was true that individuals happening to reside in these countries were taxed, but they were taxed quite equally, and on the same identical tariff, and there was an end of it—that settled it—argument was exhausted—all was fair. Such absurdities as were here involved scarcely deserved notice, save to exemplify the shifts to which people were driven who had to struggle to defend the innovation of 1853. According to that argument France and Tunis were merely geographical expressions; and if Tunis were incorporated with France, and if there was a heavy tax laid on the date crop and a light one on grapes, it would be quite fair as between the French and the Tunisians, provided the heavy tax on dates applied to dates grown by Frenchmen in Tunis or in France, and the light tax on grapes applied to grapes grown by Tunisians in either country. He (Sir Joseph M'Kenna) had really thought that Æsop's fable of the Fox and the Stork had long since put boyhood as well as manhood on its guard against such shallow sophistry. The legislation of 1853 on this subject did not take place without some earnest protest from an Irish Member. Mr. John Francis Maguire, then Member for Dungarvan, and afterwards Member for Cork City, was reported to have said—

“The right hon. Gentleman in the course of his speech—which for a Chancellor of the Exchequer to make was, he thought, one of the

jauntiest he had ever heard—said that the justice of the tax was generally felt and acknowledged in Ireland. Now, if that were the case, such a feeling ought to have manifested itself where the Consolidated Annuities were particularly oppressive, and where the Income Tax would be scarcely felt; but what was the fact? Why, it was from those portions of Ireland in particular where the Consolidated Annuities pressed heaviest, and the Income Tax would be felt the lightest, that petitions and remonstrances against the proposal were poured into that House. All the counties in the South and West of Ireland had pronounced against the impost. The attempt to gull the people of Ireland into an approval of the tax by saying that the present proposition was a good bargain, because they would have to pay £460,000 instead of £260,000, to which they were at present liable, was worse than a financial juggle—it was, if he might say so in Parliamentary language, an Exchequer swindle. The trick was so stale, the juggle so plain, and the real object so unconcealed, he could only express his wonder at any man representing an Irish constituency being gulled by it.” — [3 Hansard, cxxvii. 530-1.]

So spoke John Francis Maguire in that House one day in May, 1853. He thought he had mastered the subject and understood the scope and nature of the transaction, but he had not penetrated far into the future; for, in place of this being the laying on of an impost of £460,000 a-year in lieu of £260,000 remitted, the transaction was ab initio an immensely worse one for Ireland than Mr. Maguire believed it to be when he denounced it—for its author then announced a principle which had been unsparingly applied ever since, under which there had been raised by taxation of Ireland for the last 20 years—not to go farther back—about £3,000,000 a-year more than her previous normal contribution, being at least £3,000,000 a-year more than her quota, if the entire Revenue of the United Kingdom were raised by an identical Income Tax for England, Ireland, and Scotland. There was no test nor analysis of the wealth of Great Britain and Ireland that would not disclose the extraordinarily unfair disparity which existed between the taxation of the people of the two Islands. The latest Return of the comparative population and taxation of Great Britain and Ireland at the decennial epochs was that issued in August, 1874, which dealt with the financial years 1841, 1851, 1861-2, and 1871-2. It was too soon to expect the Return for 1881-2; but there had been no change to affect the case based on the four comit was in every Parliamentary and Municipal contest. There were very many serious evils connected with the present system of sending out voting papers to be delivered and collected by the police at the houses of the electors. Without making any insinuations against the police, it was undoubted that in many cases these voting papers were tampered with. If the ballot system was adopted, it would do away with all this irregularity. He did not see that there was anything proposed by this Bill to which anybody could make any serious objection; and he was therefore at a loss to know what the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Lewis), who had put down a Notice in opposition to it, could advance to justify the action he had taken. It was not necessary to make any lengthened observations in support of so simple a measure, and he would therefore merely move its second reading.

MR. GRAY, in seconding the Motion for the second reading, said, that four years ago he had the honour of introducing this Bill. On that occasion, in 1878, there was a tolerably exhaustive discussion on the subject. The Bill was not then read a second time; but it was not met by a direct negative, as was now proposed. By a Motion tantamount to the Previous Question, the House decided that as a Select Committee had been appointed on the Motion of the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Hibbert), now Secretary to the English Local Government Board, it would be undesirable to read the Bill a second time. The subject was fully investigated by that Committee, and he had had the honour of being one of its Members. It might be urged that the Committee reported against the introduction of the system of voting by ballot for Poor Law Guardians generally; but any Member who took the trouble to read the entire of the Report, and to examine the evidence given before the Committee, must see that the conclusion arrived at was somewhat inconsequential. The objections to the present system were set forth in full detail in that Report; yet, after stating the various irregularities, the intimidations, the tamperings with voting papers, the delays and confusions which frequently arise under the present system, it said—"We therefore recommend that the system of voting by ballot should not be adopted." The hon. Member for Oldham, who was Chairman of that Committee, would not, he thought, feel any objection to his saying that the Report in its present condition was a somewhat limp document. It acknowledged the weakness of the present system, it rejected the proposition to adopt voting by ballot, but suggested nothing instead. The fact was, the Report, which at first read admirably, was so cut up before adoption that its conclusions were an absurdity. In 1878 he showed, in instancing various abuses, that tenants, especially in the rural districts, were subjected to the grossest intimidation by bailiffs and agents, compelling them to vote for the landlord's candidates. It might be alleged now that things had greatly changed since then, and that the same amount of intimidation was not likely to be practised in future. It might even be shown that intimidation was not confined to the landlords, that it was practised by representatives of popular interests, and by clergymen of various denominations. But he was equally opposed to all intimidation, desiring that every man should be able to vote according to his conscience. It was also shown to the Committee that those who desired to tamper with voting papers followed the policeman from house to house, asking the voters—many of whom were ignorant persons—to allow them to fill up the voting papers, and invalidating them very often by either filling them wrongly or deliberately making some slight error. The manner in which ballot papers were marked was now widely known in Ireland, and many people had an idea that these voting papers should be marked in the same way. He knew a Queen's Counsel in Dublin, who assumed that he ought to mark the voting paper he received for the election of Poor Law Guardians in a manner similar to the way he marked the ballot paper for a Member of Parliament. But this was sufficient to invalidate a voting paper; and anyone who desired to invalidate it, had only to suggest to the elector that he should put a cross opposite to the name of the person he desired to see elected. So rigid were the rules, that if a voter, instead of waiting for the policeman to call, brought the voting-paper to the Returning Officer, the vote was invalidated. If he put it into the post it was invalidated. A most mischievous arrangement under the present system was that the rate-book, as it stood, was taken as the register of the votes in an electoral division. The consequence was that great uncertainty was introduced into the elections, and it was only after the worry and expense of a contest that a candidate could obtain a scrutiny, which generally lasted for days, and might have the effect of reversing the result of the election. He had never heard a suggestion even in favour of retaining this system. He knew some difference of opinion existed with regard to the first proposition in this Bill—namely, triennial elections. He himself supported it, because the only apparently good objection he had ever heard against the substitution of balloting for the present system being that it would involve a large amount of additional expense, extending the period of election from one to three years, would counteract any additional expense that might arise. A proper registry would tend, in his opinion, to reduce expense, because candidates would be able to calculate their chances, and contests would be fewer in number. The second proposition was substantially that the system of voting should be assimilated to that adopted in Municipal and Parliamentary elections. The onus probandi of showing that the ballot would not be applicable to Boards of Guardians lay upon the opponents of the Bill. To accomplish proper secrecy in voting, he proposed that property holders having multiple votes should receive a separate voting paper for each vote; thus a man having six votes would receive six papers. He left the framing of rules for carrying out this system to the Local Government Board. An important aim of the Bill was to secure that every man who wanted to vote should record his vote in person. The present system of proxy voting was an outrageous abuse. A property holder having 18 votes, against the poor man's one, could hand 12 of them over to a nominee, who, as wire-puller in the district, could use them for purely party purposes. A property voter should exercise his own discretion as to the candidate for whom his votes should be recorded. He had heard that a well-known electioneerer in Dublin held nearly 1,000 proxy votes, and that one agent thereby returned most of the Conservative Guardians to the South Dublin Board. The Secretary of the Local Government Board, Mr. Banks, showed the Committee that an enormous number of complaints reached his Board each year of intimidation and undue influence; but, notwithstanding that, the Board did not make any inquiry as to how those votes were obtained. Passing by altogether the allegations of corruption, or intimidation, or other forms of undue influence which, if proved before an Election Petition Judge, would result in the disfranchisement of the constituency, and taking cognizance merely of the inquiry whether the candidate declared elected had received a majority of valid votes, this entire Board was occupied in this investigation six weeks each year. This statement alone was sufficient to prove the desirability of introducing vote by ballot. But that prolonged investigation did not represent all the complaints, because it was only after a local scrutiny had proved unsatisfactory that the matter went before the Local Government Board. In Dublin, for instance, where the Returning Officers were lawyers of experience, that scrutiny occupied a fortnight. Mr. Banks also deposed to the widespread tampering with votes, and to undue influence upon voters, being careful to point out that this was not restricted to Roman Catholic clergymen, but extended to Protestant and Presbyterian, in fact, to clergymen of all denominations throughout Ireland, as well as to bailiffs, rent warners, agents, mobs—he himself (Mr. Gray) had heard of a mob following a policeman from house to house insisting upon the voting papers being delivered up to them to be filled as they wished or to be destroyed. These complaints, Mr. Banks said, were of everyday occurrence. He urged some objections against the substitution of the ballot system; but they were very slight, and, subject to their removal, he favoured the proposed change. One was the expense, which he estimated would be double; but this was met by the triennial election. Mr. Banks further said that it would be a great hardship upon a poor man to have to walk to the polling booth. It would be a greater hardship upon him to be unable to exercise the franchise at the election of a Guardian. The greatest distance which would have to be walked would be three miles and a-half, and no person who knew Ireland would say that that was a very formidable difficulty. Mr. Banks further said that females who would be entitled to vote would be afraid to come to the polling stations. But everyone knew that the system of election by ballot in Ireland was monotonous in the extreme, and that the most timid female need have no apprehension of walking into the polling booth and recording her vote. He further said that it would be hard upon a working man to be taken from his labour to exercise the franchise. No doubt it would; but inasmuch as an extension of the hours of polling was introduced in England to provide against that difficulty, he saw no reason why a similar plan should not be applied to Ireland. He had very warm hopes that the Bill would receive the support of the Government, and be read a second time at an early hour to-day. He had in contemplation at one time the introduction into the Ballot Act Continuance Bill of a clause extending this principle to the election of Guardians; and if the Bill should, unfortunately, be rejected to-day he should make an endeavour in that direction. The system which the Bill proposed to introduce had worked so well in connection with the election of Members of Parliament and of Municipalities in Ireland, and the abuses of the existing system were so patent and undisputed, that he hoped they would not be forced to wait much longer for this much-needed reform in Ireland. This question had been so long before the House—for four years it had been brought forward by himself, and previously by the late Sir Colman O'Loughlen—that he really thought it was time to settle it on the basis of the Bill which he now supported. The introduction of the system could do no mischief, while it would do away with a great deal of inconvenience and a great deal of feeling of injustice which existed in connection with the election of Poor Law Guardians. There might have been some kind of reason for the proxy vote, and for the present system of election when it was first introduced. The functions of Boards of Guardians were then solely confined to the administration of the rates for the relief of the poor, and it might have been felt necessary to give the property class a preponderating power by the ex-officio representation, as well as by the enormous power of the proxy system. But since that time the functions of Boards of Guardians in Ireland had been greatly enlarged, and it was scarcely going to far to say that at present the relief of the poor was not the most important duty they had to exercise. The entire powers of the Public Health Act of 1878, which were of very great importance, were now vested in the Guardians of the rural districts as the rural sanitary authority. They had the power, for instance, of entering any man's dwelling, of shutting it up if they thought it necessary, or ordering improvements at the expense of individuals; they had the power of burning clothes, of compelling persons to leave their homes and go to hospital; in fact, they had the most despotic powers, not merely over the purses, but over the persons of those within their jurisdiction. It was of the utmost importance that these powers should be fenced round with safeguards, which would inspire a feeling of confidence in the constituencies. The tendency of the time was to increase the powers of Poor Law Guardians, and therefore the necessity became greater for so managing their election as to enable them to command the confidence of their constituents. He asserted, without fear of contradiction, that under the existing system they did not command the confidence of their constituents, and that it was impossible they could do so so long as the present causes of complaint existed.

Mr. Gray

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Leahy.)

MR. TOTTENHAM, in moving, as an Amendment, that the Bill be read a second time on that day six months, said, as he understood the measure, its object was to insure the holding of office by the representatives of the Land League for the period of three years instead of one, and, in districts where that wicked and inhuman organization had no power, to throw the nomination of the Poor Law Guardians into the hands of the Roman Catholic Clergy. The hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Gray) said he considered voting by the cumulative vote an abuse.

MR. GRAY said, he referred to the proxy vote. The Bill did not deal with the property vote.

MR. TOTTENHAM said, that being so, he had nothing further to say upon the point. The hon. Member for Carlow also stated that intimidation had been constantly used by bailiffs and agents of landlords, and in some cases by the Roman Catholic Clergy. He said that intimidation on the part of the representatives of the landlords was not likely to be repeated; but he did not say that it was not likely to be repeated on the part of the other intimidators, the Roman Catholic Clergy, whose influence had been used in the most illegitimate manner at Parliamentary and Municipal elections. Looking to the part taken by those gentlemen in the support and in active advocacy of the principles of the Land League, he trusted that the House would hesitate before placing this new weapon in their hands. He moved that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months"—(Mr. Tottenham.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, that he rose thus early in the debate for the purpose of stating that it was his intention to support the second reading of this Bill. As he understood the Bill, it was a measure intended to correct abuses, and to require all whom the law invested with the right of voting for the Board of Guardians to exercise their right on their individual responsibility. In his opinion, the less the people were led in such matters the better it would be for the general community, and the more they were called upon to act for themselves the better security we should have for good order. It would be better that the voter should walk to the polling booth and record his vote, under any conditions of secrecy that might be imposed, rather than that voting papers should be left by a policeman one day and called for the next. What they had to determine, in the first place, was whether this Bill was necessary, and that depended on whether any abuses existed under the present system which required to be remedied. In reference to this point, he might observe that the Committee which was appointed in 1878 to inquire into the subject, and which was of a cosmopolitan character, comprising hon. Members from both sides of the House who were practically acquainted with the municipal affairs of Ireland, and who were men of great knowledge and of business habits, had reported—"That the abuse and inconvenience of the voting paper system as at present carried out were very great; that intimidation, tampering, and forgery of papers were practised, and frequently voters did not receive their papers at all, and in other cases they were invalidated from 'trifling technical errors.'"

He asked the House whether a system which admitted of these irregularities deserved to be supported? He would not occupy the time of the House by referring, as the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Gray) had so moderately and clearly done, to the evidence given by that distinguished official, Mr. Banks, who probably knew more about the working of the Poor Law system than any man in Ireland. One of the principal objections taken by Mr. Banks to the introduction of the ballot was that secrecy could hardly be secured to illiterate persons; but it appeared that Mr. Banks had then altogether overlooked the provisions of the Ballot Act for securing secrecy. When the Committee to which he referred held its sittings the Ballot Act was on its trial, and the system was hardly understood in the different aspects in which it was intended to be applied in the country. But they had now had a long experience of the Ballot Act, and he asked was there any Member of the House prepared to go back to the system of open voting in existence before? ["No, no!"] Then, why should not the system be extended to all cases in which they wished to secure the independence of the voter? He cared not by whom intimidation was practised; it ought to be put a stop to. If it were desirable that the independence of the voter should be secured in the case of a Parliamentary election, it was still more desirable that that independence should be maintained in the case of an election of the Board of Guardians, whose power was exercised at the doors of the voters, who had the control of their roads, and of almost all public matters in their immediate neighbourhood. It was most important, therefore, that the voters should exercise their right of voting free from intimidation and from undue influence, and with a due sense of their responsibility. The hon. Member for Leitrim (Mr. Tottenham) objected to the triennial period, and was afraid Guardians would be elected by the influence of the Land League; but he (the Attorney General for Ireland) wanted to prevent that influence, and therefore he supported the Bill. The object of the Bill was to prevent the election of Guardians by any such influence, and the first step towards that was to make the voters independent. He believed, in addition to the almost unanimous opinion of the Committee of 1878 in favour of triennial election, that it was the general feeling in England that Guardians should hold office for three years; but it was further urged that in all of the public bodies there was a system of election by rotation, so as to prevent all the old members from going out together, and a fresh set coming in who would possess no acquaintance with their duties, and that if this triennial system were adopted with reference to Poor Law elections a new Board, unacquainted with the business it would have to perform, might be elected every third year. That objection was purely theoretical. He did not suppose it ever happened in Ireland that an entire Board of Guardians went out at any election. On the contrary, from their position and influence in the district, most of the Guardians were sure to be re-elected. Assuming that the three years' tenure of office tended to make Guardians independent, he was in favour of that tenure. It would probably be also less expensive than the present system of annual elections. The Bill was framed with extreme moderation, and with great consideration for existing arrangements. As he understood it, it did not propose to interfere with any existing votes, and that all it did was to require the personal exercise of the vote. The franchise was not altered, the votes of property and of occupiers remained the same, while the personal exercise of the vote would be much less embarrassing when it was only to be exercised triennially. It did not lay down hard-and-fast lines, but gave the Local Government Board power to make the election rules. The Local Government Board had come in for some hard knocks in the House; but he must confess he still had confidence in it. He thought there were a few alterations on points of detail which he should be disposed to make in the measure in Committee, and this he reserved the right to himself to do. Believing the Bill did not interfere with any right of property, that it would assist in establishing individual responsibility among the people of Ireland in the exercise of the franchise, and would at the same time secure independence, he should give it his cordial support.

MR. PLUNKET said, he could not take the same view of this proposal as that taken by his right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland, and he should feel it his duty, if they went to a division, to support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Leitrim. He would not follow the abstract arguments of the right hon. and learned Gentleman in regard to the question of the ballot. The principle of the Bill under discussion had been rejected by the able Committee which sat to consider the question in 1878. That Committee had been described as a cosmopolitan one. Whatever that term might mean, the Committee was certainly a good one. It thoroughly thrashed out the subject, and very frankly stated in its Report the arguments in favour of the Bill which it had seen fit to reject. The question was considered with reference to England and Scotland, as well as Ireland; but for neither of those countries had any Bill similar to that now under their discussion been brought forward. He should like to know how the owners of property were to have their proper weight in Poor Law elections if this system was carried out? It was quite true that on the last occasion when this subject was brought up he moved the Previous Question, and he did so because a Committee was then sitting, charged with the business of investigating this very matter. The Committee of 1878 was not so much in favour of altering the present system as had been represented. Several witnesses condemned the present system, but others had proved that the system was convenient as affording the greatest facilities for every class. Mr. Banks stated that, in his opinion, the present system of election was the simplest, the most efficacious, and cheapest. The question of election by ballot came prominently before the Committee, and the system was objected to by some witnesses on account of the increased inconvenience it would entail as compared with the present system, by reason of imposing on the voter the necessity of attending to record his vote, and of its unsuitableness to plurality of voting. It was for these reasons, amongst others, that he was opposed to the Bill. The Committee, by a majority, found that it was not desirable to apply the ballot to the election of Poor Law Guardians. The hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Gray) was in a terrible state of mind about voting by proxy, and before the Committee he formulated a paragraph which he proposed should be introduced into the Report, and which summed up in the most forcible manner what he conceived to be the abuses of the system. The Committee admitted that there were some abuses in connection with it; but they added that in certain cases it was a most valuable mode of recording one's vote, and on a division the hon. Member stood alone—in a minority of 1—in support of his paragraph. The hon. Gentleman who sat behind him (Mr. Tottenham) had raised the point as to what sort of Guardians were likely to be elected if the proposal was agreed to? He did not want to enter into that large question. He very much agreed in what the hon. Gentleman said as to Guardians being elected for three years; but they must not look at the matter as merely for the present, but must look forward a little. As long as there was life there was hope, and he did not yet despair that some time or other, almost hopeless as the case might seem, a better state of things might arise in Ireland. But it was a mere mockery to say that the laws enacted in Parliament had at present any force in Ireland. The objections he had raised were not of a polemical or Party nature at all; they were difficulties which beset the progress of such a proposal as this with regard to England and Scotland. His right hon. and learned Friend opposite entirely supported the Bill. The measure was one of extreme importance, and in his opinion it was one that, if introduced at all, ought to be made a Government measure. Although his right hon. and learned Friend, with a light heart, gave his assent to this proposal with regard to Ireland, he would like to know what Her Majesty's Government, who were always for assimilating the laws of these countries, intended to do with respect to England and Scotland? If his hon. Friend who had moved the Amendment went to a division, he would certainly support him.

MR. T. A. DICKSON said, he was glad that the Government showed no hesitation in supporting the second reading of this Bill. He did not think it possible to adduce a stronger argument for the passing of this measure than the Report of the Select Committee of 1878. They reported, emphatically and distinctly, that all the Irish witnesses examined were in favour of the alteration of the system of voting by ballot. The Irish witnesses who were in favour of the present system were officials; while the non-official witnesses condemned it. He had sat for 12 or 14 years, both as an elected and an ex-officio Guardian, and he had no hesitation in saying that nothing could be more mischievous than the present system of election. A crowd followed the policeman leaving the papers at the houses of the electors, and the unfortunate voter was surrounded by the friends of both candidates; and the fact was that at present, in connection with the election of Poor Law Guardians, there was no such thing as freedom of election. Notwithstanding the evidence of Mr. Banks, it was not possible for a solid or substantial argument to be used against the passing of this Bill; and when Municipal Corporations and Members of Parliament were elected by ballot, what reason could be adduced why Poor Law Guardians should not be elected by the same system? He could quite understand how the hon. Member for Leitrim's political vision was distorted, and why he saw in every Irish measure a Land League scheme. But, speaking as an Ulster Member—and in Ulster they knew nothing of the intimidation of the Land League—he could say that no difference of opinion existed among the Ulster Members as to the desirability of having Poor Law Guardians elected by ballot. If the hon. Member for Leitrim wanted to get rid of the intimidation of the Land League, the bailiff, or anyone else, he could not do better than give the voter the protection of the ballot. He was glad the Government intended to support the second reading, and after that stage he hoped they would give some facilities for passing the Bill into law.

Mr. Plunket

MR. SEXTON said, that, after the excellent and very reasonable speech of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland, he thought it unnecessary to prolong the conversation to any extent. It seemed that it was only on Wednesday that he and his Friends could enjoy the luxury of agreement with Her Majesty's Government, and of seeing their arguments not only adopted by the Government, but so well supplemented as they had been to-day. The right hon. and learned Gentleman comprised the object of the Bill in a single sentence, when he said that the object of the Bill was to recognize and protect the freedom and conscience of the individual voters. Moreover, his right hon. and learned Friend embedded in his speech one or two remarks which he would like to see illuminated as political maxims, and hung up in whatever room the Cabinet met to discuss the affairs of Ireland. He had not much fault to find with the observations of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket); but he might say it was a black-letter speech, or a technical plea. The right hon. and learned Gentleman was one of those exceedingly artful speakers who employed the perfection of their artfulness in order to conceal their art. He dealt what was as nearly as his courtly nature would allow a rebuke to the hon. Member for Leitrim for dragging the large question of the Land League into the scope of the second reading of this modest Bill, and then he proceeded to say the laws passed in that House had at present no force in Ireland. It was very singular that that remark was never made by the right hon. and learned Gentleman when the proposal was to pass a restrictive measure for Ireland. They should not forget the fact that 500 or 600 of their countrymen were now in gaol in Ireland, although the right hon. and learned Gentleman said that at present the law had no force in Ireland. The hon. Member for Leitrim (Mr. Tottenham), like the character in Dickens's novel who was always bringing into his conversation the subject of King Charles's head, had dragged the Land League into that discussion. In fact, the hon. Gentleman could not deliver his sentiments for a moment on any imaginable topic without referring to that "inhuman and wicked association." The reason of this was not far to seek. The Land League had extended its protection to the tenants whom the hon. Gentleman had evicted and cast out upon the highway, and therefore it was perfectly natural that he should attack the Land League in return whenever he had the opportunity. There was no orator in the House of Commons who made such liberal draughts on the adjectives as that hon. Gentleman; but he might remind him that the adjective taken alone did not make any solid form of argument. It was a curious fact that the only opposition offered to that small and inadequate Bill for the good of Ireland came from the immediate Representatives of the landlord class in that country. It was notorious that the country had been administered solely hitherto in the interest of the landlord class; and when it was said that, according to the objects of the Bill, the representatives of the Land League should be put into the various offices, the meaning was that men who were in sympathy with the electors should hold those offices instead of those mean creatures, the followers of the landlords in Ireland. It was wonderful that any man of the experience and sagacity of the hon. Gentleman should think that, when the citadel of the landlord class in Ireland had been battered down, he could any longer defend the outworks of their stronghold.

MR. O'SHEA said, he had received many communications on that subject from persons on both sides of politics, some of whom thought it would be very advantageous, from a Conservative point of view, if the ballot were adopted at the election of Guardians. Among those communications was the following, which, with the permission of the House, he would read:—

"Honoured Sir,—There was a deal more rows about the election of Guardians than the election for the county. I was bothered ontirely between them. and the ballot would be a grand thing, for a man could say and do what he liked. Mr. — was pressing me one way, and I was not wanting to offend him, and how did I know but what the reduction would be depending upon it. Three shillings in the pound we are expecting, and the boys on the other side going for ruin like mad, and am bound to get a taste of the stick. I gave them the slip to go to the funeral of my cousin and forgot to fill it in the paper at all; but I am very sorry ever since, because if I had voted I would have only had one party against me, and now I have got the two, and them calling me a snake. So I hope your honour will get me the ballot against next year."

He would add nothing, but simply support the Bill.

MR. WARTON said, he thought that the Attorney General for Ireland had departed on that occasion from the usual prudence of his Profession by going beyond his brief. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had said that no man objected to vote by ballot at Parliamentary elections, or would wish to return to the former mode of voting. Now, he protested against the doctrine that the ballot in itself was a good thing, and that there was not a man in the House who objected to it. Every honest Member of the Tory Party must admit that a most disgraceful system of voting by ballot now existed. The ballot had been brought in by the Liberal Party professedly to put down corruption; but it had increased corruption, because it had enabled men to take bribes from both sides, and to tell falsehoods. Again, he maintained that the time was inopportune for bringing in a Bill of that kind. It reminded him of the saying about Nero fiddling while Rome was burning. Murder now stalked through Ireland, and the Government looked coldly on, the Prime Minister intimating that he did not know whether he would bring forward any measures to restore peace and the authority of the law, because he did not know whether he could get the clôture passed by the House. He (Mr. Warton) wished to have no more Irish legislation until Ireland was at peace, and the supremacy and authority of the law were asserted. All these questions were comparatively trumpery so long as the Queen's supremacy was not enforced. It was idle for the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) to attempt to ridicule the frequent references made to the Land League in their discussions. The fact was that the Land League was everywhere, and the Government knew it, but did not suppress it as they ought to and could have done if they had used more vigorous measures. The clause which required that everyone should attend in person to vote was a disfranchising clause, because at present votes could be given without personal attendance. He was in favour of taking the votes at Parliamentary elections by means of voting papers.

COLONEL NOLAN rose to Order. He wished to know whether it was regular to discuss the clauses of a Bill on a Motion for the Second Reading?

MR. SPEAKER ruled that such a course was irregular, unless the clause so discussed raised some principle of the Bill.

MR. WARTON said, he would bow to the ruling of the Chair, and conclude by expressing his determination to oppose the further progress of this measure by every means in his power.

COLONEL NOLAN said that, as Chairman of a very large Union in Ireland, he wished to give his support to this Bill; and he hoped that the hon. and learned Member who had just spoken would not persevere in his intention to block the Bill, as the Government had adopted its principle. The hon. Member for Leitrim (Mr. Tottenham) had represented his hon. Friend the Member for the County Carlow (Mr. Gray) as having said that the Roman Catholic Clergy interfered much in these elections. Now, what he understood his hon. Friend to say was that the elections were interfered with equally by clergymen of all denominations. In his part of the country the Clergy interfered very little in Poor Law elections. In future he believed that these elections would turn less upon Land League or Catholic questions than upon questions of expenditure, and the ballot would promote the return of Guardians pledged to economy. The objections raised by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket) were exactly the same as those which the Tory Party used at the introduction of the Ballot Bill for Parliamentary elections. At that time the Conservatives, seeing that it was impossible to stand against the feeling in the country and in Parliament in favour of that measure, took the course of raising a number of technical objections. The right hon. and learned Gentleman seemed to think that plural voting could not be worked under this Bill; but it was hard to understand what difficulty could arise in a voter having to fill up a dozen papers instead of one. As to the illiterate voter, he must be got rid of—he must be handed a paper like anyone else, and if he filled it up wrongly he must suffer the loss of his vote; but there would not be one in a hundred who would be so stupid. The ballot for Poor Law elections must be adopted first in either England or Ireland; and it was of ten times more consequence to Ireland, where many Boards of Guardians were like County Municipalities, and the constituencies were mostly small farmers, who felt the want of the ballot. It was natural that the demand should come first from Ireland; and if the Bill were blocked by the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton)—who, however, might relent in this case when he saw what was the wish of the Irish Members—he trusted that the Government would defeat his obstruction by giving facilities for the progress of the Bill.

MR. O'SULLIVAN said, he was glad that the Government had at last opened their eyes to the expediency of permitting this very much needed Bill to pass through the House. It was a very small Bill, but one very much required in many parts of Ireland, and would simply have the effect of giving freedom of judgment to the men entitled to vote. The existing system was the cause of very great abuses, and he had known voters over and over again to destroy their papers by voting for both candidates when only entitled to vote for one, acting under representations from the agents. He had often heard men say they would be very glad to be rid of the vote altogether in consequence of the intimidation to which it had laid them open. This measure would give freedom of action to the small holders throughout the country, and they were the men who most required it. It did not at all affect property votes, but merely did away with deputies and asked men to vote for themselves. He hoped, therefore, that if any obstruction were offered the Government would give facilities for the passage of the Bill, and bring it to a successful issue this Session.

MR. FINDLATER could not allow the remarks of the hon. Member for Bridport to pass without expressing his opinion that the best mode of making Her Majesty's Government respected in Ireland was by passing good and just laws. He intended to support this Bill in its integrity. When he first read the Bill he did not approve of the sections which required the personal attendance of voters; but, having heard the able arguments in favour of it put forward by the hon. Member for Carlow, he felt that his first impression was erroneous. The arguments from the Conservative Leaders against the Bill did not possess the slightest weight. The Attorney General for Ireland appeared to have examined the Bill with minuteness and care, and his approval of it did not deserve the description "perfunctory," applied to it by the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin. He could not agree with Members who considered the effect of this Bill would be to enable Roman Catholic clergymen to exercise undue influence. Its effect must be quite the contrary. At the last election for the county which he represented, he found a landlord's agent presiding in one of the polling booths, speaking to different voters in the most familiar manner, with the object, no doubt, of influencing their votes. A great many Roman Catholic clergymen were also present; but he did not observe any attempt on their part to interfere with the election. It was a very valuable measure, and would prove most beneficial to Ireland; and he trusted that the dreadful system of blocking would not be employed to defeat it.

MR. W. J. CORBET said, he thought very much credit was due to the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Gray) for the manner in which he had presented this Bill. In support of the case made out by the hon. Member, he would mention an instance of proxy voting which occurred a few days ago at the election of Guardians for Rathdrum. A large sheaf of voting papers having been handed in on behalf of Earl Fitzwilliam, a gentleman who attended on the part of the tenant farmers insisted upon seeing them, and found that they did not bear Earl Fitzwilliam's signature, but that they had been signed by some bailiff or under-agent.

MR. CALLAN said, he objected to the 4th clause, which insisted upon the personal attendance of voters. This absolutely took away all right of voting by proxy, which had existed in Ireland since the institution of the Poor Law system, and still existed in England. To take from the beneficial owners of property all right of voting by proxy would result in the election of a worse class of Guardians. He had seen amongst the lowest class of ratepayers' Guardians as great a tendency to "job" as amongst grand jurors. Practically, if this clause passed a person who did not reside in Ireland would not have a vote, although the principle of the Poor Law was not representation of persons, but representation of property. With this reservation he supported the Bill, and hoped the hon. and learned Member for Bridport would not block it on going into Committee.

MR. HIBBERT begged to assure his right hon. and learned Friend opposite (Mr. Plunket), who had made some reference to his absence from the discussion, that he entirely sympathized with the objects of the Bill. When he moved for the appointment of a Committee on this subject in 1878, he included Ireland and Scotland in his Motion, because he thought if it was desirable to consider the law with regard to England, it was equally desirable to consider it as regarded Ireland and Scotland. He had a very strong opinion that when they were considering any question of administration it was desirable to consider it as regarded the Three Countries, and not as it affected one country separately. On that Committee they had the presence of several hon. Members for Ireland, and many witnesses from Ireland were examined, and the evidence of the majority was decidedly in favour of an alteration of the present system. He could not, of course, speak of the necessity of an alteration in Ireland so strongly as he could with regard to the necessity of it in England. He believed that in the large towns of England a strong feeling existed as to the importance of altering the present system of electing Guardians. In Lancashire great excitement very often arose in connection with those elections, because they were made political elections like most other elections in that county; and the abuses were so great and so objectionable, that he had been pressed over and over again by gentlemen representing both sides of politics to push forward as far as possible this question. He did not think that in Lancashire there was any subject upon which a stronger and more unanimous opinion prevailed than the subject of altering the present system of electing Guardians and substituting the ballot for the voting papers now used. He would go further, and say that all elections should be by ballot where it was possible or desirable to have it. He would not confine the ballot mainly to Poor Law Guardians, but would extend it to Local Board and other elections. Therefore, speaking for himself personally and not as a Member of the Government, he entirely sympathized with the Bill, and hoped it would soon become law. With respect to the 4th clause, which necessitated the attendance of the voter at the polling booth, of course there was much to be said on both sides; but that was a matter for discussion in Committee. The great objection to the present proposal when it was brought before the Committee was that of expense; but he thought that had been met by the proposal to make the tenure of office three years instead of one.

Mr. Callan

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 95; Noes 31: Majority 64.—(Div. List, No. 64.)

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS EXPENSES BILL.—[BILL 34.]

(Mr. Ashton Dilke, Mr. Barran, Mr. Burt.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. ASHTON DILKE, in rising to move that the Bill be now read a second time, said: Sir, the measure, as I introduce it to the House, may be divided into two parts, the latter of which, I think, may be taken almost as a necessary corollary of the first. The first portion of the Bill provides for the payment of the absolutely necessary expenses—the expenses of Returning Officers—of a Parliamentary election out of the local rates; but the second part of the Bill is new, although its provisions are adopted in almost every foreign country. A measure with a similar intention to that contained in the proposals of the first part has frequently been proposed to this House; but the principle of the second portion of the Bill has been passed over altogether. The measure is one which has been very closely identified with the name of my right hon. Friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Fawcett) when he was an independent Member. It was brought in as an Amendment to a Corrupt Practices Bill, introduced by a Conservative Government, and it was carried by a small majority; but not meeting with the approval of the Government, they succeeded in procuring a majority against the proposal on Report, and on the third reading of the Bill it was cut out of it by a still larger majority. The proposal was again introduced in 1872 by the right hon. Gentleman when the Ballot Bill was before the House. It received the approval of the Liberal Government of the day; but it was not carried, and has not since been renewed. Therefore, the Bill I have now to introduce to this House has, on a previous occasion, been carried in the teeth of a Conservative Government, and rejected in spite of the approval of the Liberal Government. I hope that it will be more fortunate on the present occasion, and that it will receive the support of a majority of the new House of Commons. The chief, and, in fact, the only grave objection raised against the Bill, on the Conservative side, is simply the question of cost. In connection with that point, I have been engaged during the past Recess in speaking to a good many meetings in various parts of the country on the subject of Parliamentary Reform, and included in that was this question of payment of election expenses out of the rates. I have brought it forward in order to ascertain the feeling of the working classes on the subject; and I venture to say, though it is a proposal to put on the shoulders of the ratepayers certain expenses, yet of all the propositions I have submitted to the various meetings I have not found one which is more thoroughly popular, or where the working classes of the Kingdom more thoroughly see the advantage they will gain by the carrying out of the proposal, which is not to be weighed in the same balance with the very trifling expenditure it will involve. When the proposal was first brought forward there were no Members of this House who could fairly lay claim to the title of being direct Representatives of the working classes; but in the present Parliament we have at last secured the presence of several hon. Gentlemen who come directly under that description, and who are intimately connected with the working class interest, and so far the object of the Bill may be said to have been attained; for although my right hon. Friend, in introducing it, deprecated its being a measure exclusively for the benefit of working men, or calculated to secure the return of working men, there can be no doubt that it was generally so accepted by the House, and that that was the general impression conveyed to the country. But, even if it were not desirable to increase the representation of that class, there is another class to whom the franchise may, before many years, be given, to which this Bill will apply with greater force than the working classes. I refer to the agricultural labourer. With regard to that class, a Conservative Statesman has lately said that he would be glad to see them represented; and if that feeling had been shared by his Party, it ought not to have been difficult for that Party to let the labourers have one of the county seats which were at the command of the Party; but the remark referred to is, perhaps, to be regarded rather as a Platonic expression. I think, however, it will be admitted that a candidate of the agricultural labourers would find considerable difficulty in raising even the comparatively small sum necessary for the payment of the Returning Officer's expenses, if there should not be an extension of the law in the direction which I propose. I believe that even those expenses will be considerably diminished if this Bill is passed. The expenses to the community at large, I believe, will be considerably reduced. I found my argument on the facts as to the expenditure at the last General Election in 1880. The Return, which gives the expenses of the Returning Officers, and, at the same time, the general expenses of the Election, is an instructive one, because it shows that the Returning Officers' expenses vary enormously in different constituencies. At Abingdon, where 900 electors were polled, the Returning Officer's expenses were £177, giving an average of 4s. per elector; but in Barnstaple, where 1,650 electors were polled, the expenses were £92, a cost of 1s. 2d. per head. Taking boroughs of medium size, I find that at Warrington, where 6,000 electors were polled, the Returning Officer's expenses amounted to £630, or about 2s. per head; whereas, at Burnley, where I suppose the electors were moved by the economy which distinguishes their Representative, 7,600 were polled at an expenditure of £153, or 5*d.* per head. Coming to the very large boroughs, I find that in Lambeth 50,000 electors were polled at an expenditure of £1,557, being an average of about 8*d.* per head; but in Leeds, the polling of 49,000 electors only cost £559, or 3*d.* per head. I think that demonstrates very clearly that wherever we find inequalities of this kind we may assume that the lower value and not the higher value is the true one; and, therefore, I think I should not be taking too sanguine a view if I say that if this Bill were passed the Returning Officers' expenses generally would be diminished, possibly by more than one-half, because, as the expenditure would be met by the various Municipalities, it would be open to criticism and revision. As it is, the cost is almost ridiculously small. I have estimated that the total cost of the average annual rate required will amount to one-eighth of a farthing in the pound—that is to say, if we take the cost of a General Election—and the fact is that we have one every four years on the average—we find that it would require a rate of half-a-farthing in the pound for the year of the Election. I know, however, that there is a very great objection to do anything which would tend to increase the local rates, the whole theory of the Conservative Party at present being to throw local rates as much as possible, not on local bodies, but upon the Consolidated Fund. There will, however, be far less likelihood of extravagance if the expenses are thrown on the rates than there will be if they are paid out of the Consolidated Fund; and a Motion to make the expenditure Imperial has been already rejected by a large majority. We are told that if this Bill is passed, we shall see a greater number of candidates than we do at the present moment. I am inclined to think that is true only to a limited extent; and, if it is true, I am inclined to think it is not an unmitigated evil. I believe it would be better for this House if, instead of being divided into Liberal and Conservative camps, we had an independent feeling which, under the provisions of the Bill, I think we should have. One important fact should not be forgotten in connection with the question. There are constituencies in the United Kingdom which have never been contested on account of the enormous expense that would be incurred; and I contend that it would be better to have a surplus of candidates than we should have such a gross scandal as we have—namely, some constituencies in which there have not been contests for a quarter of a century, or, as in some cases, since the passing of the first Reform Act. The practice of foreign countries is favourable to my proposal. In a Return published last year it is set forth that in Austria, Hungary, France, and Italy, all necessary election expenses are paid out of national money—that is, out of the Consolidated Funds. In Germany, the Netherlands, Spain, Portugal, and Denmark, the election expenses are paid out of the local rates, as I propose in the present Bill. These facts show that there is a universal consensus of opinion that the necessary expenses should be paid by the electors themselves, and not by the candidates. The candidate, by offering himself to a constituency to serve them, confers a great favour on a constituency; and the expenses that a candidate would, in any case, have to incur, would, no doubt, be heavy enough. It may be said that the Returning Officers' expenses amount to but a small proportion of the whole expenditure; but that is not so, for although in many cases the saving of the official expenses will make but little difference to the candidates, still, in the case of working-men candidates, it will be found that the Returning Officers' expenses amount to a considerable proportion of the whole expenses incurred on their behalf. There is, no doubt, the evil of the multiplication of candidates as a possible one to be guarded against if this Bill be passed; and several proposals have been made with regard to this evil. My hon. Friend the Member for Frome (Mr. H. B. Samuelson), as far as I know, however, has proposed the only one likely to be available—namely, that a candidate not polling a certain number of votes should be fined a fixed sum, or compelled to pay his share of the election expenses; but it is open to many of the same objections as the present plan, and therefore I propose a better method, and a method which is uniformly adopted in almost every other country, and the second part of the Bill, which has not yet been mooted in this country, has been brought in to effect that purpose. I propose, in the second part of the Bill, that if a candidate does not gain an absolute majority of the electors he shall not be elected, and that there shall be a second election, to be decided by a relative majority of votes. A sub-section of the clause also omits what are known as the three-cornered constituencies, where it would be difficult to apply the section. I trust, however, before the Bill passes into law, that three-cornered constituencies will have gone the way of all flesh. I should now like to say a few words with regard to the proceedings of the various political associations that have sprung up on both sides during the last few years. When I first brought in this Bill there was a division taken upon it, and in the course of some discussion, the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) said he regarded the Bill with suspicion, as I was the nominee of a Caucus—that very much dreaded and detested body. Well, Sir, I can say that the provisions of the Bill are meant, if to do anything, to neutralize the power of the Caucus. If a candidate is appointed by the managers of a Party that the electors do not like, the electors have at present no power to object to the selection made. For instance, at Wigan, during the spring of last year, there was a contested election, when there were two candidates in the field. The borough is one which contains a considerable Irish vote, and where, the working-man element being rather strong, it might be presumed that there was also a certain amount of the English vote which was opposed to the Government on the burning question—namely, the application of exceptional laws to Ireland. What happened was this. The Conservative went to the poll on the ordinary platform of the Party, and the Liberal went to the poll, and, in order to secure the Irish vote, pledged himself to oppose the Bill which the Government was then fighting for so determinedly in the House. Therefore, those Liberals who voted for that candidate were in the position of persons who voted against the Government; and the result of that was that if a moderate Liberal elector of that constituency wanted to show he supported the Government in the crisis, he had only the option of voting for the Conservative candidate, and the Liberal candidate, in spite of the Irish vote, was thrown out by a considerable majority. What I contend is, that if this Bill had been in operation we should have had three candidates—a Conservative candidate, a candidate receiving the support of the Irish electors, and a candidate who would have received the votes of the Ministerialists in the borough; and I think it would have been a valuable indication to the Government if they had been able, without having the accusation of splitting the Party cast in their teeth, to run such candidates as would have given them a clear test of the feeling of the country. In that way they would have been able to have learnt whether it was with them or against them. With regard to the action of Liberal associations throughout the country, that action, as is well known, has been introduced very largely in order to prevent splits in the Party organization, and the running of superfluous candidates; and that they succeeded at the last General Election, in 1880, is evident from the fact that there is only one seat in the Kingdom—that in the Tower Hamlets—which has been lost to the Party, and which did not finally result in representing the feelings of the electors, as there were too many candidates running for the seat, and votes were thrown away upon candidates who had no chance of success. In 1874 we find that no less than 13 seats were absolutely thrown away by the fact of so many splits taking place in the ranks of the Liberal Party, in consequence of which candidates were run upon whom votes were thrown away, and which, if they had been given to another candidate, would have been sufficient to carry the election. Whilst I say this, I do not wish to see standing at every election a cut-and-dried Liberal or a cut-and-dried Conservative, for I hold that we should have independent candidates as well as independent speech in a constituency. Under the present system, however, we have sometimes found that a candidate will go down to a constituency and will be addressed by a minority of the electors, who hold strong views on some particular point. He will be asked to give a pledge on some particular question, and he consents, often to the detriment of his own moral character, either because he knows that he is not likely to have the opportunity practically to carry it out, or because he will be able in some way to get out of his pledge in the future. We have seen that to be the case on both sides, in order to secure the Irish vote, or the temperance vote, or the suffrages of those in favour of the county franchise. But if there was such a law as is proposed in the machinery of the Bill, each Party would be enabled to bring forward a candidate of its own, and so discover what was the exact amount of support that would be given to their views, so that if their candidate was beaten he could retire before the second ballot. In foreign countries the system I propose is almost of universal application; and there the question of expenditure is really considered to be one of no practical importance at all. In England, which is much wealthier than other countries, the question of expenditure will be still more insignificant and trifling. I do not believe that second elections in this country would number one in 40, although in Continental countries they number one in six or one in eight, because among our own political Parties it is a settled custom to run a Liberal against a Conservative. Nor do I believe that the expense of elections, once placed in the hands of Municipalities, would be large. In conclusion, I will give expression to the hope that the Government will assist me to carry the Bill, which I believe will be found a successful measure, and not an unpopular one in the country. I beg to move its second reading.

Mr. Ashton Dilke

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Ashton Dilke.)

MR. J. R. YORKE, in opposing the Motion, said, that, in his opinion, it was not expedient to charge any portion of the expenses of Parliamentary candidates upon the ratepayers. The hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. Ashton Dilke) seemed to be one of those happy people who took a delight in all proceedings connected with elections, and who thought those proceedings could not be too much prolonged. He appeared to approach the question from a feeling that the more the candidates the merrier would be the contest; but that was not his (Mr. J. R. Yorke's) own feeling when he contemplated the number of candidates which would be started by the crotchetmongers throughout the country, and the prolonged turmoil which would be inevitable through the two contests it was now proposed to institute instead of one election. He therefore condemned the proposal as unnecessary and, to some extent, cruel to the candidates, as subjecting them to additional torture. The expense of an election depended upon the time it occupied; and under the Bill there would be a period before nomination, the period between the nomination of the first election, and then a period of not less than five, and not more than eight, days before the second election. What the consequent expense would be he would leave to the imagination of hon. Members, who already smarted under the cost of the present system, with its official, its permissive, and its illegitimate heads of expenditure. The measure had, indeed, so narrow a scope that it would scarcely be worth opposition were it not for the principle which it involved. Besides, there were several expenses attendant upon a Parliamentary election; but the Bill dealt with only one, and no adequate reason had been shown for transferring the expense of elections from persons now willing to bear it to persons who would be very unwilling to bear it indeed—namely, the ratepayers. The hon. Member had referred to other countries; but he had not attempted to show that the system in operation there was attended by any special advantages. If the present election arrangements were to be interfered with at all, he thought there was an overwhelming case in favour of placing such charges on the National Exchequer, for he was at a loss to see how the expenses of the election of Members of Parliament who were to deal with Imperial interests could fairly be made a charge upon the rates. The ratepayers, indeed, were at present looking forward to the promised settlement of the whole question rather in the direction of relief than of an increase of their burdens, as was now proposed. The second part of the proposal was entirely new to the English Constitution, and he was opposed to it on the ground that it would needlessly multiply contests, introduce into public life the unpleasantness inevitable to prolonged strife, and lower the character of the Representatives of the people in that House. A class of candidates would, no doubt, be enabled to come forward who were at present debarred from doing so; but men were what their opportunities made them, and, as a rule, it was not desirable that a working man should represent a large body of his fellow-countrymen. In the ranks of labour men of exceptional gifts were occasionally found. Such men had done honour to their order in that House, and no one could pretend that the question of money had ever jeopardized their election. Funds for popular candidates were always forthcoming. He did not believe that any genuine working-class representative was ever prevented by the want of pecuniary means from being elected to that House. The real difficulty with working men was how to support themselves when they were in the House of Commons, seeing that an annual subsidy, which would be requisite for the purpose, was different from a lump sum. He thought it unfair to throw the cost of the Bribery Commissioners upon the ratepayers belonging to the incriminated boroughs; and especially there was one point which he wished to put forward, and that was what the position of women would be under this Bill. He had always held that a woman who was in possession of property, or who occupied a house which would entitle a man to a vote, ought not to be prevented from voting. He had never gone further. Now, in the case of a Bribery Commission, it appeared very hard that women who had never had an opportunity of being bribed or of demonstrating their superior virtue, should be called upon to pay for the misconduct of their male neighbours who enjoyed the franchise. But this Bill would inflict a permanent, instead of an occasional, injustice, for those women would be charged with a rateable proportion of the costs of elections. He trusted the House would not accept this measure. He noticed that the silver side of the shield was turned towards them, and that Ministers who before supported the measure were now conspicuous by their absence. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department, indeed, in 1871, said that, partly by their own fault and partly by the fault of others, Her Majesty's Government had fallen out with more than one class of the community; they had fallen out with the Army and with the licensed victuallers; but that Bill would do still greater mischief, because it would throw further taxation on the shoulders of the whole community. But, if that was the case in 1871, the argument was still stronger now, seeing that since then the community had been made to suffer from the imposition of additional burdens, such as the Education rate and other charges. He was glad to see that the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General had come into the House. In 1871 the right hon. Gentleman somewhat complained of the lukewarm manner in which the Prime Minister dealt with the question. But, inasmuch as this year a large and comprehensive measure had been brought in by the hon. and learned Attorney General, dealing with all other branches of the Election question, but not mentioning this, he trusted the Government had changed their minds, and would not be found voting for the second reading. For his own part, he felt he had discharged his duty to the long-suffering ratepayers by resisting this attempt to throw an additional burden upon backs too little able to bear this grievance.

Mr. Ashton Dilke

MR. BROADHURST said, it was with very great pleasure that he had observed that the hon. Gentleman who had opposed the Motion for the second reading of the Bill (Mr. J. R. Yorke) had said very little in favour of the course he had taken, and practically nothing against the clause which provided for the Returning Officers' expenses. It was in that clause he (Mr. Broadhurst) was chiefly interested. In effect, it was not wholly one for the purpose of relieving working men from the difficulties of Parliamentary expenses; but it was a proposal rather for the object of giving a wider choice of candidates to the constituencies. There were two questions always put when the name of a candidate was mentioned. The first probably was, What were his politics? And the second was sure to be, What was his power to meet the expenses of the election? And it was very often the case that the second question ultimately came to be the most important, because, whatever his politics might be, or his capacity to represent the constituency faithfully, unless he was able to meet the enormous cost of the election, his chance of being returned was poor indeed. In his opinion, the ratepayers ought to bear the burden of the expenses; and, whilst the hon. Gentleman the Mover of the Bill (Mr. Ashton Dilke) had shown that under it the additional cost to the rates would be very small indeed—so small that it was hardly worthy of discussion—yet the advantages to the candidate would be enormous, the hon. Member for East Gloucestershire (Mr. J. R. Yorke) said that working men would find very little difficulty in meeting the cost of Parliamentary contests. He begged to assure the hon. Member that that was not the case. The difficulties were enormous indeed, and one of the most aggravating and irksome difficulties was that of the Returning Officers' charges. By the recent laws regulating elections, it was necessary for a candidate to pay a deposit before he could legally become a candidate at all, and that brought about in some cases a most peculiar and contradictory state of things. In his (Mr. Broadhurst's) own case, in the borough of Stoke-upon-Trent, there were four candidates at the last General Election. His hon. Colleague, and those upon his side, were hoping they would be reduced to three. He himself was secretly praying that there would be either five or only two, because, according to the number of candidates on the day of nomination would be the relative cost to each. As it was, he found very great difficulty to obtain the £250 that he had to pay way by of deposit before he could be legally a candidate. That was an obstacle that Parliament should remove at once; and, as a matter of good taste, all rich men who were capable of meeting the expenses should vote for the Bill in order to remove the difficulties that stood in the way of their less fortunate fellow-countrymen. He did not think there was any force in the objection that working men would make frivolous proposals of candidates, as no one would be so interested in keeping the number of candidates down as the ratepayers themselves. He did not believe either that there would be any great increase in the number of labour candidates. With regard to the general opinion on the subject, he could say, from his own experience, that he had never addressed a public meeting during the last two years in aid of a proposal similar to this at which there was any opposition offered to it. Another powerful reason why Parliament should remove these expenses from candidates was, that while they were called upon, and were willing, to pay these large sums of money for seats in Parliament, the constituencies could not be persuaded from the belief that Members had some pecuniary interest in obtaining a seat in the House, their argument being that if there were so many who were willing to pay those large sums for seats in the House there must be some means of recompense. The sooner such an impression was removed the better. He, therefore, cordially supported the second reading, and hoped that hon. Gentlemen opposite would permit them to take a division upon the question.

Mr. GREGORY opposed the Bill, contending that there was no need at the present time for any such legislation, and that no sufficient reason had been shown for any change in the present system. He was unwilling that anything should be added to the already heavy burdens upon the ratepayers, and could not vote for a measure which would impose upon candidates the anxiety of a second election within eight days of the first. He had no confidence in the predictions that the cost would be infinitesimally small, as he had seen so many similar prophecies falsified by the result. Just the same thing had been said of the Education rate, which in some instances had risen to 1s. or 1s. 6d. in the pound. As things were, the present expenses were not generally felt by gentlemen who presented themselves as candidates, or who were properly qualified to be brought forward for seats in the House. The hon. Member who had just spoken (Mr. Broadhurst) admitted that labour candidates were not generally prejudiced as things were, and he did not think the Bill would add to their number. But it would, if carried, certainly lead to a large increase in the number of candidates, by encouraging persons to come forward who would not be bond fide ones, and who, at their own will, would be able to add to the burdens of the locality. It was said that the agricultural labourers would not have the same means of returning their own candidates as were possessed by the large towns. Well, the county franchise had not yet been extended, and that question, therefore, had not yet arisen. But the agricultural labourers had not been unable to provide means for their unions and other objects, and he (Mr. Gregory) did not doubt they would be able to do so also for election purposes. Besides, the Returning Officer's expenses were only a fraction of the total expenses of a candidate, and were far less than the other expenses necessarily incurred. The second part of the Bill, dealing with re-elections in certain cases, he thought was simply extravagant and preposterous, and the result would be to make life intolerable to the man who had to be elected a second time within eight days after his first election. As no benefit would, in his opinion, be derived from the measure, he should decidedly vote against the second reading.

Mr. Broadhurst

MR. SERJEANT SIMON said, he regretted that he could not support the Bill in its present complex form. The first part of it embraced a proposal he had over and over again supported in the House. Indeed, two Sessions ago he had himself brought in a Bill on the subject. The objection as to the expenses falling on the ratepayers was, in his opinion, of no weight. They would be infinitesimal, and, therefore, he could not agree with the hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory) that there would be a pressure on the ratepayers. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Stoke (Mr. Broadhurst) had shown it would not be a farthing in the pound. But, even if it were otherwise, he (Mr. Serjeant Simon) thought that the ratepayers ought to pay for the privilege of representation in the House of Commons; and the ground upon which he supported the first part of the Bill was not on economic grounds, but because he was of opinion that the present system of payment by Members of the legal machinery for conducting an election was an entire reversal of the principle of representation. If it was a privilege to be represented in the House of Commons, those who enjoyed that privilege ought to pay for the legal machinery which was necessary to conduct the election. The present state of things reversed the relation between the Member and the constituents. Instead of being a person who was conferring a benefit on the community, it represented him as a person who was receiving a favour at the hands of the constituency.

The present system was a prolific source of corruption, because the constituencies were taught to regard the candidate as a person whom they were benefiting. As a rule, only rich men could come forward as candidates, because it was only they who could incur the expenses of election. He himself had fought three contested elections, and, therefore, knew the trouble and misery of a contest. He regretted that his hon. Friend (Mr. Ashton Dilke) had introduced the proposal of a second election, as he thought it was useless and dangerous. Life would be positively miserable if a man after going through one contest had to go through a second, and perhaps a third, for there might not be an absolute majority of electors in the second any more than in the first election. Where were they to stop? He was sorry that a useful measure had been spoilt by the introduction of such a proposal. Under the circumstances, he could not support the Bill, though he would not vote against it, because the first part was a proposition of his own. He should walk out without voting. ["No, no!"] He really did not know what the principle of the Bill was—whether it was contained in the former or the latter proposals, and he certainly could not support the latter.

SIR MASSEY LOPES said, he opposed the Bill on the ground that it was a proposal to impose additional expense upon the ratepayers of particular localities, which ought to be paid out of the National Exchequer. They had been told that the addition which the proposal of the Bill would make to local rates would be very small. That might be so; but the Conservative Party objected not so much on the matter of cost, as on the matter of principle, and he could not understand, if the House were to pass the Bill, how they could oppose the payment of Members of Parliament. They might depend upon it that, if they conceded this point, the inevitable consequence would be a proposal to pay Members of Parliament. The principle was not a novel one, but had been before the House six or seven times. A Bill to the same effect was introduced in 1867 by the right hon. Gentleman opposite, the present Postmaster General, when it was carried by a small majority of about 3. It was again introduced in 1871, when it was strenuously opposed by the hon. and learned Gentleman the present Attorney General and the right hon. and learned Gentleman the present Home Secretary, both of whom were Tellers against it. The Home Secretary then made a forcible speech on the subject. Proposals to the same effect were brought forward in 1872-3, and defeated by large majorities. The Bill was both impolitic and unjust; impolitic, because it was very undesirable that the Representatives of the people should be more under the control of their constituents than they were at present. They did not want in the House of Commons machines and delegates; they wanted Gentlemen able to exercise their own judgment, and to give their own free expression of opinion upon questions that came before them. If this proposal were carried it would tend to put Members of Parliament more under local influence than they were at present. It was unjust, because owners of personal property would be exempted from paying the expenses; while the owners of real property, already burdened too highly, would have an additional burden thrown upon them in having to defray them. The analogy of Municipal elections did not apply, for the candidates had simply to perform local duties and were elected for local purposes, whereas Members of that House dealt with national matters. The effect of the Bill, too, would be to promote Parliamentary contests, to bring into the field men who were anxious to air their own projects, and largely to increase the number of candidates who would be able to gratify their personal ambition at the expense of the constituency. The local rates had already to bear the expense of registration, which was an expense which ought to fall on the National Exchequer, and he did not wish to go further in the same direction. He was satisfied that the professed object—namely, to introduce more working-class Members of Parliament—would not be secured by the Bill. He did not object to working men's candidates; he should like to see more of them, and he was sure that Conservatives generally would welcome a greater number of them than were in the House at present. But the Bill would not add to their number, while it would certainly interfere most seriously with the dignity, patriotism, and independence of Members of Parliament.

Sir Massey Lopes

MR. ANDERSON said, that the hon. Baronet the Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes) had just said he would like to see a larger number of labour Representatives in the House, and yet he objected to remove what constituted the chief obstacle in the way of their coming here. The hon. Baronet said the object would not be attained, even if the Bill were carried; and what he meant by that he (Mr. Anderson) supposed was, that the other expenses were so high that still the labour candidates would not be able to secure election. Still, the hon. Baronet said that if the Bill were carried, the number of candidates would be greatly increased; and he (Mr. Anderson) would ask, would not the other expenses tend to check the multiplication of candidates in the same way that it would check the number of labour candidates? The hon. Baronet was not entitled to both of these consequences, but must take the one or the other, as the one destroyed the other. He (Mr. Anderson) thought if the Bill were carried, with certain necessary modifications that it would be requisite to introduce into it in Committee, it would remove the great obstacle that working men had to obtaining seats in Parliament. Already they had a few very able men of that class, and very good Members they were, and he joined with the hon. Baronet in wishing there were more of them, because the number they had was very small as compared with the proportion that working men bore in the electorate. But the principal reason he supported the Bill, or at least the 1st clause, which threw the expenses of the Returning Officer on the constituency, was that the candidate had no sort of control over those expenses. All the other expenses connected with the election were more or less in the hands of the candidate and his committee; but when they came to the expenses of the Returning Officers he was absolutely helpless, and had simply to pay down a large sum of money that was expended by people over whom he had no control. He thought it was a fair argument that in all our other elections the public paid such expenses, not merely the Municipal elections, but the School Board and Parochial Board elections; and he did not see why there should be any difference in Parliamentary elections. He admitted, however, the Bill ought to be guarded; and the Bill, as it stood at present, was entirely unguarded, for there was nothing to prevent any number of candidates coming forward, and there was no kind of stipulation—as there had been in all the other Bills on this subject—that, unless a candidate carried a given proportion of votes, he should be punished by being made to pay the expenses of it, as far as his share of them went. Under the Municipal Election Act, at present candidates had nothing to pay, and the result was sometimes very curious. It happened the other day in his own constituency that one gentleman got himself nominated in some three, four, or five different wards, thus putting all those wards to the expense and trouble of a contest, which was a great abuse; because, if elected in all of them, he could only sit for one. That was an abuse, and in the same way, under this Bill as it stood, a candidate might get himself nominated in a dozen different constituencies, and put them all to the expense of a contest. That would certainly be an abuse; but there was nothing to prevent proper safeguards being put into the Bill at some other stage. As regarded the 2nd clause, he did not take the same view as the hon. and learned Member for Dewsbury (Mr. Serjeant Simon), who declined to vote for the Bill because that clause was in it. He (Mr. Anderson) objected to that clause just as much as the hon. and learned Gentleman; but the course he should take would be to support the Bill in its leading clause, and in Committee endeavour to get the 2nd clause thrown out, and that was the course he would recommend the hon. and learned Gentleman to take. He thought the 2nd clause was a distinct blot on the Bill. It tended to complicate the matter, and produce a confusion in the desire to support the Bill, which, otherwise, on its merits, the Bill was fairly entitled to. For these reasons he should support the second reading; but would endeavour to get the objectionable clause thrown out afterwards.

MR. R. N. FOWLER said, he did not consider that there was anything to complain of under the present system. The hon. and learned Member for Dewsbury (Mr. Serjeant Simon) had stated that he had fought three contested elections. As the hon. and learned Member had won all those elections he had not much reason for complaining. He (Mr. R. N. Fowler) had fought five contested elections, and only won two. Consequently, he had more reason to complain of the present system than the hon. and learned Member for Dewsbury had. It was said that gentlemen were deterred from becoming candidates in consequence of the expense attaching to candidature. When the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General lost his seat for Brighton, the borough of Hackney, at its own expense, returned the right hon. Gentleman. He also believed the return of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster for Birmingham did not cost him 1*d*. He did not think anyone who was sufficiently distinguished for a large number of people to desire to see him in Parliament was ever kept out on the score of expense, while the present system acted as a deterrent to candidates who had no claim to election. He apprehended that the larger the constituencies were the greater would be the number of candidates. If this Bill were passed the country would be flooded with “bogus” candidates, simply desirous of bringing themselves and their crotchets before the public. This would be the case at General Elections, but much more the case at by-elections, where men who were obscure would strive to attain that importance in the country for which a by-election afforded special facilities. It seemed to him that the present system acted as a deterrent upon men coming forward who had no claim to a seat in that House, and who did not enjoy the confidence of any large section of any constituency; and, believing that the Bill, by removing that deterrent, would cause very great evils, he should vote against it.

MR. HIBBERT said, he rose for the purpose of saying a word or two with respect to the views of the Government on this question. He thought the House must feel a sense of satisfaction at the tone of moderation which had prevailed on both sides. The hon. Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne (Mr. Ashton Dilke), in introducing the Bill, stated that on the second reading of the Bill, which included the first proposal, in a previous Session, it was carried at that time, although the Government of the day were in opposition to it, the Government of the day being then the Conservative Party; but a little later, when a Liberal Government was in Office, and a similar proposal was made, it was not carried; and he (Mr. Hibbert) thought his better part would be, if he was to offer the support of the Government, to say as little as possible about the former action of Parliament on the subject. His hon. Friend the Member for East Gloucestershire (Mr. J. R. Yorke), who had moved the rejection of the Bill, seemed to think he (Mr. Hibbert) was an impartial person in his views on the question; but he was not so impartial as the hon. Member thought, for he had voted on every occasion for the proposal contained in the 1st clause; and, therefore, he had great pleasure now in giving his support to the proposal, and also in giving the support of the Government to it. His hon. Friend had stated that the proposal of the returning expenses was a small matter, and that the amount needed would be very small; but there was no doubt the opposition to the Bill was based not on the amount of the expense thrown on the rates, but on the principle. There was a distinction between this proposal and other matters of expense to which objection was made as falling upon local rates. In this case, the extension of expenditure upon the localities which were interested in the return of Members would be borne by those localities; but if it fell upon the national purse, of course, all persons throughout the country would have to pay, whether they were privileged to return Members or not. Every borough had not the privilege of returning a Member of Parliament; and, certainly, if exceptions were made in cases of this kind, it would not be objected that the expenses should fall rather upon the rates than upon the national purse. It was objected by the hon. Baronet the Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes) that, if this expense was allowed to fall upon the rates, there would probably before long be a demand that the Members' expenses should be borne in the same way. That he (Mr. Hibbert) considered was a very long way off, and he did not think it was a proposal which would meet with very large support in the present House of Commons, or in the country; and if such a proposition was ever made, it would be upon a fair discussion as to whether the expense of such payment should be thrown on the local rates, or on the national funds. But, upon the main question, as to whether the cost of what were called Returning Officers' expenses—that was, the necessary expenses of the machinery of an election—should be paid by the candidate, or should be paid by the localities interested in the return of the Members, then, he thought, there were very strong reasons why a change should be made, and that the expense should cease to be paid by the candidates, and should be thrown upon the rates. This proposal he did not support merely because its working would admit the working man, because he did not think legislation should be carried out with the view of promoting class interests of any kind; but on broader grounds, he said that what had to do with the proper machinery of returning a Member of Parliament, ought to be not only conducted by the localities interested, but ought to be paid for by them; and he thought it would not be difficult to show that the very fact of candidates being called to pay these necessary expenses had been one very great reason why other expenses which were not so legitimate, and practices which were in a great many cases illegal, had by degrees grown up, and money had been so very lavishly expended in the various elections of the country. On the ground, therefore, that the change would lead to a greater economy, he also supported the proposal. He believed that if elections were conducted at the expense of the locality there would be very much smaller settlements made for Returning Officers' expenses, and that what had been charged in such cases would be found in some cases to far exceed what was necessary for the purpose. He was told on good authority that before the last Election the Returning Officers in the Metropolis held a meeting, at which they came to an agreement to demand even a larger sum for expenses than was allowed under the Act passed a few years ago, and detailed in the Schedule of the Act. On the ground, then, that this measure would clear the way to greater purity of election, as he thought; on the ground, also, of leading to greater economy, and on the ground of giving all classes more freely an opportunity of seeking the suffrages of the various boroughs or counties, he thought the 1st clause of the Bill deserved the support of the House. At the same time he felt bound to say that he agreed with his hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) in his remarks that the clause did want some provisions which should, to a certain extent, prevent any large acquisition of what were called "bogus" candidates. The Bill of his right hon. Friend the Postmaster General did contain such a proposal. It provided that in case a certain proportion of votes was not given for any candidate, a part of the money which had been paid for the Returning Officer's expenses should be taken from him and not returned; but that in the case of a proper proportion of the votes being cast, the amount of money paid for the admission of a candidate should be returned to the candidate. In Committee, he should propose, if the Bill passed the second reading, that some such provision should be made, and probably it would be accepted by his hon. Friend. As to the 2nd clause of the Bill, he must say that he could not give the support of the Government to the proposal except to this extent. The Government were willing that the Bill should be read a second time; but they would take a discussion upon it in Committee, and he did not wish in what he had said to commit the Government in any way upon the 2nd clause. There were, no doubt, great objections against it; and, no doubt, there were strong reasons for it, that some such change was in existence in all countries, with the exception of Spain. With the understanding that the Government were only committed to the second reading of the Bill, and that the 2nd clause was open to question, he should support the Motion.

Mr. Hibbert

MR. J. G. TALBOT said, that it was curious to find that the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Hibbert), as representing the Government, should get up and say that, although he did not like the Bill as a whole, he was, nevertheless, prepared to give to it the support of the Government. The hon. Gentleman wanted to modify the 1st clause, and said he would oppose the 2nd.

MR. HIBBERT: I ought to have said, if I did not sufficiently explain myself, that if the 1st clause is adopted, it will require some additional provision being made to prevent "bogus" candidates coming forward.

MR. J. G. TALBOT said, that that was with regard to the 1st clause. The 1st clause was to be modified, and the 2nd expunged. Was that so?

MR. HIBBERT: Hear, hear!

MR. J. G. TALBOT: That was rather a remarkable proceeding. There was no precedent for throwing the expense on the ratepayers. No one could complain of what the hon. Member for Newcastle-on-Tyne (Mr. Ashton Dilke) had done; but it was matter of some complaint that Her Majesty's Government should have treated the matter so slightly. In fact, the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Hibbert), the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Evelyn Ashley), and the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General (Mr. Fawcett) were the only occupants of the Treasury Bench. All the Members of the Cabinet were absent, and only one of the Members of the Government, representing the Local Government Board, came forward to support a Bill which contained an important principle, inasmuch as it sought to amend the representation of the people. The practice hitherto had always been that the expenses at elections should be borne by the candidates themselves. The matter was not, perhaps, of first-rate importance; but still alterations of the Constitution ought not to be made in that manner. If the Government really wished that this important change should take place, why did not one of their chief authorities come forward and say so boldly? He (Mr. J. G. Talbot) was one of the few Members who had no Returning Officer's expenses, and he was also returned by an absolute majority of the electors, and therefore he could not have any personal objections to the measure; but he thought there were one or two sound and Constitutional objections to a proposition of this sort being brought forward in the manner it had been. To some extent this was a sentimental grievance. What was desired was that all kinds of persons should be at liberty to come forward and seek the suffrages of the electors. Looking at the matter practically, that was not a desirable state of things. It was no use mincing matters, nor representing things as they are not. The fact was that representation in Parliament was a matter of serious and earnest business. It had been said that this was a measure to increase the number of the working men Members of that House. Well, he had no objection to a working man being in the House; but if, however, those persons wished to represent constituencies, they should be prepared, like other candidates, to devote their lives to the Business of that House. This representation was not a thing to be taken up and put down at pleasure; and unless a man was able by himself, or through his friends, to pay the moderate Returning Officer's fees now demanded, could it be supposed that he was a fit and proper person to sit in that House? Was it right that this attempt to change our present system should be made in so unsatisfactory a manner? As to the second portion of the Bill, it had been so much objected to by all the Members who supported the first section, that it would not be worth his while to spend any time in criticizing it. After all, this was merely tinkering at a great question. If they were to consider the question of the representation of the people, let them do so broadly on the invitation of the Ministers of the Crown. If they were to have Reform Bills, let them not have them in the form of tinkering on Wednesday afternoons, but on the responsibility of Her Majesty's Government, so that the House might know what they were going to vote upon.

MR. CROPPER, in opposing the Bill, said, that he considered the 2nd clause to be a deterrent to every hon. Member, as no one was anxious to prolong the excitement of a contested election. If the 1st clause of the Bill were passed in its present form, constituencies would run the risk of having all sorts of candidates thrust upon them; and it was possible that, in the event of an election taking place, there might be found in every borough returning Members to that House a Temperance candidate, a Home Rule candidate, and candidates representing all other kind of crotchets so well known to hon. Members. In fact, ambitious persons might put up for three or four places, not only to get a name, but in the hope that by some lucky chance they might get into Parliament. In reference to the allusions which had been made to the question of paying Members for their services, he would remind the House that that was not the only place where men gave their services for nothing. The whole magistracy of this country gave their services for nothing. He had no doubt that some time or other Her Majesty's Government would bring in a measure embodying the best part of the Bill; but, in its present form, he could not support it.

MR. FAWCETT said, he hoped that, when he rose to say a few words in support of the Bill, it would not be supposed for a single moment that he intended to supply the want that had been complained of—the absence of leading Members of the Government on the occasion of this debate. He hoped it would not be thought unnatural that he should say a few words in favour of a proposal which he had advocated in season and out of season, both when Liberal and when Conservative Governments had been in Office. He had brought it forward on seven different occasions, and had met with various results. The first time the subject was brought forward was when the Conservative Government was in Office in 1868. It was carried twice in Committee on the Corrupt Practices Bill, and it was only at the very last moment that it was rejected. The next time the proposal was brought forward it was only lost by the very narrow majority of 3. On the subsequent occasions, he was sorry to say, it fared worse, and was rejected by increasing majorities. The hon. Member for East Gloucestershire (Mr. J. R. Yorke) had expressed the hope that he (Mr. Fawcett) had changed his opinion in reference to this proposal; but he had not changed his opinion, and should certainly support the principle of the Bill, because the more he thought of this question, the more it seemed to him that it embodied a principle which it was of increasing importance that that House should recognize and accept. A great deal had been said, as had often been said before, about the effect that this proposal of throwing the expenses upon the rates would have in encouraging the number of candidates at a contested election; but it appeared to him that if the proposal were properly safeguarded it would tend in the exactly opposite direction; for, at present, constituencies were interested in extravagance, whereas, if this proposition were carried out, constituencies would be interested in economy. If at the present time it appeared that there was not likely to be a contest, it was perfectly well known that a certain number of hundreds of pounds which would otherwise be spent would not be spent; and, under these circumstances, the persons who would participate in the advantages of that expenditure were naturally interested in creating a contest. But supposing this Bill were carried out, who would suffer from an unnecessary contest? It would not be the candidate who was subjected to a vexatious contest, but the constituency, and the consequence would be that the whole public sentiment of the constituency would be against the person who had thrown that unnecessary expense upon the ratepayers. But it was often said that the great argument in favour of making the constituencies responsible for the expenses would be that it would have the effect of bringing forward more working-men candidates. That was very desirable; but he always thought it was unfortunate to discuss this proposition on that narrow issue. He hoped one result of that measure would be, not only to admit working men more readily into that House, but to throw the doors of that House more widely open to those who did not possess a great amount of wealth. But the great importance of the measure, as he (Mr. Fawcett) viewed it, consisted in the fact that it was the recognition of a principle, and that principle was simply this—that a Member who came into that House ought to feel that he undertook a great and important duty—one that he ought not to play with; and, that being the case, it seemed to him of the first consequence that everything should be done to make the constituencies feel that a man who undertook that duty, and discharged it faithfully, ought not to have to pay for the privilege of doing it; and that, at any rate, they should, as far as possible, lessen and lighten the pecuniary burden which might be imposed upon him in the discharge of that public and local duty. It seemed to him that, from that point of view, this measure would improve and place upon their true footing the relations which should exist between Members and constituencies. A great deal had been said in the course of the debate about the second part of the Bill, and one of his chief reasons for troubling the House with these few remarks was that there should be no doubt upon that point. Certainly he should be sorry if his hon. Friend who had brought in the Bill (Mr. Ashton Dilke) should for a moment suppose that in voting for the second reading of the Bill he was voting for the 2nd clause of the Bill. He objected to that 2nd clause, not only on the grounds that had been stated by hon. Members on both sides of the House, but for a wider and a different reason. If anyone would look to the Bill of his hon. Friend, and see the conditions with which he had found it necessary to surround that clause, it at once became evident that it would be almost impossible to work that clause in constituencies which returned more than one or more than two Members. In a few years time the subject of Parliamentary Reform, and the great question of the re-distribution of seats would become questions of absorbing importance to that House. He knew that in expressing the opinions he was about to express, he was expressing opinions which many hon. Members on that side of the House did not share; but he felt that whenever the question of re-distribution should again have to be considered, it was of the first importance that they should not drift in the direction of single-Member constituencies, but that they should have constituencies in which two or three or four Members could be returned, so that not only the majority should have a chance of being represented, but that different sections of opinion should have a chance of being represented in proportion to their voting strength. That being the case, he should be sorry if, by a side wind, as it were, he were in any way made to support a proposal which would render it very difficult to have constituencies in future with two, three, or four Members. Another objection which had been urged to the Bill was one which had been brought forward by the hon. Baronet the Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes), who had always taken such a great interest in the question of local taxation. He said that if the charges were to be transferred from the candidates, they ought to be transferred to the Consolidated Fund, and should not be thrown upon local taxation. He (Mr. Fawcett) was as anxious as the hon. Baronet could possibly be that no charges should unnecessarily be thrown upon local taxation; but it seemed to him that there was an insuperable objection to that proposal of throwing it on a public fund. Public money was too often considered to be no one's money, and it was supposed that the Consolidated Fund was a great source of wealth which could be drawn upon at will, and by drawing upon which no one became the poorer. If, therefore, they paid these expenses out of the Consolidated Fund, they interested the constituencies in extravagance; whereas, if they paid them out of the local rates, they interested them in economy; and, moreover, it had always appeared to him that the principle of maintaining the local as well as the Imperial character of representation had been felt by the Conservative as well as the Liberal Party. He would not delay the debate at that hour of the afternoon with any further observations. This question could be raised in many different ways. It could be brought up in connection with the Corrupt Practices Bill or the Ballot Bill. But he could not resume his seat without expressing his satisfaction at the announcement that had been made that afternoon, on the part of the Government, that at length the principle was recognized by the Government that constituencies and not candidates should in future be responsible for the necessary expenses of elections. In recognizing and supporting that principle, he believed an important step had been taken to place the relations between constituencies and Representatives on an improved basis, and not a little would thus be done to place the representative system of this country on a more satisfactory basis. Under these circumstances, he rejoiced in the announcement that had been made on behalf of the Government by his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Local Government Board (Mr. Hibbert); and, with the qualifications which he had stated, he should certainly give his cordial support to the second reading of the Bill.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON, in opposing the Motion for the second reading of the Bill, said, he was surprised to find that a Ministry who professed to be the friends of the rate-payers were supporting a proposal to lay upon that body an additional charge of something like £300,000 whenever a General Election took place. He was not sure that it was desirable to have no property qualification; in any case, the present law produced some of the effects of a property qualification. Men who aspired to a place in that House should have some independent means and some leisure. He was utterly unable to see how a skilled artizan, or a bonâ fide working man, could, after a hard day's toil, come down to the House, and sit up to any hour of the night, as hon. Members were obliged to do. For precisely the same reason, he objected to professional men, whose whole time was employed in their profession, being Members of Parliament. He was prepared to vote against officers on full pay being eligible as Members, and for the same reason he had voted against the admission of clergymen. It was singular that no one had attempted to explain the second part of the Bill, which referred to "absolute and relative" majorities. He confessed he did not know what was meant by a "relative majority," and had supposed, after the condemnation of the phrase "bare majority," that any such epithet was un-Parliamentary. However, his objection to the Bill was that it would add, no matter how slightly, to the local burdens; and he should, therefore, vote against the second reading. The Members on the Opposition side of the House were fighting for a great principle, and that principle was that no addition should be made to the rates.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked what was the real objection felt by hon. Members opposite to the Bill? The hon. Gentleman the Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Stanley Leighton) had stated it very fairly. He said that at present there was a high property qualification necessary to enable Gentlemen to become Members of that House, and he desired that that property qualification should continue. According to the hon. Member's view, it was the business of the electors, not to ask anyone what his political views were, but to select some wealthy neighbour as their Representative, to do what he liked, because he knew infinitely better than the constituency. He (Mr. Labouchere), however, wished to point out that the world was not divided into men who had nothing and men who were rich. There were a number of persons in the country who, being possessed of £300 or £400 a-year—too small an income to allow them to stand for a constituency under the existing system, on account of the heavy expenses an election entailed—would, under other and more favourable circumstances, be able to obtain a seat in that House, and who would make useful Members of it. It was out of the question to say that these expenses were very little, because in some constituencies, especially in counties, they were very great. He was very glad that the Government had stated that they were in favour of the principle of the Bill, and he was also very glad that they intended to oppose the 2nd clause in Committee, for he was decidedly opposed to the introduction of the double system of election. It was satisfactory to hear the opinion boldly expressed by them that the expenses in question should be thrown on the ratepayers, and he hoped that the Bill would become law.

MR. LEWIS said, he thought the House had just reason to complain of the absence of Members of the Government when a Bill of that sort, making two vital changes which were totally unconnected with each other, was being considered. Hon. Members knew perfectly well, from the course of proceedings that went on, that the Government had no opinion. Members of the Cabinet, when this new Reform Bill came on, took care to desert the House, and sent the most amiable and respected, but still a subsidiary, Member of the Government to represent their opinions. Did the Government think that way of playing fast and loose with a question of Reform, which, inter alia, introduced the French practice at elections, would satisfy their Friends in the House or in the country? The hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Local Government Board (Mr. Hibbert) proposed to take his knife and cut the 1st clause of the Bill into little bits, and cut out Clause 2 altogether. That was not the sort of reform which would satisfy the aspirations of the Radical Party or the Birmingham Caucus. They wanted something far stronger and more drastic than the milk-and-water proposals of the Bill. The Government had themselves a Bill dealing with the election expenses, for that was the real object of the Bill of his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General with regard to the Corrupt Practices Bill; but they had not ventured to put such a proposal as this in that Bill. Yet that Wednesday afternoon, with the Front Ministerial Bench deserted, they were asked to pass that Reform Bill in petto, for the purpose of satisfying hon. Members below the Gangway, and showing that there were some Radical Members of the Government who were prepared to play helter-skelter with the Constitution, and, for that afternoon, at any rate, would show how Radical they were. He himself happened to be in a peculiar position, because he had voted for Clause 1 in the last Parliament; but he thought that the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General mistook what Clause 1 was.

MR. FAWCETT said, that he had never proposed that all expenses should be thrown on the rates. He had limited it to the Returning Officers' expenses.

MR. LEWIS said, he should like to give the House an opportunity of voting on Clause 1, although his own opinion differed from that of most of those on the Opposition Benches. He believed the result of that portion of the measure would be that they would have every wretched "ism" on the Liberal side represented by a candidate at elections. He believed one result would be that the Conservative Party would benefit by the expenses of elections being thrown on the constituencies, because the Vegetarians, the Dipsomaniacs, and Hypochondriacs would have a candidate, every conceivable opinion of the smallest and most minute character in the Liberal Party, from the lowest class of working men upwards, would be represented at the poll; and he believed that in many constituencies, where an unfortunate Conservative candidate could not at the present time show his face, they would find the Conservative candidate at the head of the poll, attended by all the Radical "isms" a long way below him. That was a result he should be glad to see; but he would rather not see that if it involved the sacrifice of a principle. He himself believed that there was a great deal to be said in favour of the 1st clause of the Bill, for it was in the interest of the Conservative Party; but it was not popular with the Party, for reasons which it was not necessary to go into. Still, he should have voted for it, as he had done on a previous occasion; but he declined to be dragged through the Lobbies with that double-barrelled Reform Bill, merely on the idea that the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Local Government Board would be able to convince the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. Ashton Dilke) that he ought to submit to the physical deformity which he proposed to inflict on the Bill—namely, to cut out Clause 2 and leave only a part of Clause 1. There seemed, however, to be no probability that there would ever be any practical step taken by this great Legislature during 1882. They would probably end, as they had begun, with a considerable amount of speechmaking, and no legislative results. Every step that was taken by the Liberal Government seemed to be directed to that end—utterly to destroy every capacity of legislation for 1882. They might, therefore, just as well discuss that Bill as anything else; and, so far as he could judge, that seemed to be the opinion of Ministers of the Crown who had absented themselves on this occasion. He protested, however, against the Government voting in favour of the second reading of a Bill, the main principle of which they disapproved.

MR. D. DAVIES said, he rose for the purpose of opposing the Bill “body and soul.” The ratepayers had enough to pay, and did not want to be further burdened. There were plenty of candidates willing to pay their own expenses, and they were a better class of candidates than those who would go upon the rates. The right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General had said there would be a less amount of expenditure; but he (Mr. D. Davies) could not agree with him in that, for he believed there would be much greater expenditure if this Bill became law. There would be a contest at every General Election in every constituency. Now, at the last two General Elections he had had no contest. But that was not for want of candidates, because on the last occasion three gentlemen from London came down, and, having looked at the place, went away again. If his constituents, who were Liberals, had to pay the expenses, of course those gentlemen would have contested his seat; but when they knew that they would have to pay expenses they did not like the look of matters. He should, therefore, stand to his guns, although he voted against the Government.

Mr. Lewis

MR. DUCKHAM said, he could not support the Bill, as he did not approve of its principle. He saw no connection between paying the expenses of local elections out of rates and the proposal to pay the election expenses of Members of Parliament. Neither did he think that the ratepayers of England should have any additional burdens imposed upon them, as would be the case if the Bill became law. At present they had a great many burdens placed upon them for national objects which they ought not to bear; and if those expenses were added those burdens would be further increased. He considered the measure would be most iniquitous. He protested against the Bill, and regretted that the Government had announced their intention of supporting it.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 87; Noes 85: Majority 2.—(Div. List, No. 65.)

Bill committed for To-morrow.

M O T I O N S .

INCLOSURE (CEFN DRAWEN) PROVISIONAL ORDER BILL.

On Motion of Mr. HIBBERT, Bill to confirm the Provisional Order for the inclosure of certain lands known as Cefn Drawen Common, situate in the parish of Glascwm, in the county of Radnor, in pursuance of a Report of the Inclosure Commissioners for England and Wales, ordered to be brought in by Mr. HIBBERT and Secretary Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 126.]

INCLOSURE (BETTWS DISSERTH) PROVISIONAL ORDER BILL.

On Motion of Mr. HIBBERT, Bill to confirm the Provisional Order for the inclosure of certain lands known as Bettws Dissert, situate in the parish of Bettws Dissert, in the county of Radnor, in pursuance of a Report of the Inclosure Commissioners for England and Wales, ordered to be brought in by Mr. HIBBERT and Secretary Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 127.]

INCLOSURE (ASHLESIDE) PROVISIONAL ORDER BILL.

On Motion of Mr. HIBBERT, Bill to confirm the Provisional Order for the inclosure of certain lands known as Ashleside Common, situate in the parish of Coverham, in the North Riding of Yorkshire, in pursuance of a Report of the Inclosure Commissioners for England and Wales, ordered to be brought in by Mr. HIBBERT and Secretary Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 128.]

IRISH REPRODUCTIVE LOAN FUND ACT
(1874) AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. BLAKE, Bill to amend "The Irish Reproductive Loan Fund Act, 1874," ordered to be brought in by Mr. BLAKE, Colonel COLTHURST, Colonel NOLAN, Mr. O'SHEA, Mr. O'CONNOR POWER, and Mr. COLLINS.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 133.]

PARISH REGISTERS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. BORLASE, Bill to make provision for the better preservation of the ancient Parochial Registers of England and Wales, ordered to be brought in by Mr. BORLASE, Mr. BRYCE, Mr. MELLOR, and Mr. COCHRANE-PATRICK.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 132.]

MILITARY MANŒUVRES BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Secretary CHILDERS, Bill for making provision for facilitating the Manœuvres of Troops to be assembled during the present Summer, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Secretary CHILDERS and Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 134.]

House adjourned at Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, 20th April, 1882.

MINUTES.]—Sat First in Parliament—The Lord Boston, after the death of his father.

PUBLIC BILLS — First Reading — Elementary Education Provisional Orders Confirmation (Finchley, &c.) * (63).

Committee—Report—Duke of Albany (Establishment) * (58).

Their Lordships met at Four o'clock;—

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION PROVISIONAL ORDERS CONFIRMATION (FINCHLEY, &c.)
BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to confirm certain Provisional Orders made by the Education Department under "The Elementary Education Act, 1870," to enable the School Boards for Finchley, Llanarth, and Upper Dylais, to put in force the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and the Acts amending the same—Was presented by The LORD PRESIDENT; read 1^a, and referred to the Examiners. (No. 63.)

And having gone through the Business on the Paper, without debate—

House adjourned at a quarter past Four o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 20th April, 1882.

MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEE—Canals, appointed.

SUPPLY — considered in Committee — Resolutions [April 3] reported.

PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—First Reading—Water Provisional Orders * [135]; Gas Provisional Orders * [136].

Select Committee — Report — Arklow Harbour * [96-137].

Third Reading—Army (Annual) * [105], and passed.

QUESTIONS.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS—THE
"CITY OF LIMERICK."

MR. RYLANDS asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether it is intended to hold an inquiry into the loss of the steamer "City of Limerick."

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: The City of Limerick was detained by the Board of Trade some time ago; but the case was carried to a Court of Survey. The vessel was unconditionally released by the Court of Survey and allowed to proceed to sea. The owners have since commenced an action against the Board of Trade for damages and costs of the detention. That case will, I hope, be heard in the course of a few days by the Court of Appeal. While it is sub judice it is, of course, not desirable to institute any other inquiry. When the case is decided by the Final Court of Appeal, I will consider whether a further inquiry should not be instituted.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MESSRS. HELY AND DOWLING.

MR. W. J. CORBET asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he will take into consideration the cases of two farmers from Hollywood, county Wicklow, named Hely and Dowling, who have been in custody for the last four months in Dundalk Gaol, and will, in consideration of the peaceable condition of the county, order their release?

Mr. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that the cases of these men had been considered; but he could not recommend their release.

PEACE PRESERVATION (IRELAND) ACT, 1881 — PROCLAMATION OF COUNTY WICKLOW.

Mr. W. J. CORBET asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he has seen the following statement in "Wicklow News Letter" of Saturday last, the local Conservative Journal:—

"Although the disease of agrarian disturbance has been somewhat prevalent on the western side of the county, not only have the greater and most important districts been entirely free from it, but even in those places where it has been represented as epidemic, rumour and current reports have exaggerated the real state of things. . . . The two cases representing the serious crime of the Baltinglass district for half a year were both dealt with by Justice Harrison on Friday last; one of them was the unlawfully exposing a child, and was punished by a week's imprisonment; the other, a trumpety case of Boycotting, in which the accused, a woman, being found guilty by the jury on the charge of intimidation, was ordered to come up for judgment when called on;"

and, whether, in consideration of the peace and good order prevailing, he will recommend the Lord Lieutenant to revoke the Orders in Council under which the county is proscribed and proclaimed?

Mr. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that although, generally speaking, the present state of the county Wicklow was exceptionally quiet, he did not, as yet, see his way to the release of the political prisoners belonging to that part of Ireland.

RETURN No. 88 (REVENUE, TAXATION AND POPULATION)—PARLIAMENTARY REPRESENTATION.

SIR JOHN HAY asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If he will lay upon the Table, as a Supplement to Return No. 88, the number of Members of Parliament which each of the three divisions of the United Kingdom would obtain if the 658 Members were allotted, in accordance with the contribution of each to the Imperial Revenue?

Mr. W. J. Corbet

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: The information which the right hon. and gallant Member now asks was omitted at my request from the Return moved for by the hon. Member for Stafford. My reason for objecting to the insertion of it was, and is, that there are doubts how far the figures in the Returns represent the true incidence of taxation in the Three Kingdoms; and this being so, it is not advisable to insert in an official Return figures resting on an uncertain basis. Anyone who cares to do so can readily make the calculation for himself.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—THE POST-MISTRESS OF ARRAN ISLAND.

Mr. REDMOND asked the Postmaster General, Whether it is a fact that Mary Henion, who has held the office of postmistress in Arran Island for the last twenty years, has been dismissed in consequence of her son being arrested under the Coercion Act; whether during her long service she fulfilled her duties to the satisfaction of the Post Office authorities; and, whether her summary dismissal because of the suspected wrong doing of her son has been sanctioned by him?

Mr. FAWCETT: In reply to the hon. Member, I have to state that it is not the fact that Mrs. Henion, postmistress of Arran Island, has been dismissed in consequence of the arrest of her son under the Coercion Act. For some time past the duties of the Arran Island Post Office have not been conducted in a satisfactory manner; and it is on this account, and not on account of the son's arrest, that the office has been placed in other hands.

Mr. REDMOND: Did the dismissal come immediately after the arrest?

Mr. FAWCETT: It came after; but I had had the matter under consideration for some time.

EGYPT—THE BAY OF ASSAB.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is true that Her Majesty's Government have recommended the Egyptian Government to enter into a Convention with the Governments of Great Britain and Italy for the cession to Italy of a portion of territory in the Bay of Assab, on the West Coast of the Red Sea; whether this action is at variance with the policy hitherto followed by Her Majesty's Government as regards the claims of Foreign Governments to obtain territorial settlements on the Egyptian Coast of the Red Sea; and, if so, what are the reasons which have led to this change of policy; whether the Government of the Khedive have remonstrated against the pressure sought to be put upon them in this matter, and have refused to sign the Convention; what is the present state of the negotiations; and, whether there is any objection to communicate to Parliament the text of the proposed Convention, and the Correspondence that has taken place in respect thereto?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Her Majesty's Government have recommended the Turkish and Egyptian Governments to enter into a Convention with Italy, defining and limiting the rights of the latter country in respect to the territories at Assab, acquired and occupied by the Rubattino Company in the first instance, and subsequently by the Italian Government. They considered that it was for the interest of Egypt that such a Convention should be concluded in order to avoid the complications that might arise if the Italian occupation of Assab were maintained on an unrecognized and undefined footing, and with a view of obtaining the recognition by Italy of the Sovereignty of the Sultan, and authority of the Khedive, over the West Coast of the Red Sea. The proposed Convention stipulated that the establishment at Assab should have a purely commercial character, and contain provisions for the prohibition of the traffic in arms and of the Slave Trade. The Egyptian Government has refused the Convention; but correspondence on the subject is still going on, and the Papers could not be laid on the Table without the consent of the other Governments concerned. With regard to the hon. Member's suggestion that the action taken in this matter is at variance with the policy hitherto followed by Her Majesty's Government, as regards the claim of Foreign Governments to obtain territorial settlements on the Egyptian Coast of the Red Sea, I must point out that Her Majesty's Government had to deal with accomplished facts, and with a territorial settlement already obtained, and that they took the course which, under the circumstances, seemed best calculated to protect the interests of this country and of Egypt.

MR. BOURKE: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman can inform the House with whom the negotiations were first carried on between the Company and the territorial authority in Africa—whether it was the Native Tribes, or the Egyptian Government, or the Sultan?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: The Company appear to have obtained concessions from various local Sultans, and they actually occupied their settlements at Assab Bay a considerable time ago. I think that while the right hon. Gentleman was in Office the Italian flag was flying there.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS said, that in consequence of the answer of the hon. Baronet he should deem it his duty to bring the subject under the notice of the House and to move a Resolution.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MESSRS. JAMES DOWLING, DENIS SOMERS, TERENCE BYRNE, SIMON MALONE, AND ARTHUR MOLONEY.

MR. LALOR (for Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the neighbourhood of Monasterevan, in Kildare, has remained free from outrages; whether Messrs. James Dowling, Denis Somers, Terence Byrne, Simon Malone, and Arthur Moloney, of that district, were arrested on suspicion; whether Messrs. Terence Byrne and Denis Somers have been liberated; and, whether the same considerations which led him to consent to their liberation will apply to the cases of Messrs. Dowling, Malone, and Moloney?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that most of these men had been released. The cases of the remaining four prisoners had been considered—one had been released, and the other three could not with safety be released at present.

MR. LALOR asked why it was that James Dowling was refused the ordinary parole of three days?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he should get Notice of that Question.

EVICTIIONS (IRELAND)—THE RETURN FOR QUARTER TO 31st MARCH.

MR. LALOR (for Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, if he will lay upon the Table Return showing the number of Evictions in the quarter ended 31st March 1882 (in continuation of Return, No. 9, of the present Session), and of the Judgments for the Recovery of Land entered up in the High Court of Justice (Ireland), and of the Ejectment Decrees granted during the same period (in continuation of Return, No. 10, of the present Session)?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he had ordered these Returns, and hoped to lay them on the Table on Tuesday.

THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY— DUTY OF PROTECTING "EMERGENCY MEN."

MR. LALOR (for Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether twenty men of the Kilkenny Constabulary Forces were employed from the 5th to the 23rd September last in "protecting" Emergency men on the property of Mr. Boyd, of Tinwre, Durrow, Queen's County, with extra pay at 3s. 6d. a-day; whether they were relieved by an equal number of the Queen's County Constabulary, drafted from different points of the county, who did the same duty, and were placed in the same circumstances as the Kilkenny men; whether it is true that a large number of the Kilkenny Constabulary were employed at Mr. Keating's residence at Woodgift, in county Kilkenny, for some three months, also receiving the 3s. 6d. a-day extra pay; whether application was made, in proper form, for the allowance by the Queen's County constables employed as stated; and, whether any, and, if so, what, answer was made to it; and, upon what ground the allowance is granted to one body and withheld from the other?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that the men alluded to in the first instance received 2s. 6d. a-day extra pay while on duty at Durrow. They were replaced by men of the Queen's County, which was the place in which they were stationed. The station was reduced to 11 men, and they were lodged in the police barrack. The County Inspector did not think there was any necessity for extra pay for these men. The men employed at Woodgift received 3s. 6d. per day extra pay; but they were lodged in an outhouse, and in the opinion of the officers were entitled to this extra pay.

Mr. Lalor

THE IRISH LAND COMMISSION—THE SUB-COMMISSIONERS.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether a pledge was given by the Government that the names of the Sub-Commissioners would be laid before Parliament; and, whether any Return giving this information has been laid upon the Table; and, if not, in what manner a list of the names can be obtained?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, the Return would be presented to-day; but the Members of the House could very easily ascertain the names without this Return.

MR. HEALY said, that as there always appeared to be some difficulty in obtaining Returns upon Irish matters, he would like to know from the Chief Secretary when they might expect the Return he had promised himself with reference to the prisoners under the Coercion Act?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he believed in a day or two.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—MAJOR BOND, R.M.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the three months for which Major Bond was engaged are now up; and, if so, whether the appointment has been renewed or confirmed?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: The three months expired about the beginning of this month. He is now, like other magistrates, on one month's notice. It is not the case that he has been re-appointed for three months. At a month's notice his services could, if necessary, be dispensed with.

MR. HEALY inquired whether it was the intention of the Government to retain Major Bond from month to month?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: That will depend on the condition of the country. There is no intention of giving him notice immediately.

OFFICIAL SALARIES—MR. ALGERNON WEST.

MR. W. J. CORBET (for Mr. BIGGS) asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury. Whether it is not a fact that Mr. Algernon West, C.B., the Chairman of the Board of Inland Revenue, holds the post of Gentleman Usher to the Queen at a salary of £180 per annum, or thereabouts; and, if so, why his salary, as such, is not, in accordance with the instructions of the Public Accounts Committee, shown on the face of the Revenue Estimates, in addition to his salary of £2,000 as Chairman of the Board of Inland Revenue?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: As regards the first portion of the Question, the hon. Member is, as far as I am aware, correctly informed. The Committee of Public Accounts recommended that when a public officer receives a grant or temporary increase to his salary in respect to special services, the fact of such increase should be shown either on the Estimate or on the Appropriation Account of the Department to which he belongs. Payments made by Her Majesty out of Her Civil List to officers of Her Household do not fall within the recommendation of the Committee; and the Treasury have not required such payments to be noted in Estimates or Accounts.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—THE GORT BOARD OF GUARDIANS.

COLONEL NOLAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If his attention has been drawn to a resolution passed by the Gort Board of Guardians, requesting that their Chairman might be released from prison; and, if he would kindly accede to the prayer of the Guardians?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that he had seen the resolution in question, and that the case would shortly be reconsidered.

ARMY ORGANIZATION—ROYAL ARTILLERY AND ROYAL ENGINEERS—OFFICERS' RETIREMENT.

MR. STEWART MACLIVER asked the Secretary of State of War, If there is any Clause or Regulation in the Royal Warrant for Pay and Promotion, or in the Corrigenda Warrant, under which the Colonels and Lieutenant Colonels of the Royal Artillery and Royal Engineers, who obtained that rank prior to the 1st October 1877, can be compelled, against their wishes, to retire, or remain unemployed if they do not retire?

MR. CHILDERS: In reply to my hon. Friend, I have to state that under the Warrant of the 25th of June, 1881, now in force, of which the Corrigenda Warrant forms a part, there is no regulation compelling the officers to whom he refers to retire before the ages named in the Warrant, which are 60, 59, or 58, according to circumstances. These ages are earlier than those named in the former Warrant of 1878, and Her Majesty has undoubted power further to reduce them if thought necessary. As to employment, the Secretary of State has absolute power to approve the employment of such officers recommended by the Commander-in-Chief as he may think fit.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—EDITORS OF NEWSPAPERS ARRESTED UNDER THE ACT.

MR. LALOR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Is it the fact that suspects who are now in gaol under the Coercion Act, and who are owners and editors of newspapers, are permitted to write for their journals, provided they shall not refer to imprisonment or to Government; and that in all doubtful cases the governor of the prison shall forward the manuscript of a leading article to the authorities of Dublin Castle; and, if it be not a fact that, in consequence of such regulations, leading articles have been kept back for a fortnight?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, it was a fact that prisoners confined under the Protection Act were permitted to write for their journals, upon condition that they did not in any way carry on agitation or proceedings which would be thought necessary to detain them. When the Governor of the prison considered articles or communications to be objectionable, he informed the persons concerned that the communications would not be forwarded. The person could then request the Governor to forward them to him (Mr. W. E. Forster) or the Under Secretary. He was not aware that leading articles had been kept back for a fortnight.

MR. LALOR asked if it was not a fact that the editors were not allowed to mention anything in regard to prisoners, nor in regard to the Government of the country?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, undoubtedly the editors could not, from the prisons, write articles complaining against the Government or their treatment.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—“PAT.”

MR. LALOR asked the Postmaster General, If it is by his orders that the comic paper “Pat,” published in Dublin, is not allowed to pass through the Post Office, particularly when directed by Members of this House to their friends?

MR. FAWCETT: I have made inquiry with reference to the Question of the hon. Member, and I find that nothing is known of any copies of Pat having been arrested in their passage through the post, either in this country or in Ireland. Certainly, I have given no instructions upon the subject.

MR. LALOR said, that if the right hon. Gentleman would apply to him privately, he would inform him of cases in which the paper in question had been arrested at the Post Office.

MR. FAWCETT: If the hon. Gentleman will call upon me, I will gladly inquire into any case, details of which may be communicated to me.

ARMY—PAYMENT OF PENSIONS.

MR. O'SHEA asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he is aware that considerable disappointment and inconvenience have, in many cases, been occasioned by the delay which has occurred in sending out orders for the payment of Army pensions under the new system; and, whether he will take steps to add to the great advantages which the new system confers on the pensioners, by arranging that in future all orders for the payment of Pensions shall be issued within a week of the date upon which the latter fall due?

MR. GORST also asked, Whether the effect of the new Regulations for payment of Military and Naval Pensions through the Post Office has not been to cause a delay in the receipt of pensions, in some cases, of upwards of fifteen days; and, whether arrangements will in future be made for sending money orders to persons entitled to pensions at such dates as will admit of their receiving their pensions on the days on which they are due?

Mr. Lalor

MR. CHILDERS: In reply to my hon. and gallant Friend (Mr. O'Shea), I have to thank him for the commendation which he has given to the new system of paying pensions. As might be expected on the first introduction of the entirely novel plan, there has been some little friction, and this has been aggravated by two circumstances; one, that, in consequence of the very large sum (£700,000) required, it could not be drawn from the Exchequer, under the present or former system, until a few days after the beginning of the financial year; and the second that the first day of payment fell in the Easter holidays—in fact, on the Saturday between Good Friday and Easter Sunday. But in spite of this the payments, on an average, in many districts will be completed at earlier dates than under the former system. I have given orders under which, in the three other quarters of the year, the payments will begin on the 1st of the month, and in April on the very earliest practicable day after the 1st, and this should secure the object of the latter part of the Question. It must be borne in mind that all these pensions are payments in advance—not, like salaries, after the completion of the service. This answer, I think, fully meets the Question of the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst).

MR. GORST asked whether the answer applied to Naval pensions?

MR. CHILDERS: Yes; all payments, whether for Naval or Military pensions, are made through the Post Office.

IRELAND—MR. CLIFFORD LLOYD—CIRCULAR BY THE INSPECTOR OF POLICE, COUNTY CLARE.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is true that on Tuesday last Mr. Clifford Lloyd, special magistrate for Clare, interfered to prevent the erection of huts to shelter a large number of evicted families at Tulla, in that county, although a site for the huts had been secured from the legal possessor of the ground, and although twelve huts had been actually built, and six others were in course of construction; whether Mr. Lloyd declared the building of the huts to be illegal, ordered the builder to leave the place that evening, and told him that if he did not leave he would be arrested; whether, if the facts be as stated, the policy of the Government is to prevent the sheltering of evicted tenants through the sympathy of their neighbours, aided by benevolent action in their behalf; whether the following circular respecting Mr. Clifford Lloyd, or a circular to the like effect, has been issued by the County Inspector of Constabulary in Clare to the Sub-Inspectors under his command:—

“ Ennis, 4th March, 1882.

“As there is too good reason for the belief that every possible means will be used to assassinate Mr. C. Lloyd, it behoves the men of this county to be on the alert to prevent it:

“Men proceeding on his escort should be men of great determination, as well as steadiness, and even on suspicion of an attempt should at once use their firearms, to prevent the bare possibility of an attempt on that gentleman's life:

“If men should accidentally commit an error in shooting any person, on suspicion of that person being about to commit murder, I shall exonerate them by coming forward and producing this document:

“H. SMITH,

“1st Co. Inspector;”

whether a similar circular was issued by the County Inspector of Constabulary in Limerick; and, whether both circulars were issued in obedience to instructions from the Inspector General of Constabulary; and, if so, whether the Government were cognizant of these proceedings, and approved of them?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: The first part of this Question refers to the prevention of the erection of huts provided for families at Tulla. I received notice of the Question yesterday at Dublin, and telegraphed it on to Mr. Clifford Lloyd for his observations. I have received a telegraphic despatch from him this morning, which I will read, and which, in fact, he wished me to read to the House—

“The grossest intimidation is being practised by the Land League upon tenants. Fearing death, they are prevented in many instances paying their rents, and under League intimidation and inducement suffer eviction. When evicted, in order to keep a grip of the soil, the Land League built huts on other tenants' lands, who dare not refuse their lands for the purpose, many are glad to do so—(i. e., to give their lands), and the Land League then give permission to the owners to pay their rent to avoid eviction. Money is collected about the county for the huts, no one daring to refuse to contribute. The plea of charity is shallow and untrue. The huts are meant to be and are the standing menace and intimidation to prevent the owner letting his land, and to intimidate any persons from entering it. Any person taking any such farm as tenant or caretaker, would at present, in the counties of Limerick and Clare, be murdered. After grave consideration, and with the view of protecting the lives and property of those within my jurisdiction, I have determined to put the law in force against any persons guilty of such acts of intimidation and lawlessness. As regards the evicted tenants near Tulla, many of them have privately paid their rents, but are not permitted by the Land League to return into their farms, but are forced to consent to occupy the Land League huts. On my individual authority as a magistrate I ordered the police to warn all persons engaged in this lawlessness to at once desist on pain of arrest, and warned an emissary of the Land League in Tulla to leave the county at once, which she did. I am also acting in a similar manner throughout the counties of Limerick and Clare, and am prepared to defend my action in a Court of Law. I yesterday upbraided several tenants, who were in fear of being evicted on Lord Cloncurry's property, for not standing together and defying the Land League's tyranny, sooner than submit to what they were undergoing. Their reply in the presence of other officers was, ‘Life is sweet, sir; we should be shot if we did not obey.’”

With regard to the second part of the Question, as to the protection of Mr. Clifford Lloyd, I believe that no instructions have been issued to the police with reference to it; but if the hon. Member will repeat his Question on another day, I will see what information can be obtained from the County Inspector on the subject.

MR. SEXTON said, he should not repeat the Question, and he would conclude with a Motion. He had the best evidence that this infamous Circular had been issued by the County Inspector of Constabulary in the County of Clare. It had come to him from a member of the Irish Bar, and upon the authority of one of the most respected priests in that county. He would read the Circular to the House—

“Ennis, 4th March, 1882.

“As there is too good reason for the belief that every possible means will be used to assassinate Mr. C. Lloyd, it behoves the men of this county to be on the alert to prevent it.”

So far, no one would for a moment question the propriety of the Circular. Let the County Inspector and his men, and the whole of the Constabulary Force, and the whole British Army in Ireland be on the alert to prevent it. Let Mr. Clifford Lloyd have an escort before and behind him, and on each flank, and let them use every precaution that human ingenuity could suggest to prevent his assassination. But the Circular went on to say—

“Men proceeding on his escort should be men of great determination, as well as steadiness; and even on suspicion of an attempt should at once use their firearms, to prevent the bare possibility of an attempt on that gentleman's life. If men should accidentally commit an error in shooting any person, on suspicion of that person being about to commit murder, I shall exonerate them by coming forward and producing this document.”

And the Circular was signed “H. Smith, 1st Co. Inspector.” Who was H. Smith, first County Inspector? He was a person who was no more fit to be an Archbishop than he was to be an officer of police. He was the person who, at the head of his police force, used the language of a lunatic at Miltown, where he faced an infuriated crowd, and, presenting a revolver at them, cried out—“You cowardly dogs, come on.” This was a peace officer who, instead of showing tact and self-command at a crisis, tried to inflame the passions of the people by threats of physical violence which were most likely to produce the state of things which would entitle him to shoot down the people. He had no doubt the Circular was issued; and now what would be the effect of such a document as that going into the hands of the police? Was the life of Mr. Clifford Lloyd, in the estimation of the House, or of the Government, or of the law, of greater value than that of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, or of the Viceroy? The Viceroy or the Chief Secretary proceeded through the country with ample guards, no doubt, but not with instructions given to the police which not only surpassed but directly contravened the law of the land. The House knew what was the law of the land. If a man's life was threatened he was entitled, in defence of his life, to wound or kill; or if public officers were placed in charge of any person, and an attack were made upon that person, they were entitled, in defence of his life, to wound or kill. But what an extraordinary travesty of the law was contained in this Circular! It was not required that there should be an attack, or even a threat; but it was left to the absolute discretion of the humblest constable in

Clare, with his loaded rifle on his arm, to determine at what moment he should shoot and kill any of Her Majesty's subjects. Mr. Clifford Lloyd had an ample escort by night and by day. Let the House consider the effect of this Circular. A man opening a gate or leaving a field to go on to the highway, or mounting a stile, or jumping over a hedge, or appearing to lounge in a doubtful manner at the corner of a road, if he was seen by any member of the escort was now liable to be shot—nay, was almost certain to be shot, for the danger to a policeman consisted, not in shooting, but in not shooting. The County Inspector was to the policeman the fountain of honour and of faith, and the sole source of promotion. The policeman knew that if he did not fire he would be reprov'd, and perhaps dismissed; while if he fired and killed a man, he would be exonerated from blame, and would be considered a man of steadiness and determination. He asked if that would not be the result of such a document, and if it was not a monstrous travesty of all law, that, instead of waiting for some overt proof of guilt, every common policeman was allowed to be the judge of a man's intentions. The effect of that document would be that the highways of the county of Clare would be denied to the people, for it would be impossible for a man wishing to regard his life to go on a highway where Mr. Clifford Lloyd might pass. He denounced that Circular, in presence of the House, as a gross, scandalous, and barbarous incitement to murder. He asked, was that one of the resources of civilization? Was the life it was issued to protect so very valuable—so much more valuable than that of the Chief Secretary or the Lord Lieutenant? He called for the withdrawal of the Circular, and he asked the Chief Secretary to inquire from the County Inspector whether he issued it. It was a singular evasion of the question that, instead of referring to the man who issued the Circular, he should refer to Mr. Clifford Lloyd. The question should not be asked from Mr. Clifford Lloyd, but the official bull-dog who put his revolver in the face of the crowd was the man who should answer it. He repeated that the Irish Party could not suffer such a document as that to remain abroad without demanding mediate withdrawal. As for Mr. Clifford Lloyd himself, he did not intend waste many words upon that gentle-

He was that sort of pliant instrument which despotic Governments, in times of confusion, always found ready in their hands. He was by nature, as well as by his present function, a tyrant. He had no regard for age or youth, respect for sex. He had signalized the early day of his career as a magistrate by the exercise of tyranny and insult. He had done so by caning the people in the streets of Kilmallock. His next achievement was the arrest of a boy of six or seven years old, and afterwards prosecuting some ladies on a baseless charge. When he was obliged to withdraw in front of his own Court, not with shame—for he was impossible to such a nature—but with confusion. Instead of allaying the passions of the people, he had done everything in his power to aggravate the disturbance in his district, with the result that it was now one of the most riotous in the country. Was it any wonder that they found his example imitated in a thousand forms throughout the country? But he knew he was the Chief Secretary. The year before last the right hon. Gentleman was a Resident Magistrate that Mr. Clifford Lloyd was the only honest man against them.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I entirely dissent from that statement.

MR. SEXTON: Mr. Speaker, I can repeat my observation.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is not entitled to make that assertion without the disclaimer of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. SEXTON: Sir, I shall not contradict the right hon. Gentleman's statement. I shall only say that the statement made to me by a clergyman, who declared that he had it from a Resident Magistrate.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman is entitled to withdraw his observations, but not to contradict the statement of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. SEXTON said, he withdrew his remarks, and only said that much to himself. They had an instance of such conduct on Sunday night last, when a policeman in Waterford rushed into a shop where a respectable woman was engaged at the window reading the Irish Times, seized her, threw her down, and, kneeling upon her, searched her in an indecent manner. Such an outrage, if committed in Bulgaria, would well serve to excite the horror of a Midlothian audience. But why was so much care taken of the life of Mr. Clifford Lloyd? What care had he taken of the lives of the Irish people that his own life should be considered sacrosanct? He (Mr. Sexton) must assume that Circular to be issued until he found that it was not. These poor tenants would never have been evicted if the Government, with their Land Act, had provided a humane and statesmanlike method of dealing with arrears. These tenants would not have been evicted if the Government had provided a plan by which the action of the Courts could be rapidly brought to bear on the case of the tenants. These tenants could get no satisfaction from their landlords as to arrears, or as to their current rents. And how did the Government treat these defenceless tenants? By the process of the law they were evicted; and when public funds, subscribed by the Irish people and their friends, were applied to the erection of huts to shelter them, Mr. Clifford Lloyd declared the erection of those huts to be illegal, because they had been got up by an illegal association. The Ladies' Land League was not an illegal association, although there was an assertion to that effect. Earl Cowper issued a Proclamation against the National Land League, but not against the Ladies' Land League. He refrained from doing that, and left it to one of those convenient subordinates at Dublin Castle. He would there notice a curious discrepancy between the reason given by Mr. Clifford Lloyd and the reason given by the Attorney General for Ireland for interfering with the erection of these huts.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. W. M. JOHNSON): I gave no reason; I gave a hypothetical opinion on the statement of the hon. Member.

MR. SEXTON said, that the Attorney General for Ireland gave a hypothetical opinion, which might be treated as an absolute opinion, considering how the facts stood. The right hon. and learned Gentleman's official zeal sometimes outran his official discretion, and he said Mr. Clifford Lloyd would be entitled to arrest people under the Common Law.

He (Mr. Sexton) thought the Attorney General for Ireland would have told him that Mr. Clifford Lloyd would be entitled to arrest people under an uncommon law—namely, the Coercion Act of last year. If Mr. Clifford Lloyd acted on that law, he would ask, why did he not suppress the Ladies' Land League? The Land League had been declared to be illegal by the highest tribunal; but the Ladies' Land League had not. It was by the arrest of individual after individual belonging to the Land League that the Government had endeavoured to put it down. Why had they not proceeded by the same process against the members of the Ladies' Land League? The Attorney General for Ireland had discovered something in the Common Law that no one knew of before. He (Mr. Sexton) asked the attention of the Attorney General for England and the Lord Advocate for Scotland to this—that the Attorney General for Ireland declared that, while the Coercion Act entitled the authorities to arrest anyone who was suspected of having committed an illegal act, the Common Law went much further, for it entitled the Government to arrest and imprison persons, not for anything they had done, but upon the vaguest suspicion of something they might hereafter do. The Common Law rested upon decisions. Would the Attorney General for Ireland name any decision of any Court in any century in England, Ireland, or Scotland, which sanctioned the imprisonment of persons who had been turned out of their homes and left shelterless on the roadside, because they accepted the shelter offered them by their neighbours? That the shelter given to these tenants was legally provided for them could not be disputed. Five of the huts were erected on the land of one man, who had as good a right to have those huts there as the Attorney General for Ireland had to sit on the Treasury Bench. [An hon. MEMBER: A better.] Yes; because his was a permanent right. The other huts had been erected on the land of men who, though not its owners, were its legal possessors. As to the monstrous suggestion that this had been done as part of a system of intimidation by the Land League, he dismissed it as unworthy of attention. There never was an organization which occupied such a grand historic position as the Land League did at that moment. It started with two objects. One was to prevent rack-renting. The Liberal Party said they had achieved that; and therefore they had taken a leaf out of the Land League book. The other object was to make the tenants the owners of the farms. The Tory Party were now taking that leaf out of the book of the Land League. And the Land League occupied this position—that the two great English Parties were at the present moment plagiarists of its policy. He asked the Government to pause, even on the verge of the abyss that was before them. They had gone far enough against the people. Were the poor peasants to be turned out of their homes, and, being left without any means of shelter, to be driven over the precipice of despair? He begged to remind the Government of the story related by Plutarch regarding the Pro-Consul who told the Islanders to whom he had been sent to collect taxes that he had on his side a great God—the God of Force; when the Islanders informed him that they had on their side two Gods—the Gods of Poverty and Despair. He might say that the Gods of Poverty and Despair were on the side of the Irish peasants; and he warned the Government not to employ the God of Force too much. The right hon. Gentleman might say the people could go into the workhouse. They knew the feelings of aversion with which the Irish people regarded the workhouses. The humblest peasant would rather die than accept the charity of a workhouse. But why should they be asked to accept it, seeing that their neighbours had offered them sites for shelters, and that money publicly subscribed by their own countrymen was available to enable them to provide that shelter? What did the action of the Government mean? He would read to the House a document which he received the previous night from Mr. Murphy, Clerk of the Tullamore Board of Guardians. The Board had, on the 18th instant, the application of Pat Meehan, his wife, and six children, for outdoor relief. Meehan was a carpenter employed by Mr. Kelly, of Dublin, who was the contractor for the erection of wooden huts on the property of Major Molony, of Tullow. Mr. Clifford Lloyd stopped the work, warning the contractor that he was working for an illegal society, and Meehan was left without employment. The Guardians, after considering the case, resolved that the facts be inserted on the minutes, and that a copy thereof be sent by the Clerk to Mr. Sexton, with a request that the matter be brought before Parliament. The Guardians regretted that, under the present Poor Law, they could not grant outdoor relief to the applicants; and as it was probable that many such cases would arise under the present Liberal Ministry, they should be acquainted with the facts. A hundred times had they been told, in tones of deepest solemnity, that the object of the Government was to enable people to earn their living in Ireland. Would they enable Pat Meehan to earn his living? The poor man was in this dilemma—the Government would not let him build his hut, and the Guardians could not grant him outdoor relief—was he to gratify one of the whims of Mr. Clifford Lloyd to enter the workhouse? The Land Act was merely to be worked at the rate of a tortoise, while the sheriff and the bailiff were to proceed with evictions at the speed of the hare, and the people forced from their homes were to be left without shelter. Language could not possibly exaggerate the gravity of the situation. Must it be the final resource of civilization that the Irish peasants should be driven to starve and die in the ditches of their native land? He knew not how to convey to the House his sense of the great gravity and solemnity of the situation; but he felt bound to say that the idea of the Attorney General for Ireland was the least defensible and least rational he had ever heard. He said the people were not to be allowed to build huts lest they might watch their farms. Did the Attorney General for Ireland expect that, in the present state of public feeling, agriculturists would take those farms? The right hon. and learned Gentleman knew very well that they must be held by Emergency men. He was not accounting for the feeling which made such things necessary, neither was he defending it. He was simply pointing out the fact; and he wished to know what did the right hon. and learned Gentleman gain, in the interests of law and order, by banishing a few farmers from that particular district, while they left a few hundred others in it? Would not those who remained hold the same feelings as those who were sent away? Suppose some families were exiled from any particular district by the right hon. and learned Gentleman's new reading of the Common Law, and the whim of Mr. Clifford Lloyd, what was to be the distance within which the Common Law would operate? If the evicted tenants went only five miles distant from their farms, would this new reading of the Common Law declare them to be still too near? Must it be 10 or 20 miles—must they leave the country altogether? Who was to be the judge? If those evicted people were allowed to have a roof over their heads and food to eat, and to cherish some hope that they would be restored to their homes, was it not more probable that they would not resort to any act of violence than if they were driven away, and the lowest passions of the Bashi Bazouk vented upon them? If those people were driven away from their own district with feelings like those he had described rankling in their hearts, was it not more than likely that one of them might come back to do harm? He protested in the name of reason, of law, and of public right against the law of the land being travestied and outraged by any Pasha in the County Clare. He told the Government plainly that unless they withdrew this Circular, which was inciting the police to murder the people, and gave an assurance that tenants evicted from their farms through default of the Government would be allowed to live on at least as good conditions as the beasts of the field, he should think it his duty to rise up in that House and apply to the situation brought about by the Government such language as he thought proper. He cared not for the consequences personal to himself. He should be sorry to be forced to tell the people of Ireland what he thought, either of the action they ought to take or of the attitude they ought to preserve with regard to such barbarity. But if that occasion should arrive, he should fling to the winds every consideration except the thought that innocent men, women, and children were being hunted like wolves in the name of the resources of civilization. He begged to move the adjournment of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That this House do now adjourn."—
 (Mr. Sexton.)

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Before alluding to this Circular and the action of Mr. Clifford Lloyd, there are one or two extraneous remarks of the hon. Gentleman which I cannot pass unnoticed. I am glad to take this opportunity of saying that the Proclamation which was issued by the Lord Lieutenant included the Ladies' Land League just as well as any other League. [Mr. HEALY: Why did you not suppress it?] Any public meetings of the Ladies' Land League can be suppressed just in the same way as any meeting of the Land League to which the hon. Member belongs. The hon. Member (Mr. Sexton) taunts us with the fact that women belonging to the Ladies' Land League have not been arrested as "suspects." Undoubtedly, they have not been arrested. The hon. Member seems to wish to drive us to do so; but our course will be guided by what we consider best for the peace of Ireland, and the taunts and sneers of the hon. Member will have no influence upon our action in the matter. In regard to the hon. Member's remarks on Mr. Clifford Lloyd, I wish to repeat what I said before, that I believe Mr. Clifford Lloyd has stood between hundreds of men, women, and children in Ireland and death, or at least maiming, persecution, and ruin. It is unfair—it is more unfair than even I should have expected, and that is saying a good deal—that charges which have been over and over again disproved should be again repeated, as if there is no doubt about them. Nothing could have been so much disproved as the original charge of caning the people to the full belief of Members of this House, yet the hon. Member for Sligo gets up and repeats it as if it had never been disproved, and states that the same thing happened in Waterford. Again, in regard to County Inspector Smith, the statement about him has been denied by him, and I have given the denial; but the hon. Member repeats the statement as if no denial had ever been made. We come to the Circular itself. I stated in my answer that Mr. Clifford Lloyd said he knew nothing about it, and that if the Question was repeated I would give what information I could about it. I have communicated with both County Inspectors, and I have heard from one and not from the other. The hon. Member might have waited till I was able to give him a complete answer. I have certainly reason to believe that the Inspector for the county of Clare did issue the Circular. I know nothing about the other. As regards the Inspector General of Constabulary, I am sure he knew nothing about it, nor were the Government cognizant of its being issued; but I make this statement—that I think the last two paragraphs of the document ought not to have been issued in the manner in which they were. But when the hon. Member states that people have been endangered by it, I believe nothing of the sort. The Circular is dated the 4th of March. That is some time ago, and no danger followed. If he asks me what its practical effect has been, its practical effect has been to prevent the people from shooting at Mr. Clifford Lloyd. [Mr. SEXTON: The people did not know about the Circular.] I do not know that—these things get out. This is undoubtedly true—that Mr. Clifford Lloyd has made himself obnoxious to the men who commit murder and instigate to murder; that he is hated by them; that there are attempts to assassinate him; that a price has been put upon his head—that is notorious; and that there is a combination and conspiracy to assassinate him; of that there is no doubt, and undoubtedly he ought to be protected. I suppose what was in the mind of the Inspector when he issued this Circular—which I think, and will tell him, he ought not to have issued with these last two paragraphs—was that the cowardly ruffians who would be likely to shoot at Mr. Clifford Lloyd from behind a hedge would not do it if they thought they would be in danger. They would be in very little danger if everybody waited until they were first fired at. That is a risk which a man has to run; and though Mr. Clifford Lloyd would not have allowed that Circular to go out himself, that was a risk which the Inspector, no doubt, thought ought to be provided for. Therefore, with too much zeal probably, he issued the Circular as it stood; but it was undoubtedly true that these murders, which had happened one after another, happened in this way—that those who committed them had no more notion of suffering harm from them than had the men who instigated them to do it. They fired from behind a hedge, and then ran away; and if they thought they would be in danger before they fired, they would be very much more careful about it. But it is a risk that a man ought to run, and that Mr. Clifford Lloyd is ready to run. In regard to what has been stated about the Land League huts, it is a matter which must be judged of according to the circumstances of each particular case. Generally speaking, I have stated both to the landlords and Constabulary officers and to the representatives of the tenants that it is a perfectly legal matter for huts to be erected in charity to the evicted tenants, but that they may also be erected for purposes of intimidation; and having been in that district myself, and having had the Reports of Mr. Clifford Lloyd and the men who have been intimidated and threatened, I believe it is the fact that the erection of some of these huts lead to, and are merely for the purpose of, intimidation, which Mr. Clifford Lloyd was bound to prevent. The hon. Member gets up and supposes that we have no dangers to contend with in those districts; but they are dangers with regard to which we should be unworthy of the name of officers of Her Majesty's Government if we did not do our best to contend with them, and endeavour to prevent them. The hon. Member conveyed the impression that no one would venture to take a farm from which a tenant had been evicted. [Mr. SEXTON: Very unlikely.] But a man has a right to take such a farm. What we know perfectly well to be the case is, that hundreds of people are evicted from farms because they are not allowed to pay their rents. And, under such circumstances, is the Government to stand by and do nothing? Is the Government to stand by and say that whoever may have the courage to take such a farm is not to be protected and supported? The hon. Member seems to ask us to stand by altogether, and let the protection of the law be of no avail; to acknowledge that we have no power to protect that man; and, in fact, to let lawlessness, disorder, and outrage prevail in that country, instead of making the attempt, which we are making, and in which, notwithstanding all the opposition we experience, we believe we shall succeed—namely, to make the law prevail. The hon. Member alluded to a case to which Mr. Clifford Lloyd had referred, relating to arrears—I suppose he alluded to the case of Lord Cloncurry's tenants. That case, however, has nothing to do with the arrears question; it is scarcely possible, in fact, to find a case so inappropriate. It is one of the many cases in which the tenants—at any rate, some of them—are very sorry that they did not pay their rents; prosperous men, well-off, who have found that because they trusted in the stories that were told them by the emissaries of the Land League as to their being safe, have been evicted.

MR. SEXTON: I never referred to the case of Lord Cloncurry.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Mr. Clifford Lloyd did; and the consequence is they find that they have lost their holdings, which have been sold for a mere song, and, with tears in their eyes, they have lamented it. Mr. Clifford Lloyd practically said to them—"Why were you such fools and cowards?" "Life is sweet," they replied; "we were afraid of being shot." And why were they in danger of being shot? Because of the instigation of the "no rent" policy, which is the curse of them now; and in regard to which Mr. Clifford Lloyd must be protected and saved from planned assassination, because he has more than most others been instrumental in defeating that conspiracy.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, that the speech of the Chief Secretary had given one more proof of the failure of the coercion policy of the Government. Nothing whatever had been accomplished in the way of restoring peace or order by the coercion policy, and it had only tended to bring forward a new kind of agitation in the country. The hon. Member for Sligo had made something by pressing his Motion at once, for he had obtained something like a repudiation of this most extraordinary Circular from the Chief Secretary two or three days sooner than if he had postponed his Question. It was not a very strong or earnest repudiation; but, at the same time, it was a disclaimer of any Ministerial justification for the policy which dictated the Circular. That document, he said, gave a licence to the police which the general of an invading army never did claim for the troops under him. When the Germans invaded France it was ordered that any civilian who took arms against them should be tried and shot if found guilty; but it was never said that a man should be shot in cold blood on mere suspicion that he might take arms against them. As to the Land League huts, the monstrous suggestion was that the neighbours of an evicted tenant should not be allowed to shelter him near the farm from which he had been evicted. A man was not only to be removed from the farm, but he was not to be allowed to remain under shelter in the neighbourhood. This was in the old and bitter sense—in the Scriptural sense—exterminating a nation. The right hon. Gentleman spoke of these huts as if they were a line of fortresses. They were huts put up to shelter men, women, and children who had been ruthlessly evicted. Did the right hon. Gentleman imagine that men were less dangerous when they were unhoused, and had not a roof to cover them, than when they were preserved from the inclemency of the weather? The Prime Minister had talked of “social revolution;” but the Government were by their action bringing about a social convulsion, and were certainly not taking a course which was calculated to restore peace to Ireland. As long as they sanctioned such proceedings, it was impossible to have peace in Ireland. There was no country in the world where such conduct would not stir up the passions of the people.

MR. LEAMY said, he thought it was quite evident that in the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman Mr. Clifford Lloyd, like the King, “can do no wrong” in Ireland. They had several times attacked him in that House, and he had always found a very warm defender in the right hon. Gentleman; but there was one question with regard to him put in that House, not by an Irish Member, but by the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst), which the right hon. Gentleman had never answered. The hon. and learned Member for Chatham said that Judge Barry stated at the last Assizes in the county Clare that the outrages which had occurred in that county for the two months prior to the Assizes were twice as numerous as in the corresponding months of the previous year. He would like to have some explanation of that from the Chief Secretary. If, as he said, wherever Mr. Clifford Lloyd went there was peace, how came it that the outrages in the county were actually double when he was in it to what they were before he went there?

Mr. Justin M'Carthy

The right hon. Gentleman admitted that this Police Circular was issued. He was under the impression that the ingenuity of Dublin Castle and of the police officials in the matter of Circulars had long since been exhausted.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I have already stated that at the Castle they knew nothing about this Circular. I never heard anything at all about it until yesterday; but I suspect, from a telegram I have received, that it was issued; but no information to that effect has ever been received by the authorities in Dublin.

MR. LEAMY said, he was glad of that interruption from the right hon. Gentleman, and he invited the attention of the Radical Party to this fact. The Irish Members had often and often during the debate on the Coercion Bill last year pointed out that the law would be carried into execution, not by the Chief Secretary, but by the police throughout the country. Now they had the facts demonstrated beyond all doubt. If such a Circular had been issued by the Third Section in Russia, the whole English Press would have cried out against it. But here in Ireland, at their very doors, the police issued this infamous Circular, and the Chief Secretary for more than a month knew nothing about it. But the Chief Secretary thought that the last two paragraphs ought not to have been written—the paragraphs in which this Inspector states that if one of his men shot down an innocent person by mistake he, the Inspector, would exonerate the policeman setting aside altogether the verdicts of a Coroner's Jury, and the result of magisterial investigation or a trial by jury. With regard to the erection of huts, the question they had to ask was this—and they expected an answer from the Attorney General for Ireland—at what distance from a man's farm did it become illegal to erect a hut? Was it or was it not legal for a farmer, having land of his own, to let a house be built upon it? Did it become illegal to give it to evicted tenants? If that was illegal under what circumstances did the erection of the hut become illegal? Were they not alone going to suspect the occupant of the house, but also the house itself that was in process of building? Their neighbours were ever the best friends of evicted tenants. If the latter were driven away from their own parishes they would either fail in obtaining assistance, or be subjected to the shame of accepting it from the hands of strangers. He did not suppose there was very much use in bringing the action of Mr. Clifford Lloyd before that House. He had, indeed, long ceased to expect any defence of public rights from the occupants of the Benches opposite; but men had lately attempted to say in Ireland that the Chief Secretary was not responsible for these petty tyrannies, but now they had achieved, at any rate, that much good, that they had brought home to the Irish people that not alone did he permit Mr. Clifford Lloyd to act in this way, but that by doing so he was winning the approbation of the right hon. Gentleman. He would only say, in conclusion, that if the Ladies' Land League was to be put down it might become the duty of the Catholic priests, as perhaps the only organization with which the Liberal Government was afraid to deal, to look after evicted tenants, and assist in putting up houses for them. These houses would continue to be put up in spite of anything that Mr. Clifford Lloyd or any of his friends might do. They were threatened with more coercion for Ireland. He would only tell the Ministers that there was no form of coercion which they could devise which had not been tried in Ireland in vain in the attempt to break the national spirit. The Irish people defied coercion. Did the right hon. Gentleman think that they were forgetful of 1798, and the barbarous cruelties that were then practised upon the people of Ireland? He told English Ministers that they might bring in their coercion and they would defy them, as they defied them before. He told them their coercion policy would fail, as they were compelled to admit through the mouth of the Prime Minister it had failed. He told them now if they brought in more coercion it would fail also; it would only serve to strengthen and consolidate the spirit of hatred in Ireland against the rule of foreigners. When they tried coercion in Ireland before they failed, even though the Irish race was then confined within the four seas of Ireland. To-day the Irish were scattered throughout the world, united as they never were united before, and he told them they dare not bring in more coercion.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he thought the House ought not to be misled by anything that had been said on the other side. There were two classes of evicted tenants in Ireland. There were the tenants who were cruelly and wickedly evicted because they were utterly unable to pay the arrears which had accrued on account of disastrous seasons. Such tenants were evicted in the West of Ireland. He asked, what did the Land League do for them? What huts did they erect for them? None at all. What did they do to show their sympathy for those unfortunate creatures who were evicted on the hill sides of Connemara? Nothing. Perhaps there might be some small sum of money awarded which might or might not have been distributed, and which had given them no effectual relief; but, on the other hand, the Land League huts were erected in places in which they were intended to be nests of insurrection and insubordination. For his part, he thought that any tenants who were evicted under circumstances which they could not help themselves, who were evicted, as they had been in the county Clare and in many other places, from the terrorism of the Land League, which decreed that if they did not obey their behests they should be shot, for these persons huts and shelter should be provided; and, therefore, he could not for one moment justify this Circular of Mr. Clifford Lloyd. But if hon. Gentlemen whose indignation had been so great against persons whom they thought might in future be shot by mistake by the police had shown equal indignation against those who had already murdered their fellow-countrymen it would have come with more grace from them. They had heard a good deal of what might happen if this abominable Circular were acted upon. He called it abominable. In no other country but Ireland would it be possible, in his belief, that an Executive officer could issue it. It should speak to the House trumpet-tongued of what they whose voices were never attended to on that side of the House or the other had always been saying—that the Executive in Ireland, the permanent officials, from the highest to the lowest, had been utterly inefficient, and were utterly unable even to perform the ordinary duties of government. Did not this Circular show of what the permanent officials were made? And there had been other objectionable Circulars of this kind which had been issued and then withdrawn. But that apart, what he rose to protest against was this indignation against the Executive, and this assumption of great benevolence on the part of the Land League, who had utterly neglected the really unprotected and miserable creatures in the West of Ireland who were evicted wholesale, and who were unable to pay that for which they had been evicted. If huts had been erected for these people it would have done credit to hon. Gentlemen opposite and their organization; but nothing was done. These people could not make political capital for this organization; and, therefore, they were left to suffer as poor men, women, and children had suffered, who, if they had been able to reflect glory on the head of that Association who had done so much to ruin the country, would have had their sufferings brought forward often enough in that House.

MR. HEALY, referring to the blame cast by the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) on the Land League for neglecting the smaller tenants in the West of Ireland, explained that the League had only a limited amount of funds at its disposal, and, of course, could not expend more than it possessed. The hon. Member's income for one year would amount to more than the whole of the Land League funds. The Land League, accordingly, was only able to give small donations in each case, proportionate to what they considered the requirements of the case and the exigency of the country demanded. If the Land League was to do what should be done for the tenants of Ireland, in 20 or 30 days the whole of its money would be eaten up. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary had made an extraordinary statement. He said that, in the first place, Dublin Castle knew nothing about this Circular which was issued on the instructions of the Inspector General to the County Inspector. What he wanted to know was, the Inspector General having given instructions that the Circular was to be issued, was it no part of his duty to see what it was?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, there was no statement in the Question to the effect that the Inspector General knew anything about the Circular.

Mr. Mitchell Henry

MR. HEALY said, that every could not be stated at once; but Members were acquainted with the as well as of the issue of the Circular itself. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would be astonished to hear they had their sources of information well as he had his, and that occasionally, perhaps, they were as accurately informed. With regard to the hon. Gentleman's non-acquaintance with the Circular, he ventured to remind of this extraordinary fact. The Circular was dated the 4th of March. On the 3rd of March the right hon. Gentleman himself was down in Clare, and Mr. Smith accompanied him. Of course they were obliged to respect any statement made by the right hon. Gentleman; but when the Circular was issued the 4th of March, and when they had the opinion the right hon. Gentleman had regarding Mr. Clifford Lloyd, would like to ask—were no instructions given by him, was nothing at all said by Mr. Smith to him on the subject? What power had Mr. County Inspector Smith, a mere subordinate, over the death?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Do I stand the hon. Member to challenge what I have said? My statement was that I knew nothing about the Circular at that time. Does he say that I did? Does he wish to convey that insinuation in any shape or form?

MR. HEALY: If the right hon. Gentleman has misunderstood the statement I have made to the House he will have an opportunity of reply, to use the words of Mr. Speaker, "by the indulgence of the House." I would remind the hon. Gentleman that when I interrupted him on a recent occasion he told me I was importing new manners into the House. I would ask the right hon. Gentleman to restrain himself for two or three minutes during which I shall address the House.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Mr. Speaker, I rise to Order, because I do not apprehend that it is a question on which there can be any discussion. The question has been put by the hon. Gentleman as to whether the hon. Member was imputing a false statement. ["No!"] That is what I understand. I do not at the moment say that the hon. Member for Wexford was imputing a false ment; but I understood the Chief Secretary for Ireland asked the question whether he did or did not intend to impute such a statement to him, and I think the House is entitled to have an answer to that question.

MR. HEALY: It is quite touching to observe the liveliness with which right hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the Table support each other. I would remind right hon. Gentlemen that I know my rights in this House as well as they know theirs; but I understand the Chief Secretary for Ireland—

MR. SPEAKER: I would warn the hon. Member that he is bound to accept the disavowal of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant.

MR. HEALY: Perfectly, Mr. Speaker. You have exactly stated the position, Sir. Outside this House we resume our liberty of appreciation; and I will now resume the somewhat broken thread of this somewhat interrupted speech. They were bound to accept the statement of the right hon. Gentleman; but there had been nothing imported into the House which obliged them to accept the statements of Mr. Clifford Lloyd. He would deny that he was bound to accept Mr. Clifford Lloyd's statement, or Mr. Inspector Smith's denial. He had known Mr. Clifford Lloyd before, and had been the first to bring that gentleman's conduct before the House. He (Mr. Healy) was in the town of Drogheda on the 1st of January, 1881, and, after having dispersed a meeting, Mr. Clifford Lloyd had said to the people—"If you don't disperse quickly I will fire upon you." He (Mr. Healy) had brought that matter before the House, and had obtained the votes of several English hon. Members in support of the Motion which he had then made. Mr. Clifford Lloyd had denied his statement; but he (Mr. Healy) had heard him with his own ears, and, with the unfortunate incident of the town of Drogheda in his mind, he was unable to accept Mr. Clifford Lloyd's denial. What the Irish Members would accept was the evidence of impartial persons; they surely could not be blamed if they hesitated to accept the denials of incriminated parties. Was it not a fact that since Mr. Clifford Lloyd had been placed in Clare and Limerick there had been more murders in that district than in the rest of Ireland in the same time? The fact was that Mr. Clifford Lloyd was a firebrand, as had been stated even by Mr. Whitworth, the brother of the hon. Member for Drogheda. Mr. Boyd Kinnear, a well-known Scotch writer and lawyer, in his letters in The Daily News, stated that he was down in Kilmallock, attending some of the trials held by Mr. Clifford Lloyd, and some of the most scathing condemnations about Mr. Clifford Lloyd had been written by Mr. Kinnear. It was a strange and terrible fact that this Circular rendered a man liable to be shot on mere suspicion. If the Chief Secretary suspected a man he might arrest him; if his subordinates suspected a man they might shoot him. To such a strange pass had things now come in Ireland! If such a Circular had been issued to the Zaptiehs and Bashi-Bazouks of Bulgaria, the House would have heard a very different account of it from the Treasury Bench. On the introduction of the Land Act the right hon. Gentleman said—

"We have now been engaged for two or three weary months with the dreary business of coercion, and we have entered now into the path of conciliation."

Was this one of the steps in "the path of conciliation," to shoot persons on suspicion? It was impossible to conciliate the country by such methods. The Government should recollect that they had to deal with to-morrow as well as to-day. The officials of the Government in Ireland might make a desert and call it peace, but Ireland was a part of the United Kingdom; and when engaged in a struggle with some Foreign Power England might feel the effect of the proceedings of Mr. Clifford Lloyd. England's battles in the past had been fought by the arms and hearts of Irishmen; but English recruiting sergeants might find a difficulty in future in finding recruits in Mr. Clifford Lloyd's district. When England was engaged in a deadly struggle with some foreign foe, they would hear addressed from the Treasury Bench to the Irish people, not words of menace, as they did now, but supplications for assistance and support. They had to ask the right hon. Gentleman, Was he determined that the erection of these huts should be put a stop to? He stated that the Ladies' Land League was an illegal association? If so, why was it not proclaimed? He stated that he had not arrested any of them under the Coercion Act; but he sent them to gaol for six months, and they were kept in their cells for 22 hours out of the 24. There was no need for the Coercion Act for arresting women when he had got the law of Edward III. The people of Ireland were being put out by the score and by the hundred in the year following that Act which was to bring peace to the country. They were expelled from their homes mainly because of the arrears which the Chief Secretary treated with so much indifference when he (Mr. Healy) sought to introduce a clause into the Land Act dealing with the question. Now, when the unfortunate people were driven out on the roadside, he would not allow huts to be erected for their shelter. Was it more likely to promote the peace of the country to compel the unfortunate inhabitants of these huts to roam about from farm to farm than to allow them being comfortably housed by the Land League? The Chief Secretary for Ireland thought these people should go to the workhouse. He would probably like to see them once more going by the hundred into the poorhouse, or across the Atlantic in the emigrant ship. If the right hon. Gentleman wished to obtain credit for his benevolence, let him allow those unfortunate people to obtain protection from those who were willing to protect them. Not one of them believed Mr. Clifford Lloyd. Nobody who knew him could believe him. The testimony of any man who could consent to become the instrument of the British Government in the way Mr. Clifford Lloyd had done was not worth a moment's credence. He was hated as much in Ireland as Major Sirr was in 1798; and so long as he and persons like him were employed to carry out the dirty work which was going on in Ireland in the name of law and order, so long would law and order be despised.

MR. SHAW said, there were two subjects before the House—the question of the Circular and the question of the huts. Three weeks ago he was shown the Circular by an hon. Member to whom it was sent, and he advised him strongly not to ask any Question about it until he had ascertained whether it was genuine, for he could not believe that any man in the position of the County Inspector of Clare would think of issuing such a Circular.

Mr. Healy

lar. He did not think he would have issued the Circular in the first place without consulting his superiors in Dublin; and if those superiors had any fitness at all for their position, he could not imagine that they would allow it to be issued. If documents of this kind were allowed to be issued, he could only say that the fact gave a reason for an immense deal of the confusion that was going on in Ireland. He could not imagine that there was any real head or government of the police in Ireland. The idea of the Inspector of one of the most disturbed counties in Ireland issuing a Circular of that kind without the bidding of his superiors in Dublin Castle was, to say the least of it, the most absurd that he could imagine. The right hon. Gentleman had stated that the two last paragraphs were exceedingly improper; but he (Mr. Shaw) had expected the right hon. Gentleman to go much further. Did they intend to leave that Inspector in the county of Clare? He did not want to have him dismissed from the Force, because he might have a family; but if a man of that kind were left in a county like Clare, which was full of difficulty and disturbance, it would be the most injudicious thing in the world, and ought not to be countenanced for a moment by the Government. He thought it would be worth while for the House to inquire how it was that the Irish Police Force was governed or regulated at all. Were officers of this kind throughout the country left entirely to their own discretion as to the issuing of Circulars and the management of the people? The matter was most important for those who lived in Ireland. He knew himself gentlemen in command of the police in Ireland. He was happy to say the remark only applied to a few, who in case of difficulty ought to be locked up, or kept out of the way, for they were most unfit to manage in a case of difficulty. As a general rule, the men in command of the police were men of great judgment and sense, and discharged the duties committed to them with great propriety; but, as he had said, there were some of them, and he believed this man was one, who, on the occasion of any trouble or difficulty, should be locked up themselves. As to the huts, it was well known that they were being erected for the last six or eight months in many parts of Ireland. He never heard before that they were illegal. He maintained that there was not a single case of the building of a hut in any part of Ireland which was not as much a menace as in the county of Clare. He really thought that the Government, before going to this extreme length, should have sent down some independent authority, some proved and experienced man, to inquire into the circumstances, and not have left the matter entirely to Mr. Clifford Lloyd, no matter how valuable a servant of the Government he might be. He would not stop to inquire into the justice or injustice of the evictions; but it was a fact that hundreds of people were driven out on the roadside; and it was a very extreme thing to say that dwellings should not be erected to shelter these people. It was too extreme a step to take without having sent down an independent person to inquire into the circumstances. He could not sit down without asking the Government whether they intended to go on in this way for ever? How long did they intend that this kind of thing should go on—war, absolute war, between the people of Ireland and the forces of the country? A policeman on suspicion might shoot a man. The man, as a matter of course, might shoot the policeman. It was absolutely clear that in Clare and the district surrounding it, there was a war going on, and the Government seemed to take one wrong step after another, in suppressing it. So far as he could judge they might go on in this course for years, and the thing would never come to an end. The crisis required a different policy. It required something stronger and bolder than anything yet done. If the Government were not prepared to take another course than that now being pursued, he believed the state of Ireland would go from bad to worse.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, it was some satisfaction to hear the Circular condemned; but that was not enough. The Circular was a gross violation of the law of the land, and a direct encouragement to violence on the part of the people. If they wanted the people of Ireland to accept the authority of the law, they must respect the law themselves. This County Inspector Smith, charged as he was with functions of the greatest moment, had no right to hold so important a position in the county of Clare after issuing such a Circular. If the right hon. Gentleman would remove County Inspector Smith from a place where he was about to commit such crimes, he would do more to restore law and order than Mr. Smith and Mr. Clifford Lloyd could do. Unless the people saw that a man who did such a thing would be punished, the Government could not expect to see law and order restored. Let not the right hon. Gentleman shrink from doing to the author of this Circular what would be done if such a document were issued in any part of England. He trusted that the building of huts would not be prevented, unless it was proved that there was something illegal in it. It had been said by some that the tenants were not free to pay their rents for fear of being murdered, while others denied it. But one fact was worth a great deal of argument. He could bring forward the case of tenants who, wishing to remit their rents to the landlord, were obliged to go into a town far from their farms in order to evade outrage. [The hon. Gentleman here read a letter from a trader in Cork to the landlord, stating that such-and-such of his tenants asked him to send him a cheque in payment of their rent, and to have a receipt sent back to the writer, so that "Captain Moonlight" might be doubly baffled.] But while these things occurred, they were no excuse for illegality on the part of the Government or their officials. On the contrary, the fact that the people were threatened by illegal associations ought to be a reason why the Government should give no excuse for outrage by any illegality on their part. If they wished to get the law respected the best way to do so was to punish those who failed to respect it.

MR. REDMOND said, he sincerely trusted that the speech of the hon. Member for Cork County (Mr. Shaw) would have due effect on the mind of the House, coming as it did from a Gentleman who had never given any assistance to the Land League, and to whom the Prime Minister and the Chief Secretary for Ireland were fond of going for advice. [Mr. CALLAN: No!] That hon. Gentleman had told the Government—what everybody knew would have happened—that their coercion policy in Ireland had been a dismal and melancholy failure. Their repression and their conciliation had been alike half-hearted. If the Government believed not in conciliation, but in repression, their policy ought to be more whole-hearted. But if they believed in conciliation then why did they allow these things to go on? The facts elicited with reference to the Police Circular were such as should startle the minds of hon. Members who have been hitherto content to allow Ireland to be governed without too curiously inquiring the methods by which it was done. The worst thing about the Circular was that it was issued without the knowledge of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, or the Irish Executive in Dublin Castle. The fact that such a Circular could be issued by a subordinate official without the knowledge or approval of the Executive in Dublin was the strongest condemnation of the present system of government in Ireland. The people could only conclude from such facts that each petty official was invested with power, not only over liberty, but over life in that country. In dealing with the subject of evictions the Chief Secretary for Ireland had dwelt upon the case of a father having been intimidated by his son from paying his rent; but the right hon. Gentleman must be aware that the majority of the evictions were not evictions of tenants who could pay rents, but who refused to pay. The most remarkable cases of evictions recently were those now being carried out on Lord Cloncurry's estate. Those tenants had offered to pay a fair rent at a reasonable reduction; but, so far from accepting such an arrangement, the landlord had announced that, not only would he not give that reduction, but that he would not permit the tenants to remain on their holdings unless they consented to pay an increased rent in future. The evictions now proceeding in Ireland were, to a large extent, the direct consequence of the course which the Government had pursued. The first time that the question of the arrears of impossible rent came before the House was when the Compensation for Disturbance Bill was introduced. What, then, was the attitude taken by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and by the Government? The House was told that, in consequence of partial famine, hundreds and thousands were unable to pay their rents, that they were threatened with eviction, which was tantamount to a sentence of starvation and death; and the right hon. gentleman stated that he could not co to be the instrument of carrying out justice towards those unfortunate people. He now denounced the right hon. gentleman as having acted dishonestly in that respect. If the right hon. Gentleman had been an honest politician, an honest man he would have taken a different course. [Cries of "Order" and "Withdraw!"]

MR. GOSCHEN: I ask you, Speaker, whether the hon. Member in Order in using the words—"I, the right hon. Gentleman had been an honest politician or an honest man."

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member for New Ross must be quite aware that an observation of that kind is unparliamentary, and I call upon him to draw it.

MR. REDMOND: I am sorry, that the Rules of the House militate against telling the truth. [Cries of "Oh!" and "Name him!"]

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member has not withdrawn the expression which I declared to be un-Parliamentary.

MR. REDMOND: I rise, Sir, for the purpose of withdrawing the expression, and I would only say this—that I am sorry it is not in my power, within the Rules of Parliament, to make use of that expression. [Cries of "Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: I consider the conduct of the hon. Member offensive to this House. I consider his conduct not only offensive to this House, but especially offensive to the right hon. Member who has been addressed in the manner in which the hon. Member addressed him. And I feel bound to name Mr. Redmond as having disregarded the authority of the Chair.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, I have to move, in consequence of the statement which you have just made, that Mr. Redmond be suspended from the service of the House during the remainder of this day's Sitting.

Motion made, and Question proposed.

"That Mr. Redmond be suspended from the service of the House during the remainder of this day's sitting."—(The Marquess of Hartington.)

MR. SPEAKER having put the question, declared that, in his judgment, "The Ayes have it." This not being a agreed to, Mr. SPEAKER directed the House to be cleared for a division. Mr. HEALY having offered himself as one of the Tellers for the Noes, Mr. SPEAKER requested that hon. Gentleman to name a second Teller. Whereupon—

MR. HEALY, addressing Mr. Speaker, sitting and covered, said—I wish to name as my co-Teller, Mr. Redmond, the hon. Member for New Ross. On the point of Order, I would remind you, Sir, that on previous occasions, when an hon. Member has been proposed to be suspended—and I myself last year had twice the honour of being suspended by the decision of the House—on each occasion I took part in the division and voted against the Motion. I submit that an hon. Member who is about to be suspended is equally entitled to tell as to vote. The hon. Member for New Ross is a Member of this House—he has not yet been suspended for the remainder of this day's Sitting—and, in acting as a Teller, he would only be carrying out his function as a Member of this House. The Speaker, I contend, has no power or authority to cut off the hon. Member for New Ross before the House has clothed him with that authority by agreeing to the Motion.

MR. SPEAKER: If the hon. Member is not prepared to name a second Teller, I must declare that "The Ayes have it."

MR. HEALY: Well, Sir, if you rule that you must take that course, I will name the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) as second Teller.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 207; Noes 12: Majority 195.—(Div. List, No. 66.)

MR. SPEAKER then directed Mr. REDMOND to withdraw, and he withdrew accordingly.

Question again proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: As, Sir, the Question "That this House do now adjourn" is again before us, I wish to say a single word, in order that there may be no misunderstanding as to the view taken by a large number of Gentlemen on this side of the House who have not taken any part in the discussion. As we understand, a Question has been addressed to the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland with regard to this Circular. He has informed the House that he was not aware, until his attention was called to it, that such a Circular had been issued, and he has expressed dissatisfaction with the phraseology of the last two sentences of that Circular, which he has reason to believe has been issued. I presume that, that being the case, the Government will take such steps as they may think proper in the matter; but I am anxious that it should be clearly understood that the House, while trusting the Government will take all proper steps in that matter, fully supports the Government in those measures they may find to be necessary, in the present critical state of Ireland, for the preservation of law and order. I wish also strongly to impress upon the Government that there is no disposition whatever, either in this country or in Ireland, to weaken the hands of those who are charged with a very difficult duty; and I would further express my own personal hope, as well as the desire of others, that nothing which has passed or may be said shall be allowed to have the effect of discouraging or weakening the efforts of those gallant men—the Constabulary of Ireland, who, performing their duty under circumstances of great trial, require to be supported. Moreover, I need hardly say that I think nothing that has passed will give, or can be twisted into giving, any impression that there will be any less care taken to protect Mr. Clifford Lloyd in the discharge of his duties, which, as far as we understand, he is performing with great courage.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, he rose for the purpose of supporting, in the fewest possible words, the views taken by the hon. Member for Cork County (Mr. Shaw). He had nothing to say with regard to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of Her Majesty's Opposition to which they had just listened; but he wished to contrast briefly the demand which was made upon the Chief Secretary for Ireland by the hon. Member for the County of Cork with that which was made by the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) and the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. Justin M'Carthy). It was unnecessary to follow the hon. Member for Sligo into the variety of subjects upon which he entered; but he wished to endorse most fully the criticisms of the hon. Member upon this Constabulary Circular. All the hon. Member for Sligo asked was that if the Circular were found to be authentic, it should be withdrawn by the Chief Secretary for Ireland. He did not ask for the withdrawal of the Inspector of Police, nor did the hon. Member for Longford. He wished to make an observation as a somewhat indirect reply to the speech of the Leader of the Opposition. It was not right that the public should imagine that because they condemned the issue of this Circular they also condemned energetic action on the part of those responsible for the administration of the law in Ireland. He, as the Representative of an Irish county, was as anxious for the preservation of law and order in Ireland as the English Gentlemen who so warmly endorsed the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition. But the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) was perfectly justified in calling attention to this Circular. When the Chief Secretary for Ireland was questioned about the document, he pleaded for more time to make inquiries, although in possession of the fact that the Circular had been issued. That was not candid treatment of the House. They had had some experience of the manner in which the Chief Secretary for Ireland threw his protection over officials of this description doing imprudent or illegal acts. He alluded to the case of the Chief Inspector of the town of Ballina. Although not in the habit of "bullyragging," as they would say in Ireland, the Chief Secretary for Ireland, yet, when he found an official in Ireland setting an example of violation of the law, he felt that it was more necessary to deal with him than with an ordinary citizen, because an official was looked upon by the general population as setting them an example of strict and careful observance of the law. In the case of this Sub-Inspector, he had issued a Circular of an atrocious character, which was distinctly an incentive to violence on the part of the people, and they called for a withdrawal of that Circular. It must not be thought that they objected to proper and legitimate means being taken to enforce the law. On the contrary, it was necessary that the primary duties of civilization and government should be discharged by someone and in the presence of a great popular movement, those upon whom these arduous duties fell would, from time to time make themselves unpopular even by legitimate discharge of their duties. But so far from promoting the peace of the country by extra legal measures, they were simply playing into the hands of those who kept Ireland in a state of perpetual disturbance. The hon. Member for New Ross (Mr. Redmond), whom he regretted to say had incurred the penalties of the House, though in a manner in which he could not endorse his action, made a statement in the course of his speech which ought to be corrected. He said that the Chief Secretary for Ireland was in the habit of consulting the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Shaw) in matters of Irish policy. He had also been reputed to share the distinguished honour of the political confidence of the right hon. Gentleman. He was able to say on behalf of the hon. Member for Cork County, as well as of himself, that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland had not thought either of them worthy of being consulted. Nor, indeed, had the right hon. Gentleman taken into confidence any single Representative from Ireland with regard to his Irish policy. He was taking lately to a Gentleman who represented a very large constituency in Ireland, who was returned to the House of Commons as an avowed supporter of the Liberal Government, and he had asked him if he did not think the position of the Chief Secretary for Ireland was a very arduous and critical one, first of all because the Irish Tory Members were opposed to him, and he would not win much sympathy from them, and secondly because the active Party were also opposed to him, while even those who were ruled among did not rally round him. He had added that he supposed that moderate Home Rulers possessed the confidence, and that as the right hon. Gentleman was not an Irishman and was not acquainted with Irish institutions, he took the trouble of asking them how the Government in Ireland should be carried on. His hon. Friend told him that the Chief Secretary for Ireland had never asked him a single question about the government of Ireland since he had taken his seat on the Front Government Bench. If the right hon. Gentleman had a doubt about that he would be very happy to tell him who the hon. Member was. It was this supercilious conduct in reference to the opinions of Irish Members which had arrayed against the right hon. Gentleman all classes of the Irish Representatives. He was just reminded that another Irish Liberal Member, a staunch supporter of the Government, the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. C. Russell), had, during the Recess, issued a manifesto to the Irish people in which he too complained that the Chief Secretary took no means to ascertain for himself what were the opinions of the Irish Liberal Members. As there were several Irish Members on the Ministerial side of the House, he should be glad if any of them could contradict that statement; but it was not likely they would, because by doing so they would assume a share of responsibility for the policy of the right hon. Gentleman. As soon as the land agitation had reached national proportions, he felt that a revolution was approaching, and his attitude was shaped by his recollection of what had happened in other countries on the occurrence of great popular re-actions to overthrow systems opposed to the well-being of those countries. A revolution was going on in Ireland—there could be no doubt about that; and though it might be made by the Land League, it was not provoked by the Land League. The men who provoked revolutions usually belonged to one class, and the men who made them to another; but very often those revolutions were carried beyond the bounds of reason and justice, and, unfortunately, they saw countries deluged in the blood of their best and bravest; and he said to Her Majesty's Government, and to his hon. Friends, were they going to stain the modern history of Ireland with the blood of tenant and landlord? Were they going to keep up the heartburnings and antipathies that had raged between the two classes in the country for years? It would be the highest duty of Irish Representatives to prevent such terrible results if they could. Responsibility for the condition of Ireland was not confined to the Government or to the official class; they were all responsible. No Irish Member who forgot the terrible responsibility which rested upon the whole body in times like these could claim to be a patriot. Feeling that responsibility, he was in favour of the just, but firm and unswerving administration of the law, and of the swift punishment, with all the legal forms of justice, of the perpetrators of crime and outrage. But justice could not be served or peace promoted by allowing any portion of the official class to set examples of illegality and terrorism. For these reasons he joined his hon. Friend the Member for Cork in expressing a hope that Her Majesty's Government and the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland—who, he believed, was anxious to do his duty to Ireland, though he also begged leave to say that he did not know how—would become alive to the duties they had to perform, and that the English Parliament would ultimately discover that there was no way of settling the Irish question but by overturning the present system of Irish administration, vitiated as it was by traditions of the past which Englishmen were ashamed of, and which Irishmen remembered only with feelings of inextinguishable hatred.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, I think this discussion is wandering somewhat far from the starting-point; and unless some attempt is made to recall it to its original purpose, the inconvenience, which is already great, of raising irregular discussions in this way will be much aggravated. The question which we began to discuss was, I conceive, the Question which was raised on the Paper by the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton)—namely, regarding the conduct of certain County Inspectors in the issue of a Circular, which was quoted. But the question which we have now begun to discuss is the general condition of Ireland, the policy of this country towards Ireland during a great number of years, and, more especially, the conduct of the Chief Secretary in consulting, or otherwise, certain Members representing Irish constituencies. I cannot help thinking that if the discussion is to be protracted, it ought, at all events, to be confined to the original questions raised. The hon. Member who has just sat down has charged my right hon. Friend with some want of candour in the answer he has given the House; but I think that the charge is altogether unfounded. My right hon. Friend telegraphed for information to enable him to answer the Question; he has not received complete information. He has received a telegraphic reply from one County Inspector which led him to believe that a Circular like that quoted from had been issued; but from the other County Inspectors he had received no reply at all, and he was altogether without any statement which these County Inspectors might desire to furnish in explanation of their action. In these circumstances I think my right hon. Friend was justified in asking the hon. Member to defer his Question until he was in a position to give an answer with full knowledge. But when the Question was further pressed, my right hon. Friend did not feel justified in keeping back the fact that he had reason to believe that such a Circular had been issued in one county; but he was perfectly justified in previously asking for more time, in order that all the facts might be laid before the House. With reference to the remark of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, I quite agree with him that not one word ought to be said—and I do not think one word has been said by the Chief Secretary for Ireland—which can, in the slightest degree, lead anyone in Ireland to suppose that the Government are in the least indifferent to the charge laid upon the Constabulary to protect the magistrates in the discharge of their duty. We are aware of the great responsibility which rests upon the Constabulary, upon whom devolves the protection of magistrates, who avowedly occupy a dangerous position, and who discharge their duties, as we believe, honestly and fearlessly. No doubt, a great responsibility rests upon the Constabulary charged with the protection of these magistrates, and it would be far from the intention of anyone to utter a word which could hamper them in doing anything which is necessary. My right hon. Friend has said that he is unable to justify a portion of the Circular alleged to have been issued. It is a painful duty to utter one word which would seem to show a want of confidence or approval as regards men placed in such a difficult position. We have a right to call upon them to display courage and zeal; but we have also the right to demand from them the exercise of discretion. But until my right hon. Friend has received a full explanation from these gentlemen, it would be unfair to them, and it would not be fair to the House, to ask him to pass an opinion on their conduct. I trust, in these circumstances, that this discussion, already unnecessarily prolonged, may be allowed to close.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, there were two questions which he wished to ask, respecting which he heard nothing from the noble Lord. He entirely agreed with the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power) with regard to his observations upon the desirability of visiting strong official displeasure upon the author of this Circular; but he would like to know from someone on the Government Benches whether any assurance would be given that the constables would be informed in future that no Circulars were to be issued until they had been submitted to the authorities in Dublin; and next, that Mr. Clifford Lloyd and others would be instructed that the huts might be allowed to be erected? He had expected to hear that the erection of them had been forbidden, because of some new reading of the Coercion Act; but they had been told that it was not done under the Coercion Act or under Statute Law, but that it was in accordance with the Common Law of this country. As he understood it, the Common Law was derived from the dictation of text writers and from the decision of Judges. Perhaps the Attorney General for Ireland would be good enough to explain what text writer or what Judge had laid it down as the Common Law of England, Ireland, and Scotland, that when a person was evicted from his own farm, and his neighbour, on a freehold, erected a shelter for him, that any Executive officer of this Realm might interfere and forbid the building of his hut?

MR. JOSEPH COWEN said, he had great hesitation in recommending any Member to take a course contrary to that which he seemed inclined to follow; but he would venture respectfully to suggest to his hon. Friend the Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) the desirability of withdrawing his Motion after the statement of the noble Lord the Secretary of State for India. He would have been glad if the Government could at once have declared their intention to withdraw Inspector Smith from Clare and repudiate his Circular; but the noble Lord had stated that the Ministers were not completely informed as to the issuing of the Circular, and that before taking any steps respecting it, they desired to have some further information. The request was a reasonable one, and after the discussion that had taken place a few days' delay would not do any disservice to the cause which the hon. Member for Sligo had so ably pleaded. He could repeat the Question on a subsequent occasion, and, if necessary, renew the debate. He was conscious that hon. Members viewed these oft-recurring Irish discussions with something like despair. The subject overshadowed everything else. It was the last thing they seriously debated before the Recess, and it was the first thing after their re-assembling. It confronted them at every turn—at Question time and at Adjournment. There were more Notices of Motion and Bills on the Order Book of the House respecting Ireland than on any other three or four topics. There was no aspect of the question that the eye could survey with satisfaction, or that the mind could dwell upon with hope. In the interest of the country, of the House, and of the Government, it was imperative that the policy of the Ministry should be re-cast, and a new departure taken. No doubt, they had acted on information they possessed; but that information, as his hon. Friend the Member for Mayo had said, was purely official. They had collected their knowledge from one class of the community alone, and that the governing class, or, rather, Castle. They had neither contact nor sympathy with the Representatives of Irish popular opinion. From this defective knowledge they had made an incorrect diagnosis of the disease, and, in consequence of that error, their remedies had not succeeded. Coercion had failed, hopelessly failed, and deservedly failed. And the Land Act had not succeeded. They had treated a great democratic and social uprising as an ordinary agitation. They accused the hon. Gentlemen opposite of having created the movement. The reverse was the fact—the movement had created the hon. Gentlemen. They were the outcome and spokesmen of it. A year's experience had only gone to show that the remedial policy of the Ministry had not ensured a remedy, and their repressive policy had brought greater disorder. For their own interest the Government were bound to give immediate consideration to the subject, with a view of dealing with it under fresh conditions and in a different spirit to that which had hitherto characterized them. He did not wish to detain the House; but before sitting down he was anxious to say one word about the Chief Secretary for Ireland. No one had spoken more sharply against the policy that the right hon. Gentleman had pursued than he had done. He had condemned it from the first. Before it was adopted he had warned the House repeatedly as to the disastrous consequences that would flow from it. But, while he condemned the procedure of the Chief Secretary for Ireland as bitterly and as strongly as any man could do, he could not join with those who imputed to him unworthy motives. It was quite easy to disagree with a man and still respect his integrity. He disagreed with the Chief Secretary for Ireland far enough; but he would have no hand in the set that seemed to be made at him personally. The policy that the Chief Secretary for Ireland carried out was the policy of the Government and the policy of the Party. If he went, the Government should go; and if the Government went, the Party should go. Any credit that was due to the Administration for success would be shared alike, and any discredit that attached to them for failure should be participated in by them all. They were all Coercionists, and the right hon. Gentleman had simply been their instrument and agent. It would be shabby to single him out for sacrifice. This attempt to throw the odium of a false and fatal course on one Member would only recoil on the Party as a whole if pushed to a conclusion. He hoped, after the engagement of the Government that they would get further information and submit it to the House, that his hon. Friend would allow the Motion to be withdrawn.

MR. SEXTON said, the high respect he had for the character and conduct of the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Cowen), and the value he attached to the frank admission of the noble Marquess respecting County Inspector Smith, led him to respond to the appeal that had been made to him to withdraw the Motion. He must say, however, that it had not been proved that by any law these people should be kept from inhabiting these huts. He therefore thought they should have some assurance that these people should be allowed to inhabit the huts, as there would be more danger in sending them away than in allowing them to remain.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, he would not have risen to take part in the protracted debate, but that so many Questions had been put to him by hon. Members that he rose to give his reasons for the opinion he expressed on a previous occasion. That opinion was, that if it was found that the tenants in question were building huts for the purpose of watching the farm, and of doing mischief to persons taking the farm, or preventing them from taking the farm, that would be an offence against the Common Law, as any lawyer in the House was perfectly well aware.

MR. CALLAN said, he thought that the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) had exercised a wise discretion, although he did not agree with all that had fallen from the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Cowen). There was always a victim when a mistake had been made, and he hoped a victim would be made of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, because he believed that the right hon. Gentleman deserved it. He had set himself directly to oppose the popular voice of Ireland. The hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) said that in no other country than Ireland could such an abominable Circular have been issued. The hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Shaw) spoke of it as an atrocious Circular; but the Chief Secretary for Ireland had not said one word in condemnation of it. Was that fit and proper conduct for the Chief Secretary for Ireland? Was that the manner in which a responsible Officer of the Crown was to obtain the support of the Irish people in the maintenance of law and order? He had given an uncandid answer to the Question. The Question was whether a Circular had been issued by the County Inspector of Ennis, and no other officer was implicated. That debate would never have arisen if the Chief Secretary for Ireland had given a candid answer. He told them that he had had admission of the Circular, but had not said one word in condemnation of it. The Chief Secretary for Ireland took credit for the issue of the Circular, for he said that the practical effect of it was to prevent the shooting of Mr. Clifford Lloyd. The idea of a Chief Secretary for Ireland getting up in that House and admitting that till he saw that Circular yesterday he knew nothing about it. The hon.

Member for Cork had advised the locking up of the Inspectors and Sub-Inspectors. He would advise the Government to lock up the Chief Secretary for Ireland if they wished to have peace and contentment in Ireland. He was far more mischievous than the Inspector or the Sub-Inspectors. If they locked him up there might be some chance of law and order in Ireland. What was the Government of Ireland? Five gentlemen governed it. There was Mr. Burke, the Under Secretary, who was Castle clerk from his youth; Mr. Hillier, the Inspector General, who, when in a subordinate position, had more than one inquiry with regard to his conduct; and Mr. Anderson, a mongrel lawyer, half attorney, half-barrister, who usurped very much the duties of an Attorney General; and then they had the two men who really did the business in Ireland, who made the machine run—two sound Conservatives—namely, Mr. Robinson and Mr. Kay. The Chief Secretary for Ireland had said the charges had been brought against Mr. Lloyd which had been disproved; but would he tell him (Mr. Callan) whether there had been a chance of proving them? He was sorry that the Premier was not there; but probably, with the caution which distinguished him on some occasions, he had stayed away, knowing the direction the discussion would take. He hoped the discussion would have no effect on the country, and that this would be the last occasion on which they would see the Chief Secretary in the official position of Chief Secretary for Ireland. As long as he remained in that Office no Irish Member would put any trust in the administration of Irish affairs. ["Oh, oh!"] Had the Chief Secretary for Ireland conciliated a single person in the country? He hoped that the Chief Secretary for Ireland would never honour them with his presence in Ireland again.

MR. SEXTON said, he had further considered the matter, and was prepared to state what he proposed to do. He would put down a Question for Monday concerning the huts, and the Chief Secretary for Ireland would have the interval for considering whether these people should be allowed to wander about through the district or inhabit the huts. He begged to withdraw the Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881 — PERSONS CLAIMING TO BE AMERICAN CITIZENS DETAINED UNDER THE ACT.

MR. SEXTON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Government have asked the Government of the United States to undertake that, in the event of the release of the "suspects" claiming the rights of American citizenship, they would go, and remain, out of Ireland, or out of the United Kingdom; whether the American Government refused to give any such undertaking on the subject; whether, since the refusal in question, the United States Minister here has demanded that these suspects be at once released or put on trial; and, whether any Member of the Government is now in communication with the United States Minister in reference to the subject?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, I can only repeat the answer which I gave to the hon. Member on Tuesday last—namely, that I think it would be very inconvenient to make, in reply to this Question, any statement that would necessarily be an imperfect statement, as Papers will be very speedily laid on the Table.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN asked whether the Papers would be laid on the Table next week?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he could not state the exact date.

FORTH BRIDGE RAILWAY BILL—BOARD OF TRADE REPORT.

MR. ANDERSON asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether it is the intention of that Board to make any report upon the proposed Bridge over the River Forth (for the construction of which power is sought under the Forth Bridge Railway Bill now in dependence before the House), and upon the extent to which such Bridge may interfere with or otherwise affect the navigation of the Forth, and the access of vessels to the anchorage of St. Margaret's Hope; and, if not, what are the reasons for no such report being in contemplation?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: Sir, it is not the intention of the Board of Trade to make any Report on the proposed bridge over the River Forth. My hon. Friend is aware, probably, that this Bill has been referred to a Hybrid Committee, instead of, as is the ordinary course, a Private Bill Committee, and it appears to me that the question of navigation, involving, as it does, matters of detail, may very well be left in the hands of the Committee without coming before the Board of Trade, and I should point out, also, it is rather exceptional for the Board of Trade to make any Report.

MR. ANDERSON: Will the Board of Trade be represented on the Hybrid Committee, so that the safety of the public and the interests of navigation will be properly looked after?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: The Board of Trade will not be represented on the Committee.

NAVY—CHATHAM DOCKYARD WORKMEN.

MR. GORST asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether it is a fact that all the men employed under the Clerk of the Works Department in the Chatham Dockyard were discharged on Friday last; whether the men employed on Government work in this department will in future be hired and employed by Messrs. Foord and Sons of Rochester, instead of by the Government itself; whether a similar arrangement with the same contractors, which subsisted formerly, was discontinued some years ago in consequence of the abuses to which it gave rise; and, why the old system has been again revived?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, there has been no discharge of hired workmen employed on the extension works at Chatham, except those whose services are no longer required, in consequence of the near completion of the works. As Messrs. Foord hold the contract for ordinary repairs, any men required for the execution of works under that contract must necessarily be hired by them; but so long as any men are required on the extension, they will continue to be hired by the Admiralty as at present. The arrangement under which the contractors for ordinary repairs for a time supplied men for the extension was discontinued in 1877, not on account of any abuses, but simply for the purpose of saving to the Government the contractors' profit on a transaction which the Government could equally well manage for itself. That arrangement was due to the representations of the hon. Member, and he did the public good service in the matter. There is no intention to revive that arrangement.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—TRANSFER OF PRISONERS DETAINED UNDER THE ACT FROM CLONMEL GAOL TO NAAS.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is the case that 22 suspects have been transferred from Clonmel Gaol to Naas, owing to fever having broken out in the former Gaol; and, whether one of the prisoners so transferred has now been taken ill; and, if so, what is the nature of the disease?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, it was true that 22 persons, confined under the Protection Act, were transferred from Clonmel to Naas Gaol. Fever broke out in Clonmel Gaol some time ago, and although there had been no case of fever in that prison for three weeks previously, it was thought better that the prisoners should be transferred. One of the prisoners so transferred had a feverish cold a day or two ago, but the two medical officers came to the conclusion that it was not fever. The man was now better.

MR. W. J. CORBET asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is a fact, as stated in the telegrams, that the political prisoners have been removed from Clonmel Gaol, on account of the prevalence there of fever, to the gaol at Naas, where no fever exists, bringing the infection with them; that the Naas prisoners refused to enter into the cells, and that the military were called in to compel them amid great excitement; and, whether he sanctioned this exercise of power by the military force to compel uninfected prisoners confined on mere suspicion to mix with prisoners from an infected gaol?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that it was true that these prisoners refused to return to their cells, and the Governor, after a good deal of remonstrance, found it necessary to obtain the assistance of 50 soldiers and a force of police to compel them to return to their cells.

MR. W. J. CORBET asked whether it was not possible to transfer those prisoners to any other prison?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, there was no reason to believe the man had taken fever in Clonmel. They had got the idea into their heads, perhaps not unnaturally, and they acted with insubordination, which had to be put a stop to. There was every reason to believe there was no foundation for it.

POLICE (SCOTLAND) — DISTURBANCE IN THE ISLAND OF SKYE.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH asked the Lord Advocate, If he can explain the circumstances under which fifty of the Glasgow Police Force have been sent to the Island of Skye; and, whether the step has been taken with his sanction and on whom the cost will fall?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (MR. J. BALFOUR): Sir, for several months past the crofters—small tenants—at Brae in the Island of Skye, have refused to pay any rent unless on condition of getting back a piece of hill grazing of which they say they were deprived some 17 or 18 years ago. In consequence of the crofters taking this position, Lord Macdonald, the proprietor, or his factor sent a Sheriff's officer to Braes, on the 7th of this month, to serve summonses for the payment of rent, and also summonses for removal upon crofters. The Sheriff's officer was accompanied by an assistant, and also by a ground officer in the employment of Lord Macdonald. When they came to Brae they were met and stopped by about 150 persons, who assaulted them, too, from the Sheriff's officer the summonses were burned on the spot, and at the same time threatened the officer with more serious violence if he returned. It was a clear case of premeditated assault on an officer executing a legal warrant, and accordingly directed that four or five of the ringleaders who had been named should be apprehended and tried. The authorities of the county—Inverness-shire—stated that they believed that the force of constables at their disposal might not be adequate for the apprehension of the offenders, and they therefore applied to the police authorities at Glasgow for aid, under the provisions of the Glasgow Police Act, and the Glasgow authorities gave the services of the constables in regard to whom the Question is asked. These steps were taken with my approval, and the offenders were apprehended and lodged in prison yesterday morning with a view to their trial. The cost will fall on the county of Inverness-shire, as the constables were required for the vindication of the law in that county.

LAW AND JUSTICE—"GURNEY v. BRADLAUGH."

Mr. P. A. TAYLOR asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether his attention has been drawn to the defendant's demurrer in Gurney v. Bradlaugh, now standing for argument in the Queen's Bench Division; whether the demurrer challenges the legality of certain proceedings of the House in similar terms to a demurrer in Stockdale v. Hansard; whether, since in the last named case the then Attorney General was instructed to appear and appeared, in the name of the defendant, in order to defend the privileges of this House, any Correspondence has taken place between either of the solicitors for the parties in Gurney v. Bradlaugh and any officer of this House; and, whether there is any objection to lay such Correspondence upon the Table?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES): Sir, my attention has been called to the pleadings in the action of "Gurney v. Bradlaugh" in consequence of Mr. Speaker having placed them in my hands. They were forwarded to Mr. Speaker by the solicitors of Mr. Bradlaugh, accompanied by a courteous letter calling his attention to the questions involved. Having, at the request of Mr. Speaker, considered them in conjunction with the Solicitor General, it appeared to us that there was nothing in the issues raised which affected this House, so as to require any interference on its part or the intervention of the Law Officers on behalf of the House. In the case of "Stockdale v. Hansard," the action was brought against Messrs. Hansard in consequence of their having obeyed an Order of the House to print certain official Reports presented to Parliament, which were alleged to contain libellous matter; and it was thought that as the bringing the action was a contempt of the House, and that it was directly responsible for such publication, its agents ought to be protected, and the Attorney General was directed to defend the Officers of the House. But in this present case, no such considerations arise. With the action for penalties in itself the House is not concerned, although, no doubt, the result may be of interest and afford guidance to Members individually. The only correspondence which exists is the letter of Mr. Bradlaugh's solicitor forwarding the pleadings, and the reply of Mr. Speaker, in which he says that—"He sees no reason for his interfering in any way with the proceedings now pending in connection with the suit in question."

If the House should desire these two formal letters to be printed, I have the authority of Mr. Speaker to say that there is no objection to the wish being complied with; but probably my hon. Friend will not press the request.

STATE OF IRELAND—POLICE PROTECTION—MURDER OF A CARETAKER.

Mr. CHAPLIN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is true that, in the case of Richmond Roach, a caretaker in the employ of the Emergency Committee in Dublin, and who was shot dead on the night of the 17th, on the property of Mr. Caldwell, near New Pallas, county Limerick, that special protection had been applied for and refused by the Irish Executive?

Mr. LEWIS asked whether there was any truth in the report that the bailiff of Lord Leconfield had been murdered in the county of Clare?

Mr. W. FORSTER, in reply, said, that, as far as he could learn, there was no foundation for the report just referred to by the hon. Member for Londonderry. With regard to the case mentioned in the Question of the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire, he had telegraphed for specific information, and would give him a precise answer hereafter upon it. The statement he had already received was that there were four caretakers in this place. They were armed with Snider rifles, revolvers, and swords, and it was thought that they needed no special protection; but frequent police patrols were ordered in the district. The poor man who was murdered was murdered away from his post when he was alone. If his comrades had kept with him it was probable that he would not have been murdered.

COAL MINES—RECENT COLLIERY EXPLOSIONS.

Mr. BURT asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he will authorise the appointment of some competent legal man to represent the Home Office at the Coroner's Inquests at Tudhoe and West Stanley Collieries, in order that a searching investigation may be made into the cause of the explosions and loss of life at those places?

MR. HIBBERT, in reply, said, his right hon. and learned Friend had given instructions to appoint a competent legal person to attend the inquests in question.

CORRUPT PRACTICES (DISFRANCHISEMENT) BILL—SUSPENDED BOROUGHES.

MR. LEWIS asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, having regard to the serious questions affecting seven Constituencies at present deprived either wholly or in part of their representation in this House, and also relating to the conduct at recent Elections of two Cabinet Ministers, raised by the Amendment on the Second Reading of the Corrupt Practices (Disfranchisement) Bill, he will fix an early day, after the disposal of the Budget Resolutions, for the discussion on the Second Reading?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, on behalf of my right hon. Friend, I have to say that the Government are perfectly aware of the importance of the questions affecting several constituencies which are raised by the Bill referred to in the Question of the hon. Member. With reference, however, to a paragraph in the Question, I am unable to admit that the conduct of two Members of Her Majesty's Government has been impugned by anyone except the hon. Member himself. The fact is that both the right hon. Gentlemen referred to were examined by the Commissioners, and in neither case was the slightest censure passed on them. I am unable, therefore, to admit that the intention of the hon. Gentleman to bring forward certain not specified charges against them constitutes any degree of urgency; but the Government are conscious of the importance of the Bill, and it is with very great regret that I have to state that we are at this moment unable to fix a day for the discussion.

MR. LEWIS gave Notice that on that day week he would move the issue of new Writs for the cities of Gloucester and Chester, and that, with respect to Chester, he would then state the charge against the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board.

Mr. Burt

INLAND REVENUE—THE INCOME TAX (SCHEDULE B)—ENGLISH AND SCOTCH FARMERS.

MR. BIDDELL asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he was aware that an English farmer who paid a rent of £500 a-year for a farm, subject to a tithe of £120 and rates of £50 a-year, would pay an Income Tax of £5 12s. 10d. while a Scotch farmer, holding a farm of like value and subject to similar outgoings, would pay but £4 17s. 8d.; and, whether he will take this inequality (15 per cent.) into his consideration by reducing the Tax upon the English farmer?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: Sir, the facts as stated in the Question are correct, and doubtless show an apparent inequality in the treatment of the two countries. But the system of assessment to Schedule B, which includes this inequality, has existed since 1842, and was, I believe, explained by Sir Robert Peel in imposing the Income Tax. The intention is in both countries to levy the tax according to the true income of the farmer.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—TUESDAYS.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, seeing that the House has already been counted out on many successive Tuesdays this Session, he will endeavour to secure the keeping of a House on such days in the future, so that the remaining Tuesdays of the Session may not also be wholly or mainly lost to the business of the Country?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, I have to say it is impossible for the Government to undertake the responsibility for the performance of duty which certainly devolves upon the House itself. I believe it never has been considered that it is part of the duty of the Government to keep a House on Tuesday nights. If hon. Members do not take sufficient interest in the matters which are brought forward by independent Members, I do not think it is in the power of the Government to obviate the consequences. In fact, I am assured that it has been found to be absolutely impossible, when the attempt has been made, to secure the attendance of Members who might be willing to come to facilitate the progress of Government Business.

ness. They do not feel themselves bound to keep a House for independent Members. I have, however, to add that, partly in consequence of what has occurred, partly with the desire to obviate a further waste of time from such a cause, and partly, further, for the purpose of endeavouring to make some progress with the important measures the Government have on hand, we propose on Tuesday next, and on subsequent Tuesdays, to ask the House to sit at 2 o'clock. I would also add that I understand, on the authority of the authorities of the House, that sufficient progress has now been made with the transaction of Private Business to enable the House to meet for the transaction of Public Business somewhat earlier than it has hitherto done, and on Monday next, in the opinion of Mr. Speaker, the Public Business may be commenced at a quarter past 4 o'clock.

MR. GORST asked, Would the House have an opportunity of expressing an opinion on their proposed Tuesday Morning Sittings?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he did not think it was usual to make a Motion for the House to meet on Tuesday. The House usually ordered the consideration of a certain Bill to take place at 2 o'clock. He would not postpone any Bills for that purpose to-night. There was no intention of taking Friday Morning Sittings.

In reply to Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE,

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that he was not able at that time to say what Government Business would be taken next Tuesday.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

—:O:—

SUPPLY.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

NAVY—STRENGTH OF THE NAVY.

RESOLUTION.

LORD HENRY LENNOX, in rising to call attention to the strength and condition of Her Majesty's Navy; and to move—

"That, owing to the enormous increase in the Iron-clad Navies of the World, the Trade and Commerce of the Empire is endangered, and that it is desirable that steps should be at once taken to make an adequate addition to the strength of the Navy,"

said, that the difficulty of interesting the public on this subject was, strange to say, very great. The fact was, that from their cradle upwards Englishmen were taught to believe that England must needs be the mistress of the seas, and were accustomed to hear incessant praises of our Navy, and the reiterated statement that it was strong enough to meet all the Navies of the world. It had always been said that our Navy ought to be a match, not only for the Fleet of any one Power, but for those of any probable combination of Powers. That was the doctrine held at the beginning of this century, and he only regretted the prevalence of the delusion that our Navy was actually sufficient for that purpose in the present day. At the beginning of the century the victories that covered our naval heroes with glory were due to the excellence of our seamen and of our seamanship. A revolution, however, had taken place in ship-building, and another revolution, under the able direction of his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty, was also in progress, by which gunners and stokers were substituted for sailors. Several circumstances combined to make it more and more difficult for our Navy to maintain its old superiority. Eighteen years ago there were only four or five considerable Naval Powers. But now every single State endeavoured to possess men-of-war. Italy built enormous vessels that were unmatched by any of our own; and even China had steel gunboats with guns heavier than those of the Inflexible. And to say nothing of the fact that steam and electricity favoured rapid combinations, England was unquestionably more vulnerable now than formerly. Her Navy, it was evident, had always had to perform far more difficult duties than that of her most powerful neighbour. According to Admiral Fanshawe, England in 1805 had 83 line-of-battle ships in commission, while her enemies, France and Spain, had respectively 37 and 24; but when the hour of danger came we could assemble only 27 ships—the other 56 being engaged in protecting our Colonies and our trade—as against 33 vessels of the combined French and Spanish Fleets. He would venture to quote a few figures which would show the magnitude of the commercial interests that would have to be protected by our Navy. He found that the trade of the United Kingdom amounted in 1878 to £614,254,600, and our Colonial trade to no less than £964,000,000—that being more than a fourth of the trade of the world. The tonnage of the trading steamers during the same time was—British tonnage, 4,200,000; and French tonnage, 420,000. He quoted these figures to show the relative duties which the Fleets of the two countries had to perform in time of peace. Then, again, the increase of our food supply during the last few years had been most remarkable. In 1846 the imports of corn and flour into the United Kingdom amounted to 17 lbs. weight per head of the population. In 1858 it had risen to 70 lbs.; in 1865 to 93 lbs.; and in 1878 to 188 lbs. Our Colonies and Dependencies, too, which we had to defend embraced one-seventh of the land surface of the globe and nearly one-fourth of its population, and the total area was estimated at 7,647,000 miles, or more than 60 times the extent of other countries. The total area of the French Colonies was 335,629 square miles. In referring to the condition of the Fleet of our nearest neighbour he was not actuated by any feeling of hostility to the French Government or to the French nation. He wished that this country would remain on terms of the strongest amity with the French Government. Yet, above all things, he was an Englishman, and he thought it was his duty to call the attention of the House of Commons, and especially of the Admiralty, to the statement which he had made elsewhere, when he had not the advantage of the presence of the Secretary to the Admiralty. He began with a comparison of the two Fleets, and for that purpose he would begin with our iron-clad fleet absolutely built—that was to say, the iron-clads that were in commission and in reserve. There were 28 iron-clads. Of these, 14 were of the first class, 9 of the second class, and 5 were for coast defence. The French had now in reserve and in commission a total of 19. Of these, 9 were of the first class, 8 of the second class, and 5 for coast defence. Of the British Fleet, those that were at home at the present moment for the protection of our coasts were 9 first-class, 3 second-class, and 5 coast defences, making 17 in all. The French had at home 6 first-class, 4 second-class, and coast defence vessels, making 14; that while our iron-clad navy numbered 28, and the French 19, the ships at home were only 17 in our case and 14 in theirs. It was an absolute fact that of our 17 first-class seagoing iron-clads were purchased during a panic by the late Government; and he thought the Secretary to the Admiralty and his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for the Wigtown Burghs (Sir John Hay) would agree with him that ships bought in a time of panic were not likely to be of the class which you would deliberately select to be added to the Navy or would build in a dockyard. It was a most remarkable fact, and he hoped the House and the country would take it to heart, that while the French laid down a programme which they carried out carefully, steadily, and completely, our naval policy was a system of spasmodic efforts—at one time of going back for the purpose of economy, and at another time, in the face of a panic, of jumping in and buying whatever ships could be got. We had five coast defence vessels. He would say nothing of their seagoing qualities. They were ordered during the panic which followed upon the outbreak of the war between France and Germany. They were brought under the notice of the Committee on Designs and strongly condemned by Admiral Ryder. His right hon. Friend the late First Lord of the Admiralty (Mr. W. H. Smith), who was now present, declared in a work recently published that, in the opinion of the Committee, the coast defence vessels which were purchased in a time of panic were only able to go safely from port to port and that in fine weather. There was another point to which he wished to draw attention, and that was that, while our iron-clads were knocking about in the Mediterranean and wearing out the engines and their boilers and straining themselves so that after four years' service an enormous sum was required to repair and refit them, the French vessels in reserve remained quietly in port and were as good as on the day they left the dockyard, the police duties being performed by what were called obsolete ships. He had been charged with leaving vessels out of his English list that ought to have been in it. All he could say was that he had never left out a single vessel from the list of iron-clads.

Lord Henry Lennox

ships except those included in the Admiralty official documents as obsolete ships. [Mr. TREVELYAN: Included in what list?] The ordinary Admiralty list. We knew now exactly how we stood. We had 28 iron-clads against 19, and 17 for home service against 14 which the French also had in reserve. The next part he had to deal with was the most important of all, and that was the building programme. In discussing the building programme of the two countries they must always remember one thing, and that was that wages were much lower in France than they were in England, and that the money voted by France for the Naval Estimates embodied a larger amount of work than the same amount of money in England. In the English Dockyards during the Administrations of Lord Northbrook and the right hon. Gentleman opposite, 15,963 men were employed; while this year that number was raised to 16,844, being an increase of 800 or 900 men. The policy which induced the hon. Member to sanction this increase he entirely approved of, and he congratulated the hon. Member upon it; but, after all, it was not an absolute increase, for large numbers of men were discharged last year, and a Supplementary Vote of £50,000 for overtime was the consequence. They now had 16,844 men; but the French had at least 22,500, or something between 5,000 and 6,000 more men than we had. During the French year, which was reckoned from January to the following December, they contemplated building 16,000 tons according to our reckoning, or 21,000 tons according to their own measurement, which included hulls and machinery, in 1882, and 26,000 in 1883, thus showing an increase of 5,000 tons in the year 1883. This was not a spasmodic effort or the result of panic on the part of France. It was a careful and well-measured system of carrying out the programme which they started with great vitality two years after a disastrous war, in 1872, which they revised in 1879, and which was to be completed in 1885. They would then have no less than 38 iron-clads, 12 second-class iron-clads for coast defences, which had been suspended during further torpedo experiments, 34 cruisers, troopships, and other vessels. Their determination to carry out this scheme was evinced by the enormous sums of money voted year by year for the purposes. In 1882, 269,342,422f., and in 1883, 280,618,343f. was to be applied to that object, though he was bound to say that 8,275,921f. only of that sum was a real increase in the Vote, the balance, amounting to 3,000,000f., accruing from the sale of old stores, one-fourth of the whole being devoted to the service of the New Construction Department. The Vote for this portion of the Service amounted in 1882 to 35,842,000f., and in the Estimates for 1883 to 40,336,400f.—that was to say, an increase of 5,000,000f. in the year 1883 as compared with 1882, and of 14,000,000f. as compared with the year 1881. If evidence were needed of the determination of successive French Governments to carry out the programme they had originally laid down, these figures would supply it. The French Government had also made estimates as to how far the work begun upon each of the new iron-clads had progressed in a manner similar to the plan of the hon. Gentleman. During the naval year in England, three iron-clads would be built and added to the Navy, seven would be commenced, and two so little advanced that they could hardly say they had been commenced. He would say they had been talked about. In the French Estimates for 1883, there would be five iron-clads built, nine commenced, and two talked about. That would give us in 1883 three more iron-clads than the French, but if we consider the French Dockyards, with their enormous staff and their unlimited Votes of Credit, and if both nations maintained their relative rate of naval progress, where should we be in 1885? These Estimates, moreover, for 1883, were moderate Estimates, were such as moderate men would accept, and they would not sanction any less; but they were not such Estimates as the "Grand Ministry" of M. Gambetta would have voted. By 1885 the French would have added to their Fleet a number of most powerful ships, and with steel armour. Five of these ships would have their guns protected by 18 inches of steel armour. Five others would have their guns protected by 16 inches of solid steel armour. Four of them would have at the water-line 20 inches of steel armour. Two of them would have at the water-line 21½ inches of steel armour, and four others would have 18 inches of steel armour. If the statement he had made was mythical, then the statements made before the French Chamber of Deputies were mythical too. They could not avoid coming to the conclusion that it was highly probable—nay, more than probable—that in 1885, France, who did not depend upon the sea for her food supplies, who had few Colonies, and an insignificant trade—France, who had a Standing Army of nearly 1,000,000, would have an armour-clad Fleet equal in number, if not superior, to that possessed by that Empire which used to be considered the mistress of the seas. He hoped that public opinion might be brought to bear, in some measure, on this subject, and that the Secretary of the Admiralty, who, while addressing audiences in the country, expressed his determination to keep up the strength and prestige of the Navy, would have the backbone to insist upon the making the necessary additions to the Navy. The additions to the French Navy would be completed much sooner than had been originally intended, and with this view arrangements had been made for pushing on the ships with still more activity. They would be finished, in fact, in three years, instead of six years. The immense additions which the Minister of Marine made to the Estimates were for the purpose of finishing the ships in three years. As to unarmoured ships, certainly we had made great efforts to add to our cruisers; not that England had done all that he could have wished to see done. While we had been very active in completing our cruisers, the French had not been idle either. They were building two first-class cruisers which would be able to steam at the rate of 10 knots an hour over 5,000 miles at a stretch. This must add greatly to the strength of the French Navy. With reference to the difference between the system of artillery adopted in France and that adopted by England, it seemed to him that, during the last 20 years, successive Governments in England appeared to have been asleep. They did not seem to have been able to keep pace with the naval artillery of France and Germany. There was one suggestion which he had very much at heart, and that was the absolute necessity of establishing a Department of Naval Ordnance. ["Hear, hear!"] He was very glad that the hon. and gallant

Lord Henry Lennox

Member (General Sir George Balfour) cheered that remark, as when he came to bring the subject before the House he would claim the support of the hon. and gallant Member. Perhaps one of the most important points of all was the personnel of the Navy. They could not guide ships and fight them without men. Attention had been called to the personnel of our Navy some years ago, and it was folly was pointed out of looking upon the petty officers and seamen as fighting men. It was observed that 9,000 waiters, stewards and others who could not be regarded as fighting men. They did not know how to hold a gun, as they had never been trained. What he wished to impress on his hon. Friends opposite was the advisability of introducing a system by which every man who appeared in the Estimates as connected with Vote 1 should be trained as a combatant. Our total of petty officers and men was 31,000, the French had over 35,000; and, in 1873, when it was argued in this country that the most powerful ships required a less number of men, in France the number of seamen was increased by 845, and the reason given was that it was required on account of the more powerful character of the ships. With regard to the Marine, that force had been reduced by the Government to the extent of 600. This year the Marine Force of Great Britain stood at 12,400, while that of France stood at 22,014. The French Marine Force formed, perhaps, the most highly trained and valuable body of combatants in that country. He might mention that this was the force that defended Paris with the greatest success. In addition the French had a Marine Reserve Force of 10,752 highly-trained and disciplined men, so that their Marine Force really amounted to more than 32,000 men. Even if we were permitted to add our 4,000 Coastguards to our Marines, the preponderance in favour of France was found to be 16,354. What he asked, could be the object of a Power which was not dependent upon foreign food supplies, which possessed but few Colonies, and which had only an insignificant trade to protect—what could be the object of her having, in addition to 1,000,000 men in arms, an iron-clad Fleet equal to or greater than that of the greatest maritime Powers, and a Marine Force larger than our own? On another occasion he should tell the House what class of ships he wished the Government to add to the Service of the country. He could not think that the Government would grudge such an addition to our Navy on the ground of expense, for the First Commissioner of Works was going to introduce a Bill which would legalize the expenditure of millions in building and gilding some new public palaces ; and if the Government did not grudge money for such a purpose as that, they surely could not regret the sum which must be spent in improving the Navy. He had been told that it was unpatriotic to publish the facts which he had brought before the House. He agreed that it would be unpatriotic, if the facts were only known to the Secretary to the Admiralty and himself. But as they were known to every Government in Europe, and as the only people in the world who were ignorant of them were the English people, who were deeply interested in the subject, he thought he was taking a right course in giving publicity to the facts in question. He deprecated panic, and he deprecated optimism ; the former, because, under its influence, the Government might fill the Navy with indifferent ships at a great cost, and the latter, because it might lead to a fatal assurance. It was optimism that characterized the French Army at the commencement of the Franco-Prussian War, and the result of that optimism was crash and ruin. He ventured to press upon the Secretary to the Admiralty the absolute necessity of asking for further funds in order that large additions might be made to our armour-clad and cruising navy. A demand of that kind made by the Government would be received with popular favour, for the taxpayers of this country would rejoice to see the Royal Navy in a thoroughly efficient state. The noble Lord concluded by moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

MR. BENTINCK said, that he had a Motion on the Paper somewhat similar to that of the noble Lord. But he was glad that his noble Friend had been able to bring forward his Motion first. In rising to second his noble Friend's Motion, he had only one fault to find, and that was that his noble Friend, by his exhaustive statement, had left him very little to say. He regarded this question as, perhaps, the most important question of the day, inasmuch as upon it the very existence of the country depended. It appeared strange that in the present condition of Europe, and in the present aspect of foreign affairs, there should be any doubt existing in this country as to the efficiency of the British Navy. Yet there was no doubt such doubts did exist, and he grieved to say that, in his opinion, they were well-founded. The first explanation that suggested itself to him as to the cause of this remarkable state of things was one which he had had occasion to bring before the attention of the House many years ago, without success, however, so far as convincing the House of the correctness of his views ; but he was still convinced that the present condition of the inefficiency of the Navy—which he held to be a matter of fact—arose chiefly from the prevalence of the civilian element in the constitution of the Board of Admiralty. The hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty (Mr. Trevelyan) had stated the changes which it had been thought advisable to make in the constitution of that Board ; but he naturally did not advert to any such doubts existing. In deprecating the presence of civilians in the most responsible positions on the Board, he (Mr. Bentinck) was not casting any slur upon those distinguished men. The hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty the other day, in introducing the Navy Estimates, accomplished that which was rarely achieved ; he made the subject an interesting one to all classes. He was said to have made an eloquent speech—an opinion which he endorsed. Nobody doubted the hon. Member's talents, and nobody doubted the talents of the noble Lord who was at the head of the Department. Other distinguished men on the other side of the House, who were civilians, had also presided over the Admiralty Board, and nobody doubted their talents ; but, in spite of their admitted ability, he contended that the real cause of what he might almost describe as the unnatural condition of the British Navy was to be ascribed to the presence of civilians in the more prominent positions at the Board of Admiralty. He made these remarks in no Party spirit. The question was entirely a general one ; but he held that, in consequence of the present arrangement, the Navy virtually had no Representative in the Cabinet or in Parliament. The question was one of the utmost importance, and one which ought to be brought before the country. He would quote, in support of his views, the opinion of Admiral Sir George Cockburn, who said that our existing system was the most unsatisfactory one which could be well devised, and that the ultimate decision on important professional questions rested with men who could not, without elaborate explanations, understand professional statements or even expressions contained in professional documents. He (Mr. Bentinck) contended that the man who was to give opinions upon the condition and requirements of the Navy ought to be the man who was able to take command of a fleet, and to take it into action, and it was owing to the total want of such representation that the present painful condition of the Navy was to be attributed. He trusted, however, that the time would come when the advocacy of the cause which he was pleading would fall into better hands than his own and meet with better success. The hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty had told the House most truly that our safety depended upon our having plenty of armoured vessels, and yet it was perfectly plain, from a perusal of the Estimates, that our fleet of armoured ships fell far short of the necessities of our position. We had many more interests to defend than any other Power, and our Navy was being worn out with service in all parts of the world; while that of France, for instance, remained in harbour, ready for any emergency. Independently of that consideration, it was a doubtful question whether, in point of weight of guns and of speed, we were at present equal to the French Navy. The French had heavier guns and faster ships than we had. In the event of any combination of another Power with France against Britain, we should be in a position of inferiority. The superiority of our Navy was essential to our national existence, whilst the Navies of other Powers were to them comparatively unimportant. So great an authority as Admiral Sir Thomas Symonds held that in order to enjoy the same relative superiority as we did 100 years ago, we ought to possess 92 first-rate iron-clads. It should be remembered, moreover, that wars were now-a-days begun and ended in a few months, so that there would be no time after hostilities opened to remedy our naval shortcomings. In view of these facts, he was forced to the painful conclusion, though he was afraid the House of Commons would not allow itself to be convinced, that our naval position was at present utterly unsatisfactory, and that our national honour was in jeopardy.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "owing to the enormous increase in the Iron-clad Navies of the World, the Trade and Commerce of the Empire is endangered, and that it is desirable that steps should be at once taken to make an adequate addition to the strength of the Navy,"—(Lord Henry Lennox),

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the word proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. GOURLEY said, he felt bound to say that the speech of the noble Lord (Lord Henry Lennox) was not only eloquent, but able and instructive. So far as he could understand, neither the present nor the late Boards of Admiralty seemed to have any policy with regard to the ships they built, which were of all sizes, and all sorts of power as regards guns. The noble Lord showed very clearly that the French were now building ocean cruisers very much superior to any which we possessed. Our Inconstant, for example, could carry only two and a-half days' fuel, and the Iris which was our latest type of cruiser, was incapable of steaming with her own fuel for more than five days. It was a suicidal policy and waste of money to build such vessels, while other countries had cruisers carrying more fuel, which, in case of pursuit, would inevitably escape from them. The noble Lord, therefore, in calling attention to what the French were doing and had done in this respect, did good service to the House and the country. Nor in the event of war would it be possible for us to convoy the large amount of property which we had afloat in our Mercantile Marine. If the Government would turn its attention to an amendment of the Treaty of Paris of 1856, it would take the right course. The Americans were no parties to that Treaty, for the simple reason that they knew it would be out of the power of any nation in these days of steam to convoy its ships and merchandize effectually. Such an extension of our naval power as would enable us to do so would be next to impossible. During the American Civil War the United States had a very large mercantile fleet, and three Alabamas destroyed the whole of their trade. If we happen to be at war with a nation which had only a few swift vessels, the very fact that these vessels were known to be in search of our ships would be the means of raising the amount of insurance to such a height that our trade would be driven into other hands. In his Report upon the Naval Reserve, Admiral Phillimore said he was positive that there was one fatal defect in connection with our in-shore reserve, or fighting ships—that was, their very deep draught of water, ranging from 17 to 18 feet. These vessels, such as the Resistance, the Lord Warden, and the Hercules, in the event of war, instead of being able to perform the duties of coasting reserve, would be compelled to seek shelter in some of our deep-water estuaries, either behind forts or behind torpedoes. Those vessels were so obsolete, and so utterly useless, either for ocean cruising or for fighting, that they would be totally incapable of competing with or beating vessels of a more modern type—even such vessels as were recently built by Sir William Armstrong's firm for the Chinese Government. That firm built a number of steel gunboats or floating batteries for in-shore fighting on the Coast of China. Why should our Government allow a possible hostile Power such as China to have a more useful class of ships than we possessed? It would be said that those Chinese vessels were unarmoured; but then our own were limited with respect to the power of their guns. If we could have some 20 vessels such as those of the Chinese Government, the draught of which was only 9 feet 6 inches, it would be very much better than to carry so many eggs in one basket in the shape of one large ship. In a contest with 10 or 20 such vessels an iron-clad, while she might sink a number of them, would herself ultimately be sunk. A comparison between the gunboats built for the Chinese Government and our own large iron-clads like the Dreadnought proved the superior advantages and convenience of the former for purpose of coast defence. He wished to impress on the Government that the time had come when some attention ought to be paid to the necessity of having some organized system in regard to the vessels we possessed for coast defence, as he understood there was no organized system of that kind, and he thought we should have vessels of an improved type, not of the same size of those which had been built for the Chinese Government, but much larger, with powerful guns. That might involve the expenditure of a large sum of money, perhaps, of something like £1,000,000; but he was sure that if there was one thing besides education on which the taxpayers of this country would be willing to spend £1,000,000, or even £2,000,000, without grudging, it was in having a thoroughly efficient Navy.

Mr. Bentinck

SIR JOHN HAY said, that the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Gourley) had alluded to very interesting topics, as to some of which he should have desired to follow him; but he himself had on the Paper for that day a Notice entirely in the same sense as that of his noble Friend the Member for Chichester (Lord Henry Lennox), and, perhaps, it would be better for him now to confine himself to the want of iron-clads, which he believed to be at present the great want of the Navy. They required large iron-clad ships to protect their base of operations, and they also wanted light vessels with heavy guns, for other purposes; but he would address the House on that matter of vital importance—the small number of iron-clads which we had for purposes of war—and he believed he would carry with him, though not, perhaps, to the same extent, the feelings of his hon. Friends the Secretary to the Admiralty and the Civil Lord of the Admiralty (Sir Thomas Brassey), who sat opposite. His noble Friend the Member for Chichester had placed before the House most clearly the condition of the Fleets of France and England; but he had not alluded, to any extent, to the Fleets of other countries, which must be taken into consideration when that subject was under discussion. In addition to the iron-clad Fleet of Great Britain and that of France, the numbers of which his noble Friend had given, they had the fact that Germany had 15 iron-clads and Italy had 18. He would not trouble the House with any reference to other Powers; but if, under any conditions, the Navies of France and Germany or Italy combined, they would outnumber us nearly two to one, looking at the duties which we had to perform. It must be remembered that our Navy had much more extensive duties than any other to perform; that our Colonies were in all parts of the world; that at no time was there in this country four months' provisions for our population; that it was necessary to convey along great lines of communication our food supplies, as well as to convey safely the commerce by which we bought those supplies. We had six great trade routes to attend to. There was the route through the Mediterranean and the Suez Canal to the East, passing under the guns, so to say, of the French, Spanish, Austrian, and Turkish Fleets; then there was the route by the Cape to our Australian Colonies; then the route by Cape Horn to the Pacific, with which we had trade, where Russia at Vladivostock, and France at Tahiti and Noumea, as well as the South American Republics had always iron-clad ships, and that was also the route home from Australia; then there were the routes to the West Indies, North America, and the Baltic. All along those routes there were 20,000 British mercantile vessels to be protected, and 12,000 Colonial and Indian—32,000 ships that had to be convoyed and protected in time of war. For those duties what force had we to show? He would only speak with regard to the iron-clad fleet, because that was the base of operations of all our small ships and frigates. Many foreign countries had fortified harbours in distant parts of the world. France had three fortified harbours in the Pacific, and in the Indian and Pacific Oceans she kept, he believed, some smaller vessels and one iron-clad. It was only necessary for France to have one iron-clad far away from home; but this country kept 11 iron-clads on service in distant parts, even in time of peace. According to figures which he did not think could be controverted, in 1885 the British Navy would consist of 38 armour-clad ships and 20 obsolete vessels, besides one iron-clad which, he believed, it was intended to build. It was with great dissatisfaction, however, that he saw the Tixen, the Fiper, the Water- witch, the Scorpion, and the Wicora included in the list of ships which were of service to the country. They might be useful enough for the defence of harbours; but as some of them had only 3-inch armour, and none were of great speed, they should not be placed in the fighting line and reckoned among the 20 obsolete vessels. Among the 38 iron-clads, the Cyclops, the Hydra, the Hescate, and the Gorgon were ships which had been reported upon as not being satisfactory seagoing iron-clads, though of use under certain conditions. Taking those four away, the number of armour-clad vessels was reduced to 34 while the list of obsolete vessels was reduced to 15, by the five he had mentioned being deducted. The French Navy consisted of 33 new vessels and 23 obsolete ships, exclusive of 11 other vessels not serviceable, except under certain conditions. The result was that this country would only be able to place 39 iron-clads against 56 of France. Great exertions had been made by France to complete her Navy. In 1872, after recovering from her disasters she set to work to complete her Navy at a time when the Naval Expenditure of this country was being reduced. From 1860 to 1870 the Naval Expenditure of Great Britain averaged more than £12,000,000 a-year; but from 1870 to 1880 it had averaged a little more than £10,000,000. Except in the year in which the Turkish iron-clads were purchased, the Naval Expenditure of this country had not exceeded in any single year £11,000,000 since 1870; £2,000,000 a-year had been saved during the last 12 years, and that £24,000,000 represented exactly the amount of iron-clad shipping of which they were short. Representing, as it did, 48 iron-clads, in his opinion the relative proportion he had shown to exist between the Navies of France and England ought not to be the rule. Italy and Germany also had respectively 15 and 18 iron-clad vessels. England was thus becoming a second-class Naval Power. If the £24,000,000 saved since 1870 had been spent, they would now have had about 48 more iron-clad vessels, which would not be at all too many, and would only represent the French and Italian Navies combined. There were 166 iron-clad vessels in the world; in his opinion, this country ought to possess as many of these as any two Great Powers put together. The question was how the state of things which now existed could be remedied. Many iron-clads could not be built at the same time; but he believed that 12 could be built at one time, besides those building at the Dockyards. They would take three years in building, and the expense could be spread over that period at the rate of £2,000,000 a-year. In his opinion, the country expected the Navy to be brought up to the strength he had indicated. He hoped to hear from the Admiralty that the deficiencies in the protection of this country, which were owing to parsimony during the last 10 years, would be made up by expenditure, which would not be an extraordinary expenditure, but merely a going back to the rate of expenditure when Lord Palmerston was Premier and the present Premier was Chancellor of the Exchequer, and that an iron-clad Fleet would be created which would restore us to the position of the first Naval Power in Europe.

MR. TREVELYAN said, this debate had been anticipated by the Government for a considerable time; but it was a little difficult to know what line the Representatives of the Board of Admiralty should take. This was an extremely delicate subject for discussion, because it consisted of comparing our Fleet with that of a friendly Power, for the purpose of stimulating the production at the Admiralty. The details of the French Fleet were very familiar, he had no doubt, to the late Government; but up to the present time it had not been the custom to recommend the Navy Estimates by referring to the strength of a friendly Power, any more than it was the custom to recommend the Army Estimates by referring to the Force of any particular Power on the Continent. The noble Lord had made a speech which was marked with ability and considerable knowledge, and undoubtedly it was his (Mr. Trevelyan's) duty to say something, and he would say it as speedily as possible. Calculations relating to the strength of particular iron-clads were sure to differ. No one could have read what had been written without seeing that it was the most elastic of all topics. For instance, the noble Lord gave the names of first-class iron-clads available at home and abroad for the defence of the country as 10 first-class sea-going ships and four doubtful ones on the side of the English, and seven on the side of the French. According to the information of the Admiralty, out of these seven French iron-clads only four had been completed at all, and of the other three two had never yet been classed by any authority, except the noble Lord, as first-class iron-clad ships. There was not one of the 14 English ships alluded to by the noble Lord which was not ready for sea at a moment's notice. That was, in itself, a very great difference. Again, the noble Lord spoke of the speed of the French ships as exceeding that of English ships; but the noble Lord, he thought, was not aware that of those French ships only two had been tried for speed, and it was extremely doubtful whether they would ever fulfil the speed which they were supposed to have, while the speed of the 14 English ships was as well known as though they were packets trading between Liverpool and New York. The noble Lord spoke of four of our iron-clads as being scarcely sea-going ships; and he said they were bought during a panic. With regard to the Rupert, she had a most successful commission under Captain Gordon. The commission, he thought, was for three years, in which she encountered severe weather in the Mediterranean. The Hotspur went to sea for a year, and a favourable account was given of her by the Naval Lords. The noble Lord said that 16,000 workmen were employed in our principal Dockyards. Sixteen thousand were employed last year, and 16,800 this year. He did not know whether the noble Lord included Malta among the six principal Dockyards; if he did, then there were employed this year in our principal Dockyards 17,600 workmen. The noble Lord, however, had raised a much more serious difficulty on the question of quality. In regard to the Sea Force, they must consider what the ships were, and what the men were who would have to fight in them. The noble Lord talked of our only having 12,400 Marines, while the French had a powerful Marine Force of 30,000 men. There was really no comparison between our Marines and those of the French. Our Marines were amphibious—they were really seamen; whereas the French Marines were the Colonial Army. They were nothing more nor less than the First Army Corps for foreign service. The noble Lord, in his pamphlet, made a comparison between the tonnage of the English Dockyards and the tonnage of the French Dockyards. So far as he could judge, the noble Lord had committed a grave error, which had unfortunately been before the country in a very attractive form during the last six weeks. The noble Lord, in his pamphlet, said the French proposed in 1882 to provide 21,600 tons of armour-clad ships, and the English only 11,000 tons; but he thought the noble Lord now admitted that the calculation was wrong, because he took what was called the displacement tonnage, whereas we calculated by the proportion of the weight of the hull, as was always done in the shipbuilding accounts. If both calculations were brought to a common standard, the English estimate would be 11,466, and the French 15,250 tons. But the English always worked up nearly to their programme; whereas in 1878 and 1880 the French fell 5,000 tons below the estimate of each year, and, so far as they could judge, that was the amount to which they always fell below their estimate; and in the case of 1882 the difference in the calculation of the 10 ships amounted to 17·3-100ths, or a ship and three-quarters. The noble Lord had also raised the question of the French expenditure. He quoted the French Estimates of 1882; but he (Mr. Trevelyan) declined to enter into that, because the French year began in January and ours in April. The French Estimates were voted in July, and a certain part in December, and until they were voted they could not know what they were to be. But it was very different with the English Estimates; and as the French year 1881 was coincident with nine months of our year of 1881-2, he maintained that they had no right to compare the year 1881-2 with the French year 1882, with which it was coincident for only three months. The noble Lord had said that, according to the best judgment he could form, the French Estimates for the year 1882 were £9,500,000, or 238,000,000 francs. The Admiralty had carefully examined the figures, and came to the conclusion that £8,500,000 was nearer the mark than £9,500,000; and a person of great authority had said there ought to be a further deduction of 18,000,000 francs. But he would not accept that reduction, and was content to leave the figures at 214,000,000 francs—that was £8,500,000 of our money. Then the noble Lord talked of two French ships with 100-ton guns.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, he never alluded in his speech to any ships with 100-ton guns. He only alluded to the subject in a pamphlet which was not under the notice of the House, and the figures were taken from the interesting book published by a Colleague of the hon. Member the Secretary to the Admiralty.

MR. TREVELYAN begged to withdraw anything he had said as to the 100-ton guns. The noble Lord spoke of French ships to be armed with the 72 and 75-ton guns, and compared them very unfavourably with the ships we proposed to arm with the 60 or 64-ton gun, which was, as far as he could gather, an actually heavier gun than that which the French had decided upon. He had chosen those instances for the purpose of showing how impossible it would be to lay the state of the Navy before the country by entering minutely into the figures which were given by previous speakers. He did not wish to say anything that could be attributed to a Party motive; but it was absolutely necessary in discussing this question, when hon. Members rose to call for a rapid increase of shipbuilding, for the Admiralty to put itself right, and to show that an increased rate of shipbuilding was certainly not a matter in which they were wanting. In regard to the efficiency of the Fleet for the time being, he quite allowed that the present Government were absolutely responsible. The Government that had been in Office for a year or two ought to have brought the Fleet into a thoroughly efficient state by attending to repairs; but, as regards the numbers of the Fleet, it could not be denied that previous Governments were responsible. It was the Government of four years ago that were responsible. The Government might have followed the obvious course of taking a cursory view of the English and French Navies respectively, for the purpose of showing that the French had a real Fleet, whereas ours was a mere phantom Fleet, and of gaining popularity by such a course. But they took a course more consonant with the loyalty which ought to subsist between two successive Governments, and assumed that their Predecessors had good reason for adopting the course which they had followed. They, therefore, went quietly and steadily to work to ascertain the real state of things. Now, what was the actual conduct of the late Government, which was just as well aware as the present Government were of what the French were doing? In 1874-5—the year they came into Office—they built 8,457 tons of iron ships. In 1875-6, while efficiently and thoroughly repairing the Fleet, they built 14,276 tons. Then, in 1876-7, they built 11,418 tons. In 1877-8, they built 7,113 and bought 14,808 tons of vessels more or less complete. So that during their first four years of Office they built at the rate of more than 10,000 tons of iron-clad shipping a-year, and likewise purchased 14,000 tons more. But after that the late Government began to relax their efforts. In 1878-9 they built only 8,430 tons; in 1879-80, 7,427 tons; and in the Estimates of 1880-1 the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. W. H. Smith) only proposed to build 7,231 tons. When Lord Northbrook became First Lord of the Admiralty, it became their business to examine the state of our own and Foreign Navies, and the conclusion at which they arrived was, that the time had come when they ought to increase the rate of iron ship-ping; and so, without making any noise about it, they began building the ships which the right hon. Gentleman opposite had commenced at a faster rate. In 1880-1, instead of 7,231 tons, Lord Northbrook actually built 9,235, and in 1881-2, 10,816 tons; and this latter estimate was adhered to within 100, or, he might say, 40 tons. In the coming year his noble Friend proposed to build no less than 11,466 tons. That was the quiet and unsensational, and not ineffectual, way in which they had dealt with the situation. What was the evidence on which the charges of negligence against the present and the late Board of Admiralty rested? The right hon. and gallant Baronet opposite (Sir John Hay) had been constantly urging the Governments to increase their iron-clad Fleets, and he deserved well of the country, because, while he kept the subject before them, he was careful in his statements, and did not try to throw the country into a panic. But that was not the case with all critics. The hon. Member opposite (Mr. Bentinck) had quoted Sir Thomas Symonds as a great authority. Sir Thomas Symonds had said that the French had six sea-going armour-clads, armed with 72 and 75-ton guns, while the English had only one with 80-ton guns, and that the French had also nine armour-clads armed with 48-ton guns. If he (Mr. Trevelyan) had read one he had read 20 leading articles on that sentence; but the French had no ships with 72 and 75-ton guns; and as regarded the vessels with 48-ton guns, five were either building or progressing towards completion, and of the four others, the keel of only one was laid at this moment, and another was going to be built on the slips on which another ship, which was always quoted as a French ship afloat, was still being built. Those ships of the French were balanced by English ships with regard to which Sir Thomas Symonds was absolutely silent. The fact was that in 1872 the French came to the conclusion that they wanted more ships. Of their Fleet 31 ships were wooden, with iron plates. The programme laid down in 1872 had been more or less adhered to; but, instead of a ship costing £330,000 to £360,000, it now cost from £520,000 to £560,000. The English had 26 iron-clads, including the Polyphemus, in commission, and 23 in reserve, making a total displacement tonnage of 320,000 tons. The French had only 11 iron-clads in commission, and 29 in reserve, with a displacement of 225,000 tons. But of the French ships 21 were wooden with iron plates, whereas only two of ours were of wood. The French Admiralty had actually condemned no fewer than 17 wooden iron-clads, with an aggregate tonnage of 71,780 tons, and even after this great clearance there still remained 12 wooden ships in the French Navy as against two of ours. This was the case as regards the armoured ships that were already built. As regards those in course of construction, the number of the French iron-clad ships designed, building, or completed appeared on paper as 19, and the English ships as 13. The rapidity of the French work fell much below the Estimates; but in spite of that it was ascertained that the progress of the French ships was such that Lord Northbrook increased the out-turn of our iron-clad tonnage by half as much again as was thought sufficient during the last two or three years. Last year he stated that no great Fleet was better armed than our own. Having made that statement in Parliament, he repeated it in the country, and it attracted the attention of the noble Lord the Member for Chichester (Lord Henry Lennox), who made some rather strong observations about it. Among other things, the noble Lord said that a formidable weapon now universal in the French Navy did not exist in our Navy, and that the French Fleet was undoubtedly better armed than our own. Since this question had been started again, he wished to put it absolutely beyond dispute. Therefore, he had had a Report made of the number and weight of the armour-piercing guns now actually mounted in the two Navies. The total number of armour-piercing guns in French iron-clads was 284, and their weight was 4,476 tons. In the English iron-clads the number of armour-piercing guns was 480, and their weight was 6,224 tons. In unarmoured French ships there were 26 armour-piercing guns, their weight being 201 tons, while in unarmoured English ships there were 79 armour-piercing guns, and their weight was 880 tons. So much for the weight and numbers. As regards their quality, so far from their vastly superior weapon being now universal in the French Navy, only eight guns of the new type were mounted in finished vessels. The rest were guns of the old type, certainly not superior to our own, which the French were engaged in superseding as fast as they could, just as we were doing with ours. There was at this moment only one French ship afloat which could not be pierced in every part of her frame by the 38-ton gun, with which our more powerful ships were armed, leaving out of account the 80-ton guns of the Inflexible. But the real point of the controversy turned not on the old guns, but on the new. On this point he was bound to make two observations—first, that if our heavy guns of the new type were not sufficiently far advanced, it was the late Government which should bear the responsibility; and next that since this question had been started and pressed with such extreme energy, the Government were not prepared to affirm that the undertaking—the long and complicated undertaking—of providing the Navy with new guns was in a sufficiently advanced stage when they took Office. Less than this he could not say, and more he certainly did not wish to say. Now, the providing of heavy guns for the Navy was a question of detail, and the most important detail was to have ships ready to carry them. Sir William Armstrong said—

“What should our Government do in regard to the great work of re-arming the Fleet? I take for granted that all new ships will be armed with the best guns that can now be made.”

So the first matter was to see what these new ships were. The order in which our new iron-clads would come into the effective list was first the Ajax and Agamemnon; then the Conqueror; then the Edinburgh and the Colossus. Now, if the late Government had seen their way to press forward our new guns earlier, the Ajax and the Agamemnon, like the latest French ships, might have been armed with guns of the new type. But they did not see their way to it. On the 23rd of December, 1878, the Admiralty came to the following decision:—

“The First Lord is not prepared to delay the ships (the Ajax and Agamemnon) any longer. The change to longer guns and breech-loading or loading outside the turret, as proposed in the model, involves large considerations which cannot be disposed of hastily, and the long guns are not yet made, and, therefore, untried. The ships must be completed for the service 38-ton gun chambered as it now is.”

Well, that settled the question of the Ajax and Agamemnon. They were armed with the 38-ton gun; only it was chambered so as considerably to exceed its former range. From the first, it always carried a charge of 160 lb.; but on board the Ajax and Agamemnon it carried a charge of considerably over 200 lb. So much for the Ajax and Agamemnon, whose armament was settled by the late Board, and not by the present one. The next ship coming on for armament was the Conqueror, and the War Office engaged positively that three of the new 43-ton guns—equal, or, as far as they knew, slightly superior to the new French 46-ton gun—would be ready next December; two to be mounted in the Conqueror and one for reserve. Two more were to be ready in March, 1883, and six more in July, 1883; so that the eight guns required for arming the Edinburgh and the Colossus were promised us as soon as the ships were in a state to receive them. The 10 9-inch 18-ton guns of the new type would be ready in July next to be mounted in the turret of the Rupert and in the broadside of the Hercules; and that was the date which Woolwich was prepared to name for the delivery of 21 11½-ton guns. As for the 60-ton gun, of which he spoke in the Statement of the Estimates, and which he earnestly hoped was the biggest gun which either French or English authorities would think it necessary to aspire to, the design had already been laid before the Ordnance Committee and communicated to the Admiralty; and it was hoped that a half of the gun would be finished this year, and its construction would be advanced in parallel strides to that of the Howe, the Rodney, and the other ships which were being built to carry it. He thought it would be impossible for the armament of the ships to have proceeded more rapidly than it did under the present Government. Meanwhile, the experiment which, if successful, would secure equal power with a lighter weapon, was in an advanced stage. Sir William Armstrong had sent to Woolwich a wire gun of 10·2-inch calibre, which weighed only 21 tons, as against the 26 tons of the Woolwich 10·4-inch breech-loader, and that gun was going to Shoeburyness for trial. As regarded the 6-inch and other lighter guns, he did not wish to state over again what he had said at quite sufficient length before Easter; and he would only remark, as a melancholy, but pretty convincing proof, that the task of re-arming the Navy had begun in earnest, that the Estimates for Naval Ordnance, which in the last year of the late Government amounted to £303,000, would next year reach the very formidable figure of £616,000. Those who had been writing and speaking about the decadence of our naval supremacy had insisted on one or two points, and had left out of sight broad considerations which were strikingly re-assuring. In the first place, if they looked, as he was glad to look, to other nations besides France, they found that whereas, in 1872, those nations were building 23 iron-clads, they all of them together were now building only seven. Next, in calculations of fighting power, everything depended, not on what was intended, but on what was accomplished. When it came to a question of comparing military strength, they must look, not to what existed on paper, but to what they had actually ready in wood and iron. Let them take the iron-clads in commission—that was to say, the ships whose condition was constantly tested and tried by the only sure ordeal, their actual power of keeping the sea. They had of iron-clads, armed and manned, which were actually ready to fight the day after to-morrow, at the latest, 26, with a tonnage of 188,000, only two of which had wooden frames, while the French had 11, with a tonnage of 66,000, four of which had wooden frames. If what they looked to were size and strength, let them take ships of upwards of 9,000 tons and with upwards of 9 inches of armour. Of such ships England had eight and France three. Let them take unarmoured vessels. Of frigates and corvettes, counting only those which were equipped for war and not for police or harbour duties, they had in commission on the high seas 19, as against seven of the French. If, instead of taking number, they chose the test of swiftness, they had built or building 11 ships over the speed of 16 knots, and the French had three. If they took the lower speed of 14 knots, they had 44 and the French 29. And then look at their reserves. In time of war, if such a disaster should occur, the whole maritime energy and resources of the country would be directed to warlike purposes, until the country could be pronounced secure. It was not only that for extempore iron and iron-clad shipbuilding our capabilities far exceeded those of all the rest of the world together; but in time of war, the example of the late Government in the year 1878 would undoubtedly be followed, and the iron-clads which at the time were building or repairing for Foreign Powers in British private yards would be a reserve in the hour of danger. And as for cruisers, there were 165 merchant steamers on the Admiralty list, of which the odd 65, with a gross register of 250,000, exceeded 12 knots an hour, with water-tight compartments, and able to carry the new 6-inch guns, just as effectively as if every one of the 65 had cost the country £120,000 to build, and half as much to keep in repair. A naval war was a long business, and had the whole globe for its stage of action; and the power of a country to sustain such a war, and carry it to a successful result, must be founded on its having a great Commercial Marine and a great maritime population. And there was one consideration to which he had seen no allusion, but which appeared strongly to illustrate the declaration of the French Government that their recent shipbuilding was a temporary measure undertaken for the purpose of replacing an obsolete Fleet. The whole of the extraordinary French Estimates for rebuilding their Fleet had hitherto been provided, not out of Revenue, but as an increase to the National Debt. In the French Estimates of 1882 it had been intended that the shipbuilding should as usual be paid for out of a loan; but the Committee had recommended that for this year and for all the future the shipbuilding should be met out of Revenue. That circumstance, in his opinion, was a strong confirmation that, with the completion of the programme of 1872, the object at which the French Admiralty had been aiming would have been accomplished, and a still stronger guarantee that they would carry it no further. They, meanwhile, without incurring 1*l*. of debt, had seen their way to raise their shipbuilding to the standard of what they might call the English programme; and, for the second time in 10 years, the figure of 20,000 tons was to be attained, an amount of effort they and their successors might confidently hope to be able to maintain, and which if maintained, as he earnestly trusted it would be, would provide Great Britain with an ample and an efficient Fleet. The general conclusion, then, of the Admiralty was this—that it was not necessary for the safety of the country to ask for any special grant of money for iron shipbuilding, unless the French Admiralty, having completed its programme of 1872 and replaced its obsolete ships, should then go on building as fast as ever, but that it was necessary to build at the rate laid down by the right hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers). He concluded as he began, by saying that he regretted that he should have been obliged to adopt the line of argument he had taken, and to compare our Military and Naval Forces with those of other countries; but the Admiralty, after carefully considering the matter, came to the opinion that they had no choice in the matter. He was relieved, however, from the feeling that the making these comparisons was in any way invidious to the great country which was allied to ours by the freedom with which the French Government had published the facts relating to their shipbuilding, and by the generous admission which they themselves had made. The Commission of 1879, presided over by M. Gambetta, indicated that the idea of naval rivalry between the two countries had passed away. “No one,” it was stated, in a most interesting passage of that Report, “disputes the first rank with England;” and it was in the same amicable spirit with regard to France, and with the intention of showing the same amicable spirit towards hon. Gentlemen opposite, that he had made the comparisons which he had the honour of laying before the House that night.

Mr. Trevelyan

MR. W. H. SMITH said, that no one could complain of the spirit in which his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty had treated the subject in replying to the temperate and able speech of his noble Friend the Member for Chichester. There had been a feeling that the number of iron-clads was not sufficient for the needs of a great country; but he entirely sympathized with his hon. Friend opposite in the feeling that the comparison of our ships of war with those of other nations was to be deprecated, and was only to be made on those rare occasions when it became necessary to inform the House of the state in which our armaments stood with respect to other countries, while, at the same time, they had no reason whatever to expect that those Powers would be unfriendly to this country. At the same time, he thought it unwise for the Government to ignore the exertions of foreign countries, and he was glad that the present Board of Admiralty had seen the necessity of increasing the strength of the iron-clad Fleet. His hon. Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty had referred to the additions to the Fleet made by the late Board; and he wished only to correct the statement in which he had spoken of the addition of four important ships as having been made by their Predecessors. The four vessels in question were purchased, not in 1875, but in 1878, by means of the Vote of Credit that the Government fortunately had at its disposal; and they were, undoubtedly, a great addition to our Navy. The Secretary to the Admiralty had laid down the principle, with which the House would probably agree, that for the efficiency of the Fleet for the time being the Government of the day was responsible. There could be no question that the Government for the time being ought to maintain the Fleet in a condition efficiently to perform any service that might be required of it; and if he had a fault to find with his hon. Friend—though it was difficult to find fault with him—it would be on the ground that the present Board had failed to maintain the Fleet in a condition to meet a sudden emergency. His view of the case was that the Navy existed for the contingency of a possible war at very short notice. Our iron-clad fleet existed not for the purpose of facing combinations that might be formed after six, or, perhaps, 12 months' notice, but in order to meet events occurring suddenly like the Franco-German War. Any other war that might overtake Europe would probably be equally sudden; and those who were responsible for the Forces of the country would incur a very heavy load of responsibility if its resources were not available at very short notice. His complaint, then, was that the Admiralty had allowed the existing Forces of the country to become more or less inefficient for want of that vigilant attention to repairs which was at the bottom of all efficiency, and without which our ships would become useless. In the Estimates for the year 1881-2 the House was informed that certain ships were being repaired and would be completed in a certain time, and similar promises were made in the following year with respect to other ships. He would read the names of these ships. The Audacious, an iron-clad, was promised for 1881-2, and was to be completed on the 21st of March of the present year. The Bellerophon, iron-clad, was promised in August, 1880, to be completed in July, 1881; the Rover, 3,460 tons, was promised for 1881-2, and was not yet completed; and the Opal, the Himalaya, the Sapphire, the Pelican, the Rupert, the Active, the Avon, the Volage, the Shah, the Raleigh, the Juno, and the Wild Swan, were all promised to be repaired within the last two years, a distinct undertaking being given by the present Board of Admiralty. They amounted to 54,000 tons all told; and, for the most part, little or nothing had been done to them, and they now remained to be repaired in the course of the present year. Now, as none of these vessels were at the present moment fit for use, the Navy was so far weaker by their absence than it was in April, 1880. His hon. Friend had supplied to him a list of ships that had been removed from the effective list between that date and the present April as being no longer worth repairing, amounting to upwards of 25,000 tons. Adding the 54,000 tons which remained yet to be repaired to the 25,000 tons which had been struck off the effective list, we got a total of 80,000 tons, which in two years had been taken off for the time being, or altogether, from the effective list of the Navy. What was there on the other side of the account? According to the Estimates in the two years, if the contracts were carried out, there would be 19,271 tons of armoured ships, and 16,000 tons of unarmoured ships, making a total of 35,000 tons, against 80,000 tons, or a difference of 45,000 tons. The five ships that were ineffective for want of repair were the Resistance, which was not in the programme at present, the Shannon, which was in it, the Audacious, the Bellerophon, and the Rupert, the four latter being good and useful ships. Altogether these represented 30,660 tons of iron-clads, as against the 19,000 tons in the building programme. This subject required the careful consideration of the Admiralty. He did not complain of the expenditure of a single farthing upon the building programme; but he did complain very much that money had not been found to keep efficient the ships which the Admiralty felt to be necessary to the efficiency of the Service. It would have been wiser if the Admiralty had taken money for the repair of these vessels; but the provision made had not been sufficient to carry out the Dockyard programme of building, and also to maintain ships in repair. It should be a canon at the Admiralty that the Navy ought to be in a condition to meet sudden war with all its available resources. He had had furnished to him a list of the ships which, when they were launched, would be efficient; but they would not be available for one or two years. He had given credit for the actual programme which would be accomplished in the two years; and he had set against it the deterioration in the same period. More than two years had elapsed since the order was given by the late Government for the manufacture of a 43-ton gun; and last year they were informed that the present Government, following the example of the late Government, had ordered 6-inch, 8-inch, and 10-inch guns, which would be supplied to the Navy before the 31st of March, 1882. When they got into Committee he should ask how many of these guns were in the possession of the Admiralty; and whether there were carriages for them? He deferred observations which he desired to make on this and some other topics.

Mr. Trevelyan

CAPTAIN PRICE said, it was satisfactory that an opportunity had at last been found for bringing forward the important question raised by the Motion of the noble Lord the Member for Chichester (Lord Henry Lennox), which Motion he cordially supported. It must have produced astonishment that throughout the whole course of the statement of the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty no assurance had been given that the Fleet for which they were asked to make provision was sufficient for the purpose for which it existed. Obviously that was a very difficult duty to perform, when an examination of the strength of the Navies of other countries had to be made a part of the statement; still, he thought there were higher considerations than those merely of the manner in which a specified sum of money had to be divided between the different branches of the Service. He maintained that in all cases in which the naval policy for the year was sketched out some statement should be made, either by the First Lord or the Secretary to the Admiralty, that the Fleet was being maintained, or that a sufficient number of new ships was being built to keep the country in an efficient state of defence. That statement, however, was one which was generally absent on the occasion of the discussion of the Naval Estimates, and constituted one of the drawbacks of our system of Party Government. Whatever Government might be in power, whether it was a Liberal Government, or a Government composed of Gentlemen now sitting on that side of the House, it was the case that they were guided more by Party considerations than those which he had indicated with regard to the strength of the Navy. The defect which he spoke of was one that was reflected, and naturally reflected, at the Admiralty, where the mode of carrying on business was, as he believed he might say with accuracy, as follows:—The First Lord of the Admiralty, assisted by his Parliamentary Colleagues, and influenced by various considerations, into which he need not enter on the present occasion—sometimes affected by the nearness of a Dissolution, and sometimes by the state of the national finances and the fear of coming to that House for an increased Vote—decided what sum should be asked to be granted for the Service of the Navy. In such a case, to ask was to obtain, for he was convinced that the House would never refuse to a responsible Minister of the Crown any sum in reason which he might ask, upon his assurance that it was required for the maintenance of the Navy in an efficient state. The First Lord of the Admiralty, having decided that a sum of, say, £10,000,000, or less, might be asked for with propriety, and without inconvenience, went to the Naval Advisers of the Board of Admiralty, and said—“Be good enough to inform me how this money is to be spent.” Now, he contended that this course was the converse of that which ought to be followed. The Naval Lords were experts in the matters for which the money was required; and instead of the First Lord going to them to ask how a certain fixed sum of money might be appropriated, he should make it his duty to inquire of them what sum was required to maintain the Fleet in a state of efficiency? Were that course followed, he repeated his conviction that the House of Commons would not for one moment withhold any sum which the First Lord of the Admiralty might state to be actually necessary for the Service. He was glad that this discussion had taken place, because it had, at least, elicited from the Secretary to the Admiralty something more than an expression of the usual after-dinner sentiments that one often heard, but which no person who had entered into comparisons of the naval strength of this and other countries could for a moment entertain. General, vague, and sometimes wild statements had been made on the assumption that the strength of our Fleet was greater than that of any other Fleet; and he had once heard the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary state that the Fleet of this country was superior to the combined Fleets of the world. Now, it was said that the subject was a delicate one, and that it was invidious and unwise to make comparisons between the Navy of this country and the Fleets of friendly Powers; but, after all, we were only inquiring into the strength of the Navy—and he understood by that term the relative force of our Navy compared with the Navies of other Powers. What else was there of Foreign Powers besides their Fleets that we could possibly make this comparison with? The only reason why we kept up a Navy at all was because Foreign Powers had Navies which might, under certain circumstances, be dangerous to this country. We had also to consider whether our Fleet was sufficient for the growing duties imposed upon it; and the hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir Thomas Brassey) had, on a former occasion, made some remarks upon this subject—referring to the extraordinary growth of the trade and shipping, which our Navy existed to defend—to the effect that—

“In looking back over a series of years, it would be found that, while an extraordinary growth had taken place in our trade and shipping, the Naval Estimates had remained practically stationary; that the Effective Votes for 1881-2 were £8,662,000, and the exports and imports were £697,000,000.”

He went on to say that—

“Under the Duke of Somerset, who was the First Lord of the Admiralty in the Liberal Administration from 1859 to 1865, the Naval Estimates were far in excess of the present amounts. In 1863, and again in 1864, £9,300,000 was voted for the Navy. At that time the value of our imports and exports was £200,000,000 less than at present, and our steam shipping was less than a third of the present tonnage. The facts which he had laid before them, he said, appeared so conclusive as to the strict economy which had been exercised in our Naval Expenditure, that the question would rather be—whether we were doing enough to provide for the security of our vast Empire and our extended commerce? Upon this point it was difficult to be precise without entering into invidious comparisons with other Powers; and he therefore asked them to be satisfied with the general assurance that we were at that moment in a satisfactory condition.”

Now, the noble Lord, and those who supported the proposition which he had brought forward, had been styled “alarmists”—that was to say, they were persons who foresaw dangers to which they and others were exposed. But, he asked, were not the alarmists in this case authorities upon the question? Of course, he did not refer to himself; but surely the experience of the noble Lord at the Board of Admiralty, and the researches he had made, entitled him to this designation. Again, the view of the noble Lord was supported by Sir Thomas Symonds, Admiral of the Fleet; by the right hon. and gallant Member for Wigton (Sir John Hay); and by Sir Spencer Robinson, who was Controller of the Navy under a Liberal Administration, who had published a pamphlet on the subject, and who, directly he left the Board of Admiralty, declared in unqualified terms that the Navy of this country was wholly inefficient for the work it had to do, and that, in many essential respects, it was inferior to the Navy of France. Those who took an optimist view of the qualifications of the Navy rested their case upon a series of probabilities. The first was that we should have plenty of notice of a coming war. Surely that was not a probability upon which we could rely. The second was that this country would be certain to have Allies, and that our opponent would probably have none. That, again, was surely not a probability upon which to rely. The third probability on which hon. Gentlemen opposite rested was that of our ability to concentrate our Fleet in European waters. A fourth was that there was some arrangement on which the food supply could be assured; and a fifth and most important one was that of the iron-clads in course of construction in other than Government Yards. But as to our ability to purchase iron-clads, he asked whether there was a single vessel of the kind ready for use on which we could lay our hands? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith), when First Lord of the Admiralty, was, undoubtedly able, in 1876, to purchase five first-class iron-clads, complete, or nearly so. But he contended that, at the present moment, there was not a single iron-clad to be bought in a similar manner. [Mr. TREVELYAN: There are seven at different stages.] He (Captain Price) had made inquiries on the subject last year, and was informed that there were only two vessels at all advanced. The hon. Gentlemen had spoken of maintaining our Navy upon an equality with that of one foreign country, and had assumed that so long as it was superior to that one leading Power it was sufficient. But that was undoubtedly a new departure in the policy of this country, which used to be, in regard to Naval matters, that our Fleet should be equal to the Fleets of any two Foreign Powers. The whole of the arguments heard that night went to show that the provision we were making was insufficient. It was altogether beyond the question to say that our Fleet was equal to that of another country. If we took the Fleet as it now stood it was, no doubt, a good deal superior to that of France; but if we inquired into the effect of the policy which was being pursued in our own Navy and that which was being pursued in regard to the French Navy, it would be seen that a considerable superiority would result to the latter in the course of two or three years. He asked who was responsible for that state of things? For the purpose of comparison, he would divide our Fleet of iron-clads into three classes. In the first class he should include ships capable of carrying guns of 43 tons weight and upwards, built, building, and provided for in the current Estimates. He might, at this point, express the surprise he felt at hearing the hon. Gentleman cast doubt upon the statement that French ships now building would carry 72-ton guns, because it was a fact that guns of that weight were now being made in France; and for what were they being made if not for the purpose of being mounted? Then, what right had the hon. Gentleman to say that French ships of the first class were not going to carry guns of this calibre? The fact was that of vessels of the first class, built, building, and provided for, we had 10 ships; whereas France had 18 and Italy 7, the average weight of their heaviest guns being 55 tons in the English, as against 61 tons and 100, respectively, in the ships of France and Italy. Moreover, while the French had 70-ton guns actually building, our 60-ton guns were only on paper, the hon. Gentleman having stated that perhaps two or three 43-ton guns would be ready by the end of the year, while, he believed, the whole of the seven Italian vessels would be armed with 100-ton guns. The average thickness of armour on the English ships was 18 inches, as compared with 19 inches on the French ships. So far as France was concerned, the average speed was the same as our own, while, in the case of Italy, it was somewhat higher—that was to say, the average of our first-class ships was 14·25 knots; of the French, 14·25 knots, and of the Italian ships 15 knots. Thus, France and Italy combined had 25 first-class iron-clads, as against our 10, the respective averages of guns, armour, and speed being those which he had pointed out. Of vessels of the second class—namely, those which carried guns of from 18 to 38 tons, England had 26, France 18, and Italy 5. In the weight of guns we had slightly the advantage, as compared with France, the average being 24½ tons, against 22 tons. The same remark applied to the armour, the average thickness of the plates carried by the English ships being 12½ inches, and that of the French 11 inches. But in the more vital matter of speed we were behind, the average speed of the French vessels being 13·6, and of ours 13·25 knots. Of vessels of the third class—namely, those carrying guns of less than 18 tons, and with armour of less than 9 inches in thickness, England had 15, France 13, and Italy seven. At first he thought it would be well to include in the third class every vessel, built or building, which carried, or was intended to carry, armour-plating of any kind; but on re-consideration that appeared to be hardly correct; and he had, therefore, carefully calculated the number of ships which could be made use of, and those which would not be of use to the country in time of war. Of these ships, as he had before pointed out, we had 15 and the French 13. Now, until the commencement of the present year, the French counted on their Navy List, besides these 13 vessels, 14 others, which made a total of 27. They also had 12 floating batteries built since the Crimean War, and which until lately they had looked upon as vessels which might take their place in action. Certainly, they did not consider them useless vessels, for they kept them up more efficiently than the two floating batteries which we had at the present time. However, he should not include these amongst their vessels of the third class. But he must remind the House that a number of ships had been struck off the list of the French Fleet which last year actually took part in the bombardment of Sfax. Whether they could be brought forward again he was, of course, unable to say; but it was only fair that, as they had been removed from the French Navy List, they should not be included under the head of vessels of the third class. He said, then, that Italy and France combined had 20 iron-clads of the third class as against our 15; and, therefore, the sum total of iron-clads of the three classes was for England 51, France 49, and for Italy 19. In other words, England would have 51 ships as against the 68 of France and Italy combined. He asked whether or not the comparison he had made was a true one, and for this reason—because, when they made a comparison of the kind, they were not replied to in the terms of that comparison, but some other comparison was set up which was not applicable; and it would certainly be far more interesting to the public to get a categorical denial, if it were possible, of that which he now made in support of the Motion which the noble Lord had brought forward. If it were said that this comparison was not a true one, he asked to what extent it was not true? The Secretary to the Admiralty had made to the House a very lucid and explanatory statement; but, notwithstanding that his speech had been of the most interesting character, he had by no means denied the statement of the noble Lord, or the other statements which had been made on that side of the House. He should like, therefore, to get an answer from the hon. Gentleman, in general terms, as to whether, in the first place, he would deny that the French Naval Estimates were increasing, while ours were decreasing? The hon. Gentleman had referred that evening to the sum mentioned by the noble Lord as being voted this year in France—namely, £9,000,000—which the hon. Gentleman compared with our Estimate of £10,500,000; but, in doing so, he entirely forgot to state that in the French Vote was not included the sum which we include in our Estimate for the Non-Effective Votes. Was the hon. Gentleman also able to deny that the French were employing a very much larger number of men in their Dockyards, and building a larger amount of tonnage than we were? The figures of the hon. Gentleman agreed with his, in showing that the French were building 15,000 tons of iron-clads as against our 11,500 tons; and when the hon. Gentleman said that the French would not carry out their programme, he should be glad to know on what foundation that statement rested. Would the hon. Gentleman deny that their programme for last year was carried out? The French Estimates were published, and they had voted money for building the same amount of 15,000 tons of iron-clads next year. It mattered nothing to the present inquiry whether or not they had carried out their programme in 1878 or 1879. What we had to do was to compare with our Estimates and tonnage the money they had voted this year and the tonnage intended to be built by them in the coming two years. Again, could the hon. Gentleman deny that the French were adding 600 or 700 men to their Navy, while we were reducing our men by a like number? The hon. Gentleman stated at an earlier period in the Session that the number of men and boys asked for was the same for this as for last year; but he added that we were reducing the number of our Marines, whom he justly described as forming part of the ship's company. Therefore, it was correct to say that while we were reducing our Navy the French were increasing theirs. Again, the French, both this year and last year, had voted more money than we for guns, and were progressing with more rapid strides than we in the armament of their Fleet. They were building new types of guns more quickly, and, therefore, their ships would be sooner armed than ours; and, at the same time, they were spending more money on torpedoes. He said it would be satisfactory to the country that some Representative of the Admiralty should, if possible, emphatically deny those statements; and if he could not deny them in toto, then the House should be informed to what extent they were incorrect, or that they were not incorrect at all. The Admiralty, up to the present, had sheltered themselves under the old excuse, that it was invidious to make comparisons and that they must trust the Government. For his own part, he did not believe that the Government of any Party was to be trusted in such a matter as this; and the suggestion which he had to make, although it was not likely to be accepted, and would be considered by a large number of Members as impracticable, was that a Royal Commission should issue to inquire into the question of what was a really sufficient Fleet for this country to possess. The Commissioners should examine experts of all kinds—naval officers, engineers, Admiralty officials, and all those who were capable of giving an opinion on the subject—and then make their Report. But, although this would be a step in the right direction, it would be by no means enough, for it was probable that if Nelson, Collingwood, and all our old naval heroes were to rise from their graves and demonstrate from their own and the accumulated experience of later days that the country ought to be supplied with a far larger Fleet than it had, no Government would ask for the money that was necessary. Nevertheless, the country ought to be supplied with a Fleet sufficient in every respect; and he was quite certain that if the money were voted for this purpose, not one word of dissatisfaction would be heard throughout the Kingdom at the step which had been taken.

Captain Price

MR. R. W. DUFF said, he had listened with attention and interest to the speech of the noble Lord the Member for Chichester (Lord Henry Lennox), who, in his opinion, had done good service in calling attention to the Navies of Foreign Powers, notwithstanding that in his statement he thought he had somewhat over-estimated the strength of the French Fleet while under-estimating our own. Moreover, he thought the reply of his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty went a considerable length in the direction of answering the noble Lord's complaint. At the same time, when they looked on the vast increase of the Italian and German Fleets, quite apart from that of France, he could not feel satisfied that our own Navy was such as it ought to be. He had heard the same statements and arguments that had been advanced that evening used on many occasions during the years he had had the honour to sit in that House; while it was contended, on the one hand, that the Fleet was insufficient for the national requirements, it was usually replied, on the other, that while the Government admitted that the Navy was not quite what it ought to be, it was in the same position when they came into Office. That kind of attack and defence had gone on for years. But what they had to consider was not whether the Navy was better now than it was when the Opposition were in Office, but whether it was what it ought to be for the service of the country. He was bound to say that the noble Lord had brought forward facts and statements which, in his opinion, had not been entirely answered by his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty, although, in dealing with details, he had shown some inaccuracies on the part of the noble Lord. His object, however, in rising was to call attention to the manning of the Fleet. The noble Lord had said very truly that, deducting supernumeraries, the number of seamen amounted to about 18,000, and as he (Mr. R. W. Duff) had not seen any contradiction of the statement which he made last year as to the small number of those who had seen six years' service he would like to know whether the Admiralty would furnish the House with a statement showing the number of years' sea service which these 18,000 men had? The hon. Gentleman had told them that there were 153 steamer vessels in the Merchant Navy, all of them fit to carry guns of great calibre but he was very much concerned to know where the men were to come from for the purpose of manning these guns, particularly as the hon. Gentleman had, to a certain extent, reduced the Royal Marines. We were now introducing breech-loading guns into the Navy, although our men were always drilled with muzzle-loading guns. [MR. W. H. SMITH: There are no breech-loading guns in the Navy.] He (Mr. R. W. Duff) had certainly been given to understand that the Navy was actually supplied with some breech-loading guns. Whether that was correct or not, he thought it was high time that breech-loaders were introduced into the Navy and he felt sure his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty would admit that the sooner this was done the better for they had been proved to be better than muzzle-loaders. Without detaining the House by entering into details, he was bound to say that, on the whole, his noble Friend had made out a case for increasing the Navy. Although he had been answered to a certain extent, he had not been entirely answered; and, therefore, he trusted that the Admiralty would not, upon any false ideas of economy, shrink from bringing forward such Estimates as would enable them fully to maintain our Naval Forces. He was satisfied that no one was more convinced than the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty of the absolute necessity of keeping up the seamanship of our sailors; and if the statement which he (Mr. R. W. Duff) had made last year with reference to the amount of their sea service were correct, he trusted there would be no hesitation in bringing forward proposals on that important subject that would be satisfactory to the country. He would not, at that late hour, deal with the statements made by his noble Friend (Lord Henry Lennox); he would only say that although he agreed on many points with the noble Lord, especially when he spoke of what the Navy ought to be, he saw very great difficulty in combining in one vessel all the requirements of a naval ship. His noble Friend talked of vessels which were to be very swift; they were not to draw much water, they were to be lightly built, and yet they were to carry very powerful guns. He would like to see his noble Friend design such a vessel. If he were to do so, he would do great service to the Navy and the country.

SIR MASSEY LOPES said, they were indebted to the noble Lord the Member for Chichester (Lord Henry Lennox) for having initiated this discussion; and it was a matter of congratulation that the Navy was no longer an arena of Party politics, and that all of them, whatever their political views, were unanimous in endeavouring to maintain the efficiency, the supremacy of our Navy. There was, undoubtedly, some uneasiness and some alarm—and he thought the debate of that evening was not calculated to allay it—with respect to the condition of our Navy at the present time, and with respect to its strength, relatively, to that of the Navies of foreign countries. It was admitted that our Navy at present was more efficient than the Navy of any other country; and he would give credit to the present Board of Admiralty for having endeavoured to maintain the efficiency of our Navy so far as the limited means at their disposal would allow. The question for them was not whether our Navy was more efficient than it ever was, but whether our Navy bore a more favourable comparison with the Navies of other countries than it did some 10 or 20 years ago. That was the crucial question for them to consider. There was no doubt that the Navies of other countries, more especially that of France and Italy, had been vastly developed of late years. He believed our Navy was absolutely superior to that of France; at present there was no question about that. But then, in order to make a fair comparison, they had to compare relatively the duties of the respective Navies. The duties and responsibilities of our Navy were vastly greater than those of France. In the first place, we had a great length of coast to protect; we had an enormous trade and commerce—he believed double the trade of that of all the rest of the world; we had our numerous Colonies, and, as had already been stated during the debate, we were really dependent for our daily bread upon the regular arrival of ships in this country from abroad. Now, when they considered such enormous responsibilities he thought our Navy did not compare favourably with that of France. There was no doubt of this—that both France and Italy were at present contending for that naval supremacy which for so many years we had maintained. We had far greater interests at stake. It was necessary to our national existence. It made our Colonies, it created our commerce. We could never risk the loss of that naval supremacy. If we lost an engagement on land we could recover our prestige; but if we once met with a naval disaster we should sustain a loss which would be irreparable. If that were so it would never do to risk the loss of our naval supremacy; if we did lose that supremacy we should lose our position amongst foreign countries; we should risk the relinquishment of our Colonies and the annihilation of our commerce. He had in his hand a statement of the Navy Estimates for the last few years. They were asked this year for a Vote of £10,484,000. The apparent decrease in last year's Estimates was £462,000; but the actual decrease was £221,000. The Admiralty took credit for the extra receipts, amounting to £240,000. That was a great novelty. The extra receipts were for old stores, ships, &c.; they were formerly paid into the Exchequer, and now they were to be treated as Appropriations in Aid of Parliamentary grants. He was not sure that that was a good arrangement; but it certainly did enable the present Admiralty to submit to the Committee reduced Estimates. He had no doubt that if they were in power two or three years they would leave very few old ships and stores for the benefit of their successors. If they were going to take the benefit of the extra receipts they ought to have expended them as extraordinary expenditure. Few people were aware of what a comparatively small sum was expended out of the whole Navy Vote upon our Effective Services. Out of the £10,484,000 they had to deduct £2,070,000 for the Non-Effective purposes. They therefore only voted £8,414,000 for the Navy proper. Then they had to deduct the cost of transport, which was £120,000, so that only allowed an Expenditure on the Effective Services of £8,294,000. His hon. Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty (Mr. Trevelyan) took credit to himself for making a great many improvements, and yet for not materially increasing the Vote. Of course, that was very creditable to a certain extent. It was the hon. Gentleman's desire to make both ends meet and balance his accounts; but he (Sir Massey Lopes) did not think they should deal with the Navy in that commercial sort of way. They must first of all secure efficiency, and if they could combine that with economy so much the better. But it would not do to risk our naval supremacy if it was only a question of his hon. Friend asking them for a larger Vote. We were expending now upon our Navy considerably less than we expended 20 years ago. He had in his hand an account of the Expenditure of the Navy for the last 20 years; and, notwithstanding the costly improvements which had been made during that time, he found we were spending less money than we did at that period. Let them compare the Expenditure in the year 1860-1 with the years 1870-1 and 1880-1; and he could not go beyond that, because, as his hon. Friend knew, the Audit of the Naval Accounts had not yet been furnished for a later year. He would only deal with the Effective and Non-Effective Votes, because, in making the comparison, he had excluded all extraordinary expenditure. He found that in 1860-1 we expended a total of £12,029,000; in the year 1870-1 we only expended a total of £9,670,000; in the year 1880-1

Sir Massey Lopes

we expended a total of £10,115,000. Now, he found that the Effective Vote in 1860-1 was £10,736,000, and in 1870-1 it was £7,957,000; but he need not remind the House that it was during that year that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) was in Office, and that was the lowest Naval Expenditure we ever had. At that time we had only 12,000 men in the Dockyards, instead of 16,000 as at present. He found that the difference between the Effective Vote of 1860-1 and that of 1880-1 was as much as £1,680,000, and that we had got an increase in our Non-Effective Vote in the 20 years of £766,000, which really amounted to the cost of one of our largest iron clads—the Inflexible, for instance. It was scarcely credible that in 1880-1 we were only spending £100 more in our Effective Vote than we did in 1870-1—the year of our lowest Naval Expenditure. One thing was quite certain—that if we were to put our Navy in the same relative position in which it was some 10 or 20 years ago we should be obliged to spend more money. There was no doubt, as has been stated, that the cost of maintaining the Navy had a great tendency to increase; but then they must bear in mind that our wealth and our population were increasing in a corresponding degree. He thought that if there was any probability of France, or any other country, competing with us for naval supremacy, he was quite certain that his hon. Friend (Mr. Trevelyan) would make application to the House of Commons and the country for a large Vote; it would be cheerfully given. He would like to say a word with reference to our guns. He was always under the impression that the weak point of our Navy was our guns. He was glad to hear his hon. Friend convey a somewhat different impression. He was certainly under the impression that France, in the matter of guns, was in a better position than England; and they had the authority of Sir William Armstrong—one of the greatest authorities on such a subject—that, weight for weight, the naval ordnance of the French was superior to that of this country. He was glad to hear a remark in reference to the system of the Navy going to the Army for its guns. The system of making the Admiralty dependent on the War Office for guns was most anomalous and unbusinesslike.

nesslike. Other countries like Russia, the United States, and France, had their own naval ordnance manufactories; while Germany, Austria, and Italy went to private firms. He did not see why the English Navy could not do the same; the Navy could not order a gun without the intervention of the War Office—it had no control, and, therefore, no responsibility. It ought to be in a position to give occasional orders to private firms, just as it did in the case of the building of ships. If we did not make some real effort to increase our Navy we should find that of France, if not superior, at any rate equal to it. Any Government would incur enormous responsibility if it ever allowed France, or any other country, to be in such a position as to be able to compete with us for naval supremacy.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, he was so perfectly satisfied with the discussion that had taken place that he begged leave to withdraw his Motion, and to thank the House for the attention it had given to the subject.

Question put, and agreed to.

Motion, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," by leave, withdrawn.

Committee deferred till To-morrow.

MOTIONS.

WATER PROVISIONAL ORDERS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. ASHLEY, Bill for confirming certain Provisional Orders made by the Board of Trade under "The Gas and Waterworks Facilities Act, 1870," relating to Calne Water, Cromer Water, Denbigh Water, and Kenilworth Water, ordered to be brought in by Mr. ASHLEY and Mr. CHAMBERLAIN.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 135.]

GAS PROVISIONAL ORDERS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. ASHLEY, Bill for confirming certain Provisional Orders made by the Board of Trade under "The Gas and Waterworks Facilities Act, 1870," relating to Brecon Gas, High Wycombe Gas, Kettering Gas, Portsea Gas, Redditch Gas, Salisbury Gas, and Sheffield Gas, ordered to be brought in by Mr. ASHLEY and Mr. CHAMBERLAIN.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 136.]

TURNPIKE ACTS CONTINUANCE ACT, 1881, COMMITTEE.

Ordered, That it be a further Instruction to the Committee to take into consideration the several Acts relating to the Shrewsbury and Holyhead Turnpike Road, and to report to the House whether such Acts should be scheduled in the annual Turnpike Continuance Bill of the present year with a view to the repeal of the said Acts after a stated date.—(Mr. Hibbert.)

CANALS.

Select Committee appointed, "to inquire into the condition and the position of the Canals and internal navigation of the Country, to report thereupon, and to make such recommendations as may appear necessary."—(Mr. Salt.)

House adjourned at One o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, 21st April, 1882.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Stolen Goods (64); Army (Annual) * (65). Second Reading—General Police and Improvement (Scotland) * (48); Drainage (Ireland) Provisional Order * (51). Third Reading—Duke of Albany (Establishment) * (58), and passed. Royal Assent—Duke of Albany (Establishment) [45 Vict. c. 5].

STOLEN GOODS BILL.

BILL PRESENTED. FIRST READING.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving the first reading of a Bill to amend the law respecting the recovery of Stolen Articles, said, it was the same Bill as that which was proceeded with last Session up to a certain stage; and he proposed, when it reached the same stage, to move the re-appointment of a Select Committee to which it should be referred.

Bill to amend the Law respecting the recovery of Stolen Articles—Presented (The LORD CHANCELLOR); read 1^a; to be printed. (No. 64.)

CRIMINAL LAW — THE CONDEMNED CONVICT LAMSON.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN, who had the following Notice on the Paper:—To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether there is any existing precedent of a Foreign Government having interfered to arrest a judgment pronounced on a British subject by an English court of justice for a crime committed in England of which he had been found guilty by a regularly constituted jury; and, if not, whether the Secretary of State will inform the House what are the reasons which have induced Her Majesty's Government to accede to such an interference on the part of the President of the United States in the case of the convict Lamson, said, that before he put the Question he would like to make one or two observations upon the subject. He did so with some diffidence, as it was the first time he had addressed their Lordships. The case of the convict Lamson, and the facts relating to it, were of such recent occurrence that it would be fresh in the minds of their Lordships. After a long and patient trial the prisoner was convicted on the clearest evidence of a foul and deliberate murder of a poor little boy, his own relative.

EARL GRANVILLE, entering the House at this stage, apologized for interrupting the noble Lord, but said he had not heard his Notice given on the previous night, and suggested that the Question should be postponed until Monday, when he hoped to be in a position to give fuller information on the subject than he was prepared to do at present.

[Question postponed.]

House adjourned at half past Four o'clock, to Monday next, a quarter before Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 21st April, 1882.

MINUTES.]—SUPPLY—considered in Committee
—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES, Class I.—PUBLIC WORKS AND BUILDINGS.

PRIVATE BILL (by Order)—Second Reading—
Walton Vicarage.

PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—First Reading—Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Order *
[138].

Second Reading—Artillery Ranges * [125].

Committee—Municipal Corporations (re-comm.)
[113], deferred.

The Earl of Milltown

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

WALTON VICARAGE BILL (by Order.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That the Bill be now read a second time.”—(Sir Charles Forster.)

MR. CAINE, in moving that the Bill be read a second time on that day six months, said, he would explain as briefly as possible the reasons which induced him to move the Amendment. The Bill dealt with the Vicarage of the parish of Walton-on-the-Hill, in the neighbourhood of Liverpool. The population of the Vicarage and Rectory of Walton was 18,872. In 1871 it was only 6,459, so that the population of the district had trebled during the last 10 years. According to Crockford's Ecclesiastical Directory, the Vicarage was worth £2,100 a-year, and the Rectory £1,000, making a total income together of £3,100 a-year available for the payment of the clergy of the district of the parish of Walton. But he wished to point out to the House that although the population of the parish had so greatly increased from 6,000 to 18,000, there had been no increase whatever in the Church accommodation of the parish during the last 10 years. The present Bill proposed that the Trustees of the Liverpool Bishopric Endowment Fund should be authorized to apply a portion of the fund to the purchase of the advowson of the Vicarage, and also to the benefit of the spiritual interests of the parish. The sum which it was proposed to take from the Liverpool Bishopric Endowment Fund for this purpose was £30,000. The Bishoprics Act of 1878 authorized the foundation of a Bishopric of Liverpool, and directed the Ecclesiastical Commissioners of England to receive all contributions made by the public for the purposes of the endowment of the Bishopric, and to carry the amount of such contributions to a fund to be called the Endowment Fund of the Bishopric. The same Act enacted that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners should provide out of the Liverpool Bishopric Fund a net annual income for the Bishop not exceeding £4,200 a-year; and the surplus, if any, was to be applied to the benefit of the spiritual wants of the inhabitants of the parish of Walton. He quite admitted the need of money for the latter purpose, because the present church accommodation of Walton only provided for about 10 per cent of the population; and the Bishop of Liverpool himself, in a charge which he recently delivered in the diocese, stated that it was necessary that 12 new churches should be built in the diocese, and four of them were to be situated within the parish of Walton. The question which would naturally arise, under these circumstances, was, how much money would be available for the spiritual needs of the parishioners of Walton under this Bill? According to the authority of Canon Hume, the present income of the Bishopric amounted to the sum of £3,200 a-year. At some distant period, dependent upon the life of the present Bishop of Chester, a sum of £300 a-year would be added to the income of the See, making altogether £3,500 a-year; but from that was to be deducted the interest upon the purchase money of the advowson—£30,000 at 4 per cent, or £1,200 a-year. Deducting that sum from the Bishopric of Liverpool, outside the Vicarage of Walton only £2,300 a-year would be available for the income of the Bishop; and, therefore, to provide a net annual income of £4,200—the amount proposed by the Bishoprics Act as the maximum amount of the Bishop's stipend—it was clear that £1,900 would have to be taken from the income of the Vicarage of Walton. The income of that Vicarage was stated in The Church Directory to be £2,800 a-year; but he was told by one of the promoters of the Bill that its present value was only £1,500 a-year, and he was unable to say how the figure of £2,800 was arrived at. Perhaps the matter would be explained presently. He was told by the same authority that five years hence—in 1887—the value of the Vicarage would be £2,900 a-year, owing to—

Message to attend the Lords Commissioners;—

The House went;—and being returned;—

Mr. Speaker reported the Royal Assent to two Bills.

WALTON VICARAGE BILL.

Question again proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. CAINE resuming, said, he had been explaining to the House before the interruption took place that, under the present Bill, it was proposed that the Trustees of the Liverpool Bishopric Fund should purchase the advowson of the Vicarage of the parish of Walton for the sum of £30,000; and he was pointing out the sources from which it was proposed to raise from the Vicarage the income of the Bishop of Liverpool to the sum of £4,200 a-year, and to devote any surplus to the spiritual wants of the parish of Walton. He had also endeavoured to show that if the spiritual wants of the parish were to depend upon this surplus, the spiritual wants of the parish of Walton would come off very badly indeed. The present income of the Bishopric was £3,200, and there would hereafter be a permanent addition of £300 a-year. The money raised as an Endowment Fund was at present invested in Liverpool Dock Bonds for 50 years, at 4 per cent; but from that amount must be deducted the sum of £1,200 a-year, being the interest upon the proposed purchase money of the Vicarage of Walton at 4 per cent. This would leave the income of the Bishopric outside the parish of Walton at £2,300 a-year, and to make up that sum to a total of £4,200 a-year it was clear that £1,900 a-year must be taken from the income of the Vicarage of Walton. That income, on the authority of one of the chief promoters of the Bill, was, at the present moment, only £1,500 a-year; but, in 1887, it would reach £2,900, owing to certain building leases beginning to pay. But the House would see that, for the next five years, the income would actually fall short of the income considered necessary for the Bishopric by the sum of £400 a-year; and seeing that, even after that date, two-thirds of the income were to be given to the Bishop and only one-third to the spiritual wants of the parish of Walton, it certainly did seem that this was simply a scheme to save the pockets of the rich parishioners of Walton and Liverpool by robbing the poor of what ought to be devoted to their spiritual requirements. He also objected to the Bill because it proposed to intrust the Ecclesiastical Commissioners with functions which Parliament never intended them to perform—namely, the sanctioning of traffick- ing in Church livings, in the first in- stance, and the commission of an act of simony in the second. He could not help reflecting how, in the palmy days of Canon Ryle, the suggestion of such a transaction would have been followed by scathing articles in The Rock newspaper. Yet the whole matter appeared to have received the approval of Bishop Ryle, of Liverpool. The object of the present Bill was to deprive the parishioners of some £2,000 a-year, without an attempt being made, as far as he knew, to con- sult their wishes and feelings on this important subject. If for no other rea- son than this, he thought the second reading of the Bill ought to be post- poned until next Session. It might be quite possible that the co-existence of a Vicar and a Rector in this parish was desirable. He did not profess to under- stand questions of ecclesiastical policy, and, therefore, he would express no opi- nion upon that matter; but why, when the Bishop of Liverpool was already in the enjoyment of an income of £3,200 a-year, with a retrospective income of £3,500 a-year, besides a residence worth £500 a-year, the income hitherto devoted to the maintenance of the clergy and to meeting those wants, the neglect of which had hitherto been so deeply deplored by the very Bishop who now proposed to annex these funds for his own use, he was at a loss to understand. He hoped the House would refuse to give a second reading to the Bill, if only for the pur- pose of enabling zealous Churchmen to bring in a better Bill, dealing with the parish of Walton as the parish of Roch- dale was dealt with some time ago, and to devote the whole of the funds of the Vicarage to the provision of those churches which the Bishop of Liverpool declared to be so greatly needed in the parish of Walton. Such a proposition would certainly receive his hearty sup- port. He had no doubt that the owner of the advowson would be as willing to sell for this better purpose as for the ecclesiastical job which the present Bill proposed to perpetrate. If not, and it was still found desirable to purchase the advowson of the Vicarage, let the income derived from the purchase go towards the reduction of the rates of the City of Liverpool, which city, he believed, once formed part of the parish of Walton-on-the-Hill, and from which a large sum of money was now annually taken for the purpose of maintaining Corporation churches up and down Liver- pool in districts from which the popula- tion had long since been withdrawn. In his opinion, this Bill ought never to have been brought in as a Private Bill at all; and he regretted to say that it appeared to be only too easy to smuggle Private Bills through the House, un- known to anybody except the officers of the House and one or two individual Members. He should have thought that any measure so deeply affecting the Na- tional Church would have been of in- terest, not only to every Member of the House, but to the public generally. Bills which proposed to job away a large sum of public money ought to be dealt with by the whole House, and not by the hole- and-corner method of a Private Bill. He thought the time had arrived when something should be done to secure that copies of all Private Bills should be de- livered to Members with the ordinary Votes of the day, so that all of them might know what proposals they con- tained. He begged now to move, as an Amendment to the second reading of the Bill, that it be read a second time on that day six months.

Mr. Caine

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words, "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Caine.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. ILLINGWORTH said, he quite agreed with his hon. Friend the Member for Scarborough (Mr. Caine) that it was a somewhat strange proceeding that a proposal of this character should be brought before the House in the guise of a Private Bill. It was a Bill which dealt not only with the property of a National Institution, but with a subject which, in the judgment of all of them, was of infinitely higher importance—namely, the suppression of a sacred office in the National Church. It appeared that in the case of the parish of Walton there was a Rectory and a Vicarage, and the minds of some people there might be a little inconvenience in a possible clashing of authority, although there was no evidence that hitherto that had been the case, or that any difficulties had arisen between the Rector and the Vicar. But supposing that it was the case, or supposing that there was some infinitely weightier reason than a possible collision between the Rector and the Vicar, then he submitted to the House that in this, as in a number of other cases of the same character where the ecclesiastical functions had grown too large, there ought to be a subdivision of the district for spiritual purposes, and that separate jurisdiction should be given to these different ecclesiastical personages so as to prevent the possibility of a collision or clashing of duties hereafter. He thought the House would be acting wisely in rejecting the second reading of the Bill on this ground alone, seeing that it was dealing with the National Church and with a large national property. [Mr. WARTON: No! and other hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear!] He was delighted at the interruption, or that any doubt should be thrown upon the question whether the Institution they were discussing was a National Church, because he would infinitely prefer that there should be declared ignorance rather than concealed ignorance upon the question. No doubt, it was an interesting question whether the Established Church was a National Institution or not. He could only imagine that the hon. and learned Member opposite (Mr. Warton) foresaw that there might be great inconvenience in making the admission, or he would not have ventured to interrupt him (Mr. Illingworth) by challenging his assertion that the Established Church of the country was as much a National Institution as the Army and Navy, because, if there were substantial grounds for saying that that was not the case, he (Mr. Illingworth) thought that Parliament and the country itself would very soon ask another and a very pertinent question—namely, why the affairs of one sect in the country were to be obtruded so persistently upon Parliament, instead of being settled out-of-doors like those of any other religious denomination. He held that the main distinction between a National Church and other religious Bodies was that the affairs of the latter were settled outside the walls of Parliament, while the affairs of a National Church were with propriety brought before Parliament, and settled nowhere else. He therefore ventured to think that, whatever might be the legal form suggested by this procedure, there were very strong objections to dealing with the property and the affairs of a National Church in the form of a Private Bill. Before going further, he wished to ask this simple question—If it were justifiable, as an arrangement fitting to be arrived at by means of a Private Bill, to suppress a Vicarage for the care of souls, why might they not have a process for disestablishing and disendowing one-half of the parishes of the country by means of thousands of Private Bills? If it were proper and fitting that such a measure should be introduced in the one case, he certainly knew of no reason why the same process should not be carried out in all. If the Rector was willing to sell the living in one case, why should not other persons similarly situated dispose of their livings? The circumstances in the present case were somewhat curious. The Rector was the patron of the Vicarage of Walton, and he was the individual who was going to pocket this £28,000 or £30,000—certainly, a very anomalous transaction in connection with a Private Bill. He had no doubt there were many other patrons who would be very willing to sell the property they possessed upon similar terms—and without much regard to the danger of the suppression of the care of souls in the district where the transaction took place, seeing that no provision was made for supplying another living in the place of the one disposed of. What he desired now was to point out to the House, and through the House to the country, the danger there was, in a transaction of this very doubtful character, of suppressing altogether a public office for the cure of souls by means of a Private Bill, and through an arrangement between the patron and those who desired to obtain a benefit from the transaction. He hoped, before the debate was brought to a close, to find some hon. Member take part in it who was acknowledged by the House to be, in some sense, a special guardian of the interests and reputation of the National Church; and he was anxious to know whether any such hon. Member was prepared to come forward and justify this system of the sale of Church patronage, and of associating with it a dignitary of the highest character in the National Church? If it was justifiable in one case that the patronage should be sold, then he wanted to know what justification there could be for the Bill of the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Stanhope), by which the hon. Gentleman proposed to interfere with this system of the sale of patronage? He was aware that there had been Committees and Commissions, which had reported upon the evils to the National Church, and upon the mischief to religion generally, which arose from this mode of trafficking in sacred offices. They need not wonder at what took place among men who had no other object in view than finding investments for their money, when they found Rectors and Bishops of the Church of England indulging in this traffic themselves—or, at any rate, countenancing it. They had seen in that House during the present Session considerable anxiety shown lest the House should do some injury to religion by the admission of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh). He appealed to those hon. Gentlemen, who were, no doubt, very sincere, or, at any rate, very zealous, in their guardianship of religion, that they should go into the Lobby with his hon. Friend the Member for Scarborough (Mr. Caine) against the second reading of this Bill; for he ventured to say that if the matter now before the House were to become as well known throughout the country as the celebrated case of the hon. Member for Northampton, infinitely greater injury would be done to religion and to the Established Church of the country than anything that would be done by the introduction of half-a-dozen Mr. Bradlaughs into the House. There were some incidents about this matter that he thought the House would probably like to have the details of. How was it that now-a-days ecclesiastical property could be brought so openly into the financial market that even so large a sum as £30,000 was ready to be given for it? He thought it was to be explained by the fact that the present Vicar was 85 years of age, and that, therefore, the Bishop of Liverpool would not be called upon to wait very long before he came into possession of any pecuniary advantage which the transaction might confer upon him. He was not there to say whether or not in regard to a Bishop it was necessary that he should live in a Palace; but he was willing to admit that if he did live in a Palace he must have a Princely income. No doubt there was, in the minds of Churchmen a feeling that a Bishop should take his station among the wealthiest and the highest in the land. But when the Bishopric of Liverpool was established the public were given to understand that zealous and wealthy Episcopalian were going to provide the funds, and that there was not likely to be brought before the House of Commons a transaction of such a shameful character as the one they were now engaged in discussing, in order that the pockets of the wealthy West Lancashire gentry might not be further drawn on. As he understood the matter, the maximum sum fixed for the income of the Bishop of Liverpool was £4,200 a-year. Why, then, were they flagging in their energies in providing the stipulated amount? Had they a pastor who was not deserving of their confidence? That could scarcely be the case, for they all knew that Canon Ryle was a sincere, a zealous, and a very able Churchman; and, further, that, on becoming Bishop of Liverpool, he placed himself literally among the people there in the confidence that they would do complete justice to him. The question now was, were they going to fail the Bishop of Liverpool? Were they going to ask the House to be parties to so gross a transaction as the buying of a living and the suppression of a cure of souls? It had already been shown by his hon. Friend the Member for Scarborough (Mr. Caine) that there was already a largely-increasing population in the parish of Walton, for which no other ecclesiastical provision was made. Under these circumstances, he (Mr. Illingworth) appealed with confidence to the House to reject the Bill. He was satisfied that if the House refused to read the Bill a second time, the vast majority of the people of this country—not only those connected with the Established Church, but those without help—would commend the course which the House would take.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS: I am quite sure that the hon. Member who has just sat down has really not studied this question, and that he cannot be at all aware of the wants of the particular locality of which he has been speaking. We are extremely grateful to him, as a Nonconformist Member of this House, for the interest he apparently takes in the welfare of the Established Church. ["Hear, hear!" and a laugh.] I say that quite sincerely, although probably there are some hon. Gentlemen who do not echo the sentiment. There are, however, a great number of persons who do take a very sincere interest in the welfare of this parish, who have gone very closely into the question, and who know the "ins" and "outs" of the whole matter; and they, having the best means of judging, have come to a distinctly opposite conclusion to that at which the hon. Member has arrived. I must say I think their opinion is entitled to very considerable weight. The hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Illingworth) seems to have forgotten a very important circumstance in the case. It is quite true that there is a Rector of Walton, and a Vicar of Walton, and the Vicarage of Walton and the Advowson of Walton belong to the Vicar, and nobody can interfere with his right to them. If the Vicar and his family choose to keep the Vicarage in perpetuity they can do so, and he cannot be called upon to perform any further duties than he has hitherto performed; nor can he be called upon to sell the advowson, nor to divide the two livings for the benefit of the parish of Walton, as the hon. Member seems to think would be the case in the event of a vacancy arising. Therefore, it is altogether out of the power of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners or of Parliament to make any alteration in the state of things which now exists. In the parish of Walton there is a Rector with a very considerable income, and if this Bill passes that income will be increased, because certain fees will be handed over to him. The Vicarage is to be sold, and part of the proceeds are to be devoted to the benefit of the Rector. Therefore, the position of the Rector will be improved by the sale, and, with the improvement of the position of the Rector, so also will his power to provide for the spiritual wants of the parish be increased. I now come to the question, what is to be done with the Vicarage? It happens that those persons who have looked into the matter have been able to make an arrangement with the Vicar under which he is willing to sell the advowson of the Vicarage for a certain amount of money—I believe £28,000.

Mr. Illingworth

MR. ILLINGWORTH: Is it not the Rector who is the patron, and not the Vicar?

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS: Yes; the Rector is the patron, and he is willing to sell the avowson of the Vicarage for the sum, I believe, of £28,000. Then, what is to be done with the proceeds of the sale of this living? Where is the money to come from? The hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Illingworth) seems to think that by this proceeding we shall save the pockets of the rich men of Lancashire. We shall do nothing of the kind. The men of Lancashire have established the Bishopric of Liverpool under the sanction of an Act of Parliament. They have subscribed a certain income. But the Act says that the Bishop may have a larger income, up to £4,200 a-year. What is now proposed by this Bill is to give part of the money subscribed for this purpose to the purchase of the advowson of the Vicarage of Walton, and so to apply the income of the advowson as to be able, out of the proceeds of the purchase, to raise the income of the Bishopric of Liverpool to the full extent of the £4,200 a-year provided by the Act, and which is in no way too large a sum, considering the enormous calls the Bishop will have upon him in such a diocese. Moreover, in a short time the provisions of the Bill will enable more than £1,000 a-year to be available for the benefit of the parish of Walton, in such a manner as the Ecclesiastical Commissioners may think fit. Not only will the See of Liverpool be greatly improved and increased in value, but the parish of Walton itself will derive an advantage which, under the existing arrangements, it is impossible for it to obtain so long as this Vicarage is not sold. I have no wish to take up the time of the House by making any lengthened statement of my own, and I have stated the facts of the case as shortly as I can. It must be remembered that in the present state of things you cannot compel the sale of the Vicarage at all. You must either leave things to remain as they are, or else carry out this arrangement. I believe I have shown that the proposed arrangement will be beneficial, not only to the See of Liverpool, but eventually to the interests of the inhabitants of the parish of Walton themselves. The hon. Member for Scarborough (Mr. Caine) confesses that he knows nothing about the circumstances of the case. It so happens that the Bill has been advertised in all the local papers and elsewhere, and it is a remarkable fact that not a single Petition has been presented by an inhabitant of Walton against the passing of the measure. Surely, the local people are those best able to form an opinion as to the merits of a Bill of this character. It is not, as the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Illingworth) described, a Bill for the suppression of a living. There will always be a living in the parish of Walton. The Rectory will remain; and the passing of this Bill will, as I have already said, not only benefit the See of Liverpool, but it will make more adequate provision for the wants of the parish of Walton.

MR. ILLINGWORTH asked how, if the Vicarage was got rid of, it could be said that a living for the cure of souls had not been suppressed?

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS: The Rector has the same cure of souls as the Vicar; both livings are enjoyed by the same person, and the Rector will still remain.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR: Some of my hon. Friends have raised an objection to this Bill, which I think ought to be clearly explained to the House. They say they consider that a Bill of this character ought to have been a Public and not a Private Bill. Now, I think that this is a mistake on their parts, and that it would not have been possible to bring it in as a Public Bill. It deals with an advowson which has a beneficial value. The advowson belongs to the Rector, and it is vested in him. This Bill, therefore, is practically an Estate Bill, and as an Estate Bill it must be brought before both Houses of Parliament in the form of a Private Bill. Some confusion did exist in my own mind in regard to the effect of the Bill, until I made an inquiry both from the promoters and from the opponents as to the circumstances of the case. I find that there is no suppression of the cure of souls at all. There is only a single church in which there is a co-ordinate Vicar and a Rector, and each of them has the same charge of the cure of souls in the district church to which they are attached. The church is not to be suppressed by this Bill; but it will be continued with a much larger sum available for its support, so that the Rector can employ more curates to discharge the duties connected with the church. Without this Estate Bill there would be no surplus funds for the promotion of ecclesiastical purposes in the parish; but under the provisions of this measure there will be about £1,000 a-year available for the extension of church accommodation and the appointment of additional curates within the district. It is as I have said, simply an Estate Bill which takes a sum of £28,000 out of the subscriptions now invested at 3½ per cent, and invests the same £28,000 in an estate which will pay 5½ per cent. I have looked into the matter very carefully. I believe that the measure has been properly introduced as a Private Bill, and, as it is quite regular in form, I think the second reading ought to receive the support of the House.

MR. ILLINGWORTH asked if the right hon. Gentleman the Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Lyon Playfair) would explain whether the Bill did not sanction the suppression of a living and the sale of the income to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, for the purposes of the Bishopric of Liverpool Endowment Fund?

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR: I have already explained that the Bill does not in reality suppress any church.

MR. CROPPER wished to say one word in regard to the statement which had been made by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir R. Assheton Cross). There appeared to him (Mr. Cropper) to be a mistake in regard to the whole of the matter. The hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Illingworth) seemed to think that there was an endeavour on the part of the promoters of the Bill to do something unfair, and something that was antagonistic to the ordinary course of procedure in regard to Church livings. But the statement of the right hon. Gentleman put the matter quite plain. If this sum of £28,000 was not expended in the way proposed, the living might be simply sold in the open market, and neither the See of Liverpool nor the parish of Walton would derive any advantage from it whatever. The whole case simply resolved itself into a matter whereby a large and valuable living would be divided without the slightest harm to anybody, and to the general advantage. He disliked the sale of Church patronage as much as anybody; but he certainly felt inclined to regard this as an exceptional case. At any rate, it would prevent the recurrence of the scandal which, in many men's eyes, was attached to the sale of livings, as this advowson could now never again come into the market. Instead of the proposed arrangement being, as the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Illingworth) said, a disgrace to the City of Liverpool, he thought it would be of great advantage to Liverpool, and to the parish of Walton also. He should, therefore, give his vote in favour of the second reading of the Bill.

Sir R. Assheton Cross

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 160; Noes 76; Majority 84.—(Div. List, No. 67.)

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed.

QUESTIONS.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MR. J. O'KEANE AND OTHERS.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to a paragraph in the "Connaught Telegraph" of the 8th instant, stating that a warrant issued fourteen months ago, for the arrest of Mr. John O'Keane, of Claremorris, has been cancelled, Mr. O'Keane having meanwhile resided in England; if it is correct that a warrant was issued against Mr. O'Keane as stated; and, if so, upon what grounds; whether it has been cancelled; if so, why, and by what means, and through what channel, this fact was conveyed to Mr. O'Keane; whether it is the fact that a warrant was issued about the same time for the arrest of Mr. P. W. Nally, of Balla; if so, upon what grounds; whether Mr. Nally also went to reside out of Ireland; whether this warrant has been recently cancelled, and upon what grounds; and, whether Mr. Nally has now returned to Ireland; if so, through what channel the fact that he might return with safety was communicated to him?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, in each of the cases referred to warrants had been issued and were still in force. In each case an intimation was conveyed to the individual that his return to Ireland would not be interfered with provided he conducted himself. In the case of Mr. Keane it was represented that he was in bad health and had been recommended to try his native air; while in Mr. Nally's case it was represented that his father had broken his leg.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—VISITS TO PRISONERS UNDER THE ACT.

MR. REDMOND asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he has inquired into the subject of visits to suspects; and, whether he has been able to make arrangements for increasing the facilities for such visits, especially in Kilmainham, by providing sufficient warders to enable a larger number of visits to take place simultaneously, so that the prisoners may have the full benefit of the rule which permits them to receive one visit each every day?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he had inquired into this matter, and he found that there was no ground for complaint. With regard to the other prisons in which "suspects" were detained, he found that arrangements had been made to admit of a sufficient number of visits.

MR. REDMOND inquired whether the right hon. Gentleman's attention had been called to a letter which appeared in The Freeman's Journal, signed by a number of friends of "suspects," complaining of the inconvenience they had to suffer when trying to see their friends?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he saw nothing of that letter.

POST OFFICE—TRANSMISSION OF LAND LEAGUE PORTRAITS.

MR. REDMOND asked the Postmaster General, Whether parcels containing copies of a picture entitled "The Irish Nation, 1882," with portraits of twenty-three of the leaders of the Land League movement have been interfered with by the Government in their passage through the post, and delivered in a mutilated condition; and, if so, whether he has sanctioned such interference; whether there is any difficulty in securing the safe passage through the post of roller-shaped envelopes 17½ inches in length; and, whether he will inquire into the injury done to these pictures?

MR. FAWCETT: In reply to the hon. Member, I have to state that, after making inquiries, I find that at the Post Office nothing is known of the matter to which he refers. I may add that packets of the shape described by the hon. Member, unless provided with a strong roller, would be very apt to be doubled up, and thus sustain injury in transit.

POST OFFICE—DETENTION OF LAND LEAGUE LETTERS.

MR. REDMOND asked the Postmaster General, Whether it is a fact that letters addressed to the general secretary of the Irish National Land League of Great Britain in London have been opened and detained in their passage through the post; and, whether the warrant of the Home Secretary is being used to examine letters addressed to the officers of that association?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I can only give the same reply as I have given before, that it would not be consonant with my duty to give any information upon this subject. At the same time, in giving that answer, I must also say, as I have said before, that it implies no admission in regard to any warrant issued for these purposes.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—EXPENSES OF CROWN WITNESSES.

MR. HEALY asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether it is the fact that a promise made to pay Ex-Sub-Constable Walshe's expenses has not yet been carried out; whether it is the fact that, although Dr. Michael O'Brien, now a suspect in Limerick Gaol, was obliged to attend Cork Winter Assizes for seventeen days on a Crown subpoena, Mr. Murphy, Crown Solicitor, refused to pay him anything; and, whether there is any reason for the continued detention of Dr. O'Brien?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): As to ex-Sub-Constable Walshe, there was a question whether he was to be paid out of the Law Charges Vote or under the Constabulary Regulations; this has been settled, and the account of his allowances was made out and received in the Constabulary Office last Tuesday from the County Inspector, and, having been examined, was transmitted for payment by the next post. As to Dr. O'Brien, he attended at the Cork Winter Assizes, not as Crown witness nor as medical witness, but as a witness for persons who were charged with obstructing a sheriff and other criminal offences and for the purpose of proving that they had not committed the offences of which they were accused. During the progress of the Assizes he was repeatedly in company with his friends, who were on bail, and thus he had an ample opportunity of knowing the course they intended to take. They pleaded "guilty." Dr. O'Brien, therefore, was not a necessary witness to prove that they had not committed the offences, to the committal which they pleaded guilty, and the Crown Solicitor consequently could not certify that Dr. O'Brien was a necessary witness, and for that reason had no authority to allow him any expenses. With reference to the last Question as Dr. O'Brien is still in detention, take it for granted there is good reason for it; but that is a Question to be addressed to my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—MAJOR WALLER ASHE.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is true, as reported in the "Morning Post," that "the name of Major Waller-Ashe, late King's Dragoon Guards, and late Deputy Governor of Her Majesty's General Prison for Scotland, Perth, has been placed upon the list for the appointment of resident magistrate in Ireland;"

and, if so, whether he made previous inquiry into the past life of Major Waller-Ashe?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said that there was no truth in the statement as to the appointment of Major Waller-Ashe to be a Resident Magistrate in Ireland. What had happened was this: He was informed that Major Waller-Ashe had sent in an application in the usual way, and the usual answer was made that it would be sent to the Lord Lieutenant for consideration. There had been no intention of actually appointing Major Waller-Ashe; and, therefore, no necessity of making any inquiries respecting him.

PRIVATE (HYBRID) BILLS—FORTH BRIDGE RAILWAY BILL.

Mr. BOLTON asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether it is intended to order that all Petitioners against the Forth Bridge Railway Bill, whose Petitions have been deposited, or may be deposited, within three days of the meeting of the Committee, may be heard by Counsel, Agents, and witness; and, if not, why this course, which is generally adopted in respect of Bills referred to a hybrid Committee, is not to be followed in the present case?

Mr. EVELYN ASHLEY: I intend on Monday to move for extending the period in which Petitions against the Forth Bridge Railway Bill may be lodged and the Petitioners heard, but limiting it to Petitions relating to navigation and the safety of the bridge as to construction, both of which questions the Board of Trade are anxious to have carefully inquired into, and that every opportunity may be given to people to bring their cases before the Committee. But it would be a strong measure to extend the time as the hon. Member suggests; because that would be interfering with the discretion of the Referees and the Committee as to the locus standi of Petitioners who might appear merely on grounds of competition. In 1873, when this bridge was sanctioned by Parliament, the present Bill being merely a continuation, the Referees limited the locus standi of the Caledonian Railway, excluding the ground of competition. I think my hon. Friend is in error in his view that the course he recommends is always adopted in reference to Bills referred to a Hybrid Committee. It is generally adopted in regard to Hybrid Bills; but this is not a Hybrid Bill, but a Private Bill which happens to be referred to a Hybrid Committee.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—ANDREW AND PATRICK GALLAHER.

Mr. LALOR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it be true that, on the 15th of October last, Andrew Gallaher, and his brother, Patrick Gallaher, of Ballybrittas, in the Queen's County, were arrested on a charge of having, on the previous night, fired at and wounded a number of men in the employment of the Emergency Committee, and who, at the time, were engaged in removing a threshing machine from one farmer's place to another, along the public road; if it be true that the charge against the said Andrew and Patrick Gallaher was more than once investigated in private, by the local magistrates, in the County Gaol in Maryborough; if it be true that, on the last occasion when such investigation took place, the magistrates decided to discharge the two Messrs. Gallaher, as there was no evidence to connect them with the crime; if it be true that when the two Messrs. Gallaher had proceeded so far as the gate leading from the gaol they were arrested on a warrant under the Coercion Act, charging them with a totally different offence, namely, inciting others to an act of intimidation; and, if it be true that the said Andrew and Patrick Gallaher were then and there conveyed to Naas Gaol, where they are still detained under the Lord Lieutenant's warrant?

Mr. W. E. FORSTER: Yes, Sir; the facts are, I believe, as stated in the Question.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—ARRESTS UNDER THE ACT.

Mr. LEAMY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he will state the number of arrests which have been made under the Coercion Act of last year up to the 18th day of the present month?

Mr. W. E. FORSTER: The total number of arrests up to the 18th instant is 918.

THE IRISH LAND COMMISSION—THE ASSISTANT COMMISSIONERS.

Mr. MOLLOY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he is aware that the Land Sub-Commissioners held their first sitting in Tullamore on the 23rd of January last to hear applications for fixing fair rents for that district; that since then they had not visited Tullamore, nor given any notification of their intention to do so, although very harsh cases of eviction for no more than half a-year's arrear of rent have taken place on neighbouring properties, as at Geashill, and that after notice had been given to apply for a judicial rent; and, what steps he proposes to take in this matter to prevent the Act being rendered useless in this district?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he was informed that there would be a sitting in Tullamore upon the 26th of June, and that this fact was set forth in the Circular, a copy of which could be obtained by anyone on applying to the Secretary of the Commissioners. In every case in which a notice for the fixing of a fair rent had been lodged and decided upon, if the tenant was dissatisfied with the decision, the case would be immediately sent for trial upon his application to that extent. An application for the extension of the period for redemption could also be considered.

ISLAND OF CYPRUS—GRANT OF A CONSTITUTION—THE DESPATCH.

MR. BOURKE asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the Despatch published in Cyprus, purporting to grant a Constitution to that Island, will be laid before Parliament, as well as the Correspondence relating thereto; if so, when?

MR. COURTNEY: The despatch in question will be immediately laid before Parliament, and we hope soon to present further Papers containing correspondence, not only on the Constitutional question, but also relating to the reorganization of the judicial system of the Island, which is in an advanced state of preparation.

MR. RYLANDS asked if the Papers would include one giving information with respect to the administration of the Island?

MR. COURTNEY replied, that that Paper would be among those he had referred to.

WESTERN AUSTRALIA—FREE EMIGRATION.

SIR JAMES LAWRENCE asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, If his attention has been called to the desire expressed by numbers of unemployed working men for emigration to the Colonies; whether there is an agreement still existing with Western Australia, by which this Country has undertaken to provide free passages for more than a thousand emigrants to that Colony; and, if he will consider whether the present time is opportune for carrying out such agreement?

Mr. Molloy

MR. COURTNEY: A similar Question was raised by my hon. Friend three years since and again last year, and my answer must be substantially the same as those which have been given him on former occasions. The Question whether this country is under any obligation by agreement to provide free passages for emigrants to Western Australia was fully considered in 1869 and decided in the negative.

SIR JAMES LAWRENCE gave Notice that he should move for a Return giving the Correspondence.

INDIA—ROORKEE COLLEGE.

MR. PUGH asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether he can inform the House of the number of student who have entered the Civil Engineering College at Roorkee for the last three years, and the number of appointment made to the Indian Public Works Department from the College during the same period?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON in reply, said, he was sorry he could not give the information without telegraphing to India. A certain number of appointments were reserved, and he could not state how they had been filled up.

OFFICIAL APPOINTMENTS—MR. R. S. MITFORD.

CAPTAIN PRICE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department Whether it is true that he has appointed his private secretary, Mr. R. S. Mitford, a Commissioner of Prisons what is Mr. Mitford's age and length of public service; and, what experience has he had in the duties which he will be called upon to perform?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: It is true that I have appointed my private secretary, Mr. R. S. Mitford, a Commissioner of Prisons. I cannot say what is his age; but I am afraid it is one which I might envy. As to the length of his public service, he was 14 years in the Criminal Department of the Home Office. My first acquaintance with Mr. Mitford was when I took Office. I found him there the able and tried private secretary of my Predecessor (Sir

R. Assheton Cross); and I think the greatest proof I could offer of my confidence in him was that I appointed him my chief private secretary. He had been private secretary to four successive Home Secretaries, which everyone who has been in Office knows is about the best training a man can have in official business. Mr. Mitford was thoroughly conversant with the Criminal Department of the Home Office; and the whole business of the Department, since the present system has been established by my Predecessor, has come under his notice and knowledge. I appointed Mr. Mitford because I thought he was entitled to promotion, and in doing so I made the greatest personal sacrifice. I believe the right hon. Gentleman opposite and everyone who knows the Home Office, and who may have transacted business with Mr. Mitford, will bear testimony to his great capacity, and the admirable manner in which he discharged his duties.

CAPTAIN PRICE: In consequence of the answer of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, I beg to give Notice that I shall ask on Monday whether there are not in Her Majesty's Service other officers—namely, the Inspectors of Prisons—who are equally conversant with the Prison Service, and equally deserving of promotion?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I think I had better say at once that I have felt, without casting any reflection on anyone, that it is not desirable that the prison organization of this country should be made exclusively a military organization. I have the greatest respect for, and confidence in, the military men at present in the Prison Service; but I consider it of very great importance that the prison organization of the country should have a civilian as well as a military element.

MR. HEALY: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman recommend the Irish Office to appoint the Resident Magistrates in Ireland on the same principles?

[No answer was given.]

ARMY—THE ROYAL WARRANT, 1881.

CAPTAIN AYLMER asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether an officer who held the substantive rank of Major before 1st November 1871, but who had not been a Regimental Major, is excluded from the benefit of Article 978—XII. of the Royal Warrant of the 25th June 1881; and, if so, whether such Article is not, in that respect, entirely different from paragraph 80 of the Memorandum laid before Parliament in June 1881?

MR CHILDERS: No, Sir; I have looked into the point raised by the hon. and gallant Gentleman, and I cannot see any difference in this respect between the Memorandum and the Warrant. Any Colonel retiring under the Warrant who was a substantive field officer before the 1st of November, 1871, can have his case dealt with by the Purchase Commissioners under the clause which the hon. and gallant Member quotes.

ARMY—PAYMENT OF PENSIONS.

MR. STEWART MACLIVER asked the Secretary of State for War, If he is aware that the pensioners at Plymouth and Devonport, whose money should have been paid three weeks ago, are still unpaid, thereby causing much inconvenience and suffering; and, whether he will at once take steps to meet the complaints of the pensioners and provide in future for paying them regularly?

MR. CHILDERS: In reply to my hon. Friend, I can only say that the delay which has occurred in paying the pensioners at Plymouth has led to an officer being specially sent down to inquire into its cause, and to expedite the payments. The paying officers had full authority to obtain whatever clerical assistance they might require in starting the new system, and I cannot account for the small number of payments at this station.

LAW AND POLICE—THE RIOTS AT CAMBORNE.

MR. LEAMY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is true, as reported in the "Cornish Telegraph" of Thursday 20th instant, that, on Tuesday last, a riot occurred at Camborne, Cornwall, which began in an attempt to stone two Irishmen who were in the custody of the police; that the houses of the Irish in the town were wrecked, and the property in them destroyed and several of their occupants brutally ill-used, that, in one case, a poor old woman who had been bed-ridden for a couple of years was pulled from her bed and left writhing in agony on the floor; that an attack was made on the Catholic Chapel, and that,—

“First the windows were smashed in, then, after repeated efforts, the doors were forced. Inside, the rioters lost all control of themselves, and did most wanton damage. They broke up the crucifixes and pictures; the image of the Virgin Mary was torn from its place, thrown amongst the mob, and trampled to pieces. The confessional-box was speedily converted into fire-wood. The altar and its fittings were torn down, and the gaseliers were broken off, and the organ destroyed—the scene within the Church begging description;”

whether any of the rioters have been arrested; and, whether any steps have been taken to protect the life and property of the Irish residents in Camborne and to restore law and order in that town?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, his official knowledge—and he could not go beyond that—was furnished by a letter from the Chief Constable, in which it was stated that every precaution had been taken to prevent future disturbance and the repetition of these disgraceful scenes of riot. He had addressed to the Justices' clerk, from whom, also, he had a communication, a letter of inquiry as to whether any measures had been taken to arrest the rioters, and to punish them for the outrages they had committed. He had, of course, received no answer to that letter.

MR. LEAMY: Is the report from The Cornish Telegraph substantially correct or not?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he could not state. He had no knowledge whatever, except the letter he received yesterday, which gave no details.

MR. BELLINGHAM asked if the right hon. and learned Gentleman had any knowledge of the renewal of the rioting as reported in this evening's papers?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he had no knowledge.

MR. LEAMY said, he would repeat his Questions on Monday. If such riots occurred in Ireland they should have had all the details immediately.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—THE ASSISTANT SUB-COMMISSIONERS (KERRY AND WEST CORK).

MR. HEALY said, he had intended to ask the First Lord of the Treasury,

Mr. Leamy

Whether he is aware that the greatest local dissatisfaction exists at the decisions given by Messrs. McDevitt, Walpole, and Murphy, on the Kerry and West Cork Sub-Commission; whether it is the fact that the rents which they have fixed as fair rents are in some cases double Griffith's valuation; and, whether he proposes to take any steps to remove this dissatisfaction? Perhaps the Chief Secretary could answer the Question.

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, the Land Commissioners informed him that they had no knowledge of any special dissatisfaction. Seventy-one appeals had been lodged against the decisions of these gentlemen—39 by landlords and the balance by tenants. The Land Commissioners would sit at Killarney shortly for the purpose of hearing those appeals. It was true that the rents fixed in some cases were over Griffith's valuation, and three of those cases had been listed for appeal—two by landlords, and one by the tenant.

MR. HEALY said, that, in consequence of the answer he had received, he should call attention to the composition and decisions of the Sub-Commissioners for Kerry and West Cork, and move a Resolution.

PARLIAMENT — BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—ARRANGEMENT OF PUBLIC BUSINESS.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE asked what Business it was proposed to take at the Morning Sitting on Tuesday?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON We propose on Monday, after the Budget, to proceed with the second reading of the Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt Practices) Bill. The same Bill will be proceeded with at the Morning Sitting on Tuesday.

MR. GORST asked whether the House would give a decision to-night on the question as to whether there should be a Morning Sitting?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he should to-night formally move that the Municipal Corporations Bill should be fixed for Tuesday, for the purpose of enabling the House to come to a decision as to the question of a Morning Sitting. The Corrupt Practices Bill would, however, be proceeded with on Tuesday.

MR. HUSSEY VIVIAN: Will there be Morning Sittings every Tuesday?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Yes, Sir.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881 — MISS KIRK.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is true that Miss Kirk, sister of the ex-Member for the county of Louth, who had gone to Tulla to assist in the erection of huts for the evicted tenants, was yesterday arrested by Mr. Clifford Lloyd and sent for three months to gaol?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he had no information on the subject; the hon. Member should give Notice of his Question?

IRISH LAND COMMISSION—APPOINTMENT OF A SUB-COMMISSIONER.

MR. HEALY asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, If Mr. J. R. Hedigan, who has lately been appointed an Assistant Commissioner under the Land Act, is the same gentleman whose tenants in Tipperary are taking proceedings against him?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON), in reply, said, it was not a matter coming within his Department.

MR. HEALY said, he would ask the Question on Monday.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881 — PERSONS CLAIMING TO BE AMERICAN CITIZENS DETAINED UNDER THE ACT.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, When the Papers containing the Correspondence with the United States Government would be published? He asked the Question, seeing that the Correspondence had already been published in America.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: The Correspondence published in America is not the recent Correspondence, but Correspondence which took place some time ago. It cannot possibly be the Correspondence which is going on now. I cannot yet name a day when the Correspondence can be produced; but I may be able to do so if the Question be repeated.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY: Will all the Correspondence be included—last year's as well as the recent Correspondence?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: If Notice be given of the Question, I will look into the Correspondence of last year.

PARLIAMENT — BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—TUESDAYS—THE SETTLED LAND BILL.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS wished to say, with reference to the commencement of Tuesday Sittings, that the Settled Land Bill, which came down from the other House before Easter, had been placed in his charge, and no effort should be wanting on his part to take the decision of the House upon it. He hoped that, if the Government proposed to take all the remaining Tuesdays of the Session, they would make some arrangement by which it could be discussed.

PARLIAMENT — BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE — TUESDAYS — THE JESUS COLLEGE STATUTES.

MR. HUSSEY VIVIAN said, that he had on the Paper for Tuesday, the 2nd of May, a Motion with reference to statutes for Jesus College. They were laid on the Table of the House for three months, in order that the House might consider them. If he were precluded by a Morning Sitting being taken on the 2nd of May from bringing on the Motion he should have no opportunity of calling attention to the subject, and the House would have no opportunity of considering it, unless the Government gave up some time for the purpose. It would, therefore, be his duty to protest against the Morning Sitting.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

—o:—

SUPPLY.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

COOPER'S HILL COLLEGE.

RESOLUTION.

MR. GIBSON, in rising to call attention to Cooper's Hill College; and to move—

“That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the working and expense of Cooper's Hill College, and to report if it is desirable, for the public service, to retain the present system, or whether any and, if so, what changes and modifications should be made,”

said, it was not his desire to make any charges against the managers of the Institution; but it had been in full working order for 11 years, and that time ought to have furnished enough experience to justify the inquiry whether the system with which the College was identified was worth its cost; whether it was necessary for the Public Service; and whether there was any well-founded objection to some return to a system of public competition? It was in November, 1869, that the Duke of Argyll, who was then Secretary of State for India, determined to establish the College, and that determination was arrived at without any communication whatever with the then Government of India, or with the Institution of Civil Engineers. The system at that time in existence was inaugurated by Lord Stanley, the present Earl of Derby, who introduced free competition for the purpose of procuring Civil Engineers for the Indian Service. Before the foundation of the College the Civil Engineers were only given subordinate positions, and their pay was comparatively low. How they were treated might be inferred from a statement of Sir Andrew Clarke, who was a Member of the Governor General's Council, and who, in a Minute, dated 1877, said it was impossible to suggest that Civil Engineers had failed to satisfy the requirements of the Civil Service, because they had never been fairly tried, as they were only appointed at small pay to the position of third-grade Civil Engineers; whereas the Cooper's Hill gentlemen at once received more than double the pay of the Stanley Engineers, and were placed in a much higher grade. When the Government of India did hear of the determination of the Duke of Argyll to establish the College, they certainly did not express anything which could be construed into approval. They said they considered the success of such a College must be a matter of very great uncertainty; that it must be regarded entirely as an experiment; and that they had great doubt whether any real necessity existed for it. They felt it incumbent on them to express their strong sense of the inexpediency of adopting measures that should lead to the creation of a class of engineers for the service of India; and they believed that such an Institution would be open to condemnation if it were not conducted on a self-supporting basis. The Institution of Civil Engineers—an Institution deservedly esteemed—expressed the opinion that in the proposed College the minds of the pupils would be moulded in the same form, and that their training would develop none of the emulation, independence, and originality of resource which had produced the best engineers. It was a grave decision for the Duke of Argyll to take—to destroy the system introduced by his Predecessor, and to substitute that of Coopers' Hill College. Notwithstanding this, however, the College was established, and from 1871 it had enjoyed a practical monopoly in engineering appointments in India over all the other Engineering Institutions. It was said that in India the Civil Engineers were given the hard work to do, and that the Royal Engineers took the honours and the higher pay. But he was not going into that ground of jealousy between the two branches of the Profession. It was, he maintained, exceedingly unfair on the other Institutions, and on the Universities which had established Engineering Schools, to exclude from the possibility of serving on Indian Public Works many young men—not because they were not qualified, not because they had not a valuable engineering diploma, but because they had not happened to pass through the portals of Cooper's Hill College. From a Return which had been kindly granted, at his instance, by the noble Lord the Secretary of State for India, he gathered that in 1878 the expenditure was £20,427, and the receipts £18,254, thus showing a loss to the Exchequer of something over £2,000. If, however, they looked at the results of the following years, they would find that the loss increased, and that in 1880-1, again, an expenditure of £19,812, they only had receipts to the amount of £15,226.

or nearly double the loss of the previous year. Thus, so far from the Institution being self-supporting, as was the intention of its original promoters, it was carried on at an absolute loss to the nation; and he was not aware that this increased cost in any way meant increased efficiency, for in 1879 there were only 37 admissions, in 1880 only 25, and in 1881, under a new scheme, 39. But these figures were the more startling when it was remembered that Cooper's Hill had practically the monopoly of all the Indian appointments, with the exception of those which were given to the Royal Engineers. In 1879, 41 public appointments were conferred upon the students, though the entrances of students only amounted to 37. This showed that every young man who entered the College was perfectly sure of getting an appointment of more or less value. This was borne out by the figures in the following years. In 1880 there were 25 entrances, and 38 appointments were given. In 1881 there were 39 entrances, and 35 public appointments were granted. A letter had been sent to him, written by Colonel Chesney, formerly the Governor of the Institution. In that letter, which was dated December 12, 1881, the writer said that Cooper's Hill did not profess to turn out practical engineers, but merely to educate its students to be engineers. That being so, was it wise to exclude from the benefits conferred upon the students of the College the students of other Engineering Schools, where proper technical knowledge was acquired? It was a serious thing to support a College which did not profess to give that which might be obtained from a system of competition—namely, a quality of practicality, possessing which engineers could go to work at once without having to pass through a period of probation. It should be observed that, under the present system, applicants for admission to the College were not subjected to competitive examination. Their admission depended solely upon priority of application, so that the monopoly and advantages of the College were conferred upon boys according to that priority. It was true that there were examinations at the end of the students' career; but the way in which the examination was conducted was very remarkable. It did not profess to be more than a pass-examination; and the only element of competition was this—that the pass students were ranged in order of merit, so that those who were at the head of the list were given the first vacant appointments. As he had shown, however, there was really an appointment for each young man who passed. He could not see why the advantages of the Indian Public Service should not be given to other students than those educated at the College; and how could it be for the advantage of the Government in India to deprive it of the services of the best engineer students that the Empire could supply? The only examination conducted at the College, which had any of the competitive element in it, being that held at the close of the students' career, why should not the students of other recognized Engineering Schools be permitted to present themselves at that examination, and run their chance against the young men from Cooper's Hill? Why the 50 young men received at Cooper's Hill by priority of application should have the preference as regarded Indian appointments over all other comers, however well-qualified, he did not understand. It did not seem to him to be a position which could be logically defended. He, therefore, begged to move his Resolution.

MR. CARBUTT, in seconding the Motion, said, he thought the matter was one of very great importance, and was one which would largely affect numbers of Civil Engineers, both in this country and in India. It seemed that the Duke of Argyll had made up his mind that he was not able to obtain engineers in this country fit to go out to India and do the work. He had made up his mind without consultation with the authorities in India, and had then determined that the best thing to do was to establish this College. Considerable objections were raised against the scheme at the time of its institution by the then Governor General of India (Lord Mayo), who wrote on the 28th March, 1870 (No. 43, Public Works), to his Grace the Duke of Argyll a strong letter giving his views as to the establishment of this College. In discussing the grade in which Civil Engineers trained in the proposed College should enter the Public Works Department on arrival in India, the following statement occurred:—

“The pay proposed for this grade in the scheme lately transmitted is £420 per annum,

This sum, we believe, is not too much to offer young men trained as Civil Engineers, and we are disposed to consider that it is owing to the insufficiency of the present salary offered to the young Civil Engineers on first entering on their duties in India—namely, £240 per annum—that the failure to fill the appointments in the Public Works Department offered for competition has been mainly due. We are much inclined to think that if this increase of salary were now offered, it would have a marked effect on the supply of candidates under the existing system. We leave it to your Grace to determine whether such an experiment might properly be made before the opening of the proposed College.”

Clearly showing that the noble Lord thought the question of obtaining qualified engineers was merely one of pounds, shillings, and pence. There could be no doubt that, in consequence of the low charge for entrance, and the excellence of the course of instruction furnished by the College, the students who passed through it gained enormous advantages over other engineers; and he contended that if the Government had been prepared at the time the College was founded to pay a proper price, they would have got any number of men to go out and do their work. With regard to the question of expense, during the past 11 years the Engineering College had cost £317,000, against which there was only to show in the shape of receipts £148,000. Yet the public works in India executed by the Cooper's Hill students compared unfavourably with similar works in this country—railways, canals, harbours, &c.—the constructors of which had no exceptional advantages, but were obtained by a process of natural selection. It was calculated that the Cooper's Hill students were turned out at a cost to the country of about £321 per head. This was an enormous sum of money for the country to be paying for each pupil who went out to India, without the slightest knowledge of civil engineering, and without any practical experience except what he might have obtained from books. The system was radically bad, and, like the example of the Ponts et Chaussées in France, showed the folly of creating a close corporation in this country with the object of foisting a mushroom growth of engineers upon the Indian Service. The least the Government could do, under the circumstances, was to assent to the proposed inquiry.

Mr. Carbutt

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the working and expense of Cooper's Hill College, and to report if it is desirable, for the public service, to retain the present system, or whether any and, if so, what changes and modifications should be made,”—(Mr. Gibson,)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question.”

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR earnestly hoped the noble Marquess would favourably consider the proposal of the right hon. and learned Gentleman. In support of that recommendation he spoke strongly as to its failure, seeing that the College had not been carried on on the principles on which it was first established. He had very much regretted that the Government of India should have hampered itself with such an expensive establishment, because a small part of the money laid out would have enabled the Schools of Engineering in the Kingdom to have supplied fit persons for service in India. But the important point on which he urged the noble Marquess to consider the proposal was this—that in spite of the recommendations of the Governor General the College had been instituted. The prudent counsels of Lord Mayo, who was himself a thoroughly practical man, had been set at nought, and the forecasts which he had made had turned out to be quite correct, the College having failed to turn out engineers of the quality and kind that the Government of India required. The expenses had also far exceeded the amount which was calculated at the time. So far from the original estimate of the cost of each student being adhered to, if the averages were made up properly the cost would be brought up to £300 per student; indeed, by the bad mode of stating the annual amount of the charges of the College, the average was as high as £500 per student actually passed out, and this was a net sum after deducting the receipts. These averages were to be contrasted with the estimated cost of £1,85 for 50 trained engineers, or only £37 per student. When the Duke of Argyll first proposed the College, he said there would be no unnecessary expenditure and yet, within a few months, £58,00 had been spent in acquiring the property; and the whole amount of capital invested in the building and land, was £119,000. A very considerable profit had been obtained by the persons from whom the property had been purchased; and that profit, he had reason to believe, had been made in consequence of information furnished to the sellers. The capital account being mixed up with the ordinary annual charge was open to objection. The interest on that capital account ought to be a part of the annual current expenditure. But, by the mode in which the statement was made out, this liability was omitted. It was also worthy of notice that the purpose of the College had been changed. Instead of being an exclusive Training School for India, it had become one for the whole Empire; and this was entirely foreign to the work which India had to perform. Then, when the College was established, its course of study had no reference to any practical training, and nothing in the way of practical training was done for several years. In 1877-8, however, the sum of £2,552 was spent for the purpose of giving the students who had passed through the College the practical training outside the College which the College failed to give them; and in the following year £4,967 was spent for this purpose, while in 1879-80 the sum of £8,028 was spent for conferring practical experience. If the sum paid in the upkeep of Cooper's Hill establishment had been spent in encouraging the various Engineering Institutions throughout the country, it would have done a great deal more good.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he had no complaint to make of the spirit and tone in which that Motion had been brought forward. Nor was it at all his intention to argue that no Parliamentary Inquiry into the working of the College, and also into the system of recruitment for the Public Works Department in India, would be desirable. All he now wished to do was to offer to the House a few observations in order to show, as he thought he would be able to show, that a Parliamentary Inquiry, such as was asked for, would, at the present time, be premature, and was therefore undesirable. The speech of the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Mr.

Gibson) had covered somewhat wider ground than the terms of the Motion. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had only moved for a Select Committee—

“To inquire into the working and expense of Cooper's Hill College, and to report if it is desirable, for the public service, to retain the present system, or whether any and, if so, what changes and modifications should be made.”

An inquiry of that nature might very easily be understood, and he confessed that he had understood it as being limited to an inquiry into the working of Cooper's Hill College and the present system in force there. But he gathered from the speech of the right hon. and learned Gentleman that he wished to cover a much larger ground—namely, whether the recruitment of the Public Works Department in India was practically to be confined in future to the students of Cooper's Hill College; or whether the system of open competition was to be reverted to? Now, the wider scope given to the Motion by that speech increased his objection to granting the Committee at the present time; for he could not help seeing that such an inquiry at this moment, when the College had only been in operation for 11 years, and under the new and revised system not for one year, would be almost fatal to the prospects of the Institution. To revert to the principle of open competition might possibly at some future time be necessary; but to revert to it at present, when Cooper's Hill College, under the existing system, was absolutely in its infancy, would deal a fatal blow to the future of the establishment; and he must say that would be scarcely justified at the present time. He was scarcely concerned to defend the original institution of the College. The reasons which prevailed with the Duke of Argyll and the Council of India at that time were before the House. No doubt, it was alleged now that an adequate supply of engineers might be obtained for India by open competition; but certainly it was not conceived at that time that an adequate supply was forthcoming. The appointments were thrown open; but the result of the examination was that so few candidates presented themselves that it could not be really called open competition—in fact, almost all who presented themselves obtained appointments. It was said, indeed, that that fact was owing to the insufficiency of the pay and the prospects held out. That argument, however, was hardly borne out; because as soon as Cooper's Hill College was constituted a number of students did offer themselves, although they had to undergo a long course of training and had to pay considerably for it. [Mr. Gibson: Better pay.] He was not altogether acquainted with the figures; but he understood that originally the inducements offered to students were very much the same as those previously offered by open competition. It was, however, suggested that they might revert to open competition in conjunction with Cooper's Hill College. Well, during the first years of that College, it was open to candidates to obtain their education where they pleased, and to compete with the students of the College at the final examination. But so few availed themselves of that privilege that it practically became a dead-letter, and it was not thought necessary to retain it on the re-organization of the College. The calculation which had been laid before the House by the right hon. and learned Gentleman was an exceedingly rough one; but he did not deny that the average expenses of Cooper's Hill had exceeded the receipts by something like £4,000 annually. It was also not unfair to say that the average cost of the education of each student was about £200, if interest on capital outlay were excluded, and £300 if it were included. That, no doubt, was a considerable charge, and he did not say it was one which ought to be permanently incurred by the Government of India; but, at the same time, the magnitude of the interests involved in the efficient management of public works in India was so great that any expense of this kind ought to sink into insignificance. The question was one of efficiency in the proper recruitment of the Public Works Department of India. Looked at in this point of view, Cooper's Hill had not been unsatisfactory. The Government of India had reported several times that they were fully satisfied with the recruits sent them; and in one of their despatches they stated that the Reports they received were universally favourable, and in some cases eminently so. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had referred to a letter of Colonel Chesney, which took notice of the want of practical training of engineers sent out. He had not seen the letter, and had not been able to follow the argument of the right hon. and learned Gentleman; but he could scarcely conceive that he intended to argue that the engineers sent out from Cooper's Hill College had less practical knowledge and training, and were less qualified to take up their work at once, than candidates who were sent out from any other Engineering School in the country. No doubt, from whatever school they came, they required some practical training; but he did not suppose it would be contended that a Scotch University or Trinity College sent out more practically qualified engineers than Cooper's Hill had done. He (the Marquess of Hartington) had stated that he did not feel himself called upon to defend the policy of the original institution of this College. It was done after the fullest consideration; and, the money having been spent and laid out, it was no use discussing whether it was a wise policy at the time or not. Nor did it devolve primarily upon him to defend the new organization. What he had done had been simply to carry into completion the arrangements made by his Predecessor. The fact was, that during 1876, 1877, and 1878, the excessive cost to India of this establishment had directed attention to it, and various proposals were under the consideration of the Government for the reduction of the charges. In 1879 the check which was then given by the reduction of the Public Works expenditure, and, as a consequence, the diminution of the employment for Civil Engineers, made the question still more urgent. It was very carefully considered by Lord Cranbrook and by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. E. Stanhope). At that time the question of closing the College was mooted; and he had no hesitation in saying that the Government of India were not indisposed to recommend that course. Lord Cranbrook, however, doubted the expediency of the course favoured by the Government of India. Taking into consideration the very excellent, though somewhat costly, result of Cooper's Hill, he did not wonder that Lord Cranbrook had hesitated to destroy an Institution which had done so much good, and promised to do so much more. No doubt, as had been said, there were other Institutions in which engineering education was given. Engineering schools existed in the Schools and Colleges referred to; and he believed that in some cases degrees and diplomas in engineering science were conferred; but he did not believe that there existed in any part of the Kingdom an establishment devoted to education in civil engineering in which the appliances and the arrangements carried out so complete a system of engineering education as at Cooper's Hill.

The Marquess of Hartington

MR. GIBSON observed, that Trinity College possessed every appliance for the purpose of affording a complete education in engineering.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON was informed that there was no Institution where the appliances were so complete as at Cooper's Hill. Then, it must be remembered that the same article was not required in India as in this country. Any man proceeding from an engineering school in the United Kingdom or Ireland was kept for a time under the care of a competent engineer, possessing full practical knowledge, under whose direction he rapidly became competent. But in India the men were widely scattered, they had almost immediately to take up independent duties, and they were not, and could not be, retained under the care of professional experts, as would be the case in England. It did not follow, therefore, that because the engineering schools of this country were exactly adapted for the production of the article required for engineering at home, the same schools would turn out what was required for India. Under those circumstances, Lord Cranbrook hesitated to adopt the proposal to close the schools and to abandon altogether what had been done. He appointed a Committee, of which the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Stanhope) was Chairman, which conferred with certain leading members of the engineering profession. As a result, they made certain proposals which were adopted by Lord Cranbrook, and the constitution of the College was entirely changed. It had been originally computed that at least 50 engineers would be annually required to be sent out to India; but when the reduction in the Public Works expenditure of India was decided upon, it was found that probably 10, or 15 at the utmost, would be annually needed for many years to come. It was therefore evident that Cooper's Hill could not be kept up exclusively for the wants of India, and it was decided to alter the constitution of the College, and to throw it open to the public, and to abolish the entrance examination. The appointments in the Public Works Department, as many as were vacant, it was decided should be offered, from time to time, as prizes to the most successful students in the establishment. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had contended that every student would obtain an appointment at the conclusion of his course, whether he submitted himself to examination or not. That was not so. The right hon. and learned Gentleman took the years in which it was known that the number of appointments to be given would very much diminish, and on account of that knowledge the entrances fell off. It was hoped that this Institution might be made useful and available, not only to meet the wants of India, but also of the Colonies and Dependencies of this country, and, to a certain extent, for home requirements. With the object of adapting the education fully to the wants of the public, a Board of Visitors had been appointed, who were intrusted with the revision of the studies pursued at the College, and it was hoped that the course would thus adapt itself to the wants of the public and the profession. The Board of Visitors now consists half of gentlemen who were qualified by Indian experience, and half of eminent members of the engineering profession. Among the latter, he might mention Mr. Barlow, the President of the Institute of Civil Engineers, Mr. Fowler, the late President, and Mr. Siemens, whose reputations were well known. These were active and attentive Members of the Board, and they had from time to time recommended certain changes in the studies. This scheme was practically matured when he succeeded to the management of the India Office; and he had had nothing to do with it but to give his formal sanction to the appointment of gentlemen who had already been nominated for the Board of Visitors. The scheme only came into operation last September, and the support it had hitherto received from the public was by no means discouraging. No one desired that any considerable burden should be permanently imposed upon the Government of India for the purpose of maintaining this College. No doubt they would not be justified in imposing a heavy burden upon the Revenues of India, and they must endeavour to devise some other system; but there was no reason to think that under the new management any such terms would be imposed. At all events, considering what had been done, the expenditure that had been incurred, and the undoubted efficiency of the instruction which was now given at Cooper's Hill, it would be a matter of great regret that by a premature inquiry public confidence in this College should be destroyed, and the chance of its becoming a success should be put an end to. As he had said at the commencement, he did not say that this was not a subject which might hereafter be very usefully inquired into by a Committee; but it appeared to him that at the present moment, when a new scheme which was very carefully elaborated had only just come into operation, that course would not be an advantageous or a desirable one to adopt. The hon. Member for Monmouth (Mr. Carbutt) made some reference to the grievances of the civil engineers employed in the Public Works Department. The hon. Member referred to the Royal Engineers. Well, the position of the civil engineers had lately been under the consideration of the Government of India, and they made certain proposals which were still under the consideration of the Council of India. He had every disposition to give a fair consideration to that most important branch of the Civil Service, and he trusted that reasonable satisfaction would be given those men. It was true that a great many of the highest appointments were still held by the Royal Engineers; but they had had a long start in the profession, even the Stanley engineers being comparatively their juniors; and it was natural that the senior service should still hold a considerable proportion of the higher appointments; but there was no reason to believe that as time went on this would continue to be the case. He ventured to hope that the right hon. and learned Gentleman would be satisfied with having called attention to this very important question, and would not press his Motion to a division. It would be competent to the right hon. and learned Gentleman, when some further experience had been gained in the working of this College under the new management, to bring forward the subject again. He could not think that an inquiry at the present moment would be conducted under advantageous circumstances.

MR. ONSLOW said, he had no wish to pass the slightest slur upon the management of the College. He had the pleasure of knowing several who had been connected with it, and those who had been educated in it, and he knew the great work the College had done. But, after all, the question to be considered was, What was the best plan for recruiting the Public Works Department in India? He had the pleasure of being connected with India some years ago, when this question cropped up in a forcible way. After mature consideration it was deemed that the best plan for promoting the Service of India was by having a practical College in England, where gentlemen could be trained for the services they had to render abroad. The question was forced on the Government of India by the great and overwhelming public opinion—an opinion in which he fully shared—that it was a matter of paramount importance for the prosperity of India that large sums of money should be spent annually on public works; and this, of course, necessitated a considerable increase in the staff of officers at that time employed. They had had officers as able and efficient coming from the Military Department as, he believed, they would ever get from Cooper's Hill College. But the number of engineers they could get in India was comparatively small considering the amount of work which had to be performed. So long, however, as they had Cooper's Hill to obtain recruits from, and also could obtain military engineers from Woolwich, there would always be some little friction and dissatisfaction—therefore, his right hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Gibson) proposed to have a Committee to inquire into the system of education at Cooper's Hill; and, in fact, to have a thorough inquiry into the mode of recruiting the Public Works Department in India, and he thought it would be well to agree to the Motion. He supposed there never was a more efficient or abler engineer than the present Lord Napier of Magdala; but he was rather an exception. It would be very difficult to recruit officers of the same calibre as Lord Napier. He did not care what the expense of an establishment in this country for training young men might be, so long as they could send out efficient men to India. The question was, What was the best way of getting men into the Public Works Department? It appeared to him that it would be better if they had some more general system of getting men for that Department; that there should be examinations of candidates in Scotland and in Ireland; and that those who successfully passed examinations should be placed under efficient tuition in this country. The amount of money spent in India for public works was never the same from one year to another. The amount depended upon the sum that could be spared from the Revenues of India, and it was this fluctuating demand which had been the great difficulty of Cooper's Hill College. The fluctuations in the number of men trained in it, according to the state of the Indian finances, he believed, caused greater expense than any plan that could be adopted for recruiting men for any Department where the constant and regular supply was known. The noble Marquess had referred to an inquiry which had taken place; but it was simply Departmental, and it could not be so efficient as one by a select Committee of that House, which could show whether military engineers could be the best to send out to India—in short, whether the teaching and training at Woolwich or at Cooper's Hill were the better; and another question whether Woolwich could supply the quantity of recruits necessary for the service. He considered that it would be more satisfactory to the public, not only in this country, but in India, if the Committee that was asked for were appointed, though he admitted, at the same time, there was force in the observation to let the present system have a further trial.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, the practical effect of appointing a Committee of Inquiry would be to paralyze the working of Cooper's Hill College, and, ere long, lead to its utter destruction. No doubt Cooper's Hill College must stand or fall upon its own merits. He quite admitted that if the question were a new one, and they were asked to establish such an Institution, there might be some ground for hesitation; but now that it was established, it was but just that it should have a fair trial. At the time of its institution it could not be denied that an Institution of that character was necessary. It was established at what he might call a period of inflation, when an exceptional number of engineers was suddenly required; and it was a time when we were not fully able to arrive at a definite conclusion as to the number of engineers that would be required in the future, or as to the extent to which we should be able to employ Natives. Therefore it was that the establishment of the College was forced upon the Duke of Argyll. It could not be doubted that the College had done admirably good work to the Profession and the country. Students had been sent from it who were a credit to their country and to their profession. There was one matter not much alluded to, which had always struck him as supremely important. He would refer to some remarks made by Colonel Chesney, who afterwards became the head of the College. Colonel Chesney said that the spirit of esprit de corps which such an Institution was calculated to engender was not the least of its merits, because it was a matter of feeling rather than administration. Colonel Chesney went on to say that he was only expressing the general feeling of the Profession when he said that the Institution had served to bring together, in the period of enthusiastic youth, the future members of the Service, who looked forward to passing their lives in a common calling in India. That was the spirit in which the College had been founded. How had it worked? He believed a corporate sense of honour—which was, perhaps, a better expression than esprit de corps—had been created, which led men to do their best to reflect credit on the Institution. The expenditure on the College, if great, could hardly be considered in recent years, at any rate, to be out of proportion to the service rendered, as it was of the highest importance that the best class of engineers should be secured. It was found, however, when the Public Works Staff in India was largely reduced in 1879, that only a small proportion of the students admitted to the College could possibly receive appointments to the Public Works Service in India; and, in consequence, a new system was organized, which had only been in operation for six or seven months. It was perfectly clear to his mind that an inquiry at this early stage could do no good; its only effect would be to weaken and hinder the useful work which was being done. His right hon. and learned Friend proposed to go back to the open system. But it was perfectly clear that by competition alone the best men could not be obtained. The result of the existing system had turned out good practical engineers, and men who were bound in honour to do their duty. He trusted that the House would allow that system to be thoroughly tested, and would not break up an Institution which had done such valuable service.

MR. PLUNKET said, he regretted that the noble Lord the Secretary of State for India had not seen fit to assent to the appointment of such a Committee as had been proposed by his right hon. and learned Friend and Colleague. He would venture to appeal once more to the noble Lord, in the interest not only of his own constituents, but also of the public generally, to allow a Committee to sit for the purpose of inquiry, by no means necessarily in a hostile spirit, into the working of Cooper's Hill College, in order to get to the bottom of the question, and to set at rest the discontent which prevailed in the public mind as to the management of that Institution. The argument of the noble Lord was that if there was an inquiry public confidence would be shaken. But he did not think that a fair inquiry, over which it was not improbable the noble Lord himself would preside, would tend to blight and wither the prospects of the College. What harm could happen? The Professors would still lecture, and the students attend their lectures. The noble Lord was entirely mistaken in stating that there was no practical school of engineering besides the College. In the University of Dublin there was a perfectly practical school of engineering, in which the curriculum was much the same as that at Cooper's Hill, except that the examination at the University was of a more practical and searching character. The Dublin engineering students had done much valuable work in the country. This and other schools, in fact, turned out all the engineers of the country, Cooper's Hill having merely a character more specialized. Then he did not understand from the speech of his right hon. and learned Friend that he wished to abolish Cooper's Hill, root and branch. That might possibly be the result; but it might be far otherwise. The great danger was in creating a monopoly, which always tended to encourage laziness, whereas, with free and open competition, you always got your money's worth. The present system at Cooper's Hill was a haphazard one, in which the rule prevailed of first come first served, and there was no adequate security of getting the best men. Another extraordinary thing connected with the College was this. The noble Lord said it now admitted other persons than those who were designed for the Indian Civil Service. On what ground, he should like to know, were they admitted? In his opinion, this was only an excuse for keeping up this expensive monopoly. There was another most remarkable thing with respect to which he should like some explanation. According to the 31st paragraph of the scheme, the College authorities might, on the application of students who passed out of the College, but who did not enter the Indian Civil Service, place them as pupils with eminent engineers on payment of a nominal premium. This was an additional attraction to induce men to come into the College; and, although they did not intend to go out to India at all, the College was to interfere in order to give them these extraordinary advantages. The College was well endowed, and no doubt it was a very excellent Institution; but this was no reason why it should not be inquired into. All the Civil Services were now thrown open, and a general system of open competition prevailed. By competition alone could the public be assured of obtaining the best men for the public service. He did not wish to say one word against the excellence of the College or of the students; but he thought his right hon. and learned Friend and Colleague had made out a case for an inquiry into the working of this Institution.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, that when the College was established the condition of the Public Works Service in India was not satisfactory, and it was felt that something should be done to supply young men for the engineering service in India. It was the case also then that there were no engineering schools in this country which sufficiently combined this branch with scientific educa-

Mr. E. Stanhope

e had listened with interest to the of the right hon. and learned r for the University of Dublin (bison); and, while one or two of ements struck him as extravagant, y respects his arguments were gent. He knew that in the Uni- of Edinburgh the engineering had been very much improved; thought that with respect to rring schools Scotland and Ire- ad an advantage over Eng- The English Universities, he t, were too much hampered by ents, which bound them to cer- bjects of education, and it was a h to them that they were not pro- ith engineering schools. It might y said that Cooper's Hill College bsidized, and that it competed e other engineering educational ions in the United Kingdom. He t surprised that the right hon. rned Gentleman, representing the ency he did, should have brought estion forward; but they must ight to the considerations put l by the noble Marquess. Cooper's llege was established to meet a y, and it was, to a certain extent, ul. He should be sorry to see llege done away with, or under- without full consideration and e inquiry. The noble Lord told at a new arrangement had been r made, and he was apprehensive y further inquiry might endanger cess of the present experiment. ir George Campbell) had that all- ng faith in the efficiency of the of Commons to set everything e every department of the British , he might not be indisposed to the proposal for a Select Com- but he confessed the longer one he House, the more one was con- that it was overwhelmed with s, and having regard to the and largeness of the questions ight be opened up by an inquiry kind, it was a question whether l be desirable to bring it forward e Procedure of the House was d. On that ground, while con- that he thought it extremely de- that, if not now, at all events ery long, some sufficient inquiry be made into the system by which ublic Works Service in India was l, he was not, for one, prepared to oppose the view that the noble Lord took that the present proposal was somewhat premature, and that they had better wait a little before Parliament should be asked to make the inquiry. With regard to the distribution of patronage in India, and to the appointment of military engineers, he most emphatically denied that there was any prejudice in favour of military engineers, or that civil engineers were likely to be unfairly treated. It was desirable in the interest of the Public Service that they should have in India men who were prepared to devote their lives to the country, who would become acquainted with the habits and language of the Natives, men not only good engineers, but men who must be able to manage vast armies of Natives, sympathize with them, and, as he said, to spend the better part of their lives among them. He was inclined to believe that the military engineers should confine themselves to military work, and that in future the Civil Department of the Public Works in India should be recruited by young civil engineers. They had in Scotland and Ireland established sufficient schools of engineering; and he felt that they should not be excluded from the appointment of students to these engineering posts.

MR. PUGH said, this was not a College for India only, but for home requirements. It was only Indian in this respect, that India had to pay the whole cost of it. He certainly thought the hon. Gentleman (Sir George Campbell) had by his speech conclusively shown a necessity for the proposed inquiry.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 78; Noes 27: Majority 51.—(Div. List, No. 68.)

Main Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

POLICE PROTECTION TO PUBLIC SERVANTS.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON, in rising to call attention to the increase to the rates arising, during a period of deep depression, from the necessity of adding to the local police forces, in order to protect public servants from personal violence, with the view of moving—said, that the Home Secretary seemed to think it was offensive in him the other day to draw the attention of the House to a matter which seemed to him to be of public importance. He trusted he would now retract that insinuation. This Resolution was one which was universally, or almost universally, accepted elsewhere as an axiom of government, and was both reasonable and politic. One Act of Parliament which established local police provided that special and extraordinary police services should be paid for by those who required them. The Chief Constables might, when applied to, and with the permission of the local authorities, provide constables for special duty. Under the Act 3 & 4 Vict. c. 80, s. 19, provision was made to that effect; and it had been largely taken advantage of by the managers of places of public amusement, as well as by contractors for large public works, and by others. According to the Metropolitan Police Returns, as many as 1,200 men were employed on such special services; and in the Civil Service Estimates it appeared that Royal and public personages and places were provided with police protection, the expense of which was charged on the Estimates, and was not thrown on the rates. Under this head the charge in respect of Marlborough House, for instance, was £595, and for the House of Commons £2,500. The Home Secretary had, indeed, argued that Cabinet Ministers were just the same as any ordinary individuals. He put that down rather to his own excessive modesty than to any want of appreciation of fact or of law. It would follow from this statement that the Ministers who, in the exercise of their public duties, brought themselves into unpopularity, ought to provide the necessary police protection for themselves out of their own pockets. What more monstrous proposition could be laid down? The necessity for that protection came from the discharge of their public duties, and not of private duties; and, therefore, the obligation to protect them fell necessarily, it seemed to him, upon the public. He took the case of the Flintshire Local Authority as an example of what was happening or might happen anywhere. In the autumn of last year, the Chief Constable of the county applied to the Local Authority for special additional police to protect the Prime Minister.

"That the obligation to provide special police protection to public servants is a subject of Imperial rather than local obligation, and should no longer be a charge upon the rates,"

Mr. Stanley Leighton

The Chairman of the Local Authority appealed to the Court over which he presided, stating that the Home Secretary required the Chief Constable to furnish men for the protection of the Prime Minister. The Local Authority expressed their opinion that the safety of the Prime Minister was a national affair, and that, for that reason, the cost of his protection should fall on the National Exchequer; but instantly provided the special police contingent that was asked for. In the result a county singularly free from crime was charged with the expense caused by the crime of another part of the Kingdom. Now, the Local Authority ought not to have been called upon to make any such provision. Not long ago the local taxation reformers thought they had converted the Prime Minister to their views, when he surrendered at discretion before the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Harcourt). The right hon. Gentleman must excuse them if they were now rather doubtful, and called to mind his words, that any relief to the rural ratepayers would be nothing less than quartering the landlords on the Exchequer. The Prime Minister was quartering himself upon the ratepayers. There was, however, a far graver matter to consider—the inadequacy of the Local Authority to discharge the duty cast upon it. When the Prime Minister thought it necessary to make a visit to a political magnate in a neighbouring county, he was conducted by the Flintshire police to Chester, by the Cheshire police to Lancashire, and by the Lancashire police to Knowsley; he travelled like a State prisoner rather than a State official. Was it right, was it fitting, that the Prime Minister should be treated thus? He would not say one word against the rural police, who, however, were occasionally more distinguished for their zeal than for their discretion, as an anecdote which he would relate to the House would show. When the Prime Minister was at Hawarden the other day a poor stranger appeared on the scene, desirous of obtaining one of those letters of recommendation to a constituency which the right hon. Gentleman was so liberal in giving. He ventured to touch the hem of the Premier's garment, whereupon he was immediately seized and thrown into prison, until it was found he had committed no offence.

There could be no doubt that the rate-payers of Flintshire would willingly pay £50,000 a-year, if necessary, to secure the safety of the Prime Minister; but even if they paid £1,000,000 a-year that would not avail, for the circuit of their authority was limited, while the Prime Minister was ubiquitous. The Prime Minister had told them lately that they did not realize the gravity of the issues which lay before them. They must, indeed, be grave if for the first time the unprecedented degradation had come upon the country, that in Constitutional England the Constitutional Ministers of the Crown were not safe. He regretted very much that this should be the case for the first time under the Premiership of the present Prime Minister. Complaints had been made that police protection had been taken away from the lonely caretaker in Ireland. But that was no reason why the right hon. Gentleman should not be accompanied and guarded by a sufficient force of police. He hoped the House would accept this Resolution. He appealed to all sides of that House to show that they desired to acquiesce in the principle of his Motion; he would ask hon. Members who represented the Irish constituencies to show, by supporting his Motion, that they did not countenance or sympathize with the attempts against the persons of Ministers of the Crown, but were willing to vote Irish money to frustrate those plots. To the great Liberal Party he appealed to rush to the rescue of the right hon. Gentleman, who was termed by them, at all events in the country, the living incarnation of all the principles of Liberalism. As he could not move his Resolution under the Rules of the House, he would content himself by calling the attention of the Home Secretary to the matter.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Sir, it is difficult, I am afraid, to treat this matter with all the seriousness which would seem to be demanded by the energetic rhetorical appeal of the hon. Gentleman for a combination of parties who happen to be absent—his appeal to the Irish Land Leaguers to support him, to the great party of local taxation which is absent, and to the Liberal Party, which is, at the present moment, I believe, at dinner. But whether this Motion was intended to be a local taxation Motion, or whether it was intended to be a great political and personal attack on the Prime Minister, I am left to doubt. The first part of it was a prosaic form of the local taxation creed—if the hon. Gentleman will allow me, without offence, to say so—run rather mad. The latter part of it was a sort of semi-political, semi-personal attack upon the Prime Minister. I will leave that part of the matter, because it has nothing to do with this question. The only point on which I will detain such of the House as are present is the local taxation question. The hon. Member has regard to the case of Flintshire, and I ask myself—"How is it that this Motion has come before the House?" There is a Member for Flintshire. There are Members for the Flint Boroughs, and for Cheshire, for Liverpool, and for Lancashire, representing the people who protected the Prime Minister when he went to Knowsley. But what has Shropshire suffered? I do not know if Shropshire is fertile of Ministers, and when they had their rates overburdened by what they have had to pay. The only thing I could think of as the origin of this Motion was that one of the hon. Members for Shrewsbury (Mr. Cotes), who was a junior Lord of the Treasury, had been protected at an enormous cost. Why did the hon. Member for Shropshire come forward with this Motion? Who have taken the matter up in Flintshire? The magistrates of Flintshire. But the great basis of all local taxation reform rests in the fundamental proposition that the magistrates did not represent the ratepayers. There is no body of men who are less representative of the sentiments of the ratepayers, or less fit to convey their views, than the magistrates; and if my hon. Friend, as a local taxation reformer, will bear that proposition in mind, he will master the grammar of the subject. As far as I know, the ratepayers have disavowed this Motion, and have condemned the view of the majority of the magistrates. It is a remarkable fact that while this matter is brought before the House by a Gentleman who has no connection with Flintshire, the motion at the Quarter Sessions was brought forward by a gentleman who does not reside in Flintshire, and who, for 12 or 13 years previously, had not been at any meeting of Sessions there. There is a gentleman whose opinion, at any rate, is rather taking, and that is the Chairman of Quarter Sessions. Having considered my letter, he was good enough to say that, though they were justified in asking the Home Secretary to repay some portion of the extra expenditure, he, on the other hand, if he had been the Home Secretary, would have sent the same answer as the Home Secretary had sent—that they were bound to protect their own ratepayers. Now, the hon. Member has stated that I considered the character of this Resolution was somewhat offensive. That is not my expression, but the word he adopted; but it was not my view of the subject. That view of the subject was entertained by a gentleman very well known in Flintshire to hold Conservative opinions; and he said—

“Is it wise, courteous, altogether right, when we have the privilege of having resident in the county so distinguished a man to begrudge that small contribution towards the protection of his life and property? It is a matter in which politics should be completely put aside. It would be better to bear this little grievance than to lay ourselves open to the charge of unwillingness to protect the Prime Minister, whatever his politics might be.”

These, I believe, are the views of the ratepayers of Flintshire, and the views of the people of this country. What is the rule? The hon. Member seems to be imperfectly informed of the practice in this country on this subject. He seems to have repeated a statement which was made by Colonel Rowley, that in the Metropolis there were specially employed for the protection of Her Majesty's Ministers 13,000 or 14,000 policemen—and that is the sagacious man upon whose advice and motion the magistrates of Flintshire adopted this resolution. Now, Sir, there is not one particle of foundation for that statement. There are not 13,000 police employed in the defence of Her Majesty's Ministers; and, in the next place, those who are so employed are paid precisely in the same way as the magistrates of Flintshire are called upon to pay. There is no special payment. I have before me a memorandum from Colonel Henderson, which states that it has always been held to be the duty of the Metropolitan Police to make proper provision for any special arrangements necessary from time to time for the protection of distinguished personages visiting the Metropolis, of Her Majesty's Ministers, and of such other persons as are held entitled to special consideration, and no payment has ever been made by the Treasury on that account. That is a matter which the hon. Member might have ascertained of Colonel Rowley, if he had taken the trouble to ask. Oh, yes; but then it is necessary to read those things intelligently to understand them. The hon. Member has referred to the Houses of Parliament. There is a payment made for the police employed inside the Houses of Parliament, but not for those employed outside. The whole cost of protection for Her Majesty and the Royal Family is borne by the ratepayers of London, subsidized to the extent of one-half from the Imperial Funds; and does the hon. Member maintain that the Queen is to be put on the same footing as public servants? He has not said so. The fact is that the principle is that very sensibly stated by the Chairman of Quarter Sessions of Flintshire, that it is the duty of every local authority to protect persons who are within their jurisdiction. That applies to the highest and to the lowest. It applies to Her Majesty's Ministers; it applies to the hon. Member; it applies to the Sovereign; it applies to the Royal Family. Now, Sir, I should like to know what the hon. Member's definition is with respect to public servants? He originally put it in the form of “Cabinet Ministers.” I suppose the magistrates are public servants, and they must not go upon the rates; but the expense of protecting them must be borne by the Consolidated Fund. Officers in the Army are also public servants, and it must be understood that they are not on the rates. And when the Government is turned out, are they then to be protected or are they not? They cease to be public servants; and are they then to go upon the rates? Now, Sir, the hon. Gentleman is a little at fault in his history. He says that this is the first time that Ministers of State have ever required protection. Well, Sir, I will recommend the hon. Member to read in histories of the time of George III., during the Administration in the days of the Wilkes riots, or in the days of Lord George Gordon riots, and he will find that there have been Ministers in former times who have required police protection. Sir, there are people who require protection sometimes more than Ministers—the Leaders of the Opposition. They are often quite as unpopular and require protection quite as much. I do not know whether the hon. Member has the disadvantage of being old enough, as I have, to recollect that time when the iron shutters of Apaley House had to be closed, and when it was necessary to protect the great Duke of Wellington against a popular siege in London on the anniversary of Waterloo; and I remember some verses of Lord Stanhope, in which it was said the English people were more shamed on the London streets than the French were on the Belgian plains. I want to know whether the hon. Member extends his principle to Her Majesty's Opposition? In reply to an inquiry which I made to the Commissioner of Police, whom I happened to meet to-day, he said he had been at quite as much pains to protect the Members of the Opposition as Members who were in Office. Members of the Opposition, as in the case of the Duke of Wellington at the time of the Reform agitation, may be just as much in need of protection as Ministers of the Crown. It is therefore quite impossible to admit of a limitation of this kind, apart from the universal principle acted upon everywhere, that each locality is responsible for the peace of the locality. When, for instance, the Queen or the Prince of Wales went down into the country, as the Prince of Wales recently went down to Liverpool, did the people of Liverpool or of other places visited grudge the cost of the extra police who were required to be engaged on account of the Royal visit? The police are responsible for the district, and you cannot take particular individuals and ticket them—"This is a servant of the Crown, and therefore it shall not be at the risk of the locality. You shall not protect him. You shall protect another man." The hon. Gentleman has a Colleague whose father was lately a public servant, holding the Office of Master of the Horse. Well, is Lord Bradford to be protected at the expense of the rates when he is not Master of the Horse, and to be protected by the Consolidated Fund when he is? Is that a thing that would be tolerated, or is it possible to work it? How are the police to determine whether a man is a public servant or not—whether he is to be protected at the cost of this fund or the other? I do not wish to speak at all disrespectfully of the great question of local taxation; but this is an instance in which it is not worth while departing from a very serious principle to gain, I think, no particular advantage. I therefore cannot concur in the view of the matter taken by the hon. Gentleman.

Sir William Harcourt

MR. ROBERTS said, he rose for the purpose of denying that the hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Stanley Leighton) represented, in the course he had taken, the feelings of the ratepayers of Flintshire. Heavily burdened as they were, and notwithstanding that they were suffering from the depression of the mining and agricultural interest, they cheerfully bore the charge for the protection of the Premier, and the feeling prevalent among them was one of shame at the conduct of their magistrates. The motion at their meeting was moved by a comparative stranger, who had not attended Quarter Sessions before for the last 12 years.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—CASE OF PETER DUNNE—MR. JUSTICE FITZGERALD.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he had given Notice that he would draw attention to the conduct of Mr. Justice Fitzgerald, at Maryborough, in detaining in custody Peter Dunne after he has been acquitted of the charge brought against him; and to move—

"That the action of Judge Fitzgerald in detaining in custody Peter Dunne, after his acquittal on the charge preferred against him, and on account only of a demonstration in court over which the prisoner had no control, was an abuse of authority."

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR, continuing, said, that the subject-matter of his Motion he submitted to the Attorney General for Ireland three weeks ago, and furnished him with a verbatim report of the proceedings which took place from a local newspaper. Peter Dunne was tried before Mr. Justice Fitzgerald for manslaughter on the 3rd of March, and acquitted, the jury taking a very short time to arrive at their verdict. When the verdict was delivered no comment was made by the Judge; but it was received with applause. Justice Fitzgerald then said—

“In consequence of that display I order the prisoner to be kept in custody until to-night, and if there is any more of such conduct I will keep all the prisoners in custody until the close of the Assizes.”

The answer which the Attorney General for Ireland gave to his letter was that he had seen different reports of the case in The Irish Times and The Daily Express and was, therefore, not prepared to admit the accuracy of the report. But he contended that it was very likely, at any rate, that it was correct; and he would leave it to the House to judge of the fitness or candour of an answer of that sort. The Attorney General for Ireland went on to say that he entirely disclaimed any duty of replying to the question as to the conduct of the Judge; but he might say that, from what he had reason to believe took place, the learned Judge acted quite legally. In other words, the right hon. and learned Gentleman, although knowing nothing whatever of the circumstances of the case, and not having taken the trouble to make inquiries, was quite prepared to say that Judge Fitzgerald was right. He (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) would contest the legal opinion of the right hon. and learned Gentleman. He denied that the Judge had any right to detain any man against whom no charge was pending, simply because some other persons, over whom he had no control, chose to commit a contempt of Court. Sir William Blackstone, whom the right hon. and learned Gentleman would, perhaps, admit to be an authority, stated that when a prisoner had been acquitted by the verdict of the jury “he should be immediately set at large.” The 8 & 9 Vict., c. 114, provided that every person charged with any crime before any Court holding criminal jurisdiction within Great Britain or Ireland who on his or her trial had been acquitted “shall be immediately set at large in open Court.” Archbold, in his Criminal Pleadings, stated—

“If the defendant be acquitted on the merits, he is for ever free and discharged from that accusation, and is entitled to be immediately set at liberty unless there be some other legal ground for his detention.”

It was not pretended there was any other legal ground for the detention of Peter Dunne. He believed the invariable practice was for a Judge, on a verdict of acquittal being handed in, to ask if there was any other charge against the prisoner, and if not to order his immediate discharge; but, whether the Judge so asked or not, the man, if no other charge was pending against him, was entitled to an immediate discharge. Other writers on Criminal Law were to the same effect as those he had already quoted. Whether the Grand Jury had or had not found a true bill did not affect the question. He maintained that it was a violation of the principles of the Constitution to deprive a man of his liberty because of an offence which he had not committed and for which he was not responsible. The persons who committed the offence were punishable by the Judge, who, if he had chosen, might have cleared the Court. He did not accuse Mr. Justice Fitzgerald of malice; but the learned Judge certainly acted in a very splenetic manner with regard to Peter Dunne. He was aware that it was laid down by Lord Coke and other high authorities that a Judge was in no case liable to an action for an abuse of his authority, or for exceeding his jurisdiction. Therefore it was that he brought the matter before the only tribunal which could express an opinion on it. The terms of his Motion were very moderate.

MR. SPEAKER: I suppose the hon. Member is aware that his Amendment cannot be put to the House.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he was aware of that fact; but he was anxious to bring the matter, not only before the House, but also before the country, as a protest against an improper and reckless use of power.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said that the hon. Member, in introducing his Motion, with a charming frankness had been pleased to put to the House whether he had been candid in answering a Question which had been put to him. The hon. Member had impeached the character of a Judge who, for learning and integrity, was in the first rank of Judges on the Irish Bench, and was universally respected by the Profession and the country. If the hon. Member was acquainted with the Legal Departments of Ireland, he would not have been so ready to bring forward this matter. The hon. Member had assumed that his statements were matters of fact. He disputed that assertion. There was no fact before the House; but only the statement of what he might, without offence, describe as an obscure local print. The two Dublin papers which had given accounts of the proceedings did not corroborate the story of the hon. Member. He was, therefore, not prepared to admit the facts. It was not shown that a reporter of the local paper was present, or, if there were one, that he was a competent reporter or a shorthand writer. The hon. Member had displayed a vast amount of burrowing ingenuity. But he had referred to no Irish Statute, and to no book of Irish practice. He had quoted English books of practice, and a series of Statutes which applied exclusively to England, beginning with the 14 Geo. III., which was passed before the Act of Union, and all to impeach the character of a learned and impartial Judge, of whom he had spoken in such terms of discourtesy as could hardly have been expected from anyone. The learned Judge had committed no offence. The mere fact of a series of Statutes being passed was evidence that they were intended to alter an already existing practice. In Ireland the law was that the Assize Commission was one unbroken period of time from the opening of the Assize to the proclamation of delivery. During the whole of that period prisoners remained amenable to the order of the Judge. The mere fact of the verdict being given for acquittal did not, either in England or Ireland, entitle the prisoner to an immediate discharge. The record had to be entered—which had not been done in this case—and until it was entered the prisoner could not be discharged. What took place was, that the verdict was received with great applause, and the learned Judge, in order to prevent re-occurrence of that, said he would not discharge the prisoner until the sitting of the Court, so that, after all, it was as a tempest in a teapot.

Mr. Arthur O'Connor

MR. ARTHURO'CONNOR remarked, that the Judge threatened to keep the man in prison until next day, and he did so.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. W. M. JOHNSON), continuing, said, the Judge was strictly entitled to do as he was reported to have done when such an indecency —for it was an indecency—had been committed, representing, as it did, the prevailing feeling in the district against all law and order. The learned Judge, fearing a breach of the peace, was perfectly within his right in acting as he had done; and he himself, in the same circumstances, would not have hesitated to take the same course. In conclusion, he felt it his duty to say that a more learned, a more distinguished, a more upright, or a more fearless Judge than Mr. Justice Fitzgerald did not sit on the Irish Bench.

MR. BIGGAR said, the Attorney General for Ireland had given a high character to Judge Fitzgerald. Others were entitled to hold a different opinion as to the merits of the learned Judge. Judge Fitzgerald was a very able man; but his reputation for impartiality did not stand so high as the Attorney General for Ireland would have the House to believe. The general opinion in Ireland was that Mr. Justice Fitzgerald was an exceedingly warm partizan of the present Government. He was a Privy Councillor, and in that capacity he directed prosecutions; he gave recommendations with regard to the general criminal policy of the Government, and then he tried the very cases based upon his own recommendations. Therefore, in point of fact, Mr. Justice Fitzgerald was prosecutor and Judge.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. W. M. JOHNSON): Mr. Justice Fitzgerald gives no advice whatever in reference to criminal prosecutions. I, and I alone, am responsible for them.

MR. BIGGAR said, he did not state that Mr. Justice Fitzgerald gave directions in particular cases, but he did say that he gave recommendations to the Government with regard to the general policy of repression in Ireland.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. W. M. JOHNSON): No, no; the hon. Gentleman is quite in error. Mr. Justice Fitzgerald gives no advice to the Government.

MR. BIGGAR: Did the right hon. and learned Gentleman allege that a Privy Councillor was a perfectly ornamental personage? Did he give no advice at all, nor offer an opinion on any subject whatever?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. W. M. JOHNSON): The House will, perhaps, permit me to say that a Judicial Member of the Privy Council is most careful, and the Government are also most careful, that he shall have nothing whatever to say to any matter which comes before him as Judge.

MR. BIGGAR said, that did not alter the case, for although individual cases might not come quite before the same person, that person might have his mind influenced in regard to a case which he might have to try. It was obvious that Mr. Justice Fitzgerald, being a Privy Councillor, and being consulted by the Government, gave recommendation from time to time as to their general policy. He could tell a story about Judge Fitzgerald, which he had from a political prisoner who was tried before him in 1867—namely, Mr. John Cleary—

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is now about to discuss the conduct of Mr. Justice Fitzgerald. The House is always very guarded in its language in reviewing the conduct of the Judges of the land; and the hon. Member is now, as I understand him, about to give to the House some hearsay story with regard to that Judge. I am bound to point out to the hon. Member that I think, considering that the House is not in a position to express its opinion on any Motion before it, it is not becoming to the Judge to give hearsay stories with regard to his conduct.

MR. BIGGAR said, that, after this warning from the Chair, he would not enter into the circumstances of the case, but would merely say that, according to his informant, the strongest speech for the prosecution in that particular case was delivered, not by Counsel, but by Mr. Justice Fitzgerald from the Bench. With regard to the particular question before them, he would remark that in Ireland a newspaper which gave an unfair report of the proceedings in a Criminal Court rendered itself liable to prosecution for contempt of Court. If, therefore, the report as to Mr. Justice Fitzgerald was incorrect, the learned Judge had the remedy in his own hands, and it was significant that he had not availed himself of it. It was difficult to see how his action in detaining a prisoner could be defended on any reasonable ground. He would only add that he thought the terms of the Motion which his hon. Friend was precluded from moving should commend themselves to every fair-minded man in the House.

PEACE PRESERVATION (IRELAND) ACT,
1881—SEARCH FOR ARMS—SUB-INSPECTOR BALL
OBSERVATIONS.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, he rose to call attention to the conduct of the Sub-Inspector of Police at Ballina in searching certain houses of that town for arms. He thought it was always desirable, when questions of this description were raised, as far as possible, some effort should be made to test the opinion of the House with regard to it; and he wished to say that it was not his fault that it was impossible to take that course in the present instance. Mr. Ball occupied the position of Sub-Inspector in the town of Ballina; and he would ask the House to consider the character generally which that town had borne in the report of the police with regard to public agitation, and then to consider the character of the persons who were subjected to the visits made by the Sub-Inspector of Police, and to consider the action of a Sub-Inspector in proceeding to search the houses of some of the most respectable merchants of that town on information which proved to be as unfounded as the search which he instituted proved to be fruitless. So far as his information went, he acted on the information of this private informer, without going to the trouble of consulting any of the local magistrates, or even the Resident Magistrate. The town of Ballina was the largest town in the county of Mayo, and the town in which the great land agitation originated. It was a town that had been subjected to many temptations; it had had the influence of surrounding movements of a very excited character freely brought to bear upon it; and it was a singular fact that throughout all this time the town had been characterized by its loyal and peaceful character. He said that, as far as his information went, the officer in question, acting upon the statement of a private informer, and without consulting any of the local magistrates, not even the Resident Magistrate, proceeded to search the houses of some of the most respectable inhabitants of a town remarkable for being well affected. The Sub-Inspector procured a force of military and police to carry out his object. One of the men whose house was searched was Chairman of the Town Commissioners, and all of them bore an excellent character. Owing to the action of Sub-Inspector Ball, a population of 10,000 in the town, and at least as many more in the country around, had become disaffected, simply because their previous good conduct afforded them no protection. This was a dangerous lesson to teach any people, particularly at a time in the history of Ireland when the country was heated to boiling point by the political passions of the hour. When the Town Commissioners asked the Lord Lieutenant for an inquiry, they meant that they should obtain one of an independent character. But the inquiry they obtained was one conducted by one policeman into the proceedings of another. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. E. Forster) had informed the House that it had been conducted by the County Inspector, who endorsed what the Sub-Inspector had done. The right hon. Gentleman also stated, in justification of the action of the Sub-Inspector, that though no arms were discovered, yet in the course of the search a case of revolvers had been removed from one shop to another. He found, however, that the person from whom the right hon. Gentleman derived that information was the very officer whose conduct had been incriminated. He maintained that with police surrounding the house, and stationed at all the doors, it would have been impossible that a case of arms could have been removed. There was no side of this story which did not show the Sub-Inspector of Ballina in an absurd and ridiculous position; and he thought when a gentleman occupying a responsible position had been found so incapable, the very least the inhabitants should be entitled to was to be relieved of his presence. He was not unreasonable enough to ask for his dismissal from the force; but his had been a great blunder, and there was a French proverb which told them that a great blunder was very often worse than a crime. The county Mayo was rather unfortunate. He was not entitled to call attention to Major Bond; but he did not know what grudge the Chief Secretary for Ireland had to Mayo that he should have thought a man who was unfit to be the head of the police in Birmingham was fit to be a Resident Magistrate in Mayo. They had also got there the eccentric Major Traill, whose conduct afforded amusement to the people. He was told that the Major drove into the town of Claremorris lately, and threatened to arrest his shoemaker under the Coercion Act because he had not mended a pair of his old boots. He protested against the people of his country being handed over to those men. He was aware that he was not now at liberty to make the Motion of which he had given Notice, owing to a division having been taken; but he had intended to move—

“That, in the opinion of this House, the character of the town of Ballina, and that of the persons whose houses were needlessly and fruitlessly searched by Sub-Inspector Ball, aided by a large force of military and police, should have protected them from domiciliary visits, the only result of which has been to create general disaffection and discredit the administration of the law.”

Unless gentlemen occupying the position of Sub-Inspector Ball were taught to exercise discretion in the performance of their duties, he thought the Government were in a fair way of having their difficulties multiplied rather than removed, and having their efforts frustrated when they tried to restore peace and tranquillity to Ireland.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he could not complain of the tone of the remarks of the hon. Member for Mayo, although the hon. Gentleman had given rather a mistaken description of what had happened in that case. With regard to Major Traill, he could only state that the district under that gentleman's supervision, owing in some respects to his energy, was one of the most peaceable in the county of Mayo. As to the search for arms in Ballina, of course it was a disagreeable thing that such searches should be made; but there could be no doubt that arms were concealed in many parts of the country, and the Government would be liable to much deserved criticism if proper efforts were not made to take arms from those who ought not to have them. The hon. Member was wrong in supposing that the Sub-Inspector in that case had acted entirely on his own responsibility. The whole necessity for the search was acknowledged by the Resident Magistrate, and the arrangements were made between the Sub-Inspector and the Resident Magistrate. Upon consultation with Mr.

Henn, it was considered necessary to employ the military in the search, there not being sufficient police for the purpose. Mr. Henn requisitioned the attendance of the military, and was, in fact, as much responsible for the search as the Sub-Inspector himself. It was true that no arms were found; and that was the case in almost every search that was made; but no one doubted that arms existed, or that it was remarkably easy to conceal them, and very difficult to find them, especially by searches that had to be made with considerable warning. With respect to the Chairman of the Town Commissioners, and another gentleman whose houses were searched, there was no suspicion that they were concealing arms; but they had several assistants in their business, and it was to see whether those assistants were breaking the law that the search was made. Upon full inquiry he thought the Sub-Inspector, in consultation with the Resident Magistrate, was justified in the course that was pursued; and in what was done there was a desire evinced to avoid, as far as might be, the giving of all unnecessary annoyance. Therefore, he thought he should have been much disregarding his duty if he had shown displeasure on the part of the Government at the action which had been taken. Arms were in possession of people in Ireland, and were used for very bad purposes; and he thought the House would accept the statement that the Arms Act was passed in order that, as far as possible, arms should be taken out of the hands of those who were likely to make a bad use of them. He admitted that Ballina was one of the most orderly towns in the West of Ireland—at any rate, it was one of which he heard least—but still it appeared to the responsible authorities necessary, on account of the possible action of some few individuals in it, to make these searches that Sub-Inspector Ball had made. As to the complaint that the Government had merely sent down the County Inspector to inquire into the matter, he should say he thought it the proper course under the circumstances, and also that no evidence was adduced at that inquiry which could justify its being submitted to any other tribunal.

MR. SEXTON wished to say a few words on the subject of this Motion, which his hon. Friend the Member for

Mayo had brought forward in such extremely moderate terms. Although he had no fault to find with the manner in which his hon. Friend had laid the case before the House, he thought his hon. Friend had considerable fault to find with the reply he had received. He thought that the right hon. Gentleman might have spared them his eulogium on Major Traill, one of those Resident Magistrates in Ireland who had done much to promote the state of affairs now existing in certain districts. They heard occasionally in that House very wise counsels from the Ministers of the Crown about the utility of protecting Civil affairs from the interference of the military in England; but the idea had never penetrated the walls of Dublin Castle. If his district were as peaceable as the right hon. Gentleman stated, why did Major Traill deliver from the Bench so much oratory with a strong flavour of gunpowder? The utmost that an official of his peculiar type could boast of was his selection from Dublin Castle, and the utmost that he could claim from Irish Members was the charity of their silence. This town of Ballina was situated partly in the county which he had the honour to represent, and he had some knowledge of it. He knew it to be inhabited by a very peaceable and industrious community; but he believed that its population were willing to take their stand with the rest of the Irish people, and would not claim for themselves an exemption from police indignities which they would not equally claim for their fellow-citizens of any other town. The maxim of the French statesman about too much zeal was not regarded by the Executive Government, and any blunder was readily condoned, provided that it was only directed against the Irish people. When the order went forth from Dublin Castle, the humble policeman or the Sub-Inspector had to obey. He thought he might say, with every confidence in that House, that where searches of this description were carried on in a country struggling with excited circumstances, and in a perilously troubled condition, they ought to be carried out under conditions that would tend to the preservation of the public temper and the public peace. Indeed, there were two considerations which ought carefully to be borne in mind. In the first place, when a policeman was about to institute a search, the Police Inspector ought first to consider well the sufficiency of the evidence upon which that search was to be made; in the second place, he should conduct that search in a careful, and not in an unnecessarily public manner; in the quiet, undemonstrative manner proper to a police officer. In Ballina the houses of the most substantial men were entered, the houses of men of substantial means and moderate principles. Surely these policemen must have known that if they had sent two or three officers, the gentlemen in question would have allowed them to look into their cupboards and boxes for anything they suspected to be concealed. In England, one or two policemen would have been sent from Scotland Yard, and the whole affair would have been perfectly quietly managed. This was not enough for Sub-inspector Ball; and he had in the quiet state of the country, been guilty of a blunder which was a crime. He had gone to the quiet town of Ballina with the force and uproar of a battalion of Blues—perhaps his military aspirations had never been gratified before—and for once in his life his love of extensive military parade was satisfied. But the town of Ballina had additional reasons to feel discomfited and outraged; that town had been described by the Chief Secretary for Ireland as a quiet town. If these things were done in a green tree, what would be done in a city? He had one good reason for not asking for the dismissal of Sub-Inspector Ball, and that was because he knew it would be no use. But he thought they might at least ask that energy, which was his most conspicuous quality—for no one would say that discretion was on a par with it—might be employed somewhere else than in the town of Ballina. He had made himself notorious and disliked in the place. If the right hon. Gentleman was anxious of preserving the peacefulness of this town in which he took so much pride, he might remove Sub-Inspector Ball to some place where he would be more popular, because not so well known.

Mr. W. E. Forster

MR. REDMOND desired to say a few words before the House left the consideration of the subject before them. They had great reason to complain of the way in which the Chief Secretary for Ireland had treated the matter. It had always seemed to him that of the two Acts, that which was called the Protection of Person and Property Act and the Arms Act, the latter was the one which inflicted the greater hardship. Not one place only, but whole country sides, had been searched for arms without a single instance in which they had been found. It was impossible that policemen could be particular as to the information upon which they acted when so many fruitless searches were made. The additional responsibility of the Resident Magistrate only made the case worse. These searches were made at night. [Mr. W. E. FORSTER: They were not at night.] Well, if these were not at night, others were. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to regard those searches for arms very lightly. He had expressed a hope that the police would err on the right side—in other words, upon the side of searching the houses of innocent persons. This was very like the recommendation contained in a recent Circular issued by a County Inspector, and for which the Chief Secretary for Ireland was responsible, that the police should shoot men on suspicion. The action of the police in breaking into houses was a great provocation. Why did not the Chief Secretary for Ireland endeavour to prevent this source of disaffection? It was impossible for the Irish Members to assist the right hon. Gentleman in preserving order in Ireland. So long as the right hon. Gentleman had hand, act, or part in the government of Ireland tranquillity would be an impossibility, because the right hon. Gentleman was not a sufficiently strong politician to grasp the situation, or to control the men who, like County Inspector Smith, now acted in the name of the Government of Ireland. It appeared that police officers might issue Circulars inciting to murder without the knowledge or approval of the right hon. Gentleman. That course give rise to irritation and a spirit of retaliation among the people. Was it too much to expect that the right hon. Gentleman would stand up and make this concession to the wishes of the Irish Members, that the individuals who took the course in Ballina which was complained of would be removed from the town? It was often said the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues did not consult with the Irish Members on Irish affairs. If they did consult with them, their course of action, he believed, would be different. But they preferred to go on the even tenour of their way, and pursue a course of action in Ireland which was grounded on absolute ignorance of the real wants of the country, and which was carried out without a single spark of sympathy with the wishes or aspirations of the people. As long as that course of action was pursued the Government would be disgraced by such actions as the issue of the recent Police Circular, and the conduct on which the hon. Member for Mayo had commented to-night. He was not one of those who entirely regretted the continued blundering of the incompetent politicians who were responsible for the government of Ireland, because he was convinced that every blunder they made, every false step they took in the government of Ireland, brought nearer the day when their power in Ireland would be at an end, and when every vestige of British interference in Irish affairs would be swept away along with them.

PARLIAMENT — INTERFERENCE OF PEERS IN PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN, who had on the Paper a Notice that he should call attention to the intermeddling of Peers in the election of Members of Parliament, said, that his Motion involved an accusation against two noble Lords, and some Friends of these Noblemen were anxious to take part in the discussion. He had delayed it from time to time to enable them to make the explanation which they deemed necessary. As they were not present he would not proceed with it on the present occasion.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—THE ASSISTANT SUB-COMMISSIONERS (KERRY AND WEST CORK).

MR. HEALY said, he rose to make some remarks upon the action of the Sub-Commissioners intrusted with the carrying out of the Land Act in certain parts of Ireland. He wished it to be distinctly understood that the statements he was about to make were not within his own personal knowledge. He was merely the mouthpiece of the tenants of Kerry and Cork, who considered they had fair reason to complain of the administration of the Land Act in their counties. A mass of evidence had been put into his hands showing that many decisions given by Messrs. M'Devitt, Walpole, and Murphy left the rents double and sometimes treble Griffith's valuation. The important point he desired to raise was that those three Sub-Commissioners, Messrs. M'Devitt, Walpole, and Murphy, were operating in one of the most distressed districts in Ireland, and that their decisions had given the utmost dissatisfaction. It was remarkable that Messrs. M'Devitt and Company were hearing the cases on the estates of Lord Kenmare and the Marquess of Lansdowne; and he wanted to have from the Government a distinct denial, if such could be given, that the reason why the Sub-Commissioners who previously acted in those districts (Messrs. Reeves, O'Keefe, and Rice) were removed was not because of the decisions which they gave, and which were satisfactory to the tenants in some cases, but because of a Memorial of landlords in the district asking for their removal, and for the appointment of the present Sub-Commissioners.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the hon. Member had been misinformed.

MR. HEALY said, he made himself the mouthpiece of grievances in the locality. He had not had an opportunity of investigating the matter. In Kerry and Cork there was a tremendous amount of dissatisfaction with the decisions of the present Sub-Commissioners.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he understood the hon. Member to say that these gentlemen were sent to Kerry in place of another Sub-Commission, against which the landlord party had presented a Memorial. There was no Memorial, no such representation from Kerry.

MR. HEALY said, he had been informed that the previous Sub-Commission had been sent adrift—if the statements which had been made to him were untrue, it was desirable that they should be corrected—and that Mr. M'Devitt had been appointed a Sub-Commissioner in response to a Memorial of landlords of Cork.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he had said there was no Memorial. He thought the hon. Member was alluding to Kerry. There was no Memorial from anybody in favour of Mr. M'Devitt. He never heard of such a thing.

Mr. Rodmond

MR. HEALY said, that being the case, was very glad to hear it, but a solicitor said Mr. M'Devitt got his appointment through his contesting Tyrone, and at he stated in one of his stump speeches—"Now we have our heel on the landlords, and we will crush the life out of them." Afterwards the Duke of Bercegnon drew attention to M'Devitt's speeches—perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would contradict that—and said he could bring them before the House of Lords, when M'Devitt denied altogether the accuracy of the report, and said that, instead of being a tenant's man, he was together a landlord's man.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that was not the case.

MR. HEALY said, that story was believed, and they had now the misfortune of having M'Devitt reinstated in the graces of the Government at the expense of the poor tenants. If, however, that statement was untrue, he would give the right hon. Gentleman some statements which were true. He would show the nature of the decisions given by Mr. Devitt and Company. In more than one case the judicial rent was allowed to be nearly 150 per cent over Griffith's valuation, in other cases 40, 50, 70, 100, 120 per cent over Griffith's valuation.

These decisions had given immense dissatisfaction. He gathered that from a letter written on 15th April last, by the Rev. John Savage, C.C., and published in the Cork Examiner. This respectable Catholic clergyman expressed, on behalf of his flock, deep dismay at the removal in the district of the previous Sub-commissioner, and the substitution of Messrs. M'Devitt and Company, whose decisions in other places he had no reason to be satisfied with. The district was essentially poor, and it was but that the Sub-Commissioners who had some acquaintance with it should not have been allowed to remain there. Mr. M'Devitt was a barrister whom the Irish lawyers improperly called to the Bar without having attended his terms, on the express statement that he did not intend to practise. He was no sooner called than he took all the practice he could get.

M'Devitt was a Northerner, and why was he not sent to the North? The farmers of Kerry and West Cork were obliged to submit to decisions which he proposed would not be tolerated in England. He had received a communication from a respected Catholic clergyman on the subject of the recent proceedings of the Sub-Commission. That gentleman said that the Sub-Commissioners were getting completely under the influence of the Government, and of persons high in authority; and their proceedings were such that the people were gradually losing all confidence and all hope on the subject of reduction of rent. He did not ask for the dismissal of Mr. M'Devitt; but he asked that he should be sent elsewhere, and that Mr. John Rice, who knew the district, and was generally respected and trusted by the people, should be allowed to remain. It was a curious fact that those in the district over which Messrs. M'Devitt and Rice had been placed, whose estates would be most interfered with, were Members of the Government. They had Lord Kenmare and Lord Lansdowne in Kerry; and why was it to go abroad, that in consequence of representations made by these Noblemen, men like Mr. John Rice had been removed from the district?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: No such representations have been made.

MR. HEALY asked why Mr. Rice had been removed?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that he had no right to speak, and he had no authority in the matter, which lay under the control of the Chief Commissioners. But he believed the reason of Mr. Rice's removal—Mr. Rice was in all respects an excellent man—had some connection with property in the county of Cork, and it was a rule that a man should not exercise jurisdiction in districts where he had interests of his own.

MR. HEALY said, he supposed that it was on the same principle that a gentleman who came from Bradford was sent to govern Ireland. Men who knew nothing about countries were the men sent into them. Mr. Rice was a native of Cork, and he had been chosen by Mr. Disraeli's Government as a Member of the Richmond Commission. He was good enough for the Government of Mr. Disraeli; but he was not good enough for the Chief Secretary for Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman apparently considered that the best men to send to Ireland to give decisions on matters vitally affecting the people was a foreigner. The right hon. Gentleman himself was a foreigner, and he thought the proper way to rule Ireland was by strangers; but the people of Ireland had very good reason to be suspicious of strangers. They knew what invasions led to in times past, and they would not have strangers any longer. They would have none but men whom they trusted; and if the Government refused to appoint these men, they would never produce contentment or peace among the people. He would mention another case in the county of Kerry. That was a case of a County Court Judge, Mr. O'Connor Morris, for whose actions, he admitted, the Government were not responsible. Mr. O'Connor Morris had recently to fix a fair rent for lands, of which the old rent was £3. The landlord's valuator, Mr. Cruikshank, valued some of the land at 10s. 6d. an acre, the bog land at 4s. 6d., and other parts at 10s. and 12s. 6d. an acre. Notwithstanding this evidence on the part of the landlord's valuer, the Judge fixed the rent at £2 12s. 6d. an acre—only 7s. 6d. below the old rent. Then he would refer to the appointment of Mr. J. R. Headeck as a Sub-Commissioner for Antrim and Derry. He hoped the farmers of the districts over whose interests Mr. Headeck would have jurisdiction would note the fact that Mr. Headeck was a Tipperary landlord, whose rents were considered by his tenants to be so excessive that he had recently been brought into Court by them. A man appointed to fix fair rents should be above suspicion; and it was an extraordinary fact that out of the whole of Ireland the Government should select for the counties of Derry and Antrim a landlord who was on the worst relations with his tenants. He would ask, also, why the names of the Sub-Commissioners had never been furnished to Parliament, as had been promised? The Government ought to appoint men of whom hon. Members sitting on that side of the House could have no complaint to make. That very day he addressed the Attorney General for Ireland a Question concerning Mr. Headeck's appointment; but he received no reply.

MR. W. E. FORSTER, interposing, said, he at once answered that Question by stating that Mr. Headeck was appointed a few days ago. He added that if the hon. Member would give him an opportunity of inquiring into the truth of the charge which had been made he would give him the required information.

MR. HEALY observed, that he asked the Question of the Attorney General for Ireland, and that the Chief Secretary for Ireland said nothing about the matter.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he got up and said he should be able to reply to the hon. Member fully next week.

MR. HEALY said, he had no recollection whatever of the right hon. Gentleman's reply. One of the Questions he had on the Paper related to Messrs. M'Devitt, Walpole, and Murphy. The right hon. Gentleman read a statement showing the number of appeals which had been made from their decisions. In his opinion, that simply proved that the tenants were poor men, and that they had no hope of justice; whereas the landlords had a powerful association at their back, and were prepared to push matters to the bitter end. The tenants were stricken down in the Courts; but the landlords were supplied with funds and allowed to carry on their own organization. The tenants' organization, as far as it appeared above the surface in the Courts, had been "felonized" by the right hon. Gentleman. In India, he believed, there were political representatives, who sent Reports to the Crown as to the feelings and condition of the people; but there was no one to stand between the Irish people and the Government. The information of the Chief Secretary for Ireland was derived from Executive officers who carried out the functions of the law. Independent men ought to be appointed in the various districts of Ireland to report to the right hon. Gentleman what the feelings of the people really were. Unless it were the intention of the Government to keep a sense of exasperation, they would take some steps to ascertain the feelings of the Irish people, and to put the administration of Ireland into harmony with those feelings.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. PORTER) said, he thought the hon. Member had made charges against individuals under circumstances of very great unfairness. The removal of Mr. Rice was not mentioned in the Question put by the hon. Member that afternoon. [MR. HEALY: It was involved in it.] No Notice whatever had been given of it. Mr. Rice was removed by the Land Commission, and not by the Government. Supposing he had been a person connected with the ownership of land—not as a tenant, but as a landlord in the district—would not the hon. Member himself have said that he was not a proper person to sit as a Judge there? In fact, it had been repeatedly urged by the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) in the House that Mr. Bomford, one of the Sub-Commissioners, had been improperly permitted to sit and discharge business in the county of Cavan, with which he was in some way connected. As to Mr. Walpole, everybody who knew Ireland must admit that a more upright gentleman did not exist. The objection raised against Mr. M'Devitt at the time of his appointment was that he was too favourable to the class of tenants. There was, in reality, no more foundation for that allegation than there was for the complaint now made against him. With regard to the charge made against Mr. O'Connor Morris, an able and upright Judge, no Notice had been given of it. When the matter was investigated, no doubt it would be found that that gentleman had good ground for pronouncing the decision complained of. The allegation as to Mr. Headeck was that he was engaged in litigation with his tenants, and that he had treated his tenants badly in Tipperary. If, however, it was a fact that some of his tenants were in the Land Court, it did not at all follow that they and Mr. Headeck were on the bad terms that had been described. It was unfair that statements not founded on facts should be made about a Sub-Commissioner which could only have the effect of prejudicing the community against him. Whatever charge might be brought against the Government, nobody could suppose that they would willingly do anything to bring the Land Act into disrepute. Certainly, the removal of Mr. Rice and the appointment of Mr. Headeck were not made with any such object; and he felt sure that landlords and tenants in the North of Ireland would be calm enough to wait until the charges had been substantiated. It had been insinuated that Mr. Rice had been removed on account of influence exercised by landlords, and particularly by two Noblemen who had been named. He was able to say that this statement was without foundation. If they approached the Land Commission with the view of interfering with the administration of justice, he was certain what answer they would receive. He urged the extreme unfairness of making charges of this kind, and he asked the public to suspend its judgment, and not to be misled by uncorroborated statements in newspapers and private letters.

Mr. Healy

MR. O'DONNELL said, that no one had any idea of attributing suicidal conduct to the Government. The fact remained that events occurred which very much astonished the Government when their attention was directed to them. He was aware that the Government were anxious to appoint Sub-Commissioners who would make the Land Act popular; but it was a fact that gentlemen were appointed Sub-Commissioners who had failed to secure the confidence of the classes for whose benefit they were appointed. The Government did not deprecate newspaper criticism in support of their policy, and they should not altogether disregard unfavourable criticism, particularly from friendly journals. The Cork Examiner was very fair and moderate, and yet it said that there were Sub-Commissioners of whom it would be glad to speak with confidence if it could. These questions could not take the Government by surprise if they were fully informed as to the antecedents of the gentlemen they appointed. But when an objection was raised they required three or four days or weeks to obtain information. He recommended the Government to pay more attention to the opinion of fair and moderate newspapers. He was certain that as time went on it would be seen more and more clearly that the whole object of the Irish Party was to make the Land Act more and not less efficient than it now was. It was already admitted on both sides of the House that the Act needed amendment, and there were many Members of the House who were now of the opinion of the small handful of Irish Irreconcilables of six months ago. With the object of permanently removing the grievances of the tenant, the Members of the Irish Party would support any measure that might be introduced on either side of the House, and if the Government would regard them as the mouthpieces of the vast majority of the cultivators of land in Ireland, it would greatly add to the prospect of peace in that country; but up to the present time the Government had set their face against every kind of counsel pressed upon them from those Benches. Now he asked the Government to turn over a new leaf, and to listen with confidence to the demands of the Irish people, instead of perpetually thwarting all proposals of reform. If they did this they would see the beginning of a new era. If they went a short way towards meeting the Irish Party, they would find that that Party would go a long way towards meeting them. After the heat and turmoil of the present conflict were passed history would admit the fact that on the whole the Irish Popular Party had been right in their contentions and their policy.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS I.—PUBLIC WORKS AND BUILDINGS.

(1.) £33,361, to complete the sum for Royal Palaces.

MR. BIGGAR called attention to the item of £1,300 on page 4 of the Votes for the repair of one of the Palaces. It seemed a very large sum for the repair of one establishment, and he should like to have an explanation of the item.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, the sum certainly was rather larger than usual; but it had arisen on account of the necessity of painting the exterior.

Vote agreed to.

(2.) £2,178, to complete the sum for Marlborough House.

(3.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £90,921, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1883, for the Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens."

MR. HEALY wished to put a question to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Commissioner of Works with regard to the Royal Parks. He believed that the right hon. Gentleman had recently taken some steps in the direction of throwing Hyde Park Corner open to the public; and he thought the Members of the House should have an opportunity of knowing what changes the right hon. Gentleman proposed to make. One remark he desired to make in reference to Hyde Park was this—that the whole of Hyde Park and Rotten Row were devoted to the pleasure and amusement of the wealthy and aristocratic classes who could afford to keep their carriages, while the humble plebeian was forbidden all access to them if he could only afford to hire a hansom cab. If he could afford to pay half-a-crown for a hackney carriage, he was able to enjoy the drive; but if he could only pay 1s. for a cab, he was prevented from doing so. If, instead of having only 1s., he happened to have a sovereign, he could go where he pleased; and he (Mr. Healy) wished to know upon what principle it was laid down that the man with only 1s. must not drive in the park, while the man with 20s. might? Why should the Committee be called upon to vote away the public money in order to give certain privileges to the aristocratic classes who were able to drive their carriages? He hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would in future give instructions that the parks should be as freely open to people using hackney carriages and hansom cabs as they were to the more aristocratic owners of private carriages.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he had urged the point raised by the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down for the last 15 years, and he had divided the Committee upon it; but he had certainly never found himself in a majority. It was monstrous, he thought, that the public, who paid for the parks, should not be allowed to use them, and that the money voted for their maintenance should be practically devoted to the exclusive use of wealthy persons who possessed carriages. There was not a single other park in the whole of Europe in which this exclusive right existed. The great value of a park was that it was a place where the rich and the poor might meet together. No doubt the right hon. Gentleman would tell them that the traffic would not permit of the admission of other vehicles; but if that were the case, then he (Mr. Labouchere) would suggest that there should be one day on which cabs should be excluded, and another day on which private carriages should be excluded. He remembered the Predecessor of the right hon. Gentleman in the Office of Works, 15 years ago, telling him that poor people derived a special pleasure from looking at the wealthy classes driving along the parks in their carriages. They might, if they liked, look at the wealthy people driving by; but if they desired to take a drive themselves in hired cabs, they were prevented from entering the parks. He claimed that the general public had as perfect a right to the full enjoyment of the parks as the wealthy classes.

Mr. O'Donnell

MR. BROADHURST said, he hoped that there would be a more liberal distribution of free seats in the Green Park and St. James's Park. Twelve months ago an assurance was given that a larger distribution would be made of free seats; but, so far from the promise having been carried out, there had been no addition whatever to the free seats, except it was in Hyde Park only. What he desired to point out was that it was not in Hyde Park that a larger supply of free seats was required, but in the Green Park, St. James's Park, Battersea Park, and Victoria Park. Those were the parks to which the working classes went for pleasure and pastime; and in them it was most difficult to find a seat without being pounced upon by the proprietor's agent with a demand for 1*d.* or 2*d.* The Green Park and St. James's Park were the rendezvous of the workpeople of Westminster, Lambeth, Soho, and those living in the neighbourhood of the Strand; and these persons were charged 1*d.* or 2*d.*, according to the size of the chair they occupied. [Laughter, and cries of "No!"] He believed the charge was 1*d.* for a single chair, and 2*d.* for an armchair. [An hon. MEMBER: No; only 1*d.* in each case.] He was glad to hear that there had been an improvement in that respect. He knew that it was so formerly. At any rate, the moment a person sat down in one of these chairs up went the agent of the proprietor, as though he had sprung from beneath it in some way or other, so rapid was he in the collection of the money. He thought that the collection of money for the use of seats in a public park ought to be entirely done away with; but if they could not do away with the payment for seats altogether, then he hoped the First Commissioner of Works would favourably entertain the proposition for largely increasing the number of free seats in the parks to which he (Mr. Broadhurst) had referred.

MR. W. H. JAMES said, he would support the request for more free seats in the parks. He was also anxious for further information in regard to the contemplated changes at Hyde Park Corner. He did not propose, however, to discuss the merits of those changes at the present moment; but he simply wished to elicit a statement from his right hon. Friend the Chief Commissioner as to what his intentions were.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH asked whether, in regard to the contemplated improvements at Hyde Park Corner, it was proposed to take any money in the present Estimates? He presumed that if the necessary sum were proposed to be voted in a Supplementary Estimate the Vote would be laid in due course before the House, and would afford the proper opportunity for a discussion. He should like to know, in the meantime, how much money it was intended to vote now?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, that it was his intention to take a Vote, probably not exceeding £3,000, in respect of the Hyde Park Corner improvements. That sum was necessary, not so much for the improvement itself, as for the removal of a reservoir which was rendered necessary by the scheme, and which it was also desirable to remove for other reasons. When the Treasury were asked to advance the money for the Hyde Park improvements he was bound to say that his noble Friend the Secretary to the Treasury (Lord Frederick Cavendish) was of opinion that the improvements were more of a Metropolitan than of an Imperial character, and expressed a doubt whether the House of Commons would feel justified in voting the money necessary to carry them out. His noble Friend, however, considered that he would be justified in asking for a Vote for the removal of the reservoir just mentioned; but that otherwise the whole expense of the improvement should be provided by the Metropolitan Board of Works or by the owners of private property. A Supplementary Vote would be laid before the House later in the Session. With regard to the question as to the seats in the parks raised by his hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-upon-Trent (Mr. Broadhurst), he might say that last year he had expended a considerable sum of money in providing additional seats in Hyde Park; and he had been under the impression that the same course had been taken in regard to St. James's Park. If he should prove to be wrong in that impression, he would undertake this year that an ample provision should be made for seats. No doubt, both St. James's Park and the Green Park were more used by the working classes than Hyde Park; and he should be very sorry that there should be any want of accommodation for them. In regard to the remarks which had been made by the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) and the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), he had to say that the complaint they had made in respect of the non-admission of hackney cabs in Hyde Park was one of long standing. In early times hackney cabs were permitted in Hyde Park and in the other parks, and the fact was recorded in the Memoirs of Pepys. The writer of that interesting diary frequently spoke of driving in Hyde Park in a hackney carriage; but at a subsequent period, when he was able to keep a carriage of his own, he appeared to be highly scandalized at the large number of hackney coaches that were to be seen there. At a later date, hackney coaches were altogether prohibited in the Parks, and the prohibition had been maintained because it was considered undesirable that the Parks should be converted into a mere thoroughfare for the use of people driving in cabs from one station to another. The prohibition had only been maintained in that sense; and there was no prohibition, even at the present moment, against the use of hackney carriages hired from a livery stable. The prohibition only applied to cabs hired in the streets. He thought it was for the interests of the public generally that the Royal Parks should not be made the mere medium of traffic from one part of London to another.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, there was another point upon which he was anxious to put a question to his right hon. Friend the Chief Commissioner in reference to the trees in Kew Gardens. He was given to understand that a good many trees had been cut down by the order of the Curator. The Curator pleaded, as his reason, not that the trees were objectionable, as trees, but that a good deal of flirtation went on beneath them. He thought it was hardly the business of the Curator to destroy the trees or to interfere in flirtations; and he wished to know whether the right hon. Gentleman had heard of the action of the Curator, and whether he intended to take notice of it in any way? He had, however, risen for another object—namely, to move that the Vote be reduced by the sum of £17,680, that being the cost of Battersea Park, Kennington Park, and Victoria Park. He did not understand upon what grounds the cost of all the new parks that were made in London was thrown upon the Public Treasury. It appeared to him that it ought to be paid by the ratepayers of the Metropolis, and that it should not fall upon the taxpayers of the country generally. Those parks had been bought at very great expenditure and by the public money. He believed that Victoria Park was a Royal Park; but he did not know whether the others were or not. He thought the Metropolitan Board of Works ought to take them over, and that it ought to be distinctly stated in the House of Commons that they were not prepared, year by year, to vote large sums of the public money for the maintenance of the parks in the Metropolis. With every desire that these open spaces should continue to exist in the Metropolis, he could not forget that it was a very wealthy Metropolis, and that it ought to pay for the health and enjoyment of its inhabitants. He certainly failed to see why there was any more reason why the public generally should pay for the maintenance of the parks in the Metropolis than that the people of London should pay for keeping up the parks in other parts of the country. He, therefore, begged to move that the Vote be reduced by the sum of £17,680; and he hoped that the Amendment would be taken as a hint that a stop must be put to the present habit of throwing upon the Public Exchequer expenses which ought to be borne by the localities.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That a sum not exceeding £73,241, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1883, for the Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens."—(Mr. Labouchere.)

Mr. Shaw Lefevre

MR. A. PEASE wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works if he could hold out any hope that Constitution Hill, from Buckingham Palace to Hyde Park Corner, would be thrown open to the public? It would be a great convenience to the public going by way of Pall Mall and St. James's Street to Hyde Park Corner to have this road thrown open. At present it was necessary that they should go round by a very circuitous route. There was no desire to interfere with the comfort or privacy of the Royal Family in the occupation of Buckingham Palace; but he believed that the route which would be taken would rather add to the privacy of the Palace than otherwise. He believed that the throwing open of the road would be most acceptable to the public; and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would be able to see his way to making the suggested alteration.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON said, that, only an hour or two ago, the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary (Sir William Harcourt) positively stated to him, in answer to a Question, that there was no item in the Votes for constables employed in London on special services, such as gate-keepers in the parks, or at the House of Commons, or in the public gardens. Remembering the answer which the right hon. and learned Gentleman gave him earlier in the evening, he would be glad if the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works would explain what was the meaning of the sum of £7,000 which appeared in the Votes for Metropolitan constables, paid specially for their services as constables and as gate-keepers in the parks. The payments, he understood, were for special and extraordinary services performed in the Metropolis. The complaint he had to make was that when similar services were performed in other localities, the cost was thrown upon the local ratepayers. When he put his Question to the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary at an earlier period of the evening, the right hon. and learned Gentleman, in the most absolute and barefaced manner, if he might say so—["Oh!"] Well, then, the right hon. and learned Gentleman, in the strongest and most emphatic manner, denied that this was the case in the Metropolis, notwithstanding that he was warned that such an item did appear upon the Estimates. With his usual confidence, the right hon. and learned Gentleman ridiculed the idea, and seemed to take it for granted that it was impossible he could be wrong.

MR. W. H. JAMES asked if the hon. Gentleman was in Order in referring to a past debate in the House?

THE CHAIRMAN said, that if the hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Stanley Leighton) was referring to the debate which had taken place that night he was out of Order.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON said, he was only asking for information. He was much obliged to the hon. Member for Gateshead (Mr. James) for putting him right; but he merely wished to know why a charge appeared in the Estimates for the special services of constables in London, whereas charges for similar services were thrown on the ratepayers in the country. He thought that the whole of these charges, instead of being included in the Civil Service Estimates, ought to be paid for by the Metropolis itself. He again asked for some explanation whether it actually was the case that special services on the part of constables were inserted in the Estimates when they were rendered in the Metropolis, while similar services in the country were paid for out of the local rates?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, he thought the hon. Member was wrong in the statement he had attributed to the Home Secretary.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF rose to Order. He wished to know whether the right hon. Gentleman was in Order in alluding to a past debate?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, that if there was any objection he would not continue the subject. The item referred to was for the services of police in the parks; and, personally, he thought it was a charge that ought to be borne by the local authorities, and not by the public generally. With regard to the question raised by his hon. Friend the Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), it was a question which had been discussed in the House in previous years—namely, whether the cost of some of the parks—Victoria, Battersea, and Kennington—should not be borne by the ratepayers? That was a question which might be fairly considered whenever the new Municipalities were provided for; and as that was a question that was likely to arise shortly, he thought it would be better to defer the subject until it could be properly discussed. Whenever that time did arrive, there were several items on the other side which would also have to be discussed; and he was by no means certain that the Treasury would be a gainer by taking all these matters over. For instance, there was the item of the City Police, of which the City at present bore the whole expense. Whenever the whole question came to be raised he did not think the public would gain much by throwing the expense of the parks upon the Metropolis, and having, on their part, to bear the expense of the City Police. The matter, however, was one which might be deferred until the question of the London Municipality came to be discussed. With regard to Kew Gardens, he had seen a statement in the papers the other day with reference to the cutting down of certain trees. Now, he should no more dream of asking a question of the Curator of Kew Gardens in reference to the maintenance of everything that was beautiful in Kew Gardens than he should of asking a lawyer an opinion about his brief, or a doctor about his prescription. He thought the question was one that might safely be left in the hands of Sir Joseph Hooker, who had the entire interests of Kew Gardens at heart, and who was not likely to allow anything prejudicial to happen to the trees there.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, that his hon. Friend the Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) had asked a question about Battersea Park. Now, Battersea Park was a very old friend of the House. The sum of £500,000 was spent some years ago upon Battersea Park; and, at the time that arrangement was entered into, it was understood that the improvements effected in the surrounding property, under good letting, would recoup the Treasury for a considerable portion of the outlay. He was sorry to find that the promise had turned out as he expected it would at the time it was made. After an interval of some 20 or 25 years, the land and building plots, which they were told were to be so profitable, had not been utilized, and the £500,000 advanced by the Treasury had never been recouped. He should be glad to know what improvements had been made, and what funds were available for paying the large expense of the maintenance of Battersea Park, for which a sum of £5,300 was asked in the present Estimate? He thought that, to some extent, the promise made by the Government at the time the park was taken should be carried out, and that the country should not be saddled with this very large annual charge.

MR. RITCHIE said, he must confess that he had heard with much astonishment the proposal of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere). He was somewhat surprised that an hon. Member with such strong Radical proclivities should make a proposal to throw the cost of the parks at Battersea, Kennington, and the East End of London upon the ratepayers; but that the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works should give the slightest countenance to the proposal of the hon. Gentleman certainly filled him with amazement. Now, what was the proposal? It amounted to this—that the parks of the rich should be supported out of the Consolidated Fund; but that the parks of the poor in the East End and in other parts of London, used solely for the enjoyment and recreation of the humbler classes, should be supported by the ratepayers. Anything more astounding, coming from such a quarter, it was impossible to conceive; and whether the right hon. Gentleman made such a proposal now or at any future time, he should certainly give it a most uncompromising opposition.

COLONEL NOLAN said, he wished to ask a question with regard to seed potatoes. He could not find any distinct reference to that subject in this Vote, and yet, when he had raised the matter previously, he had been put off until the present occasion. He wished to know if the Financial Secretary could inform him whether there was any provision in the Vote in regard to seed potatoes?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, he could assure his hon. and gallant Friend that the Vote had nothing whatever to do with seed potatoes.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, the hon. Member clearly thought the Vote referred to the question of seed potatoes, as it made provision for the Botanical Gardens at Kew. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works would explain what the items were that were included in the Vote.

Mr. Shaw Lefevre

MR. W. H. JAMES wished to deny the assertion of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie) that it was desired to pay for the Royal Parks out of the Consolidated Fund, and to tax the public for the East End Parks.

MR. HEALY rose to Order. He wished to know if the hon. Member for Gateshead (Mr. W. H. James) was in order in referring to a past debate?

MR. W. H. JAMES said, he was not referring to a past debate, but to the present debate, in the course of which the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie) had suggested that while the parks in the West End were supported out of the Consolidated Fund, those in the East End should be paid for out of the local rates. If the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets had given a little more attention to the debate, he would have found that nothing of the kind had been suggested. So far as the East End Parks were concerned, it was perfectly competent for the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) to form an opinion that the Corporation of London had ample means at their command to enable them to support them.

MR. RITCHIE said, he thought the hon. Member must have been asleep, or dreaming, while the discussion was going on, for he had entirely misrepresented what he (Mr. Ritchie) had said. He had said nothing whatever to the effect that the parks in the East End of London should be supported out of the rates; on the contrary, he had strongly objected to that proposition. The point raised by the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) was that the Royal Parks—the parks of the rich—should continue to be maintained out of the Consolidated Fund; but that the parks of the East End of London, which were essentially the parks of the poor, should be supported out of the rates. To that proposition he (Mr. Ritchie) entirely objected. There might be some technical distinction between the Royal Parks and the other parks in London; but the people of the Metropolis would fail to understand that distinction, and they could only see, in any proposition of the kind, a proposal that the parks enjoyed and utilized by the rich were to continue to be supported out of the public funds, while those which were used by the poor were to be paid for out of the local rates. The hon. Member for Gateshead (Mr. W. H. James) must certainly have been asleep, or dreaming, during the time that he (Mr. Ritchie) was making his remarks.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he had not the slightest desire that Hyde Park, or any park in London, should be paid for out of the Consolidated Fund. He had only proposed the Amendment, throwing upon the ratepayers the cost of the three parks he had mentioned, because they were the last three which had been taken over. If his proposition were accepted, he should be prepared, at another time, to move that all the parks in London should be supported by the ratepayers of the Metropolis. He had certainly no desire to draw an invidious distinction between the Royal Parks and those which the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie) represented.

MR. RITCHIE asked why the hon. Gentleman did not include the whole of them in his Motion?

MR. LABOUCHERE said, his only object in dividing the Committee at all was to register a protest against the expense of the parks being thrown upon the public. He hoped that his proposition would be considered by the Home Secretary, and that the right hon. and learned Gentleman would insert some such provision in his new Municipal Bill.

COLONEL NOLAN desired to have some particulars about the Vote for Kew Gardens, which was a very large one—namely, £10,000. Was the sum given simply for the support of the School of Botany? If so, it seemed to be a very expensive school. He noticed an item of £800 for a refrigerator; and he wished to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether Sir Joseph Hooker did anything more in connection with Kew Gardens than superintend the school? No doubt the school was a very valuable one; but he thought there might be a distribution of seeds in other parts of the Kingdom, and even in India.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, it was scarcely necessary to state that at Kew Gardens there was a very valuable School of Botany, and that it did an enormous amount of scientific work. No doubt the Vote for Kew Gardens was large; but that was on account of the variety and enormous quantity of work which was carried on there. He could hardly say what the amount of work was, or what the value of it was; but it was very well known that the amount of it was very great.

MR. CARBUTT said, the right hon. Gentleman had not answered the question which had been put to him as to the use of Constitution Hill. At present a person desiring to go in a cab in that direction had to go round by Park Lane and through the back streets; but if he happened to have a carriage he could go right through the park and along Constitution Hill.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, he had to apologize to the hon. Member for Whitby (Mr. A. Pease) for not having answered the question sooner. He was afraid he could hold out no hopes in regard to the throwing open of Constitution Hill. The question was rather a delicate one; it had not yet been raised, and at present he did not propose to raise it. It was right, however, to say that Her Majesty had given Her consent to the improvements proposed to be carried out in connection with Hyde Park Corner, although, to some extent, they would interfere with Her private gardens at Buckingham Palace. He would make some inquiries as to permission for cabs to cross Hyde Park. He was under the impression that cabs were now allowed to go across the western division of Hyde Park.

MR. HEALY understood that the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) was going to divide the Committee upon his Motion. He presumed that it would be open for him (Mr. Healy), after that Motion was disposed of, to move the reduction of the Vote by a smaller sum?

THE CHAIRMAN was understood to reply in the affirmative.

MR. BUXTON asked whether, if Her Majesty gave up a portion of Her rights in connection with Buckingham Palace Gardens, it was proposed to make any addition to the Palace Gardens in another direction?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, that was not the case. There would be no addition whatever to the gardens of Buckingham Palace; but, on the contrary, there would be a contraction of them.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked what was the meaning of an item in the Vote which stated that the roads at Kew cost £700 a-year? Were they public roads, or the roads of the pleasure gardens? If they were not in the botanic and pleasure gardens he did not see why they should be included in the Vote.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, the right hon. Gentleman had not answered his question—whether any income was derived from the improvements in Battersea Park?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, the hon. Member (Sir Patrick O'Brien) was mistaken as to the original cost of Battersea Park. The cost was £200,000, and not £500,000. £100,000 had already been repaid by the sale of property; the remaining £100,000 had not been repaid; but there was a certain part of the property let on lease. In all probability something like £60,000 or £70,000 would never be repaid. The park had now been open for a considerable number of years. In regard to the Kew roads, he did not know exactly what the arrangement was; but he would make inquiries.

MR. RITCHIE said, there was one question which he would like to put to the First Commissioner of Works upon this matter. During the hours of daylight or sunlight people could walk across Kensington Gardens; but at certain times, ranging from 4 until 7 o'clock, the gates were closed; and he wished to know whether they could not be kept open until a later hour? He was at a loss to understand why the gates could not be kept open to a much later hour, in order to save persons who lived on the other side of the park the trouble and inconvenience of going a long distance out of their way. Of course, he was aware that the keeping of the gates open might involve an additional expense; but the present regulations were a source of so much inconvenience that he trusted the right hon. Gentleman would reconsider the matter.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he could speak from personal experience of the great inconvenience which resulted from closing the park gates at so early an hour. He had repeatedly crossed the park in the afternoon, and found the gates closed at 4 o'clock on his return. The rule now in force seemed to him most unnecessary, and he hoped the First Commissioner of Works would take into consideration the desirability of altering it as soon as possible.

MR. O'DONNELL suggested that the Committee might be able to get through the Business of the evening with a clearer idea of what they were doing by disposing of one matter at a time. Hon. Members had already before them an important question, raised by the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), which had created a great amount of disinterested activity on the part of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie). It would be well to come to a settlement of that question first, because he was sure that the subject of seed crops at Kew Gardens, referred to by the hon. and gallant Member opposite (Colonel Nolan), had been very imperfectly explained to the apprehension of a large number of Members.

COLONEL NOLAN said, he simply wished to know if Kew Gardens were used, to a considerable extent, for the propagation of seeds and plants for particular purposes, and if there was any other establishment in this country which was used for the same purpose?

THE CHAIRMAN said, the hon. and gallant Member was not in Order in raising that question on the present Vote.

COLONEL NOLAN remarked that he had carefully avoided alluding to seed potatoes.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, there was no other establishment in England used for the purpose alluded to by the hon. and gallant Member. He thought, however, there was one other in Edinburgh; but he understood that no plants were being propagated there.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, as the question before the Committee was the proposed reduction of the Vote by a certain sum of money which included the expenses of maintaining Battersea Park, he was surprised that when the right hon. Gentleman rose to reply to the questions which had been put to him, he should have omitted to answer the very pertinent inquiry addressed to him by the hon. Member for King's County (Sir Patrick O'Brien). It was mentioned in connection with Battersea Park that a large sum of money had been advanced some years ago, and the hon. Member for King's County had inquired the amount of the funds derived from the land. He would be glad to know what sum the right hon. Gentleman expected to get this year on account of Battersea Park, because the sum due in the shape of interest alone was more than enough to cover the item charged for maintenance.

MR. O'DONNELL said, as the result of the pending division would possibly leave the park at Battersea within the control of that House, he begged, in the interest of the poor clerks and artizans who visited it, especially on Sunday, to ask what necessity there was for tying up the little pleasure boats on that day, without any regard to the feelings of those who would like to use them? He ventured to hope that the arrangements at the park, which would doubtless remain under the control of the House of Commons, would be made to suit the public requirements, and that between then and next year the grievance he had referred to would be remedied. He thought it was pushing Biblical prudery too far to say that we were not to be allowed to amuse ourselves in a harmless manner on Sundays. There were great numbers of young men in the Metropolis who would be glad to use their muscles in the wholesome exercise of canoeing, but who had no chance of doing so in consequence of the present absurd arrangements, the alteration of which, in the direction indicated, he felt sure would confer a considerable boon on a deserving class.

MR. RITCHIE said, that the hon. Member for Dungarvan had certainly not acted upon the advice he had himself given to the Committee a short time ago, that questions should be dealt with in their proper order; and, therefore, he suggested to the consideration of the hon. Member whether it would not be better to reserve his observations upon canoes until the Navy Estimates were reached? He trusted the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works, although he had not replied to the question relating to Kensington Gardens, would endeavour to do something in the direction proposed.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, he would make inquiries into the regulations for closing the gates at Kensington Gardens; and if he found it practicable to alter them in the direction suggested by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie) he would certainly do so. Of course, he could not hold out any expectation that the gates would remain open all night, because there were many considerations which rendered that unde-airable; but if it were possible they should be kept open longer than usual. He had found it necessary to shut up a portion of St. James's Park during the night, in consequence of complaints made to him by clergymen and others, and he was afraid his hon. Friend might not approve that step. With regard to Battersea park, he reminded the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) that this was not the only park in which there were lakes with boats upon them. It had been usual for many years past to let out boats upon the water in Hyde Park on week days, but not on Sundays, and he was quite satisfied that the public would not wish that practice to be altered. It might be a Sabbatarian view of the case; but he pointed out to the hon. Member that if the boats were let for hire on Sundays a considerable number of persons would be requisite to attend upon them, and these would, in consequence, be deprived of their day of rest. The tendency, on the whole, was to use the parks as places for walking in on Sundays, and there was a general feeling against them being made use of for other purposes, as was the case in former days. He remembered the time when a number of carriages were to be seen in the parks on Sundays; but that was not so now, the reason being, as he believed, that people wished their servants to be employed on Sundays as little as possible. He was sorry to say that there were long arrears of interest upon the money advanced for Battersea Park. The original sum expended was £200,000, of which £100,000 had been repaid.

MR. O'DONNELL said, that, although there appeared to be a conscientious objection to the employment of men to take pence for boat hire on Sunday afternoons, the same objection was not felt to the employment of the persons who took pence on Sundays for the use of chairs in the parks. For his own part, he was unable to see any difference between the two cases.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE believed the Committee would understand that chairs were more essential than boats to the comfort of the public using the parks.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 44; Noes 139: Majority 95.—(Div. List, No. 69.)

Mr. Shaw Lefevre

Original Question again proposed.

MR. HEALY said, he rose for the purpose of moving the reduction of the Vote by the odd £921. The right hon. Gentleman, in the reply he had tendered, had not given satisfaction as to this matter of refusing to allow cabs to pass through the Parks. He had only stated that the custom in question was an old one, and that was no explanation. Moreover, the case of Mr. Heaps that the right hon. Gentleman had quoted seemed, so far as he (Mr. Healy) could gather, to be altogether in favour of the argument to which the right hon. Gentleman had replied. When Mr. Heaps was poor he was in favour of being allowed to pass through the Parks in cabs; but when he grew rich he was scandalised at such a proceeding on the part of anybody else. A man who hired a hackney cab for, say, 1s., was not allowed to drive through Hyde Park; but a man who hired a carriage could drive through them as much as he liked. The disability in the case of the person who engaged the cab did not apply to Hyde Park alone, but to Richmond Park as well. It could not be said that the traffic was as great in the latter as in the former; and if there was anything in the argument that people driving in their carriages through Hyde Park, where there was such a large amount of carriage traffic, would be scandalized to see people in cabs admitted amongst them, the same argument could not apply in the case of Richmond Park. Whatever he might do in the matter of Hyde Park, would the right hon. Gentleman, at least, guarantee that in the, comparatively speaking, little-used Park at Richmond the restriction which was complained of would be taken off? This House of Commons was, broadly speaking, a House of rich men—to a great extent an aristocratic Assembly—and it did not come well from a Body, so many of whom were supposed to represent the aristocratic classes, to keep up this disability against the poor. When the House became more and more democratic, as it would become—nay, as it was becoming—no doubt it would put a stop to the Chamber being a preserve for the rich. Rotten Row, the Ladies' Mile, and other rides and drives, were kept up for the benefit of the aristocratic classes. The rich were allowed to air themselves and their conveyances in these places; and when, on behalf of the poor, it was urged merely that cabs could be admitted within the Parks, those who made the request were met by the aristocratic classes saying, "Oh! the traffic is too great." Possibly, the hours during which the aristocratic classes disported themselves in the parks, there might be too much of the present traffic for the admission of traffic of another kind; but there were certain hours during the night and day when fashion did not allow the aristocracy to show themselves in these places, and, during those hours, it could not be said that "the traffic was too great" to admit cabs. At 12 o'clock at night, for instance, the aristocracy were not riding and driving up and down, at any rate, in anything like numbers, and the sight of a hackney carriage would not annoy them, nor its presence interfere with them very much. It would not come between the wind and their nobility. Then, again, there were certain seasons when "nobody" was supposed to be in London; and if "nobody" was in Hyde Park, why was it that the poor were not allowed to drive through it in cabs? In the Phoenix Park in Dublin they could drive in cabs as much as they liked, and the Park was in that way a great boon to the public. People of the middle and lower classes, and, for that matter, anyone, could drive through the Park on Sundays on pleasure excursions; but directly a person in a hackney carriage came to Richmond Park gates he was stopped by a policeman or a "Ranger," and told that he could not go through. Probably if the hackney carriage driver was to remove the number from his conveyance and cover up his badge he might be allowed to drive through; but if he did that, he would be acting illegally, and subjecting himself to a heavy penalty. He (Mr. Healy) moved the reduction of the Vote as a protest against hackney cabs being allowed entrance to the parks, and so that, the attention of the right hon. Gentleman being called to the matter, he might consider it, and, probably next year, see his way to making some concession.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £90,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1883, for the Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens."—(Mr. Healy.)

MR. EDWARD SHELL said, that in the Estimates under the head of St. James's Park, Green Park, and Hyde Park, there was an item for Police; and in another Vote in the Department of "Rangers" there was a sum of £1,273 for "Park Constables." How was it that this high charge for constables was not included in the large item immediately preceding it?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, the constables of the parks were an entirely different body from the Metropolitan Police. The Metropolitan Police were employed in the parks; but, in addition to these, there were constables who were permanent officials there. The hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) was mistaken with regard to Richmond Park. ["No, no!"] Well, certainly, he was not aware of the restriction complained of by the hon. Member. He had recently driven through the park in a fly hired from the Station without being interfered with. With regard to Hyde Park, it was only a matter of public convenience whether or not cabs should be allowed in the drives. From Lancaster Gate to Queen's Gate cabs were allowed; therefore, if it was said that a thoroughfare was required in the park through which cabs could drive, the answer was that it already existed. There was no other drive in which it was considered necessary to allow cabs; but if a thoroughfare was desirable in any other direction, no doubt cabs would be permitted to use it. He objected to this being considered a question as between rich and poor; and, in the interest of the poor themselves, it was important that they should prevent the parks being used merely for traffic purposes, for enabling people to get conveyance from one point to another. The people who used the park went there for enjoyment; and it was, therefore, desirable to limit the use of it as a thoroughfare as much as possible.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, he did not think the explanation they had just heard was particularly satisfactory, inasmuch as it left the question just where it was before. It seemed that a certain class of persons might drive in that part of Hyde Park set apart for driving, whilst another class were not allowed that privilege. People who used SHAW LEFEVRE said, he be sorry if he had misled the Committee on this matter. He had said there was no prohibition against passing through Richmond Park, he had been of opinion that that was the case; but the hon. Member had to dispute it. He would propose to make inquiries into the sub-

HEALY said, he did not wish to trouble the Committee to the trouble of an Amendment, and that if the right hon. Gentleman would promise to consider the matter with a view of increasing the facilities to the public for passing through Richmond Park, he (Mr. Healy) would withdraw his Amendment, and would leave the question to the right hon. Gentleman to bring the matter some time next week. The Members might fairly be satisfied with the right hon. Gentleman's promise. If, however, he (Mr. Healy) was in the House next year he would interrogate the Government as to the advisability of allowing Hyde Park to remain open all day and all night, so that the ordinary traffic there could not be interfered with by the admission of cabs.

BYRNE said, that he himself had been prohibited from driving through Richmond Park in a fly. He had gone on two occasions, once he had gone for the purpose of getting a little air, and that was the occasion on which he was prevented from passing; but on another occasion, when he arrived at the Park Gates, the driver and they were going to Lord John Russell's, and they were allowed to proceed. From this it had seemed to him that Hyde Park was not so much for the use of the public as for Lord John Russell.

SCHREIBER said, he wished to draw the attention of the First Commissioner of Works to the condition of the statues in Hyde Park. What, he said, had originally been a flaw in the casting had developed, under the action of time and the London weather, into a serious wound, not, as it had been expected, on the heel, but on the calf of the right leg. The position of the statue gave him the impression that if it was not for the coat of arms behind it, the leg would break and the statue fall forward. He had been sent for the purpose of calling attention to this matter.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, he would certainly inquire into the matter.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £31,110, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1883, for the Buildings of the Houses of Parliament."

MR. GORST said, he wished to make a suggestion to Her Majesty's Government, which he thought would facilitate the course of Public Business, and it was, that they should now agree to Progress being reported. The noble Marquess the present Leader of the Government (the Marquess of Hartington) had announced that he intended to-night to make a proposition which he himself would admit was of an unprecedented nature. It was one to which the House could not be expected to assent without, at least, some discussion. In order that that discussion might take place, he suggested that the Government should agree to the Chairman reporting Progress.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, he would move to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.)

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he did not propose to go beyond the next Vote. It would be convenient if the Committee would consent to take that. ["No, no!"] If he thought it would necessitate a long discussion, he would not suggest that they should take the next Vote. They, however, would be able to deal with the next Vote in a very short time.

MR. HEALY said, if, as the noble Lord stated, it would not take them long to dispose of the next Vote, it would not take them long when it came on again.

Question put, and agreed to.

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported upon Monday next.

Committee also report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (re-committed)
BILL.—[BILL 113.]

(Mr. Hibbert, Secretary Sir William Harcourt.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That this House will, upon Tuesday next, at Two of the clock, resolve itself into the said Committee.”—(Lord Richard Grosvenor.)

Mr. CHAPLIN said, that on this occasion he rose for the purpose of opposing the Motion that the Bill be taken at 2 o'clock on Tuesday next. He had some reason to complain of the very scant Notice that had been given to the House of the intention of Her Majesty's Government to appropriate the Tuesdays for the rest of the Session. It was true the noble Lord had made an announcement to that effect last night; but he (Mr. Chaplin) should like to call the attention of the House to the circumstances under which that announcement was made. He did not say it was the fault of the noble Lord; but, whosoever the fault, it was the fact that the Motion was made during the dinner-hour, when the House was nearly empty, and nine out of ten Members in the building were not in a position to know that such an announcement had been made. Let the House for a moment consider what were the Motions that were to be superseded in this high-handed way by the action of Her Majesty's Government. He had looked at the list of Motions for Tuesday, and found that there was a Motion to be made on the subject of Lunacy, and another on the much-vexed question of the Deceased Wife's Sister. Whatever might be the opinions they entertained on the last-named subject, there could be no doubt it was one which excited very considerable interest in the House and very widespread interest in the country. Then, he observed, there was a Motion down for leave to introduce a Bill for Sunday Closing, which was also a question that excited great interest in the country and in the minds of many hon. Members in the House. There was, further, a Motion by an Irish Member in regard to the remuneration of teachers in primary schools in Ireland. Even this did not exhaust the whole list; because there were other Motions which would be brought forward on Tuesday, if opportunity occurred, which did not appear on the Paper. He happened to know of one himself—a Motion in which he was interested, which he submitted to the House of Commons last year, and which he had been anxiously waiting for an opportunity of bringing forward again this year. The question was one which excited great interest in the agricultural community of this country. He was anxious to call attention to this—that, in spite of all remonstrances from the Opposition side of the House last Session, it was the fact that the importation of diseased cattle into this country had been permitted almost every month. This was a state of things which caused great anxiety and alarm amongst the agricultural portion of the community, and it occurred at a period when the interests of agriculture were most depressed, and when the condition of the agricultural classes deserved the earnest attention of Parliament and the country. The Motion on that subject would be superseded entirely if this proposition of the noble Lord were accepted. But he wished to remind the House that it was not only the Motions which stood on the Paper for Tuesday next, but the Motions for every succeeding Tuesday in the Session, which would be superseded if the noble Lord's Motion were adopted. On consulting the Order Book, he found that the first Motion of importance down for a Tuesday after the Tuesday he had referred to was one which would ask the House of Commons to declare that the maintenance of the Church Establishment in Scotland was indefensible. No one who was at all acquainted with public feeling in Scotland, whatever opinion they might entertain with regard to it, could deny that this was a question which excited immense interest in Scotland at the present time; and it was a question which he should think, judging from what had fallen from him with regard to it, possessed considerable interest for the noble Lord himself. An hon. Member sitting on his left (Sir H. Drummond Wolff), he also found, had a Motion down on the Paper for a Tuesday—a Motion of immense importance, in which he proposed to call the attention of the House of Commons to the recent course of events in Egypt, and move a Resolution. This subject was one which deserved the attention of the House, and which ought not to be summarily disposed of by the action of the Government in taking the days of private Members. This Motion was followed by one standing in the name of a most devoted and constant supporter of the Government—the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands)—and it had reference to the present enormous amount of the National Expenditure. This Motion was practically a Vote of Censure on the Government for the extravagant expenditure in which they were indulging at the present time. He (Mr. Chaplin) should like to know what would have been said by the other side, supposing the Conservative Party had been in power, and they had been guilty of a similar expenditure to that which right hon. and hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench were incurring, and a Vote of Censure on them had been proposed, and they had endeavoured to supersede it by appropriating private Members' days? There was a vast number of other Motions—beyond those he had mentioned, he saw a list of eight or nine, all of them deserving of the attention of the House of Commons—which hon. Members were waiting for an opportunity of bringing forward. There was one which related to the question of arrears of rent in Ireland; another which called attention to the progress of Russia in Central Asia. Although it was perfectly true that there had been four or five occasions of late on which the House had been counted out on the nights which were appropriated to private Members, they must remember that these "counts out" had been very much the fault of Her Majesty's Government in not assisting, as they ought to have done, in keeping a House; and that it had so happened that those private Members who had Notices on the Paper which did possess great interest to the House of Commons had not been fortunate enough to obtain a place on the Paper, which gave a reasonable hope that their Motions were likely to be considered. All these Motions to which he had alluded were to be sacrificed by the action of the Government. If the Government had intimated to the House that they intended to raise any question of great importance on Tuesday; if they had given the smallest idea, for instance, that the House might expect to hear from them a statement on a subject which all classes were waiting so anxiously to hear something about—namely, the policy they proposed to pursue in Ireland for the future, in the place of that which had so disastrously collapsed—or, indeed, if they had given the House some reason to imagine that they intended to adopt some proposal really to facilitate the progress of Public Business in the House, and which would have commended itself to the general sense and feeling of the House of Commons, then, he believed, on both sides of the House, there would have been a general disposition to give them every opportunity they sought; but the House had heard of nothing of the kind. On the contrary, judging from the utterances of the Government, there was every reason to believe that they intended to proceed with their 1st Resolution as to Public Business in the House, without any alteration or modification whatever, although it was repugnant to almost every hon. Gentleman on that (the Opposition) side, and to the vast majority on the Ministerial side of the House. Practically, it came to this—that they were asked to sacrifice all the days of private Members for the rest of the Session in order to give facilities to the Government for proceeding with proposals which did not commend themselves in any considerable degree to the general sense or feeling of the House. But he thought he might, perhaps, on even broader grounds than these, ask hon. Members to resist this Motion. Unless he was mistaken, the present Government last Session appropriated a larger amount of public time than had ever, in his recollection, been appropriated by an Administration; and what had been the result? Nearly the whole of that time was devoted to the consideration of Irish questions, and to the development of what they were pleased to call the Irish policy of the Government; and what had followed on that, which he would call their misuse of so much time? Why, it was described the other night by an hon. Member who was a most devoted and consistent supporter of Her Majesty's Government—a Member for whose opinion the Government entertained the utmost respect, and whom they had appointed to serve in a most responsible position in Ireland—he was speaking of the hon. Member for the County of Cork (Mr. Shaw). This hon.

Member had said that what had followed on the policy of Her Majesty's Government, to which so much of the public time had been devoted, was this—"that at the present moment"—he (Mr. Chaplin) was quoting the hon. Member's exact words—"there was absolute war between the Government and the people of some counties of Ireland." If the Government had so misused the time placed at their disposal last Session, and then called upon private Members to sacrifice the days appropriated to private Members, and such results were to follow from that sacrifice, the less time that was in future placed at the disposal of the Government the better—for, so far as he was able to form a judgment, the more time they got, the more mischief they did. He therefore proposed to omit the words "at Two of the clock."

Amendment proposed, to leave out the words "Two of the clock."—(Mr. Chaplin.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS: I am not going to enter into the large question which my hon. Friend has raised; but, with every wish to further the Business of the House, there is one matter upon which I wish to ask a question of the noble Marquess, not relating to any Motion for Tuesdays, but to the Bills which come after Motions. Very often on Tuesdays the Motions disappear, and the Wednesdays are absolutely absorbed already, so that no one has a chance of putting down a Bill for fair discussion. The only chance, therefore, is that any Bill which it is wished to promote should be taken on Tuesday, when the Motions are practically disposed of. But if the Government take four hours from the Tuesday Sitting, there is very little chance for such a Bill, and its chance is almost reduced to a nullity. It is sometimes said that the House of Lords have not done much work; but they have undoubtedly passed one or two Bills of importance, and it is with regard to one of those measures, which deals with a question of vital importance at the present moment, especially having regard to the recent agricultural depression, that I wish to ask a question—I mean the Bill relating to Settled Estates. I shall not enter into the merits of that Bill, but it deals with that question in a large and comprehensive spirit; and I think it is due to the trouble taken by the Lord Chancellor upon the matter that the House of Commons should express its opinion upon the second reading of this Bill before any long time shall have elapsed. I am sure the noble Lord will agree that it is a matter of great importance, and one in which great interest is felt by the country. If the Government are going to take the whole of the Tuesdays into their own hands, I hope I may have an opportunity of taking a discussion upon the second reading of that Bill. I quite admit that, it being down for Tuesday, which is a Motion day, there is some chance of getting it on; but if you take half of Tuesday away, that chance is reduced to a nullity. I hope, if the Government persist in this Motion, some facility may be given for the discussion of that measure.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I do not propose to follow the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) into the remarks he has made with reference to the Procedure Rules of the Government, or their policy in Ireland. No doubt, the hon. Member thinks that any opportunity is a sufficient peg upon which to hang an attack upon the Government; but I am under the impression that sufficient time has been given to those subjects, and that, at all events, there will be other opportunities, perhaps more appropriate than this, for discussing them. The fact is that, although the time has varied in different ways, the practice of asking for Morning Sitzings on Tuesdays and Fridays has been resorted to in previous years very much earlier than is now proposed. In 1878, when the Conservatives were in power, five Morning Sitzings had actually been held before the date at which I am now addressing the House—namely, on March 19th, for Supply; on March 26th; on March 29th, for the Mutiny Bill; on April 12th, for Ways and Means; and on April 16th, for the Budget Bill. The hon. Member says the House might have considered this proposal if we had any measure of first-rate importance to bring forward. The hon. Member has altogether omitted to state whether he considers the Municipal Corporations Bill of importance or not. It does not appear to be one in which he takes any interest; but I venture to think it is, at least, of as much importance as any of those I have enumerated, and which, during 1878, were discussed at five Morning Sitzings before this date. Then the hon. Member says we are going to appropriate the Tuesdays. That is putting the case a little too strongly. We are only going to ask the House to give us the Morning Sitting, and the Evening Sitting will remain for private Members; and if private Members will only avail themselves of the Evening Sitting they will still have as long a period for the discussion of any Motion as they have thought it desirable to take on any Tuesday up to the present time this Session. The hon. Member has alluded to some of the Notices, and he appears to consider that they relate to matters of very great importance. All I can say is, that it is extremely unfortunate that all the importance and apparent interest in these Motions should have managed to postpone themselves until a Tuesday at the end of April, and that, on those successive Tuesdays on which those measures of importance might have been brought forward, the House has been so unfortunate that nothing has been presented for its consideration except matters which could not attract the attention of a quorum of 40 Members. The hon. Member reproaches the Government with not having kept a House; but it is impossible for the Government to take that responsibility. It never has been taken by the Government. I do not think a quorum of 40 Members is an unreasonable proportion to ask the House to form; and if an hon. Member has a Motion to bring forward, and cannot secure the attendance of 40 Members without the assistance of the Government, I think he has no great reason to complain if the Sitting is cut short. The hon. Member has raised the consideration of subjects which are still on the Paper for discussion. I make this proposal, in great part, for the purpose of suggesting a way of preventing time from actually being wasted; and, as I have already said, on six successive Tuesday nights, although there is a great deal of work to be done, the House has adjourned within a few hours of meeting. That, so far as the Government are aware, is a state of things extremely likely to be repeated; and we think it will be for the convenience of the House and in the interests of the public that, at all events, the mornings of these days should be applied to making progress with Public Business. There is one other ground upon which I may appeal to the House to assent to this Motion. I think that any Member who has attended the course of Business during the present Session must have observed how large a proportion of the time nominally appropriated to the purposes of the Government is virtually appropriated to independent Members. The hon. Member talks of our appropriating the time of private Members; I have shown that we do not appropriate the whole of Tuesdays. We only ask for a certain portion of Tuesdays by taking a Morning Sitting; and if hon. Members will recollect how many Mondays and Thursdays, when Supply has been on the Paper, almost the whole time has been spent in Motions that the Speaker leave the Chair, I think they will come to the conclusion that some reciprocal concession is due to the Government. The hon. Member opposite said a short time ago that every delay in Business is owing to the mismanagement of the Government, and the Prime Minister said he never recollected a time when that statement was not made by the Opposition. I dare say it has often been made with considerable truth; but, at the same time, I think the House must admit that it is impossible for us, or any other Government, to make bricks without straw; and if the whole of the time on nominal Government nights is to be appropriated by discussions on the Motion that the Speaker leave the Chair, and we are not allowed the privilege which has been given to other Governments in the matter of Morning Sitzings, I do not see how the House can expect the Government to make any progress. With reference to what has been said by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir R. Assheton Cross), the Government altogether acknowledge the importance of the Bill to which he has made reference. That Bill was, I believe, accepted and supported by the Representatives of the Government in "another place," and I have no doubt whatever as to its importance. The right hon. Gentleman acknowledges that the prospects of taking a discussion on its second reading are somewhat remote. I do not know that I can recollect any recent occasion upon which the discussion of an important Bill has been able to take place on Tuesday night; and, therefore, I do not think the right hon. Gentleman makes any great sacrifice in regard to the proposal I now submit. I am quite certain, however, that my right hon. Friend at the head of the Government will be willing to admit the importance of the subject, and to make any arrangement by which it would be possible to give an opportunity for its discussion. I trust the House will agree to what I believe is a thoroughly precedented proposition. I may now add that, although we propose to ask the House to give us a Morning Sitting on every remaining Tuesday of the Session, the only question before us now is that a Morning Sitting shall be taken on Tuesday next.

Mr. Chaplin

MR. GORST said, he hoped that the House would not be insensible to the observations of the noble Marquess; and if the noble Lord had asked the House to devote one Tuesday to the transaction of Government Business, he did not think that proposal would have been met with the opposition which had now been evoked.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I said, in giving Notice yesterday, that my intention was to ask the House to give us, as a rule, Morning Sitzings on Tuesdays, but that nothing was now before the House except a proposal for a Morning Sitting on Tuesday next.

MR. GORST said, it was the Notice of the noble Lord that he had that design on the rights of private Members which caused alarm. There was no action he studied in the opposition to the late Government with more interest than the noble Lord's own example. He found that in 1875, which was the first complete Session of the late Conservative Government, when they made a proposal, which, he admitted, went further than the present proposal—namely, to take the whole of Tuesday, June 22nd, the noble Lord, who was then the Leader of the Opposition, thought it his duty to come to the House and protect the rights of private Members. That was rather a remarkable Session, because the time of the Government had been greatly taken up, in the early part of the Session, by the renewal of the Peace Preservation Act, which had been in force for five years, and a great deal of time was wasted on the discussion of that Bill; but the noble Lord, on the 22nd of June, not only complained of the conduct of the Government in wishing to appropriate the time of private Members, but made an observation, on the proposal to take Morning Sitzings, which induced the impression that he would hardly have made such a proposal as he now placed before the House. The noble Lord said the Government had made a liberal use of Morning Sitzings, that had begun as early as the 16th March. There was another Morning Sitting on the 30th April; another on May 4th; another on May 11th; and the Morning Sitzings began, as a rule, on May 24th in previous years. He (the Marquess of Hartington) found that the exceptional rule was never adopted earlier than May 11th, and the formal Resolution had been adopted on May 26th, June 3rd, or July 2nd. The example of the noble Lord, in making these observations, had such an effect on the present Postmaster General (Mr. Fawcett), who was at that time very jealous of the rights of private Members, that he moved an Amendment, resisting the proposal to take the days of private Members, and made some strong observations on the importance of preserving the rights of private Members, which, no doubt, if he were in his place to-night, he would now have repeated. He called upon the then hon. Member for York (Mr. J. Lowther) and other hon. Members to support his Resolution; and so impressed were the Government of that day of the reasonableness of that opposition, that they consented to the adjournment of the debate until the following Thursday. Mr. Disraeli being present on the Thursday, the Motion was not discussed, but was, for the time, abandoned. In consequence of the impression made by this opposition by the noble Lord and his Friends, in 1876 the regular Tuesday Morning Sitzings did not begin until June 13th; in 1877 they did not begin until June 19th; in 1878, which was the year quoted by the noble Marquess, the general taking of Morning Sitzings did not begin till June 4th; while in 1879 they only began on June 10th. He (Mr. Gorst), therefore, thought he was quite justified in saying that if the Government were now asking for a Morning Sitting for the specific purpose of making progress with the Corrupt Practices Bill, it would be wise for the House to agree for that particular purpose; but if the Government were, as the noble Lord threatened, going from Tuesday next to take every succeeding Tuesday, and so extinguish, to a great extent, the rights of private Members, he thought he was justified in applying to such Parliamentary proceedings the epithet "unprecedented."

The Marquess of Hartington

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he was informed that the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General, on a former occasion, had referred to him. He had not been aware that the right hon. Gentleman had done him that honour; but the sentiments which he had expressed on that occasion were identical with those which he entertained now — namely, that the proposal to commence Morning Sittings was really one which it would be unwise for the House to decline to adopt. In regard to the question of "counts out," and the duty of keeping a House on private Members' nights, he ventured to differ from the opinion expressed by his hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin), that the noble Lord the Secretary of State for India (the Marquess of Hartington) was wrong in declining, on the part of the Government, any responsibility for the "counts out" which had taken place on various Tuesdays during the present Session. He agreed with the noble Lord that it had never been considered the duty of the Government of the day to keep a House on the days devoted exclusively to the Motions of private Members. The noble Lord also referred to the fact that much of the time which was nominally placed at the disposal of the Executive Government had been, during the present Session, monopolized, to a very great extent, by private Members in availing themselves of the opportunities afforded to them, on the Motion for going into Committee of Supply, of bringing forward independent Motions of their own. But the noble Lord might have gone a little further. He might have referred to the fact that not only had those legitimate opportunities of calling attention to grievances before going into Committee of Supply been taken advantage of by private Members, but that during the present Session there had been more than one instance, on a Government night, in which the very illegitimate practice had been resorted to of moving the Adjournment of the House at the time of Questions. He ventured to call the attention of the noble Lord, and of the Government generally, to the fact that if the legitimate opportunities were taken away from private Members, they would invariably find that the temptation was the greater to have recourse to the illegitimate practices he had referred to, and that private Members would adopt less orderly means for calling attention to grievances, and for eliciting the opinion of the House upon Ministerial answers to Questions, which seemed to annoy them, and which were deemed unsatisfactory. The Government, in the New Rules of Procedure, proposed to take away the opportunity of moving the Adjournment of the House at the time of Questions; and the proposal afforded an additional reason why the non-official Members of the House should feel disposed to scrutinize very closely any additional weapons that were proposed to be placed in the hands of Her Majesty's Government. He hoped the noble Lord would not lose sight of the fact that by proposing to take away from the Members of the House the time-honoured precedents under which they were able to bring forward almost any matter in which they took a legitimate interest, the Government had contributed largely to those disorderly practices which, undoubtedly, seemed to have made considerable way during the time that the present Ministry had held the reins of Office. He hoped that the noble Lord, seeing that the feeling of a large section of the House was decidedly opposed to the proposal which he had brought forward, would reconsider the decision to which he (Mr. J. Lowther) hoped the Government had not definitely arrived; and that he would, at any rate, allow the ordinary proceedings of the House to take their usual course until such a period of the Session had arrived as would enable the Government to assure the House that they had certain definite measures to submit, and to ask the House to give up its time for that purpose. When this system of Morning Sittings was first introduced, he remembered that it was distinctly laid down at the time by Mr. Disraeli that they were only for the progress of Bills in Committee. If the noble Lord had his Hansard in his hand, he would be able to see at once that that was the ground upon which the concession of Morning Sittings was originally advocated on that (the Opposition) side of the House. It had always been held that Morning Sittings should not be encouraged except when the pressure of Public Business was very great, and there were specific measures to bring forward.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, he merely rose in order to point out that Her Majesty's Government were not so blameless and so free of responsibility in regard to recent "counts-out" on Tuesdays as they were endeavouring to make out. The right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken (Mr. J. Lowther) said it had never been the habit for the Government of the day to admit that it was any part of their duty to keep a House on the days devoted to the use of private Members. But he (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) apprehended that when the Government put an important Motion down upon the Paper, it really became their duty to keep a House in order that they might have an opportunity of bringing it forward; and that was precisely what had occurred in the present Session. On two, at least, of the days on which the House had been counted out, the Government had put down a most important Motion for the appointment of the Public Accounts Committee. Up to the present time there was no Public Accounts Committee in existence. On three or four occasions the Motion had been put on the Paper for Tuesday, and yet the Government took no pains whatever to keep a House. Under these circumstances, he could not agree with the right hon. Gentleman who spoke last that the Government were altogether free from responsibility for having allowed the time of the House to be uselessly frittered away.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he happened to have been present on five of the occasions when the House was counted out by Mr. Speaker; and he might, therefore, be supposed to be a witness upon the question now under consideration. If the noble Marquess simply proposed that the Government should have a Morning Sitting next Tuesday, and that the propriety of continuing Morning Sittings on the subsequent Tuesdays should be reserved for future discussion, he should have nothing further to say; but he gathered that the real intention of the Government was to take possession of all remaining Tuesdays during the Session. He was bound to say that, on three of the occasions on which he had been present, when it was moved that Mr. Speaker should count the House, the Prime Minister was in his place, and on two of them the right hon. Gentleman was taking notes, in order to answer questions of very great importance which had been raised in the discussion—once upon a Scotch question, and once upon an Irish question. On each of those occasions the Prime Minister was upon the Front Bench when the House was counted out. In one case there were 38 Members present, and in the other 34. The right hon. Gentleman remained on the Treasury Bench all the time prepared to take part in the debate, and to answer the various questions of importance which were raised; but, nevertheless, the House was allowed to be counted out. He must confess that that was a circumstance which he had never witnessed, either in the time of Mr. Disraeli or of Lord Palmerston. It was said that the Government had themselves arranged for these "counts out" on Tuesdays, in order that they might say to the country—"See how impossible it is to conduct the Business of the country unless we carry our Resolutions." He thought the Government were to blame for not having taken the entire Sitting on Mondays for the purpose of proceeding with the Estimates on that day without the interposition of any other Motion. That course might have been adopted from the very commencement of the Session, as it had been in other years, the only stipulation being that, on the first occasion upon which a particular class of Estimates was submitted, one Resolution having strict relation to them might be discussed. But no proposal of that nature had been submitted to the House this Session, and the result was that the House found themselves engaged in the consideration of the Estimates at 3 o'clock in the morning, and that many of the Votes were taken without any due and adequate discussion at all. It was said that this course had been taken by Her Majesty's Government, and that "counts out" on no less than six Tuesdays had been tacitly assented to, so that they might go to the country and impress the people with the absolute necessity of the loture. So far as the future Tuesdays of the Session were concerned, he had special interest in Tuesday, the 2nd of May, seeing that a Motion in his name stood first on the Paper. The second Motion on the Paper was one by the hon. Member for Glamorganshire (Mr. Hussey Vivian), who desired to raise the important question of addressing Her Majesty praying her to withhold her assent to the Statutes proposed by the University of Oxford Commissioners for Jesus College. His (Sir John Lubbock's) Motion was even of greater importance, and he had very little doubt that he should be able to get a quorum, even if he were compelled to put it off until 9 o'clock. It was as follows:—

Mr. J. Lowther

"That the detention of large numbers of Her Majesty's subjects in solitary confinement, without cause assigned, and without trial, is repugnant to the spirit of the Constitution, and that, to enable them to be brought to trial, jury trials should, for a limited time (in Ireland), and in regard to crimes of a well-defined character, be replaced by some form of trial less liable to abuse."

He might almost suppose that Her Majesty's Government did not wish to have that question discussed, and that they intended, if possible, to prevent its discussion. He had, however, been promised so much support that he trusted, even if it were deferred until 9 o'clock, that he should obtain a fair hearing, and that the question would be duly considered. His own opinion was that the Government ought to be anxious to give facilities for the discussion of such a question rather than endeavour to defeat it by a side wind. At the present moment, and in the present state of Ireland, there could be no more important question for consideration than that of the persons who had been so long detained without trial.

MR. DILLWYN remarked, that hon. Members opposite professed great zeal for the rights of private Members, and called upon Members on the Liberal side of the House to participate in their feeling; but he did not think their zeal was quite pure in the matter. The hon. Member for Mid Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) mentioned the case of several Members who had been shut out and prevented, by the counting out of the House, from bringing on their Motions; but towards the end of his speech the hon. Member cut the cat out of the bag, and showed that the real desire on the part of hon. Members opposite was to stop any Government Business from being transacted at all. The hon. Member said that the measures introduced by the Government had been so objectionable in their character and so dangerous that he wished to see them stopped altogether, and that was the reason of his opposition to the present proposal. ["No!"] At all events, the hon. Member gave that as his own reason for the Amendment he moved; and he (Mr. Dillwyn) had no doubt that that reason was the very reason which would commend the Motion of the noble Marquess to the votes of hon. Members who sat on that (the Ministerial) side of the House.

MR. HEALY said, he should like to say why he had not the smallest objection to the Government taking a Morning Sitting on Tuesday; but why he should view with some anxiety any proposition to give up all private Members' nights to them for Morning Sittings. As yet the Government had given no indication of what their policy in regard to Ireland was to be; and if Morning Sittings were to be used for the purpose of passing a Coercion Bill for Ireland, he should give to the proposal the most strenuous opposition in his power. He would remind the House that Her Majesty's Ministers were already pledged with regard to a variety of measures, not one of which had as yet seen the light. One of these measures was for the extension of Municipal Government, others for Grand Jury Reform, Poor Law Reform, Bankruptcy, the Repression of Corrupt Practices at Elections, the Conservancy of Rivers and Prevention of Floods, the Codification of the Criminal Law, the amendment of the Laws affecting Patents, and the establishment of a Peasant Proprietary. Upon five of these subjects the Government stood positively pledged to introduce reforms, and in regard to three of them the pledge was given in the Queen's Speech. Not one of these Bills, nor, indeed, not a Bill upon any subject whatever, had been printed. Under these circumstances, until the Government showed their hand, it was not to be expected that the House would tacitly give up all its privileges, and enable Ministers to appropriate the whole of private Members' days to Morning Sittings. He thought the House should be fairly informed what the programme of the Government was, and what the measures were which they desired to carry out. He strongly objected to take any step in the dark, and he would strenuously resist any proposition to give continuous Morning Sittings to the Government until they stated the way in which they proposed to arrange their Business, and the use to which they intended to put the Morning Sittings. At the same time, he had no objection to give up next Tuesday. He was not about to enter any protest against the counting out of the House, for he had on several occasions approved the Speaker's attention being called to the fact that 40 Members were not present; and he should ever be willing to support a Motion to that effect. It had always appeared to him an extraordinary thing that millions of money should be voted when but a small number of Members were present; and he was inclined, on a future occasion, to move that the number required to form a quorum should be enlarged.

MR. R. N. FOWLER said, he would remind the noble Marquess that there were some very important Motions upon the Paper for next Tuesday. Amongst those was the Motion of the hon. Member for Hereford (Mr. R. T. Reid), which excited a great deal of public interest, and which so large a number of Members of that House were pledged to support; and also that of the hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Stanley Leighton), which, if the House met at 9, would, no doubt, occupy it until half-past 12 o'clock. The effect of the Government proposal to take Tuesday as a Morning Sitting, for the purpose of interposing another Motion, would probably be that the hon. Member for Hereford would have no chance of bringing on his Motion in regard to the Deceased Wife's Sister. If that were so, the responsibility would rest with the noble Marquess.

VISCOUNT FOLKESTONE said, as the Government proposed to ask for a Morning Sitting, not only on Tuesday next, but on every Tuesday during the Session, hon. Members would be glad to understand that the Government would give timely Notice of their Motions on that subject, so that their proposals might be adequately discussed.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he thought it was not a fair argument to say that private Members had a very slight appreciation of their rights, because they did not keep a House on Tuesdays. The fact was that private Members had no corporate interest in any particular Motion. Before the House could take any interest in private Motions it was necessary that they should be laid before it, and when this had been done it would be an easy matter to keep a House on a future occasion. However important the question raised might be, unless this were done only five or six Members might know anything about it. The difficulty was that Motions had often to be introduced on the responsibility of a Member who had not made his position in the House; and in that case, unless the Government contributed to the keeping of a House, the Member, whose Motion might raise a question of great public importance, did not even obtain the opportunity of laying it before the House. Again, it was impossible to keep a House for private Members unless the Government accepted the responsibility of so doing, because there was scarcely any private Motion which would have more than a dozen backers. But he regretted to see that the occupants of the Front Benches were acting upon the principle that they had no responsibility towards private Members in this respect. He felt convinced that if this policy were pursued, a great many private Members would feel themselves relieved from their responsibility to the Government on the Government nights; and he could strongly corroborate the statement made by an hon. Member that evening, that, as surely as the Government prevented private Members bringing forward their Motions on legitimate occasions, the illegitimate occasions which would be availed of would multiply. It was neither in the purview of the proposed New Rules nor in that of the Rules now existing to prevent illegitimate occasions arising; and the Government of the day would therefore do well to take great care that the Business on Tuesdays, up to 12 o'clock, should not be interrupted by "counts." He could quite understand the occupants of the Front Opposition Bench not wishing to throw stones at the Government about the matter of not keeping a House on Tuesdays, for both Parties appeared to be in permanent conspiracy against non-official Members in this respect. As had before pointed out, the result of the present practice would be to increase a temptation to new Members to take illegitimate, if they could not find legitimate, opportunities of bringing forward their Motions.

Mr. Healy

MR. CHILDERS said, there was no intention on the part of the Government to move any general Resolution with respect to Morning Sittings on Tuesdays, as the noble Lord the Member for Wiltshire (Viscount Folkestone) seemed to suppose. The usual course was to move to put a Bill down for Tuesday, and to intimate that from that time there would be Morning Sittings on the following Tuesdays. His noble friend had been very careful to explain that the Government would be quite willing that not the morning alone, but on the whole of any particular Tuesday, if within the control of the Government, should be given up for the discussion of any subject of adequate importance.

EARL PERCY asked if hon. Members were to understand that the Government practically intended to take all the Tuesdays during the Session for Morning Sittings, because, as far as he was aware, that was certainly not the impression which the House had derived from the statement of the noble Marquess.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, that he and other Members, on a previous Tuesday, had inferred that there could be no "count out" from the fact that the Government had placed a Notice on the Paper relating to the Committee of Public Accounts. He pointed out that private Members were deprived of the opportunities for bringing forward their motions, which were accorded to them by the Rules of the House, they would be under the necessity of taking such measures as they could of their own interest. There was an important Motion, of which he had given Notice, that he should have been glad to bring forward if he could get the opportunity for doing so on Tuesday; but now that the Government were about to take Tuesdays for Morning Sittings this was no longer possible. He was, therefore, driven to the necessity of infringing upon one of the Government days; and accordingly, he had given Notice that he should move the Resolution he had referred to on the next Government day —that was to say, the following Monday, on the Motion for going into Committee of Ways and Means.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, it was clear that the noble Lord had unintentionally conveyed a false impression to the House in his statement of the intentions of the Government with regard to the Morning Sittings on Tuesdays; because the statement he made had been entirely contradicted by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War. The right hon. Gentleman stated that the whole of the remaining Tuesdays throughout the Session would be taken for Morning Sittings, whereas the noble Lord gave the House to understand that the proposal was an isolated one and referred to next Tuesday only.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I gave Notice yesterday that I should propose Morning Sittings on Tuesday next, and on succeeding Tuesdays.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he was aware of that. Their complaint was, however, that the speech which the noble Lord made that evening had altered the impression which many hon. Members had, who came down for the purpose of preventing the Government getting next Tuesday and succeeding Tuesdays during the Session, their opposition having been mitigated by their belief, derived from the noble Lord's statement, that the Government only intended to take next Tuesday for the purpose of a Morning Sitting. They now found that it was the intention to take all succeeding Tuesdays.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 100; Noes 50: Majority 50.—(Div. List, No. 70.)

Main Question proposed.

SIR JOHN HAY asked for a distinct intimation from the noble Marquess as to when the Government would propose to take the remaining Tuesdays; and when they would propose to take Tuesday, the 2nd of May, because he had an important Notice down for that day respecting the imprisoned Irish "suspects."

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, if the right hon. and gallant Baronet would put down the Question on the Paper, he would answer it on Monday.

EARL PERCY said, he considered the reply of the noble Marquess to be so unsatisfactory that he felt bound to move the adjournment of the debate.

VISCOUNT FOLKESTONE seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned." —(Earl Percy.)

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he would undertake that the Government would not attempt to fix a Morning Sitting for next Tuesday week until next Thursday.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Committee deferred till Tuesday next, at Two of the clock.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (IRELAND) PROVISIONAL ORDER BILL.

On Motion of Mr. HERBERT GLADSTONE, Bill to confirm a Provisional Order of the Local Government Board for Ireland relating to the Bangor Gas Undertaking, ordered to be brought in by Mr. HERBERT GLADSTONE and Lord FREDERICK CAVENDISH.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 138.]

House adjourned at a quarter after Two o'clock till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, 24th April, 1882.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading—Elementary Education Provisional Order Confirmation (London) * (56); Elementary Education Provisional Orders (West Ham, &c.) * (55); Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders (Ballymena, &c.) * (57); Metropolitan Commons Supplemental * (38); Army (Annual) (65).

Committee—Report—General Police and Improvement (Scotland) * (48); Drainage (Ireland) Provisional Order * (51).

NEW PEER.

The Right Honourable Sir George William Wilshire Bramwell, Knight, late a Lord Justice of Appeal, having been created Baron Bramwell of Heyer in the county of Kent—Was (in the usual manner) introduced.

SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE.

The LORD CHANCELLOR acquainted the House that Her Majesty had (by Commission) appointed the Earl of Cork and Orrery Speaker of the House in the absence of the Lord Chancellor and the Earl of Redesdale; the Earl of Lathom Speaker of the House in the absence of the Lord Chancellor, the Earl of Redesdale, and the Earl of Cork and Orrery; the Viscount Hawarden Speaker of the House in the absence of the Lord Chancellor, the Earl of Redesdale, the Earl of Cork and Orrery, and the Earl of Lathom; and the Lord Monson Speaker of the House in the absence of the Lord Chancellor, the Earl of Redesdale, the Earl of Cork and Orrery, the Earl of Lathom, and the Viscount Hawarden: The said Commissions were read.

HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS
PRINCE LEOPOLD, DUKE OF ALBANY.
THE QUEEN'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS.

THE LORD STEWARD OF THE HOUSEHOLD (Earl SYDNEY) reported the Queen's Answer to the Address, as follows:—

"MY LORDS,

"I HAVE received with sincere pleasure your loyal and dutiful Address.

"The assurance of your lively interest in the intended marriage of Prince Leopold, Duke of Albany, is most gratifying to me, and I share with you the confident hope that, under the blessing of God, this event may be an additional source of happiness to my Family and also to my People."

LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACT, 1881 (SECTION 8, SUB-SECTION 9)—CASE OF
"ADAMS v. DUNSEATH."

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN, in rising to call attention to a statement of the Prime Minister relating to the decision of the Court of Appeal in the case of Adams v. Dunseath; and to ask, Whether Her Majesty's Government propose any legislation in reference to the Irish Land Act of 1881? said, the statement was one which involved most complicated issues. It had to do with that portion of the Land Act which dealt with the vexed question of the relative value to landlord and tenant of improvements.

When the Act of 1881 was in Committee the other House, a sub-section was suddenly jerked into the Bill which gave rise to infinite discussions, Amendments, and suggestions, until it finally resolved itself into Sub-Section 9 of the 8th section, by which no rent was to be allowed made payable in any proceedings under the Act in respect of any improvements made by the tenant or his predecessors, in title and for which, in the opinion of the Court, the tenant should have been paid or otherwise compensated by the landlord or his predecessors in title. The sub-section was very clearly expressed; but he thought the intention of Parliament concerning it could be sufficiently clearly made out by the discussions that took place concerning it. The difficulty of ascertaining the relative value of landlord's and tenant's interest in improvements had always been great, and was sufficiently indicated by the difference of opinion entertained by high legal authorities on the subject. The highest legal authority, the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack (Lord Selborne), on the occasion of the second reading of the Bill, said, in speaking of the value of the tenant's interest—

"Now, both of these—the goodwill of the thing and the value of the improvements—things which in no sense belong to the landlord. . . . That which the tenant has to sell . . . is a thing which the landlord never had, never could have."—[3 Hansard, colxiv.]

According to the noble and learned Lord, therefore, the goodwill and the value in improvements were things which could not exist, except under circumstances in which the land was let to a tenant. A short time ago, however, Mr. Litton, one of the Chief Commissioners under the Act, speaking on the very case of Dunseath v. Dunseath, said that—

"Whatever might be procured from the improvements I have referred to beyond commercial value belongs to the tenant who holds the possession, just as it would belong to the landlord if he was about to let his land for the first time."

Mr. Litton, therefore, held views diametrically opposite to those of the noble and learned Lord upon the Woolsack. Among the several points decided in Dunseath v. Dunseath, the most important related to the question whether the length of time during which improvements were enjoyed by a tenant could be looked upon as in any way compensating him for them. That point was amply discussed in the other House of Parliament and in their Lordships' House, and the Prime Minister made several statements concerning it. The Prime Minister stated that—

"He objected to the time during which any improvements had been enjoyed being taken into consideration. The tenant's own improvements were the tenant's property. That was the doctrine upon which the Government took their stand. They did not admit that the time of enjoyment of improvements was any reason for handing them over to the landlord."

On another occasion he considerably modified that statement, and gave as a reason for changing the clause as it originally stood—

"That if it were left unqualified, the tenant could claim for remote reclamations and for improvements made in pursuance of covenant."

These expressions of the Prime Minister, no doubt, appearing somewhat vague to Mr. Parnell, he endeavoured to elicit some more distinct opinion on the subject; and after the insertion of the present sub-section; he moved to introduce words to the effect that—

"The time during which a tenant may have enjoyed the advantage of improvements shall not be held to be compensation within the meaning of this sub-section."

These were words which distinctly asserted the principle that, under no circumstances, could the tenant's interest in improvements be deteriorated or lessened by the length of time during which he had enjoyed the improvements, and they were opposed by the Government and rejected by a large majority. It appeared by that that Her Majesty's Government and Parliament held that, under certain circumstances, the interest of the tenant in improvements could be deteriorated by time. It was not very easy to reconcile these varying statements, or to understand exactly what the Prime Minister meant. But he (the Earl of Dunraven) presumed the meaning was this—that in respect of improvements the tenant was entitled to the full amount of money which he had expended in making them, and to a fair remuneration or percentage on it; but that if the value of the holding was increased over and above that, because the capabilities inherent in the soil were developed, then the landlord was entitled to reap the benefit of the improvements in that respect. Such was the general idea of Parliament on the subject; and Parliament further held it was extremely difficult, if not impossible, to define the principle accurately in an Act of Parliament, but that the Act could be safely left to be interpreted by the Courts, which were constituted for that especial purpose in Ireland. As yet only one case had been decided by the final Court of Appeal—the now famous case of “Adams v. Dunseath.” It was a most important decision for both owners and occupiers. Chief Justice Morris, in giving his decision, stated that—

“He expected that Court must determine, in regard to the important question arising in the case, principles by which the future action of the Commissioners would be regulated.”

The High Court of Appeal decided various points, among them that, as regards improvements made prior to 1870, Sub-Section 9 of Section 8 of the Land Act of 1881 must be construed with due reference to the last paragraph of Section 4 of the Land Act of 1870, which section dealt with the question of compensation for improvements. The practical result of this decision was that the Court of Appeal held that the tenant's interest in his improvements was capable, under certain circumstances, of being diminished by the enjoyment of them. Now, he should have thought that the decision of the Court of Appeal was consistent with the intention of Parliament and with the views of the Prime Minister, as far as the intentions of Parliament could be ascertained from the discussions in Parliament, and as far as the views of the Prime Minister could be gathered from the statements of the Prime Minister. But the Prime Minister had lately declared that the decision of the High Court of Appeal in that respect, as far as that portion of it was concerned, was opposed to the intention of the framers of the Act of 1881. He (the Earl of Dunraven) had no wish that any man should be deprived of the full value of his improvements. It would be most unjust and unwise that such should be the case; but he failed to see that there was any danger of such an injustice being done. There were, besides, two other questions involved in addition to those in which improvements had been effected solely by the tenant. There were cases in which the prospective value of the improvements was accepted by the owner in lieu of a present money payment in the shape of rent. That prospective value was part of the consideration for which the holding was let. It was obvious that if the entire benefit of the improvement was handed over to the tenant, no such agreements would be made in future, and it was equally certain that if the benefit was transferred to the tenant great injustice would be done. Those cases were supposed to be safeguarded by Sub-Section 9 of Section 8. The Prime Minister stated that they were sufficiently guarded by the words “otherwise compensated.” It might be that the insertion of the word “otherwise” was sufficient, and that the subsection did protect cases where improvements were stipulated for on consideration of a low rent; but when the Court of Appeal gave a decision which bore upon these cases and protected them, the Prime Minister took exception to the ruling of that Court, and he (the Earl of Dunraven) could not but think that the rights of landowners were prejudicially affected thereby. There was another set of cases which were also affected by the decision of “Adams v. Dunseath”—namely, those cases where improvements had been made by loans from the Board of Works. Those would be indirectly affected. One Sub-Commission had decided to the effect that the improvements made by Board of Works loans became the property of the tenant after the instalments had been paid. The judgment of the Court of Appeal appeared to be contrary to that decision; because cases of improvements made by Board of Works loans would be affected by the concluding words of the last paragraph of Section 4 of the Act of 1870, which, according to the decision of the Court of Appeal, governed Sub-Section 9 of Section 8 of the Act of 1881. It was obvious, if the view of the Sub-Commission was to be accepted as correct, landlords would not be inclined to borrow any more money to improve their estates. No man could be expected to mortgage his property if he was to receive no benefit whatever for doing so. There had been between £3,000,000 and £4,000,000 borrowed by owners of land on the security of that land, and laid out in drainage and other main improvements for the general benefit of the country; and if landlords were to be deprived of the advantages they hoped to reap by that outlay a huge injustice would be done. It was for the wisdom of Parliament to decide whether such loans should be sanctioned in the future. In the past Parliament had deemed them most beneficial to the country. Parliament had encouraged landlords to borrow by many Acts of Parliament, which had been passed with the intention that landlords should benefit by the outlay of the loans. He did not believe that Parliament intended that the Act of 1881 should confiscate any benefit which the landlords hoped to gain by improvements to execute which they mortgaged their property. But if the decision of the Court of Appeal was erroneous, it was very doubtful whether those benefits would not be confiscated. The decision in "Adams v. Dunseath" naturally attracted great attention; and the Prime Minister, in reply to a question about it, stated, in effect, that in some respects the decision of the Court of Appeal was not in accordance with the intentions of the framers of the Act. The Prime Minister was, of course, quite within his rights in making that statement. No one could object to the Prime Minister, or any Member of the Government, stating that Parliament had passed a Bill contrary to the intentions of Her Majesty's Government, who brought it in. The Prime Minister would also have been quite justified in declaring that in view of the decision it would be necessary, in his opinion, to amend the Act. But he declared nothing of the kind; he said something very different. He declared that the construction which the Commissioners and the Sub-Commissioners put upon the judgment of the Court of Appeal was to be carefully observed by the Government, before they decided what they were to do in the matter. The Prime Minister constituted himself a final Court of Appeal; for, although he did not attempt to reverse this particular decision of "Adams v. Dunseath," he declared the decision of the Court of Appeal was contrary to his intentions, and he left it to be inferred that it was erroneous, and that the Act, if properly interpreted, carried out his intentions, by suggesting that it ought not to be considered in dealing with similar cases. He said, in effect, that the Act was falsely interpreted by the Court of Appeal, and that if the Sub-Commissioners were guided by that interpretation it would become necessary to amend the Act. Whatever might be meant by this statement, it certainly would be considered in Ireland to mean one thing, and one thing only, and that was that the Sub-Commissioners were strongly recommended not to pay attention to the judgment of the Court of Appeal, and that if they did so, and were guided by that decision, they would force upon the Government the disagreeable necessity of bringing in an Amendment Bill. He would leave it to their Lordships to consider what effect such a statement was likely to have upon men who were appointed by the Government, and appointed for one year only. Having passed an Act, and constituted Judges and Courts to carry it out, and a final Court of Appeal, it appeared to him an extraordinary proceeding for a Prime Minister to set himself above the Court of Appeal and advise the Sub-Commissioners to pay no attention whatever to a decision of that Court. On one occasion the Prime Minister "took the liberty," to use his own words, "to notice an error in the language of a learned Judge in Ireland." On another occasion he called in question the correctness of a decision of the High Court of Appeal. Such commentaries were not likely to induce respect for the law among the population of Ireland. It was most important that they should know the intention of the Government in this matter—whether they still intended to continue to carefully observe the construction which was put upon the decision of the Court of Appeal, or whether they intended to bring in an Amendment Bill this Session. He would like also to ask the noble Lord the Lord Privy Seal by what means the Government intended to find out what construction had been put upon the decision of the Court of Appeal by the Sub-Commissioners in Ireland? The Sub-Commissioners gave no reasons for their decisions. How, then, was it possible to discover how those decisions had been arrived at, unless the Government received information from the Commissioners which was not open to Parliament and the public? He submitted that Parliament had a right to be informed on a matter of this kind. Their Lordships' House had been severely criticized for appointing a Committee to inquire into the general working of the Act, although that Committee expressly stated that the terms of their Reference did not allow them to inquire into any particular decision. It was probably considered advisable to rally the Liberal Party at that time, and perhaps it was also deemed advisable to awaken the people—perhaps with a view to further legislation. Their Lordships might remember what the Prime Minister said in one of his famous Mid Lothian speeches. He was criticizing that House, and said that, whenever the House of Commons

“Were backed by any strong national feeling it would be dangerous to confront or resist, the House of Lords passed their measures.”

It seemed rather a curious form of adverse criticism to say their Lordships passed measures when there was a very strong national feeling that they should be passed. Then Mr. Gladstone continued to say that—

“The moment the people went to sleep, and became satisfied, and ceased to take a strong and decided interest in public questions—that was the moment when the majority of the House of Lords grew powerful; then they mangled, then they cut about, then they postponed, then they rejected the good measures that went up to them from the House of Commons.”

Anyone might suppose that in speaking of people “cutting about” and “mangling” the versatile intellect of Mr. Gladstone had led him to indulge the electors of Mid Lothian in a dissertation on establishments partaking of the nature of a laundry; but it really was of one of the branches of the Legislature that he was speaking. Well, it was probably thought necessary to awaken the nation and rally the Liberal Party, and the appointment of a Committee by that House was made to serve the purpose. He did not suppose a nation was ever awakened or a Party rallied under such a flimsy pretext; but almost before the words with which the Prime Minister denounced that House, rallied the Party, and woke the people ceased echoing, the same Prime Minister himself not only criticized the Act, but picked out a particular case for criticism, and informed the Commissioners, the Sub-Commissioners, and Parliament and the country that a decision of the Court of Appeal was wrong. And he went further, and told the Sub-Commissioners in Ireland that if they were guided by that decision of the Court of Appeal they would force upon Government the disagreeable necessity of bringing in an Amendment Bill. Could men be expected to do their duty under such circumstances? There were other evils likely to follow upon the statement of the Prime Minister. If the decision of the Court of Appeal was not to guide other cases, the result would be that all such other cases would have to go up to the Court of Appeal, and the present partial block in the Courts would be succeeded by an absolute block. Unless the Land Act was to prove a failure, it was necessary that cases should be largely settled out of Court; but it was difficult now for either landlord or tenant to discover any basis for negotiation with such diametrically opposed views expressed by the Court of Appeal and by the Prime Minister, and with the prospect of legislation hanging over them. It was essential also, unless Ireland was to remain in a state of chaos, that the differences of landlords and tenants should be largely settled out of Court. It was essential also that the authority of the Courts should be sustained, and due respect paid to their decisions. He feared that the authority of the Court of Appeal suffered by the statement of the Prime Minister; and he hoped Her Majesty's Ministers in that House would take the opportunity of giving their Lordships some explanation that might be satisfactory in the matter.

LORD CARLINGFORD, in reply, said, that he would not make any lengthened statement in answer to his noble Friend's (the Earl of Dunraven's) Question. He would not go into all the matters mentioned in his noble Friend's speech, neither would he attempt to discuss or defend every sentence in all speeches of the Prime Minister which had caught the eye of his noble Friend. He would confine himself to the Question as it stood upon the Paper. He was not able, at that moment, to add anything substantial to what was said by the Prime Minister when questioned—more than once, he believed—in the House of Commons on the subject, because the Prime Minister would himself have a very early opportunity of stating the intentions of the Government as to any Amendment to be proposed by em on any point of the Land Act of last year. But he (Lord Carlingford) could take the liberty of adding a few words upon the speech of his noble friend generally. In the first place, he must protest against the extraordinary mare's nest which had been discovered by his noble Friend in the words of the Prime Minister in answer to the Question of a Member of the House of Commons. His right hon. friend had said that it appeared to him at part of a certain decision of the Court of Appeal in Ireland, as to the legal bearing of a clause in the Land Act, was not consistent with the intention of the framers of that Act. His noble Friend had construed that expression of opinion as if it were a criminal interference with the working of the Land Act, or an indirect threat to the Courts which were administering the Act, as if it were an interference with the independence of those Courts. Anything more preposterous he (Lord Carlingford) had never heard than such a view of the effect of the words used by his right hon. Friend; and he was a good deal surprised at such a suggestion coming from his noble friend. The Prime Minister had, in fact, simply expressed an opinion, and it was impossible for a Minister of the Crown not to do so when asked to answer a Question. There would be no interference with the working of the Land Act. That would go on through the Courts which were constituted for the purpose of administering it. What the Prime Minister had, in fact, expressed was his agreement with the Lord Chancellor of Ireland in his judgment upon the question arising in this now famous case; and he added that, rather than pledge himself to any immediate attempt at legislation upon the point, he and his Law Advisers would wait and see what amount of practical effect this decision would have. It was a doubtful point in his opinion, and was, he (Lord Carlingford) believed, a doubtful point now. In fact, he was not aware that the Land Commission itself had considered what the effect of the decision would be in the cases which have or would come before the Court. It was impossible to say what the practical effect of the decision would be upon the relations of landlord and tenant in Ireland, and upon the fixing of fair rents. It was surely natural that the Prime Minister should prefer to wait to see what that effect would be. The question was an important one, and if important results were to follow, differing materially from the intentions of the Government, it might be the duty of the Government to ask Parliament to correct that part of the Act. If, on the other hand, the practical effect of the decision was not of great moment, it might not be the duty of the Government to make that application to Parliament. In the meantime, the Courts would, of course, be bound solely, not by the expression of anyone in either House of Parliament, whether Prime Minister or any other person, as to what was the intention of the framers of the Bill, but by the judgment of the High Court of Appeal in Ireland. It was not necessary for the Land Commission to say that they felt themselves absolutely bound by that decision; but they had said so, and it was not for them to say otherwise. He would add a very few words as to what the Prime Minister really said. In effect his right hon. Friend at the head of the Government had expressed agreement with the Lord Chancellor, whose judgment differed from that of his Colleagues forming the majority of the Court over which he presided. The practical difference, as he (Lord Carlingford) understood it, was this—the Lord Chancellor thought that, in this matter, the Courts were to be governed by the provisions of the 9th sub-section of the 8th clause of the Act of last year, and by that only—a clause containing the important words which had been mentioned, as to improvements which had been paid for, or otherwise compensated, by the landlord. The majority of the Court, contrary to the view of the Lord Chancellor, were of opinion that the conditions and restrictions contained in the 4th clause, or Improvement Clause, of the Land Act of 1870 were still in operation, and were not overridden by the words contained in the Act of last year. That clause in the Act of 1870 declared that the value of the tenant's improvements was to be subject to reduction by lapse of time, or by any reduction of rent which he might have enjoyed. He should, however, like, in passing, to remind his noble Friend that the words referred to did not raise any great question of principle, because those conditions and restrictions were limited to cases of improvements made before the passing of that Act, and those only; so that as to any improvements made by the tenant since the 1st of August, 1870, the conditions and restrictions of the Act of 1870 had no application whatever, and they were governed solely by the words of the clause in the Act of last year. That was an important distinction in point of principle, and it would become of increasingly practical importance with every year that passed. But the truth was that the divergence between the Lord Chancellor and the Court of Appeal was, in his opinion, not so wide as it appeared at first sight, and his noble Friend had considerably exaggerated its importance. He (Lord Carlingford) understood that all the Members of the Court of Appeal agreed that there were two classes of interests concerned in the matter; there was a landlord's interest as well as a tenant's in the improvements, although they differed in degree. Those two classes comprised the improvements in buildings placed on the soil, and in the value of the soil itself, as enhancing the capabilities of the holding; and they would, on reading the judgment delivered in the case of "Adams v. Dunseath," find that the Lord Chancellor drew a great distinction between the tenant's work of improvement and its direct results on the one hand, and the capabilities of the soil belonging to the landlord on the other. It was true that Lord Justice Fitzgibbon, in his acute judgment, differed upon the practical point before the Court from the Lord Chancellor; but he drew substantially the same distinction between the very varying amount of the two interests in different classes of improvements, pointing out that in the case of a house or other building the tenant's interest absorbed almost the whole value, and the landlord's interest, if it existed, would be very limited; whereas, in the case of any improvements made in the soil, the tenant's interest would be more limited, and the landlord's interest might be very considerable. As to the practical result of the decision, he would ask the House to remember that, by the words of the Act of 1870, which, by that judgment, were imported into the Act of last year, and which governed the case they were discussing, the Court had a wide discretion in all cases to take into consideration the length of time during which improvements had been enjoyed. The Courts now also had to take into account the important question of rent. It was further to be supposed that all or most of the cases in which this question would come before the Courts would be cases in which the rent was a high one. He submitted, therefore, that, first of all, the divergence between the majority and the minority—that was to say, between the Lord Chancellor and the other Judges of the Court of Appeal—upon this matter, was not so great as it had appeared to his noble Friend to be; and, secondly, that the whole practical effect of the decision of the Court, as regarded the interests of landlord and tenant, had by no means yet become clear enough to see what it would be. The Prime Minister had, he thought, said a most reasonable thing when he stated in the House of Commons that the Government would wait and see whether, in their opinion, there was anything grave enough in the effect of the judgment of the Court to justify them in asking Parliament to correct that particular point in the Land Act of last year, for it would be neither wonderful nor blameworthy if, in one of the most difficult and, from its very nature, complicated pieces of legislation ever framed or passed, there should be points in the Act requiring correction. The Prime Minister would, however, at an early date, have occasion to state the views of the Government upon the whole of this matter, and upon the question whether any amending measure or additional legislation was required to the Land Act of last year. Under those circumstances, he (Lord Carlingford) would not anticipate the Prime Minister's statement.

The Earl of Dunraven

EARL CAIRNS said, he wished to remind their Lordships that just before the Recess there was a statement made by the Prime Minister with regard to that House which, to his mind, seemed a very important one. He had said that the question they had to decide was not only whether an inquiry into the Land Act was desirable in this House, but by the House of Commons, and they took four or five evenings to determine whether an inquiry into the working of the Land Act was desirable or not, and came to the conclusion that, on the whole, an inquiry into the working of the Act would be injurious to the good government of Ireland, and, therefore, extremely inexpedient, but that their Lordships had found one evening sufficient for the purpose of voting that it was desirable, and that they had acted wrongly in passing such a Resolution. The progress of events, however, had placed beyond the range of controversy the question of the desirability of that inquiry very much more rapidly than, perhaps, their Lordships imagined. On the 9th of March the House of Commons passed their Resolutions declaring that any Parliamentary inquiry into the Land Act tended to defeat good government in Ireland. On the 15th of March the second reading of a Bill proposing an important Amendment of that Act was moved in the same Assembly. Upon the back of that Bill were the names of four staunch Supporters of the Government, who, he believed, voted for the Resolution of Censure upon their Lordships' action in the matter. What did the Government, who believed that any inquiry into the Act would not be favourable to the good government of Ireland, do? Did they ask Parliament to throw out—but he would not use that expression—did they hurl the Bill from the House? On the contrary, Member after Member rose and declared that any inquiry into the working of the Land Act would be fatal to it, although it was admitted there were many miscarriages, and that the results desired could not be obtained unless there was some alteration. What did the Government say? They could not admit the possibility of tampering with the Act; yet they actually, with the utmost humility, asked the promoters of the Bill to put it off for some weeks, saying that, in the meantime, they would narrowly watch the working of the Act, and state their views at the end of that period. But there were two points to which he particularly desired to direct their Lordships' attention. In the first place, the House was aware that over 90 per cent of the cases in which applications to break existing leases had been made had failed, with no other result than to entail upon the applicant the costs of the proceedings. A Question was put to the Prime Minister a short time afterwards on the point. He was asked as to the clauses of the Act which referred to the making of leases. He was asked, whether he knew it was a fact that 90 per cent of the applications made by tenants in con-quence of the restricted scope of the 21st section of the Act were rendered ineffectual, and that Judge O'Hagan had publicly stated that fact; and also, whether it was proposed by legislation to remedy the defect? What was his answer? The Prime Minister thought there was considerable reason for an amendment of the law in respect to non-judgment. He thought the tenant in actual enjoyment of a lease, when he executed a new lease, or the tenant whose lease had just expired and was in occupation, ought to be placed on the same footing as a tenant from year to year. But he could not state, owing to the condition of Public Business, when the change would be introduced. This was a serious matter, because this particular clause was one of the greatest instances of legislation that had been proposed. When the proposal to break leases was first introduced into that House it was strongly opposed. He (Earl Cairns) had himself expected great objections to it; but he was somewhat surprised when he discovered that it was the wish of certain noble Lords in the House who were Irish landlords, and who felt that it carried with it some implication that they had done something wrong, that the clause should be passed. Accordingly they subsequently agreed to it, and what was the consequence? No case whatever was made out against the landlords; but now they knew that 90 per cent of the applications made had failed. The Prime Minister thought the law should be amended, on the ground of the decisions of the Court. He thought the tenants should have the redress to which they were entitled, as to which the Land Court in Ireland thought they had no claim. Now, he asked, how was it possible for Ireland to be peaceful, and for property to be secure, if declarations of this kind were to be made from time to time? The leaseholders were told that, so far from the law being settled, it was to be altered. What was the position of the 90 per cent? They were buoyed up by the promise of the Prime Minister, and hoped for that relief which they considered they were entitled to; while other leaseholders entertained the opinion that the law should be altered in their favour, and some alteration of the present system be effected. It was said that an inquiry into the working of the Act would be fatal. It might be asked if a declaration like this was likely to conduce to the peace of the country, for there was no reason for advancing it. He now passed to the second consideration. There was a strong feeling in the House at the time of the passing of the Act that in this matter, if necessary, there should be power of appeal to the highest tribunal in the Kingdom, the House of Lords; but the Government said they did not think there ought to be an appeal from Ireland to England; that the expense of such an appeal was objectionable, and they refused to allow it. They gave, however, an appeal to the highest Court which dealt with the subject—the Land Court, consisting of all the great judicial officers of Ireland. That arrangement was made, and it was, or it certainly ought to have been, understood that when a case came before the Land Court its decision was to be final. Well, there arose a very important case bearing upon the question of improvements. That case was brought before the Court and argued most elaborately for several days. Great pains and trouble and considerable time were taken before the Court gave its decision. It was divided in opinion, as Courts often were; but a very decided judgment was eventually pronounced. The reply of the Prime Minister to the Question put to him with reference to that question had been very clearly stated by his noble Friend (the Earl of Dunraven). He (Earl Cairns) would ask the Government, whether it was aware in that decision that, as regarded the improvements made by the tenants, the Land Court, in fixing a fair rent, had regarded the real enjoyment of the improvements as some compensation for the money spent upon them; and, whether the Government did not, in the course of the passage of the Bill through the House of Commons, distinctly state that no such construction was to be placed upon the clause? The Prime Minister stated it was not the intention of the framers of the Act that the tenant's interests in the course of his improvements should lapse, or be impaired in consequence of his enjoyment of those improvements. He (Earl Cairns) took it that the meaning of that was no reduction should be made because of a lapse of time. The Prime Minister said the wisest course would be to observe what construction the Court of Appeal put upon the clause, and its practical effect, before taking any action. He (Earl Cairns) agreed with what had been said—namely, that no person could have the least doubt as to how these statements would be received and understood in Ireland, and how they would be received by the Sub-Commissioners. They must remember who those Sub-Commissioners were, and that they were appointed annually. They were, in fact, in the position that Judges once were when they were supposed to be under the influence of the Government. Another thing was that it was perfectly in their power, having regard to the manner in which they gave their decisions, to conceal the principles upon which they proceeded; and, in point of fact, they did so. It was impossible to find out the grounds upon which they decided. It was clear how many unsophisticated persons would read this statement. The country would say the Government differed from the Court of Appeal, and they would have no means of knowing how far the Court of Appeal would be followed by the Sub-Commissioners in their judgments. What the Prime Minister said was substantially this. If the Sub-Commissioners did not follow the decision of the Court of Appeal they would agree with the Government, and the Government would not be put to the trouble of bringing in an amending Bill; whereas, on the other hand, if they did follow the decision of the Court of Appeal, they would, by so doing, say the Government were wrong, and consequently the Government would have to bring in an amending Bill. Was it accurate to say that this decision on the subject of compensating circumstances and improvements was not in accordance with the intention of the framers of the Act? He (Earl Cairns) did not know what the innate intentions of Her Majesty's Government were; but he knew what the expressed opinion of Parliament was, and what were the communications of the two Houses of Parliament upon the subject. The Prime Minister was under an entire misapprehension. The matter lay in a small compass. On the 12th of August his noble Friend (the Marquess of Salisbury) proposed an Amendment to the Land Act, to the effect that the Court, in fixing a fair rent, should consider the length of time during which the tenant had been enjoying improvements at a low rental, and that the time during which they had been so enjoyed should be held to be compensation for them. The terms of the Amendment were in substance taken from the Act of 1870, and the Amendment itself was adopted by their Lordships. It then went down to the House of Commons, where the Attorney General for Ireland said that, having regard to the clause already inserted in the Bill, the words were unnecessary, and asked the House to dispense with them, but suggested that the word "otherwise" should be inserted. His (Earl Cairns') right hon. Friend Sir Stafford Northcote hoped the House would not object to the insertion of the words, which he said were taken from the Act of 1870. The Prime Minister did not find fault with the words of the Act of 1870; but thought that if any doubt existed as to the meaning of the clause, it might be met by the word "otherwise," and he said that the Lords' Amendment might leave the matter ambiguous. The Amendment was then disagreed to, and the word "otherwise" put in. Thus the House of Commons disagreed with the Lords' Amendment, because, as had been said, having regard to the clause already inserted in the Bill, the words of the Amendment were superfluous. Now, after what passed between the two Houses of Parliament, were they to be told that a slur was to be cast upon the decision of the highest Court of Appeal in Ireland, because their decision was, it was alleged, not in accordance with the views of the Government? Statements recently made by the Prime Minister conveyed to the minds of the people of Ireland the impression that they were not obtaining from the Act the benefits they were entitled to under it. It made one tremble with despair to see how Ireland had been dealt with in the present Session. If there was one thing that he (Earl Cairns) thought the Leaders of both great Parties in Parliament were agreed upon at the commencement of the Session, it was that those Parties would be firm in resisting that unnamed but perfectly well understood movement which was called Home Rule, and he had hoped that that firmness would be persevered in. But the fact was, the Prime Minister interposed declarations in the course of the Session which it was enough to describe as having been welcomed by the advocates of Home Rule as the grandest statements ever made. He (Earl Cairns) was satisfied that those statements, having been taken over to Ireland, had done more to unsettle the minds of the people than anything that had taken place for years past. Then, as to the leaseholders, the right hon. Gentleman had told them they had a grievance. If there was at the beginning of the Session one thing more settled than another, it was the position of leaseholders by the Act of last year—that was thrown to the winds by the declarations of the Prime Minister. The decision of the highest Court in the country was similarly blown to the winds; and then they were told, forsooth, that that House, in endeavouring to ascertain where the shoe pinched, had done that which endangered the peace of Ireland, because it presumed to inquire into the working of an Act which the Government had themselves done their utmost to discredit.

Lord Carlingford

EARL FORTESCUE: After the announcement just made, I must ask pardon of the noble Lords who proposed and supported the Committee of Inquiry into the working of the last Land Act for having been deluded by the Government into voting against them. I voted thus, though that Act, undeniably confiscatory in its principles, had proved itself far more sweepingly confiscatory in its operation than Parliament had been led to expect; the Lord Privy Seal, indeed, said last Session that it would be beneficial to all except the few bad landlords in Ireland. I voted thus, though the appointment of Sub-Commissioners inspired little confidence, not so much on account of their general political partizanship—a charge which, while probably exaggerated, was not, I fear, by any means unfounded—but rather on account of the restriction in the selection of them imposed by Mr. Gladstone's unwise parsimony in judicial remuneration, of which this is by no means the first or only instance. I voted thus, though the Land Act has failed as a message of peace even more signally than I predicted it would to you last Session. I voted thus, though refusing a Parliamentary inquiry into very real grievances, while less utterly repugnant than would be the suppression of freedom of Parliamentary debate, was very uncongenial to me after supporting civil liberty all my life. I voted thus because, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, it seemed to me undesirable to disturb the public mind in Ireland about the Act before it had been practically at work more than a very few months. I ought to have known better, and remembered that Ministerial words sometimes require to be interpreted, as Tract No. 90 said the words of the Articles ought to be, in a non-natural sense. But I then little thought that a Statute, considered too sacred and fragile by the Government to bear even inquiring into, would within a few weeks be pronounced by its authors so far from perfect as already to require cobbling and piecing. And here, lest the memory of Ministers should lead them astray about this Act, as it did some of them about the Land Act of 1870, when they imputed its defects to Amendments made by their own Chief Secretary, their own Lord Chancellor, and their own Chancellor for Ireland, I would precautionarily remark that the Lord Privy Seal expressly admitted that the last Land Act, far from being injured, had been improved by your Lordships' Amendments.

Can any reasonable man doubt that, as pointed out by the noble Earl who so ably introduced the subject and the noble and learned Earl opposite, the language of the Prime Minister, by raising vague hopes in the Irish tenants, will have prevented many amicable arrangements being made between them and their landlords; or that it will have tended to encourage fresh refusals of rent, and to excite fresh outrages, in the expectation of thus extorting fresh concessions from the Government? And here I must remark that the Lord Privy Seal gave a very unsatisfactory answer to the noble Earl's comments upon the Prime Minister's extraordinary review of the decisions of the Court of Appeal, intimating his approval of the opinion given by the Irish Chancellor, and his disapproval of the judgment of the majority of that Court. This House—no thanks to Mr. Gladstone—continues to be, as it has long been, the highest Court of Appeal; but even here we should be very much surprised if we heard even the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack—the highest judicial person in the Realm—answering questions about any judgment given by another Court, not judicially brought before him. I must be allowed to protest against this as a practice all the more dangerous because, unhappily, sanctioned by a Prime Minister. I take a very gloomy view of the prospects of Ireland under the present Government. They ought not to believe that further agrarian legislation is the first requisite for restoring Ireland to the condition in which they received it from their Predecessors. What is most wanted is prompt and vigorous administration, speedy trial, generally without a jury, whenever evidence can be procured, heavy fines for offences levied on the district where evidence is withheld, and protection freely afforded to the law-abiding, even at the cost, if necessary, of increasing the Constabulary Force. The Government cannot deny that Ireland was handed over to them tranquil and orderly. The Prime Minister, more than three weeks after Lord Beaconsfield, speaking from official information, had publicly warned the country that Ireland was profoundly disaffected, declared that there was an absence of outrage and a sense of comfort and satisfaction in Ireland previously almost unknown. This was re-echoed by his supporters throughout the country, and the Government took credit for not having renewed, in spite of the warnings of their Predecessors and of the Resident Magistrates, the Peace Preservation Act, which they complacently allowed to expire. For the present lamentable and disgraceful state of Ireland I shall always consider the Government, by their credulity, vacillation, procrastination, and general helplessness in administration, to have made themselves deeply responsible.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: My Lords, my feeling is that we are often called upon to discuss the very gravest questions upon the most purely incidental event, and it puts us in a position in which, I think, the House is very often placed under circumstances of the greatest disadvantage. I do not think that the Government have given due appreciation to the magnitude of the interests at stake in the question put by my noble Friend on the Cross Benches (the Earl of Dunraven); but I am bound to say, as to the remarks of the noble Lord the Lord Privy Seal (Lord Carlingford) that they tend to allay alarms which have arisen in consequence of other utterances of the Government; and I do think that they show a due appreciation of the magnitude of the interests that are at stake upon the question placed before the House; but believing, as I do, that this is not a favourable opportunity for the discussion of the principles which are involved in the decision of the Court of Appeal in Ireland, I shall certainly postpone anything I have to say until a future occasion. But I do say this—that it is impossible to deny that the discussions which have arisen in this House to-night, and the discussions which have arisen “elsewhere,” throw an entirely new light upon the discussion as to the appointment of a Committee to inquire into the Land Act in this House, and in which I took no part. I was not present on that occasion, and I must frankly confess to the House that I had made up my mind to vote with the Government if I had been there, and I would have done so on two grounds. In the first place, no one can deny that the Government are charged just now with the most difficult duty which has ever been imposed upon any Government in this country. We are bound to look upon them as the Executive Government of the country, and to rely upon the information possessed by the Government; and therefore I should not have been disposed to vote for any inquiry which the Government, upon their own responsibility, distinctly stated involved an embarrassment that would prove dangerous to the government of the country. That is one of the grounds. The second ground is that I think the appointment of a Committee so early in the Session might give rise to misunderstanding in Ireland, and might lead many persons in the country to suppose it was the desire of our House to deprive the people of Ireland of the substantial advantages which we, in common with the other House, had agreed to give them in the previous Session. On these two grounds, and on these two grounds alone, I should have voted with Her Majesty's Government on that occasion; but I cannot deny there are many questions upon which it is at least possible that we shall have something to say on a future occasion. There is the question of arrears. I do earnestly trust—though from the observations of my noble Friend opposite it may be otherwise—that we shall not be called upon to consider the fundamental principles of the Land Act in the present Session, and so dissipate the idea of finality. Finality is a difficult word to deal with; but finality ought to be adhered to in regard to a great measure of this kind, which involves an enormous re-distribution of property; and I cannot conceive the peace of Ireland being secured if we are perpetually to have questions reopened which are fundamental questions. Putting aside, however, fundamental questions connected with the Land Act, there are a dozen others with regard to which it is of the first importance that this House should be duly informed as to the operations of the Act; and if we are to be called upon to discuss questions of emigration, arrears—as to which it is very possible that legislation may be required—and other questions which have been raised both in this and the other House, I think it is important that we should have the fullest information; and I think, therefore, the House has done wisely in seeking to gain some definite knowledge as regards them. Therefore, on the whole, though I am satisfied with the course which I have taken, I shall still look with immense interest on the Report which the Irish Land Act Committee may make; and I have no doubt some noble Lord connected with Ireland will raise the question, and give us an opportunity of considering the whole subject. It will be most unsatisfactory if, perhaps, at the end of June, or the end of August, or, Heaven knows, it may be the month of September, the House should be called upon to give its consent—“content” or “not content”—to some measure of which we know nothing in regard to the government of Ireland.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he apprehended that the principal object of the speakers who had not favoured the action of the Government had been to show that that House was right in its recent vote for the inquiry into the Land Act. His noble Friend on the Cross Benches (the Earl of Dunraven) had brought forward the case of “Adams v. Dunseath,” and had argued it upon its own merits; but the whole object of successive speakers had been to turn the arguments so as to extract from them a proof that the Government were wrong and that House was right; but those conclusions rested on a very slender basis. It had been assumed, in the course of the debate, that the inquiry of the House of Lords into the operation of the Land Act was to be treated in the same category with decisions of the Courts in Ireland; whereas there was the greatest difference between the course pursued by the Government and what he must call the "fishing" inquiry proposed and carried in their Lordships' House, for the purpose of finding out whether there were any defects in the Land Act which required legislation; but he did not think it was possible for the Government to adopt a more prudent attitude than that of watching the decisions of the Courts of the Land Act. He was sorry to find that his noble Friend behind him (Earl Fortescue) had changed his mind. When his noble Friend told the House of the dangerous hopes which might be excited by any statements which might lead people to suppose that it was intended to change the Act of 1881, did he not see that that might be turned round and put another way; and what would he say to the fears which an inquiry might excite in the minds of those who took a different view, and who thought, perchance, alterations might be made, as the result of that inquiry, adverse to the interests of the tenants? It constantly happened that Courts of Law gave decisions on the meaning of Acts which were not in accordance with the intentions of the framers of those Acts, and opinions were freely expressed on such decisions by many persons, and even by Members of the Government. The Government were watching the decisions of the Irish Land Courts. That was their method of inquiry. Precisely what the Government had said ought to be done was now being done. The Act of 1881 was left to operate; and the Courts in Ireland, not an inquiry by the House of Lords, were interpreting and applying the provisions of that measure. The Government were anxious, before any conclusions were come to as to amendments of the Act, to see what was the effect of the Act, both in its practical working and its legal interpretation by the Courts. He deprecated the importation into the discussion by the noble and learned Earl opposite (Earl Cairns) of the question of leases, and thought that with regard to the question of compensation for improvements, where it was, no doubt, difficult to arrive at the precise understanding of the elaborate judgments delivered by the Court, exaggeration had been indulged in. No one deprecated more than he did continually meddling with this important law. The Government would adhere to the main principles of the Act; but it might, of course, hereafter be found necessary that in some details, in which the Act might be found by experience not to work well, there should be amendments. It had been said that the opinion expressed by his right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone) with respect to the case of "Adams v. Dunseath" was meant to influence the Sub-Commissioners. But if everything said by a Member of the Government upon the subject of the Act was to operate upon the minds of the Sub-Commissioners charged with its administration, and to induce them to disregard their plain duty, then all he (the Earl of Kimberley) could say was, that they would be utterly unfit to perform the functions committed to them. He did not understand that his right hon. Friend desired for a moment to influence the decisions of the Sub-Commissioners. Was it not constantly the case that Judges placed an interpretation upon Statutes not contemplated by the Legislature, and that similar expressions of opinion were the result? As regarded the matter, he, for one, had considerable difficulty in arriving at the precise principles which governed it. The question seemed to be whether the intention of the Legislature was that, with regard to improvements, the Act of 1870 should be imported into the Act of 1881. It appeared to him that if the decisions of the Court were such as not to be in accordance with the intentions of the framers of the Act, then it was the obvious duty of the Government, at the proper time and season, to consider whether it was not part of their duty to propose the amending of the Act. It was not possible to suppose that this Act, in the sense that it would require no amendment in details, could be final; and what he apprehended was meant, when it was said they should not be continually making new laws in Ireland, was that the general principle of the Act should remain fixed, and that they should not be constantly altering their general policy; but as to the details, it was absolutely certain that questions would rise, sooner or later, upon which they might have to make some alteration in the law, large or small. It in no way followed that the time had arrived for a complete inquiry into the Act, because there was something in the working of the Act which should be remedied.

The Earl of Kimberley

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, I do not think my noble Friend who has just sat down (the Earl of Kimberley) has given an accurate impression of the House of the purport of this debate, or of the objects which those who introduced the discussion had in view. He has represented the debate as if it were a mere re-discussion of the question whether or not a Committee of Inquiry into the working of the Land Act was desirable. That is a matter of some importance; and I think it is very clear, from subsequent events, that the House on both sides is very much of the opinion of the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) that there was sufficient matter for inquiry. But the particular object which I understood the noble Earl on Cross Benches (the Earl of Dunraven) had in view was to impress upon the Government a matter which the noble Earl (the Earl of Kimberley) has passed over lightly—namely, the effect upon public opinion in Ireland upon the permanent pacification of the country, of the hints, and of more than hints, dropped by the Prime Minister, that he is prepared to re-open the question of land legislation for Ireland. A great re-distribution of property has taken place; that which belonged to the landlord has been re-distributed by being taken from him and given to the tenant. After that has been done, whatever the opinions of the Government with respect to it may be, the one thing you desire is that men on both sides—landlords as well as tenants—should settle down to their new relations, and should make the best of the situation as they find it; that they should settle, by mutual agreement, such differences as exist between them; and that, as far as the conditions of the Act will allow, they should go on with the most vital industry of Ireland as if nothing of importance had occurred, and no further legislation were contemplated. But the Prime Minister has produced exactly the opposite result by the declaration he has made, and he has opened up a boundless field for doubt. No landlord will like to make any permanent arrangements; he will not dare to risk any further his private property, already so grievously compromised, when there is an almost unlimited possibility, to be inferred from the obscure hints of the Prime Minister, of a new attack on his rights, and of a new re-distribution of his property. On the other hand, the tenant will not wish to bind himself by any agreement, or prematurely to challenge the decision of the Court which may be held finally against him, when there is unlimited hope in the results of further agitation, when the words of the Prime Minister betray how sensitive the Government is to the action of agitators, and how ready they are to abandon and tear up that finality which they promised, and to enter upon a new course of land legislation at the bidding of the agitators in Ireland. I do not care, with reference to this matter, what is the opinion of the Government. What I say is that they are bound either to abstain from ambiguous forecasts of their intention altogether, or to make a clean breast of it, and tell us what they do intend. It is unpardonable for the Government to keep these two important classes in Ireland any longer in a state of painful doubt. The Government are only intensifying antagonism, which is too bitter already; they are only exciting hopes and fears which have already been too fatal to the peace and prosperity of Ireland.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he greatly doubted whether the course taken that evening was not an unwise one. When Questions were put in either House of Parliament, it was generally agreed that some answer was needed; and when answers to Questions were represented, as they had been that evening, in the case of statements made by his right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, as meaning something which did not appear, at all events, to persons whose minds were constituted in the ordinary manner, it was to be regretted; for consequences might follow from the present discussion, and from their being so represented, which it was not intended should take place. The people of Ireland might think that they had, in fact, some rights which were not yet conceded to them, and thus their minds might become unsettled; and the result would be that much more harm would be done by discussing these statements than by leaving them as they were—simply as answers to Questions put in one of the Houses of Parliament. He did not understand that any statement made by the Prime Minister was intended at all to intimate that the Government were going to re-open the question of tenure under the Irish Land Act. The statement appeared, as far as he could judge, to have reference only to the Question put, and to have been carefully made so as to avoid any such construction. One thing, at all events, he should have thought perfectly clear, and that was that the Prime Minister, whether he rightly interpreted or not the decision of the Court of Appeal, did not for a moment seek to cast a slur on the correctness of that Court; and he should not, until that evening, have thought it possible that anyone could hold the Prime Minister's meaning to be that the Commissioners and Sub-Commissioners were not to act upon the decision of the Court of Appeal, or that the action of the Government was to depend upon the question whether the Commissioners and Sub-Commissioners took their own course, regardless of that decision, or whether they followed that decision. The noble Earl raised a question which really depended upon the construction to be put upon the decision of the Judges; but, if he (the Lord Chancellor) were called upon to discuss that decision, he should reply that he was not in a position to do so, as the opinions delivered by the several Judges, in the case of "Adams v Dunseath," had not been laid before the House, and he did not know that they had been laid before the House of Commons. He must say that until he came down to the House upon that occasion, the notion that any human being would put such an interpretation on the Prime Minister's words as had been put, or would suppose such a conclusion to be deducible from them, never would have occurred to him, and he was perfectly certain it never could have occurred to the Prime Minister himself. Then, did the Prime Minister hold out any expectation that the Government would re-open the question of the Land Act and introduce some new Bill to overrule the decision of the Court of Appeal? Quite the reverse. He said that there had not been time to ascertain the practical effect of that decision, and that its effect would have to be watched.

The Lord Chancellor

Again, the Prime Minister did not hold out any expectation that further power of breaking leases would be granted. Was any good to be done in Ireland by throwing doubt upon every statement of the Prime Minister, and by making every word of his a subject of debate? He did not think that any such uneasiness had been created by the statements of the Prime Minister as had been suggested, nor had they interfered with arrangements being made by landlords and tenants out of Court. If there had been any unsettling of men's minds, or any obstruction of settlements in that country between landlord and tenant out of Court, he thought that was much more likely to have been caused by the premature appointment of the Committee to inquire into the operation of the Land Act than by anything which had been said by any of Her Majesty's Ministers.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, the noble and learned Lord (the Lord Chancellor) had stated that it would be very unwise to pay attention to so small a matter as this, and that it would be better to let these disagreeable questions rest. That was not the light in which he (the Marquess of Lansdowne) looked at this question. He thought his noble Friend (the Earl of Dunraven) had done good service in bringing it forward that evening—first, by enabling the Colleagues of the Prime Minister in that House to show that their minds were not so open to conviction as his; and, secondly, by giving the House an opportunity of protesting against the way in which these great questions of principle had been left in suspense by the statements which had been adverted to. Speaking as one who had some knowledge of Ireland and the Irish people, he must join with the noble Earl who had brought forward the subject in the expression of his conviction that nothing would more retard a settlement of that country than the creation of an impression that whenever the people found that legislation had not in all respects fulfilled their expectations, their claims for a revision of what had been done were to be admitted. The great fault, both of the Land Act of last year and of the Land Act of 1870, had always seemed to him to be their extreme intricacy. And not only was it necessary for the illiterate peasants whose interests were at stake to make themselves masters of two of the most complicated Acts of Parliament ever introduced into the Statute Book, but in addition to this they were obliged, before they could know how they really stood, to study the three elaborate judgments of the Land Commissioners sitting as an Appeal Court in Dublin, and the seven still more elaborate judgments of the High Court of Appeal to which these matters had, in the last instance, been referred. Most people had hoped that the question having been thus dealt with was at last finally disposed of, and that the parties would be satisfied with the settlement of a case by the High Court of Appeal; but now it appeared that that was not so, for no sooner was a decision come to than it was called in question by the Prime Minister himself, and a most unfortunate state of things was the result. The fact was that this perplexity had arisen from Ministers not being able to make up their minds as to which of two alternative positions they would adopt on the subject of tenants' improvements. One position was that improvements once executed by a tenant or his predecessors in title—which had been interpreted to include predecessors in occupancy—could never be exhausted by enjoyment, no matter how long or how profitable. That was one view. The other position was that the land was the property of the owner of it—that its capability of improvement, with all its resources, latent and apparent, belonged to him, and that he was to be at liberty to lend the use of that land to another person upon condition that the person cultivating it should develop those resources, and, having done so, should be allowed to recoup himself for the expenditure of his capital, skill, and labour; but that, after he had been so recouped, then the landlord's reversionary interest in those improvements should be recognized. According to the former view the improvement resulted solely from the tenant's efforts, and, therefore, belonged exclusively to him; according to the latter it resulted from the co-operation of the tenant's skill, labour, and capital with the capital which the landlord or his predecessors had invested in the acquisition of the soil and its capabilities, and, therefore, belonged partly to the one party and partly to the other. Those were the only two positions which could be assumed in regard to tenants' improvements. Both were intelligible, but they were irreconcilable; and it seemed to him that throughout all these discussions they had never had any clear statement from the Government as to which of the two they took up. He (the Marquess of Lansdowne) had himself pointed out that the second of the two views was the one which had always hitherto regulated the agricultural economy of the United Kingdom. It was the principle of the Land Act of 1870. It was the principle of the Agricultural Holdings Act of 1875. It was the principle favoured by that unquestionable patriot, the late Mr. Isaac Butt. It was the principle in all the most liberally drawn Scotch leases; and, finally, it was the principle which the Irish tenants themselves invariably acted upon in their dealings with their fellow-tenants. That principle was never repudiated till last year. It was first called in question by the Bessborough Commission, and ultimately by the Prime Minister. He (the Marquess of Lansdowne) said ultimately, because what was known as Healy's Clause formed no part of the original proposals of the Government—it was, indeed, no part of Mr. Healy's original proposal—and was only accepted at a late stage of the Bill, with the addition of qualifying words which it was impossible to doubt, were accepted by both Houses of Parliament with the idea that they had effectually protected the landlord against tenants' claims on account of these remote improvements. It was impossible not to see that that was the basis on which the Healy Amendment was accepted. The whole question had now been re-opened by the recent statements of the Prime Minister. They were now in this difficulty. There were 16 sets of Sub-Commissioners regulating these matters, and deciding innumerable cases, into every one of which this question entered, without any principles being laid down as to the manner in which they were to be decided. He did hope that, as they were told some statement was to be made by the Prime Minister, there would be, once and for all, a clear and definite settlement of the question. In the meanwhile, the old principle had been demolished, and no new one had been established in its place—or one so vague that no two persons understood it in the same sense. In whatever sense it might be finally decided by the Government, they should recollect that if it were enacted that tenants' improvements were not to be exhausted by time, and, further, that succession in occupancy was to be the same thing as succession in title, the Government would be driven by inexorable logic into the adoption of Mr. Parnell's theory that the "prairie value" of the land was the fair measure of the rent which a tenant ought to pay for it—a theory for advocating which Mr. Parnell had been thrown into prison. That seemed to him to be the real difficulty. He did hope that if the Government were going to address themselves to the question, and to legislate upon it, they would deal with it in a manner incapable of being misunderstood.

LORD INCHQUIN said, the discussion which had taken place impressed him with the wisdom of the course that had been adopted in instituting an inquiry into the working of the Land Act. What he wished to find out was, how were the landlords of Ireland to ascertain whether the Sub-Commissioners, in giving their decisions, had acted upon the decision of the Courts of Appeal, or whether they had acted upon the hints which had been thrown out by the Prime Minister? Unless the landlords knew the grounds of the decisions, it was almost impossible that many cases should be settled out of Court by agreement between landlord and tenant. There was no security, as things were, that the tenant would not get paid twice over for his improvements—once when the fair rent was fixed, and then at the end of the statutory term. If their Lordships' Committee ascertained that fact, it would have done good service.

VISCOUNT MIDLETON said, that he quite agreed with the noble Lord who had just sat down (Lord Inchiquin). If the Sub-Commissioners' decisions, when reversed by the Court of Appeal, were to be said not to express the intentions of Her Majesty's Government, what hope was there of any final settlement in Ireland? He had spoken with more than one agent, who had expressed the opinion that while the question which their Lordships had been discussing was unsettled, there was little hope of amicable arrangements between tenants and landlords. He knew of cases where there was a willingness on both sides to accept the decision of gentlemen in whom they had confidence; but those gentlemen, though enjoying the confidence of both parties, declined to act, because of the uncertainty as to the principles upon which they were to adjudicate upon the question of fair rent. He asked whether any man could counsel an extra-judicial settlement when the decisions were so entirely different from one another? Take another instance. A Sub-Commissioner was appealed to to say upon what principle he made his valuation. He replied that he valued, in the first instance, the tenant's interest at the full disturbance allowance, and then took the full capitalized value of the tenant's improvements—in other words, he gave the tenant compensation for disturbance when he had not been disturbed. He believed that there was not a single landowner in Ireland who was not earnestly desirous of settling all differences between them and their tenants; but their difficulty was in dealing with an Act which had no definite interpretation, and with respect to which the Government refused any indication of the lines on which it was to be interpreted. He hoped for an assurance that the insecurity which landlords felt in dealing with their property might at an early date be put an end to by some definite assurance from the Government.

ARMY (ANNUAL) BILL.—(No. 66.)

(The Earl of Morley.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Earl of Morley.)

THE EARL OF LONGFORD said, that with regard to the manner in which this Bill had passed through the other House, he had to complain that many of the most important national Bills were either put aside or dealt with in a hole-and-corner fashion. He had endeavoured to learn something with respect to the efficiency of the Army; but he found upon inquiry that it was in a state of transition. In October last the Secretary of State for War made a public announcement of the satisfactory condition of the Army. He (the Earl of Longford) had thereupon written to him, asking him to name one single battalion possessing its full complement of men, and in every other respect efficient. The Secretary of State had adopted the old system, and never even answered his letter. He believed that no single battalion was at that moment in a state of efficiency. Last year there were several changes, the changes to territorial regiments, which had created more confusion than anything else since Babel; then there were various changes in the uniforms. The system of paying pensioners had also been changed, with the result that the pensioners, who were poor men, upon one occasion had to wait for their pensions. He did object to change in itself; he disliked changes which produced no advantageous result. He would like to know, as he was addressing the House, whether the recent change in the form of Gazette announcements to the commands of regiments and battalions indicates any change in the position or pay of commanding officers?

The Marquess of Lansdowne

THE EARL OF MORLEY, in reply, said, the criticisms of the noble Earl upon the Army were of so general a character that they did not require answering upon the present occasion. As regarded the Question put by the noble Earl, he would say that the change in the form of Gazette announcements to the commands of regiments indicated no change whatever in the position or pay of commanding officers. The reason for the change in practice referred to was that there were now two lieutenant colonels in each battalion—one subordinate, the other in command—and it would be on many grounds desirable and convenient that the appointment to the command of a battalion or regiment should be announced in The Gazette, though the officer so appointed had already reached the rank of lieutenant colonel. In reference to the new scheme for paying military pensions by post-office orders, he differed from the noble and gallant Earl, who stated that the change would produce no beneficial results—he believed, on the contrary, that it would be of great benefit to the pensioners, who would not in future be obliged to attend at their pension offices every quarter to receive their pensions, a practice which often interfered with their employments, and was productive of other inconveniences. The scheme had been put in operation for the first time on April 1st; and some little friction had arisen, as might be expected, in bringing it into working. Delay in issuing pensions had, no doubt, caused inconvenience—it did not deserve the name of hardship—to the pensioners in some districts who, it must be remembered, received their payments three months in advance; but the greatest care would be taken to avoid any such delay on future occasions—it having now only been caused by temporary circumstances incidental on introducing a large change of system. As regards the condition of the battalions forming the First Army Corps, he admitted that at present there was a larger proportion of young soldiers in these battalions than was desirable; but this was the unavoidable result of having suddenly to raise their establishments to a strength much in excess of what they had been hitherto. This increase could only be made by rapidly recruiting into them. It must take some time to harden these battalions; but as soon as the newly-fixed establishments were in order, this hardening process would progress rapidly, and in future years the condition of the battalions in question would be satisfactory.

VISCOUNT BURY considered that there was much to be said in regard to the administration of the Army, and asked that the next stage of the Bill should be put down as the first Order, so that noble Lords who took an interest in the Army might have an opportunity of addressing the House.

LORD CHELMSFORD said, he wished to point out that, as regarded the appointments of two lieutenant colonels, it was not a new regimental arrangement. In 1858, when he was appointed to the 95th Regiment, there were then two lieutenant colonels in all regiments in India. No practical inconvenience was then found in gazetting these appointments in the manner which existed before the recent change was made.

THE EARL OF MORLEY said, that he proposed to put this Bill down for Committee to-morrow.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^d accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House To-morrow.

House adjourned at Seven o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter past
Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 24th April, 1862.

MINUTES.]—SUPPLY—considered in Committee—Resolutions [April 21] reported.

WAYS AND MEANS—considered in Committee—Financial Statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer—The Resolutions.

PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading—Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) [21] [First Night], debate adjourned; Bankruptcy Law Amendment [87].

Committee—Report—Arklow Harbour (re-comm.) [137].

QUESTIONS.

STATE OF IRELAND—USE OF DYNAMITE.

MR. REDMOND asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that an attempt was recently made to blow up the house of Mr. John Ross Mahon, at Ahascreegh, with dynamite; whether Mr. Andrew Manning, Vice Chairman of the Ballinasloe Board of Guardians, and Mr. John Egan, have been arrested on suspicion of complicity with this outrage; whether he can state upon what kind of evidence such arrests were sanctioned by him; whether it is a fact that dynamite is largely used by the workmen of Mr. John Ross Mahon; whether seven cartridges of dynamite were found on the person of one of his workmen; whether this man has been arrested on suspicion; and, whether, under these circumstances, he will order a sworn investigation into the whole case?

MR. J. N. RICHARDSON said, that, before the right hon. Gentleman answered the Question, he wished to know whether the Mr. Ross Mahon alluded to in the Question was the son of Mr. Mahon, who was murdered in 1849?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he had no information as to the latter Question. With reference to the Question on the Paper, there was an attempt made to blow up this house with dynamite. The men who had been arrested had been arrested under the Protection Act. Dynamite had been used in moderate quantities in Mr. Mahon's works, and the police had removed some charges from an outhouse, in which they had been injudiciously left. He could not give the grounds for the arrest of these men, as it was not customary to disclose the grounds of arrests under the Protection Act. He did not think it was necessary to order a further investigation into the subject.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—SERGEANT MAGUIRE.

MR. REDMOND asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that Sergeant Maguire, chief clerk in the county inspector's office, Ballinasloe, absconded on the 16th of March last; whether he can state what amount of public money he embezzled; whether it is a fact that for years he had been in the habit of obtaining money under false pretences from newly appointed constables; and, what steps the Government have taken in the matter?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, Ex-Constable Maguire had been guilty of gross irregularity with regard to his duties as office clerk; but nothing came before the Court of Inquiry to ground a prosecution upon. Constable Maguire was no longer a member of the force.

STATE OF IRELAND—OUTRAGES AT LONDONDERRY.

MR. REDMOND asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he has any objection to lay upon the Table of the House, a Copy of the Correspondence which has lately taken place between the Corporation of Londonderry and the Government, with reference to the occurrence of alleged outrages at the foot of Bishop Street (Without), in Londonderry, and of the consequent necessity for the erection thereof of a new and costly police barracks; whether the outrages so alleged were attributed to the Roman Catholics of the locality, and whether really no such outrages took place at all; whether, it being alleged that the Roman Catholics had severely beaten and injured some of the servants at Government House, the residence of the agent of the Irish Society, and that, in consequence thereof, the protection of the police for the agent was sought for and obtained; and, whether it has since transpired that no such outrage had been perpetrated, but that some of the Society's employes, having stolen a quantity of whiskey that came by railway with the Society, they got drunk upon it, and beat and severely outraged each other, and then charged the peaceable Roman Catholic inhabitants of the locality with a party outrage?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that the Correspondence referred to by the hon. Member had taken place; but there was not, he thought, sufficient interest in it to warrant its being laid on the Table, unless the hon. Member chose to move for it, when there would be no objection to its production.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881 — RELEASE OF PRISONERS DETAINED UNDER THE ACT—LIMERICK GAOL.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Messrs. James F. Daly, John Holloway, and Michael Bush, were released from the Limerick Gaol on April 1st without the usual caution being given to them by the Governor; if it is the fact that the Governor followed one of those suspects, James F. Daly, to the rooms lately occupied by the Limerick Central Land League, and the other two to the private residence of the Secretary of the Limerick Ladies' Land League, and there administered the caution; and, whether the Government approve the Governor's course?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that the facts, as stated in the Question, were substantially correct. The Government did not approve the course taken by the Governor of Limerick Gaol in this matter, and had already signified to him their disapproval of what he had done. It was to be mentioned, however, in justice to the Governor of the Gaol, that he released the "suspects" in question in consequence of telegraphic instructions to do so, which were sent for the convenience of the prisoners themselves, in order that they might be liberated in time to reach their homes that same day.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881 — MR. JOSEPH SMYTH.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he will not again consider the case of Mr. Joseph Smyth of Columbkil, in the county of Longford, who has been confined for six months in Dundalk under a warrant charging him with being reasonably suspected of having taken part in intimidation; whether the district to which Mr. Smyth belongs is not and has not been peaceful and well conducted; and, whether, under the circumstances, he will direct that Mr. Smyth be released from prison?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, it should be taken into consideration.

ARMY—MILITIA REGULATIONS, 1880—BREVET PAY.

COLONEL O'BEIRNE asked the Secretary of State for War, If he will explain why some officers on full pay as captains and brevet majors in the regular forces, and holding appointments as adjutants of auxiliary forces, who, by paragraph 451, Militia Regulations, 1880, are entitled to receive brevet pay if appointed on or after the 22nd February 1871, were on application refused arrears of brevet pay accruing to them previous to the 1st April 1877?

MR. CHILDERS: In reply to my hon. and gallant Friend, I have to point out to him that the Warrant of 1877, which settled this question, only allowed these officers brevet pay from the 1st of April of that year. I myself have done nothing in this matter; and it would be unprecedented to disturb such a decision made by my Predecessor five years ago.

HARBOURS OF REFUGE (SCOTLAND).

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR (for Sir ALEXANDER GORDON) asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether, in view of the loss of life and property every year on the East Coast of Scotland, he will cause a survey and report to be made, by competent officers, of the two places they may find most suitable for the formation of two harbours of refuge, one on the south, and the other on the north, of the Firth of Forth, to which vessels navigating the North Sea, and fishing boats from the Coast, may run to for safety, at all times of tide, when caught in a gale of wind from the east?

MR. PEMBERTON asked the Secretary to the Board of Trade, Whether it is the intention of the Government to take any steps for the formation of a harbour of refuge on the South Eastern Coast; whether their attention has been directed to the advantages possessed by Dungeness for that purpose; and, whether the memorials addressed to the Board on this subject will be printed?

MA. CHAMBERLAIN, in reply, said, the hon. and gallant Gentleman who had put the Question would see that it would not be right for the Government to propose an inquiry of the kind suggested unless they had made up their mind that at the conclusion of the inquiry they would recommend to Parliament the construction of harbours of refuge at the national expense. That was a very large question, which concerned not only the East Coast of Scotland, as was shown by the Question on the same subject by the hon. Member for East Kent. It would involve an expenditure of many millions in the provision of harbours of refuge which could be shown to be necessary at different parts of the coast of the Three Kingdoms. He was sorry to say that past experience, with reference to this matter, hardly justified the Government in taking any such course. The provision of harbours of refuge by the State had not been, on the whole, very economical or efficient. This subject was fully discussed some 20 years ago, and the proposal to construct large harbours at the public cost decided against. Under these circumstances, the Government certainly would not be prepared to recommend the House to embark in any considerable undertaking of the kind. In reply to the latter part of the Question of the hon. Member for East Kent, he had to say that only one Memorial had been received advocating the formation of a harbour on the South Eastern Coast. There was no intention on the part of the Board of Trade to print it; but if the hon. Member liked to move for it, he saw no objection to its publication.

POOR LAW (IRELAND) — ELECTION OF GUARDIANS, CAVAN UNION — CHARGE AGAINST A RETURNING OFFICER.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If his attention has been drawn to the charges of great irregularity brought against the Returning Officer of Cavan Union by Mr. T. Boland, in connection with the late election of guardian for Belturbet electoral division, and on what grounds has an inquiry been refused?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, Mr. Boland had been in communication with the Local Government Board, and that body was instituting an inquiry into the matter.

ARMY—SENIOR MAJORS—EXTRA PAY.

COLONEL O'BEIRNE asked the Secretary of State for War, Why the advantage of extra pay granted to the two senior Majors of a Battalion of Infantry of the Line, or of a West India Regiment, by Art. 185—I. of the Royal Warrant for Pay, &c. dated 25th June 1881, has not been similarly extended to the two senior Majors of a Regiment of Cavalry of the Line; and, whether he will rectify this anomaly by a revised Warrant, granting the same advantage to Cavalry Majors as the Infantry Majors have obtained by the above-named Warrant?

MR. CHILDEERS: In reply to my hon. and gallant Friend, I have to point out to him that in the Cavalry, as in the Infantry, Majors of three years' service as such will receive the higher rate of pay. The special and temporary allowance to the two senior Majors of an Infantry Battalion were granted to protect them against a loss which cannot occur in the Cavalry, in which all the existing Majors, if qualified and recommended for promotion, became, under the new establishment, Lieutenant Colonels.

THE OPIUM TRADE—THE CHEFOO CONVENTION.

MR. PULESTON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is true, as stated in the public papers, that Her Majesty's Government, through its Representative at Peking, is in communication with the Government of China in regard to the trade in opium between India and China; and, if so, at what stage matters have arrived?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Her Majesty's Government have been in communication for a considerable time with the Chinese Government, through Her Majesty's Minister at Peking, respecting the opium trade and the arrangement on the subject conditionally agreed to in the

Mr. Pemberton

Chafoo Convention. The negotiations have been adjourned pending the consideration by Her Majesty's Government of a new proposal for the settlement of his question recently made by the Chinese Government. Sir Thomas Wade telegraphed, on the 9th of February last, that he was reporting fully on that proposal, and Her Majesty's Government are now awaiting his Report.

EDUCATION (WALES)—REPORT OF DEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE.

MR. PULESTON asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether the Government have approved the Report of the Departmental Committee on Education in Wales; and, whether he can state what a measure to give effect to its recommendations will be shortly introduced?

MR. MUNDELLA: The hon. Member for Devonport asks whether the Government have approved the Report of the Departmental Committee on Education in Wales. My answer is that the Government propose to legislate on the lines of that Report, and have announced their intention to do so in Her Majesty's Speech at the opening of Parliament. In a later Question my hon. friend the Member for Merthyr (Mr. Richard) asks me whether I expect soon to introduce the promised measure. I can only say that we shall be ready to introduce the measure as soon as there appears any reasonable prospect of making progress with it.

ARMY—RE-ENGAGEMENT.

COLONEL COLTHURST asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he will make known to the Army that private soldiers enlisted before August 1870, i.e. under the Act of 1867, may be allowed to re-engage, on the recommendation of their respective commanding officers, if of good character and otherwise eligible?

MR. CHILDERS: Yes, Sir; the pledge which I gave to the House on Monday last, that the rule for the re-engagement of privates shall be made perfectly clear, will be fulfilled, and the necessary order will issue shortly.

LANDLORD AND TENANT (SCOTLAND)
—THE EVICTIONS IN SKYE.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Lord Advocate, Did Lord Macdonald, in Syke, take away the pasture land from the tenants some years ago, without reducing their rents, and is the present struggle for restoration or reduction of rent; and, did he, or the Home Secretary, order Captain M'Caul to send the police to Skye, without consulting the Glasgow magistrates; and, if so, did the order instruct Mr. M'Caul to refuse all information to his superiors, the Lord Provost, Magistrates, Members of the Corporation, and Citizens of Glasgow? The hon. Member said he also wished to know whether the police who went on this expedition were armed with revolvers; and whether civil officers were entitled to be armed when going upon such expeditions?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): I have made inquiry with the view of enabling me to answer this Question; and the information I have received is, that till about 70 years ago the piece of hill pasture in question was occupied by the tenants of several small townships in the neighbourhood. At that time it was taken from them, and their rents were reduced from £280 in the aggregate to £200, at which latter figure they have stood since then. After the pasture ground was resumed, it was used as a market stance, and as a place for impounding strayed cattle. As it was uninclosed, the cattle and sheep of various persons were grazed upon it by tolerance, but not under lease or any other agreement. It was let for the first time about 17 years ago, and the animals belonging to the tenants in the neighbourhood were then excluded from it. No alteration was made upon their rents, which had continued to be paid down to the last few months without complaint. In answer to the second part of the Question, I have to say that neither the Home Secretary nor I gave any order, or had any communication with Captain M'Caul or the Glasgow police authorities on the subject of sending policemen. The application to the Glasgow authorities was made by the Sheriff, under the 90th section of the Police Act of 1866. The application was not, in the first instance, made to Captain M'Caul, but to the Lord Provost; and, the Lord Provost having assented, the Sheriff addressed a requisition to the Chief Constable, under which the constables were sent. I believe it is the case that the Sheriff did express the opinion that it would be desirable that the despatch should be made with as little publicity as possible, that being, in his judgment, essential for the proper execution of the duty, and in that opinion I entirely concur.

IRELAND — MR. CLIFFORD LLOYD — CIRCULAR BY THE INSPECTOR OF POLICE, CO. CLARE.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What course the Government propose to take with respect to County Inspector Smith, of Clare, who issued the Circular of the 4th of March, addressed to the sub-inspectors under his command; whether any communications have been addressed to the sub-inspectors of Constabulary in Clare, instructing them that the Circular in question has been withdrawn; and, whether a copy of such communication will be laid upon the Table, or its substance imparted to the House?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: The Inspector General of Constabulary informs me that, acting on his own responsibility, he has ordered the withdrawal of the Circular to which the hon. Member alludes. As regards the other part of the Question, I am in communication with the Lord Lieutenant on the subject, and I will take care that the House is informed of the conclusion at which we arrive. But, in the meantime, I must state that no proper precautions for the protection of Mr. Clifford Lloyd in the performance of his arduous duties will be neglected.

STATE OF IRELAND—OCCUPATION OF HUTS BY PERSONS EVICTED—IN-TERFERENCE OF THE POLICE.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Government will undertake that in future there shall be no interference with persons building or occupying huts on sites properly procured, or with evicted tenants availing themselves of the shelter thus provided?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Where the huts are merely for the shelter of the persons building or occupying them there will be no interference; but in all cases the action of the Government must depend upon the particular facts of each case.

The Lord Advocate

MR. SEXTON: I am sure the House will believe that it is with extreme reluctance that I resort a second time in this matter to the use of the Forms of the House. ["Order!"]

SIR JOHN R. MOWBRAY: I rise to a point of Order, Sir. It will be in the recollection of the House that the hon. Member for Sligo, on Thursday last, put a Question to the Chief Secretary for Ireland with reference to this matter, and moved the adjournment of the House in order to discuss it. I am quite aware—[Cries of "Order!" from the Home Rulers—] I am explaining the point of Order which I wish to put—I am aware that it is the practice of the House, under the exigencies of the moment, to extend its indulgence to any hon. Member who wishes to raise a Question upon a Motion for Adjournment; but I submit that when an hon. Member intends a second time to make use of the Motion for Adjournment on the same Question it is an abuse of the indulgence of the House, and an excess of even that outrageous licence which has grown up of late years.

MR. HEALY: On the point of Order, Sir, I—[Cries of "Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: As has been stated by the right hon. Gentleman who raised the point of Order, this case is certainly without precedent. The House is very indulgent to hon. Members in allowing the adjournment of the House to be moved before the commencement of the appointed Business of the day. That step was taken by the hon. Member for Sligo upon an occasion last week, when the same subject now raised was fully discussed; and I am bound to say that I consider that to raise again the same Question upon this occasion would be a gross abuse of the privilege ordinarily conceded to hon. Members. At the same time, I am not prepared, without direct instructions from the House, to say that the Question of Adjournment shall not be put from the Chair.

MR. SEXTON: Mr. Speaker, I shall not proceed, as I originally intended, considering the nature of the remarks you have addressed to the House, and especially the considerate manner in which you, at the close of your statement, guarded the Privileges of the House. I shall merely ask leave to read a letter from a parish priest of Tulla, with respect to an interview which he had with the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary on the subject before the House—

“DEAR SIR,—As I had a large share in the erection of the wooden huts in the parish ofulla, I take the liberty of sending you the following facts in connection with them. When the Chief Secretary visited here, I asked him if I were legal for me to assist the lady (Miss Kirk) who had just arrived from Dublin for the sole purpose of erecting huts for the evicted tenants and giving them temporary relief. Here are Mr. Forster’s words—‘It is perfectly legal, and nothing could be more legal than for a man to assist a man, and so long as the lady connects herself to these duties she should not be molested.’ I then promised the Chief Secretary that I would act as a special policeman, and see that this lady did not in any way incite the people to pay no rent. I now assert that this lady did not, either directly or indirectly, interfere in anything outside what Mr. Forster had declared to be ‘perfectly legal,’ and that she always declined to answer any question outside the building of the huts and the distribution of little charity. Miss Kirk is now in Limerick hool for acting legally. With regard to the erection of these huts, Miss Kirk and I were opposed to them whenever lodgings could be procured. Now, we erected them on sites for the most part where both landlord and occupier had given full and free consent. Only three of the entire number have been erected on land without the consent of the landlord, which consent would be applied for had we known his address. On the day of eviction the owner and occupier of a fee-simple property voluntarily came forward, and offered sites for huts for all evicted tenants. Several huts are erected, and others in course of erection, on that fee-simple property. Some of the evicted, with families of 10 and 12, first went into lodgings with neighbours who had large families and small houses. These lodgings were convenient to the holdings from which they had been evicted, and yet, as they had not sufficient accommodation, they went a considerable distance to wooden huts. This does not look like watching the farms. I know nothing about some of the evicted having paid their rents and are afraid of returning to their farms. Intimidation and outrage in the district have ceased. By Miss Kirk and myself telling these people that if any outrage or intimidation took place we would immediately break off all communication with them, we brought about a condition which the vast police, and military force too, had failed to effect.”

Mr. Speaker, I submit that letter to the consideration of the House. I thank you sincerely for the manner in which you have guarded, on this occasion, our privileges in this House; and I give notice that I shall, on the earliest available occasion, call attention to the subject.

MR. REDMOND wished to put a question arising out of an answer given by the Chief Secretary a few moments ago. Had the attention of the right hon. Gentleman been called to Section 41 of the Code for the regulation of the Royal Irish Constabulary? The section in question provided that—

“Before issuing any orders of a general nature to police officers under his command the County Inspector will submit them to the Inspector General for his approval.”

What he wished to know was, whether the order directing the issue of County Inspector Smith’s Circular was submitted to the approval of the Inspector General?

MR. W. E. FORSTER replied, that he was quite cognizant of the section of the Code referred to by the hon. Member, and that the Inspector General was not aware of the Circular before it was issued. He hoped that on a future occasion he should be able to give the House much information on the subject.

STATE OF IRELAND—THE REMOVAL OF PLACARDS BY THE CONSTABULARY.

MR. REDMOND asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that, on Sunday the 9th instant, the constabulary tore down and destroyed placards which were posted in Lady’s Island, county Wexford, inviting the tenants on two neighbouring estates to meet, in order to discuss the best manner of protecting their interests; and, whether he has sanctioned such action on the part of the police; and, if so, whether the Irish Executive intend to prevent, in the south of Ireland, meetings of tenants similar to those constantly held, unmolested, by the farmers of Ulster?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, it was the duty of the police to remove placards of an unlawful character. Placards had been posted announcing a meeting at this place, and a meeting had been held at which a “no rent” resolution was unanimously adopted. [MR. HEALY: Hear, hear!] When the placards were put up for the second meeting the police considered that the adjourned meeting would be of a similar character, and removed the placards, as was their duty.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MARTIN SCANLAN AND OTHERS.

MR. LABOUCHERE (for Mr. O’SHEA) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord

Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether No. 452, Martin Scanlan, No. 453, John Gregg, No. 454, Matthew O'Brien, No. 456, Michael Minogue, No. 458, John Clune, and No. 459, Martin Crotty, are correctly included, and whether the grounds for their arrest are correctly stated, in the Return of all Persons detained under the statute 44 Vic. c. 4, dated 1st April 1882?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, the grounds of the arrest were incorrectly stated, but were given in the Return. They were originally arrested for treason-felony, but not under the Protection Act. They were remanded to Ennis Gaol, and were re-arrested under the Protection Act on the expiration of their term of imprisonment.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACT—RESTRICTIONS ON THE MOVE- MENT OF CATTLE.

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE (for Sir SYDNEY WATERLOW) asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether, having regard to the high price of meat consequent upon the restrictions placed upon the movement of cattle after exposure for sale in the Metropolitan Market, and seeing that only one case of foot and mouth disease has appeared in the Metropolitan Market since the 23rd January (that case about 19th February), and that at this season of the year and during summer months the Home Counties draw the greater part of their beef supplies from the London Cattle Market, can he hold out any hope of an early modification of those restrictions, in order that the London Market may be placed on the same footing as the markets in other large towns, viz.: Liverpool, Manchester, Leeds, Wakefield, Birmingham, &c.?

MR. MUNDELLA: We cannot admit that the high price of meat is caused by the restrictions placed on the Metropolitan Market. The price of beef in that market was exactly the same during the three months which preceded the imposition of the present restrictions and the three months during which they have been in force. The price of mutton here, as elsewhere throughout the country, has been higher during the last three months. The Privy Council, however, are fully alive to the inconvenience caused by the restrictions, and are considering whether they may not now safely return to the state of things which existed up till the end of last year, under which animals sold in the Metropolitan Market may be taken into the country for slaughter.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PRO- PERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—POLICE PROTECTION (CARETAKERS) — CASE OF RICHARD ROCHE.

MR. CHAPLIN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is true that, in the case of Richard Roach, a caretaker in the employ of the Emergency Committee in Dublin, and who was shot dead on the night of the 17th, on the property of Mr. Caldwell, near New Pallas, county Limerick, that special police protection had been applied for and refused by the Irish Executive; and, whether he will lay upon the Table the Correspondence between the Emergency Committee and himself, the Under Secretary, Mr. Clifford Lloyd, and the Inspector General of Constabulary, with regard to the granting of special police protection to the men employed as caretakers by that Committee?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that the protection applied for was not thought necessary by the authorities at Dublin. The murder was not committed at or near the house, but at some distance from it. There had been no application for protection for these persons in going to and fro, and police protection would not have been required for three or four well-armed men if they kept together; but, unfortunately, three out of the four went away, leaving the other man by himself.

IRELAND — THE ROYAL IRISH CON- STABULARY — PENSION TO WIDOW OF SERGEANT KAVANAGH.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What pension the Government has determined to award to the widow of Sergeant Kavanagh, who was assassinated whilst performing his duty at Letterfeach, county Galway?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he was glad to be able to say that a special pension of £40 per annum had been awarded to Mrs. Kavanagh so long as she remained unmarried, and of £2 10s. to each of her children until they attained the age of 15 years.

CUSTOMS DEPARTMENT—THE NEW WAREHOUSING SCHEME—SURVEYORS.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, What is the number of surveyors of each class to be added to the Outdoor Department of Her Majesty's Customs consequent on the transfer of work from the existing Warehousing Departments to the Outdoor Department; and, whether it is the intention of the Treasury that the whole of the surveyorships thus created shall be given to the clerks of the Warehousing Departments who consent to be transferred with their work?

Lord FREDERICK CAVENDISH: Nine surveyors will be added to the first class, 12 to the second, and 24 to the third; but I cannot at present say how far these posts will be assigned to the outdoor and clerical branches of the Service.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS—COLLISIONS AT SEA.

CAPTAIN PRICE asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether his attention has been called to the numerous collisions which take place between steamships, and the great loss of life and property arising therefrom; and, whether he would consider the expediency of amending the Merchant Shipping Act so as to make it compulsory for all vessels carrying passengers to be fitted with longitudinal bulkheads so as to subdivide their water-tight compartments?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: I am fully aware of the number of collisions between steamships. It is, however, satisfactory to know that the number of lives lost by collisions at sea has decreased considerably during the past two years, notwithstanding the great increase in the number and size of seagoing steamships. For the greater security of life and property, I look rather to the strict observance of the Rule of the Road than to any attempt to regulate the details of construction of ships by Act of Parliament. This view is supported by experience. At one time the Merchant Shipping Acts contained an enactment on the subject of bulkheads; but the minimum required by a Statute is apt to become the maximum in practice; and since the Compulsory Clause was repealed the number of bulkheads has greatly increased, and they have also become more efficient.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PRO-PERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MR.
MOLONEY.

Mr. REDMOND asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that Mr. Moloney, at present confined as a suspect in Grangegorman Prison, Dublin, has been refused permission to see his wife except in the ordinary cage, and for fifteen minutes only each day; whether these rules have not been modified in the case of other prisoners who have been permitted to receive visits from their wives of an hour daily, and without the presence of warders; whether it is a fact that upon some occasions when Mr. Moloney had already received visits from friends from the country, even the visit of fifteen minutes in the cage was refused to his wife; whether there is any special reason for these rules being more rigidly enforced in the case of Mr. Moloney than in the case of other prisoners; and, whether the continued imprisonment of Mr. Moloney is due to the fact that Mrs. Moloney is a member of the Ladies' Land League, and that if she retired from that association the Government would release her husband?

Mr. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that Mr. Moloney was at present confined as a "suspect." As regarded the visits of his wife, he was allowed to see her just in the same way as other "suspects" were allowed to see their friends. The Rules were not more rigidly enforced in his case than in the case of others. His continued detention was not due to the fact that his wife was a member of the Ladies' Land League.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PRO-PERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—TREAT-MENT OF PERSONS ARRESTED UN-DER THE ACT—GRANGEGORMAN PRISON.

Mr. REDMOND asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that, although there are only two suspects in Grangegorman Prison, visitors are sometimes kept twenty minutes waiting before they can see their friends; no other visitor being in the Gaol; whether the air in the visiting cells is so bad that visitors have, on almost all occasions, made complaints on the subject; whether the cells are so cold that the suspects complain they "have to take off their boots and lie under the bed clothes for warmth from 8 o'clock till bed time at 10 o'clock;"

whether it is a fact that the exercise ground consists of a small cottage garden; whether it is a fact that, when a suspect desires to take a bath, he must go down to the convicts' apartments and use their bath; whether it is a fact that there is no hospital in the prison, and not even a room with a fire in which sick persons might lie up; whether the association room is connected with the only closet in the gaol; whether this closet, frequently getting out of order, the atmosphere in the association room is not sometimes abominable; and, whether he will at once have these complaints inquired into?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that three persons were detained as "suspects" in this prison. Visitors to them were never kept so long as 20 minutes before they saw their friends. The architect had reported that the air in the cells was good, that they were well ventilated, and kept at a fair temperature. The baths used by the "suspects" had never been used by convicts, and the sanitary arrangements of the gaol were in good order.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881 — MR. MURPHY.

MR. REDMOND asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that, on the 25th of January, Mr. P. J. Murphy, of Cork, was liberated from Kilmainham Prison, on parole, for such time as was necessary to attend to some urgent private affairs, and having been required to sign an undertaking to give notice to the authorities when such affairs were duly arranged; whether, on the 12th of February, Mr. Murphy returned to Dublin, and wrote a letter to the authorities, informing them that he had returned to surrender his parole, and would remain for three days at the Imperial Hotel, in Dublin, ready to receive orders to return to prison; whether he remained for that period ready for re-arrest, and, in fact, called at Kilmainham, but received no intimation whatever from the authorities; and, whether, under these circumstances, his release did not become unconditional?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that the facts were as stated by the hon. Member. Nothing had, however, occurred to alter the decision which had been come to by the authorities in this case.

ENTAIL BILL (SCOTLAND)—LEGISLATION.

MR. DUFF asked the Lord Advocate, Whether he will state to the House when Her Majesty's Government propose to introduce the Entail Bill for Scotland mentioned in Her Majesty's Gracious Speech from the Throne, in order that it may be considered before the meetings of the Commissioners of Supply?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (MR. J. B. BALFOUR), in reply, said, that the Bill had been prepared, and would be introduced as soon as the state of Public Business would permit, and he should see whether the desire expressed by his hon. Friend could be carried out.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881 — PERSONS CLAIMING TO BE AMERICAN CITIZENS DETAINED UNDER THE ACT.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he can state when he can lay the Correspondence with the United States relative to suspects claiming American nationality upon the Table; and, whether he can also present to Parliament the representations addressed last year to the United States Government in respect to the incitements offered in the United States to outrage in England, to which representation no answer has been received? The hon. Gentleman said he wished to know whether in case of the answer being unfavourable the hon. Gentleman would lay upon the Table that portion of the Correspondence which had been already published in America?

Mr. Redmond

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: The Correspondence to which the hon. Member refers will be presented to Parliament before the close of the present week. There will be no objection to presenting the representations addressed last year to the Government of the United States.

MERCANTILE MARINE—THE RECENT ACCIDENT TO THE "ALBERT EDWARD."

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether his attention has been directed to the accident that occurred on Tuesday last to the "Albert Edward" steamboat a short distance from Boulogne, on her passage to Folkestone, by the bursting of one of her cylinders; and if he has any official Report upon the subject explaining why she remained for four hours at anchor without receiving any assistance from the authorities at Boulogne; and, as to what provision is made by the Railway Companies at Folkestone and Dover to render assistance to a steamer disabled on her passage, so as to prevent in future the passengers being detained four hours at anchor, and then towed into Dover or Folkestone by a steam-tug in eight hours more? He wished also to ask whether the right hon. Gentleman's attention had been called to a letter in The Times of that day giving a full narrative of the dangers run and the miseries endured by the passengers; and whether it was not compulsory on Channel passenger steamboats to carry lights in case they were overtaken by fog?

MR. DIXON-HARTLAND asked whether the Albert Edward was not the same boat which had some of her machinery broken only the week before Easter, and drifted four or five hours before reaching Calais Harbour?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: With respect to the last Question, I have no information. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will put the Question another day. As regards the additional Question of my hon. Friend the Member for the City, my attention has been called to the letter to which he refers, and it is no doubt the fact that the Channel boats, like all other passenger boats, are required to carry a proper supply of lights. As to the Question on the Paper, the Board of Trade have instructed their officials to make a preliminary inquiry into the accident that recently occurred to the steamship Albert Edward shortly after leaving Boulogne on her passage to Folkestone; and when the Report of this inquiry is received, I will consider whether any further investigation is necessary. As to the vessel not receiving assistance from the authorities at Boulogne, I have no official information; but I learn from a private source that a pilot boat was sent off, the state of the tide preventing a tug from leaving the harbour. As to the last part of the hon. Member's Question, I will communicate with the Railway Companies.

ARMY (INDIA)—PROMOTION OF CAVALRY OFFICERS.

COLONEL WILLIAMS asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether he has any objection to lay upon the Table of the House the Papers showing what steps have been taken to relieve the stagnation of promotion amongst the Officers on the Cadres of Cavalry of the Indian Army, these Officers having been been led to believe, from various official communications addressed to them before, during, and since 1880, that "the question was then under the immediate consideration of Her Majesty's Government;" whether it is a fact that every Officer on these Cadres, after completing twenty years' service, serves pecuniarily at a disadvantage with his juniors of the "General List of Officers of Cavalry," by reason of those Officers being granted substantive promotion, and increased pay, after stipulated periods of service, these advantages being withheld from their seniors in the Cadres; and, whether this supersession in substantive rank, with the loss of the pecuniary advantages attaching thereto, is not a contravention of the guarantee given to the Officers of the Cadres above mentioned, by the "Henley Clause," and in antagonism with the opinions of the Committees presided over by Lords Hotham and Cranborne, and Sir T. Aitcheson, respectively?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The officers of the Cadres of the Cavalry of the Indian Army continue under the same rules of promotion as they enjoyed under the East India Company. Through slackness of Cadre promotion, they have for the most part fallen behind the Staff

Corps and General List officers in attaining the higher grades of substantive rank; yet every one of them had the option, in 1866, of joining the Staff Corps, and thereby placing themselves on an exact equality with the officers of whose more favourable promotion they now complain. That they did not take advantage of this is probably due to their desire to preserve the present advantage of considerably higher unemployed and furlough pay than that drawn by the Staff Corps and General List officers; and, secondly, to their hope that their ordinary Cadre promotion would, as has proved to be the case with the Infantry, prove more favourable to them than the promotion by fixed periods in force with the Staff Corps. As a fact, their promotion has been considerably less favourable than that of the Staff Corps and General List; but they are protected from supersession by the grant of Army—that is, brevet—rank, on the completion of the same periods of qualifying service as the Staff Corps and General List. Their rights and privileges have been strictly maintained, and there has been in no degree a contravention of the Parliamentary guarantee. Still, there is no doubt that the position of the local Cavalry officers, especially in the junior grades, is so depressed that some exceptional and remedial measures are needed. I have, therefore, recently addressed the Government of India on the subject, and have suggested a measure, which will, I believe, prove efficacious. Until I receive their reply, I do not think I could properly lay the incomplete Correspondence before the House; nor would it be right that I should indicate the remedial measures which I had suggested, until the Government of India has had an opportunity of considering and expressing an opinion on it.

NAVY—PAYMENT OF NAVAL PENSIONS.

MR. GORST asked, Whether it is a fact that the payment of Naval Pensions due April 1st has in the Chatham district not yet commenced; what steps will be taken by the Admiralty to expedite the payment of these pensions; and, whether measures will be taken to prevent on a future occasion the inconvenience and distress caused by the non-receipt of moneys upon which the pensioners have been accustomed to rely?

MR. CHILDERS: In reply to the hon. and learned Member, I have to remind him that I answered a general Question on this subject some days ago, and on Friday I stated that the delay in paying the pensions at Plymouth, which I was at a loss to understand, had led to an officer being specially sent there. We also found delays at Chatham, and sent an officer on Saturday there; and I hear by telegraph to-day that the issue to 2,700 pensioners (Army, Navy, &c.) is now concluded. These delays, as I have already informed the House, will not occur again.

MR. PULESTON asked whether there was any objection to allowing these pensioners to go personally for their pensions? It would save both time and expense.

MR. CHILDERS: The present system was established in order to remove the temptation which existed previously to pensioners to go and spend their money as soon as they received it. There is no intention to return to the old arrangement.

MR. MACLIVER asked whether it was a fact that the pension papers must be signed by four Staff officers?

MR. CHILDERS: I am unable to reply to that Question without Notice.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked whether it would not be desirable to station a Staff officer at Woolwich?

MR. CHILDERS: I do not think that it is necessary that an officer should be stationed at that place.

CUSTOMS DEPARTMENT—THE NEW WAREHOUSING SCHEME.

MR. ANDERSON asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, If it be the fact that, in reorganizing the Customs Service, the Indoor Warehousing Department is being abolished or greatly reduced, and the servants are offered only the ordinary terms of retirement, or the acceptance of outdoor service, involving longer hours, nightwork, and exposure in duties not strictly analogous to their former employment; and, if it be the fact that, when similar changes were made in the Admiralty and War Office, an Act was passed (41 and 42 Vic. c. 53) giving gratuities to those who were thus retired, and why the Customs servants are to be less liberally dealt with?

The Marquess of Hartington

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: I cannot admit that the alternative offered to the displaced warehousing clerks is accurately described in the Question of my hon. Friend. The new service will practically be not very unlike that to which they have been accustomed; and so far as the hours are different, they will be compensated by some increase of pay. Failing the acceptance of this alternative, they will receive pensions at the special rate allowed under the 7th section of the Superannuation Act, in case of abolition of office. I cannot but think that much groundless alarm has been excited by too literal interpretation of the technical term "outdoor." As regards the suggestion in the latter part of the Question, I have to observe that the very peculiar circumstances which were held to warrant the exceptional terms given in the War Office and Admiralty, under a special Act, do not exist in the present case.

GEOLOGICAL SURVEY (SCOTLAND).

MR. BUCHANAN asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether he will lay upon the Table the recent Memorial of the Edinburgh Geological Society with regard to the Scottish Geological Survey, together with the reply thereto of the Science and Art Department?

MR. MUNDELLA: I shall be glad to lay the Correspondence on the Table if the hon. Member will move for it.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—INTERFERENCE OF THE CONSTABULARY.

MR. LALOR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is true that, on the 15th instant, the constable of Ballybrittas Station, in the Queen's County, accompanied by a sub-constable, visited the residence of Mr. Edmund Nolan, of Belin, and told him that—"He had been ordered by the sub-inspector, Mr. Grene, of Maryborough, to call on him, Mr. Nolan, and ask what terms he had made with his landlord;"

and, if so, is it to be understood that for the future the police force in Ireland shall have added to their other duties the responsibility of collecting rents, and otherwise acting as land agents?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that the statement was not true, and that the police would not be employed in collecting rents.

ISLAND OF CYPRUS—THE NEW CONSTITUTION—REPRESENTATION OF MUSSULMEN IN THE LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the Mussulman community of Cyprus have presented a Petition to Her Majesty's Government against the new Constitution of the Legislative Council in that Island, by which it is proposed that the Council shall consist of nine Christian to three Mussulman members, and whether the following is an accurate representation of the tenour of the Petition:—That the British Government, in proposing this change of proportion (the present members on the Council being half Mussulman and half Christian), have not considered the loyalty with which the Mussulman inhabitants of Cyprus accepted the change of administration, refusing to listen to the Anti-English party who tried to stir up agitation; that the British Government have not considered the character of the agitation which is now going on among the Greek population for the ruin and oppression of the Mahometans; that they have not considered the fact that the Mussulmans, who have for over three centuries possessed the Island, have always treated their Christian fellow-citizens with justice, and protected them in the enjoyment of their property and religion; that the Government have not consulted the British Authorities in Cyprus before using this new Constitution; that, although in the 10th and 11th Articles of the new Constitution it is stated that the British Government, in accordance with the terms of their Convention with the Sultan, wish to give the population of Cyprus a law and not privileges, yet by the 4th Article (which establishes this Council of nine Christians to three Mussulmans) they give to the Greeks the greatest possible privilege—one which they do not even possess in Greece itself; that in Asia Minor, where the Mussulmans are in a large majority, the Christian population have equal numbers and equal votes on the Administrative Councils, and of the fact that under the proposed change the Mussulmans who are in a majority in Nicosia, the principal town, would be at the mercy of the Greeks, and in view of the fact that the Greeks openly assert that they mean to use their majority on the Council in order to oppress the Mussulman population, and to obtain the independence of Cyprus; the Petitioners finally pray that either the proposed Constitution of the Legislative Council be modified and restored to the old plan of equal numbers and equal votes, or that the Mussulman population be allowed to emigrate in order to escape the loss of their rights and their personal safety; whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been called to the inflammatory articles inciting to race persecution and revolution which appear in the Greek journals of Cyprus; and, whether, in view of the very grave statements contained in the petition of the above Mussulmans of Cyprus, which is signed by the Mufti and other notables on behalf of the whole Mussulman population of the Island, Her Majesty's Government will either withdraw the Article complained of, or fix an early day for the discussion of the question in Parliament?

MR. COURTNEY: Sir, a Petition has been received from the Mussulman community of Cyprus; but the representation of it in the Question of the hon. Member cannot be accepted as accurate. The Petition and the reply will be included in the Papers shortly to be presented. I may, however, say now that the document commented on in the Petition is not a draft of a Constitution with definite Articles, but a despatch containing a general outline of a proposed new Council. It is not proposed that the Council shall consist of nine Christian and three Mussulman members. These will be the members elected by the Mussulmans and Christians, and in addition thereto there will be six official members, and the President will also have a vote. The present Council is not half Mussulman and half Christian. Sir Garnet Wolseley appointed one Mahomedan and two Christian unofficial members; but there is now one vacancy among the Christian members. It is not the case that the British authorities in Cyprus have not been consulted. There have, in truth, been long and frequent communications with them. It will be seen, without going through all the paragraphs of the Question of the hon. Member, that the fears of the Mussulman community, to whose loyalty and good behaviour the Secretary of State willingly bears testimony, rest on misapprehension of the nature of the proposed Council, and it is not proposed to withdraw the scheme. It is not thought that any particular attention is due to the articles in the Cyprus Press more than to other strong articles which appear in newspapers throughout our Colonies. It is not intended to fix an early day for the discussion of the question in Parliament.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked of what nationality the six official members were to be?

MR. COURTNEY: As they will be appointed by England, they will be probably English.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, that, in consequence of the unsatisfactory answer of the hon. Gentleman, he should call attention to the subject on an early day.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881— MESSRS. NALLY AND O'KANE.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, On what grounds the warrants were issued against Messrs. Nally and O'Kane, and who was the person at whose request these gentlemen were told that the warrants were suspended, and that they might return to Ireland?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he had already explained the circumstances of this case, and he could not go into any more details.

CROWN AGENTS FOR THE COLONIES— INSPECTOR OF COALS AT CARDIFF.

MR. LEWIS asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether Mr. John Batchelor, of Cardiff, has recently been appointed by the Secretary of State for the Colonies Inspector of Coals to the Crown Agents for the Colonies, or by whom such appointment was made; whether he had any experience whatever on the subject of coal exploration or coal mines, or any practical knowledge of coal or the coal trade; whether he is the same person as carried on business as a timber merchant and ship-builder during all his business life; whether he is also the same person who was for some time previous to his appointment the leader of the Liberal party in Cardiff; and, whether the appointment was conferred by the Colonial Secretary spontaneously or at the solicitation of Mr. Batchelor?

Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett

MR. COURTNEY: The appointment to which the hon. Member refers is made by the Crown Agents on their own responsibility. The Secretary of State transmitted to the Crown Agents one testimonial which was sent to him in favour of Mr. Batchelor; but did not interfere further in the matter, and never heard anything about Mr. Batchelor's political antecedents. I myself received, and forwarded, a similar testimonial. Another letter which I received, referring to Mr. Batchelor's political services, I entirely suppressed. The Crown Agents report that Mr. Batchelor was one of several applicants who submitted their testimonials on the death of the late holder of the office in question; that he was then selected, with two or three others, as appearing to possess the best qualifications for the post; and it was eventually conferred upon him after communication with those who, in the Crown Agents' opinion, were competent to speak as to his special knowledge of the duties he proposed to undertake. The Crown Agents add that in making their appointments they are not actuated by political considerations, their object being to secure the most efficient servants they can get.

THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—

“UNITED IRELAND” — ALLEGED EXCESS OF DUTY BY A CONSTABLE AT WATERFORD.

MR. LEAMY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is true that on Sunday last a police constable entered the house of Mr. Patrick Kavanagh, Michael Street, Waterford, and, finding Mrs. Kavanagh engaged in reading “United Ireland,” attempted to take it from her, and in the attempt threw her down, put his knees on her stomach and tore her clothes, while he searched her in a most insulting manner, Mrs. Kavanagh being unable to offer any resistance, as she has been for some time partially paralyzed; whether he also assaulted her daughter, Miss Kavanagh, and then proceeded to search the premises, knocking the furniture about in all directions; and, if these statements are correct, what course the authorities propose to take to mark their sense of such an outrage?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he had made inquiry into this case, and found that the constable was guilty of this assault. He was not aware of the instructions that had been issued against seizing the recent numbers of United Ireland. He saw a woman reading a number of the paper, and wanted to take it. She resisted, and he then took it from her by force. The constable was summoned before the magistrates, and fined 21s. and costs. He denied the particulars of the aggravated assault; and he (Mr. W. E. Forster) imagined that the magistrates must have agreed with him, because the Mayor and one of the Justices present said that, although it was their duty to fine him for assaulting the woman, they believed he only did it in what he considered the discharge of his duty.

MR. SEXTON asked if the right hon. Gentleman was aware that some of the magistrates expressed their disbelief in the accuracy of his statement?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I was not aware of that.

LAW AND POLICE—THE RIOTS AT CAMBORNE.

MR. LEAMY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is true, as reported in the “Cornish Telegraph” of Thursday 20th instant, that, on Tuesday last, a riot occurred at Camborne, Cornwall, which began in an attempt to stone two Irishmen who were in the custody of the police; that the houses of the Irish in the town were wrecked, and the property in them destroyed and several of their occupants brutally ill-used, that, in one case, a poor old woman who had been bedridden for a couple of years was pulled from her bed and left writhing in agony on the floor; that an attack was made on the Catholic Chapel, and that—the crucifixes and pictures; the image of the Virgin Mary was torn from its place, thrown amongst the mob, and trampled to pieces. The confessional-box was speedily converted into fire-wood. The altar and its fittings were torn down, the gaseliers were broken off, and the organ destroyed—the scene within the Church begging description;”

“First the windows were smashed in, then, after repeated efforts, the doors were forced. Inside, the rioters lost all control of themselves, and did most wanton damage. They broke up

whether any of the rioters have been arrested; and, whether any steps have been taken to protect the life and property of the Irish residents in Camborne and to restore law and order in that town?

MR. JUSTIN MCCARTHY: Before the right hon. and learned Gentleman answers the Question, I may, perhaps, be allowed to put another on the same subject. I wish to ask him whether he has seen the following statements in The Standard of this morning, and whether they are true so far as he knows:—

“About a dozen men suspected of being ringleaders in the riots, were also sworn in, and placed on duty in the Town Hall;”

and, again—

“Complaint is generally made that there were rumours for a week or more before the Petty Sessions day that there would be a riot, and that the Catholic chapel would be wrecked, of which rumours the Magistrates were informed by the priest. No precautions were taken to prevent the threats being carried out. Secondly, that after the riot no protection was provided for the threatened Irish in the outlying villages. And, thirdly, that when the county police were brought to Camborne they were kept shut up in the station, so that they were utterly useless, and the victory lay with the mob. Not one of the rioters has yet been apprehended?”

MR. BELLINGHAM asked whether the right hon. and learned Gentleman had seen the statement in this day's paper to the effect that the conduct of the authorities had been the subject of ridicule throughout the country amongst all classes?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I have received reports on the subject from the Chief Constable and from the Justices, which are too long to read to the House; but the effect of which, to my mind, is that none of those reports in the newspapers are correct. They are entirely exaggerated, and altogether inaccurate. That is the answer I have to give with reference to the newspaper reports. With regard to the latter part of the Question, I am informed that the steps which have been taken to protect the life and property of the Irish residents in Camborne, and to restore law and order in that town, have been sufficiently effectual, and that no repetition of these disgraceful riots has taken place. I saw the Chairman of the Local Quarter Sessions at the House here on Friday, just before he was going to Cornwall, and I impressed upon him the necessity and propriety of making every effort to arrest the authors of these riots. I have received a telegram to-day showing that one of the persons has been arrested, and that it is intended to make further arrests.

MR. HEALY: May I ask whether it is not true that the special constables sworn in to prevent the riot were the ringleaders of it?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I have no information to that effect.

MR. LEAMY: Is it true that the Roman Catholic Church was wrecked and the sacred ornaments torn down?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: The accounts I have received say that that statement is quite untrue. Some of the windows were broken; but a very gallant lady routed the mob with a candlestick. [Cries of “Read!”]

“She was carrying out a pair of large candlesticks when she saw a man trying to unshackle the altar rail. She put down one candlestick, clubbed the other, and went for him. He ran away, leaving his pocket-handkerchief behind him; and every soul in the place scuttled off, hiding their faces in their coat-collars.”

All the sacred vestments and other articles were rescued.

MR. BELLINGHAM: Was the church in such a state that no service could be held in it on Sunday?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I believe it was thought indiscreet to hold a service there last Sunday.

SOUTH AFRICA—NATAL—ALLEGED MASSACRE.

MR. R. N. FOWLER asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether his attention has been called to the following statement of the “Grahamstown Journal” of March 8th:—

“The correspondent of the ‘Independent’ at Taunse, March, 4th, says—‘On Feb. 13th a patrol of Boers and Mosheshe's men captured thirty unarmed men of Jan Macsibi's on the road from the Diamond Fields, took them to their laager and massacred twenty-seven of them. On the 21st the whole force of two hundred and fifty Boers with Mosheshe's and Matchain's people attacked Montsion's station ee cannon; in the afternoon they tried the station by driving cattle in front of the trenches; at the third attempt they sallied out, captured all the cattle, and the Boers to their laager. Their loss was, but must be heavy. At daylight the Boers again attacked the station. Thirty-eight Boers and allies were left dead, and among them the Boer commander and the leader of Moshote's army; " whether he can give the House any information on the subject?

Mr. Leamy

COURTNEY: I have not seen a paragraph in The Grahamstown, except in the Question of the Chamber; but we have received a cover from Sir Hercules Robinson from Mr. Bethell, agent to us, containing almost identically the same statements. Sir Hercules Robinson had already directed the Resident to inquire into the truth of the allegation of the murder of unarmed, and we look for a further Report on this and other points.

LAW (IRELAND) ACT, 1881— THE TENANTRY.

HEALY asked, If any information reached the Government as to a number of the tenants who made applications to the Land Commission, fix a fair rent are in the meantime following their farms to remain; and, if he can give the House to what extent this practice is going on?

N. E. FORSTER: I have no information to that effect. I have asked the Land Commissioners personally, and they likewise have no information.

MENT — BUSINESS OF THE E—THE NEW RULES OF PRO- CEEDINGS.

PEMBERTON asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, having to what took place in this on Thursday last, during the day devoted to answering Questions, he has considered the desirability of the 2nd Resolution, relating to the business of the House, before the 3rd Resolution is finally disposed of?

GLADSTONE: We do not think able to do so, even to avoid the inconvenience to which the hon. Member alludes.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACT, 1881— "ARREARS."

MR. T. A. DICKSON asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If Her Majesty's Government are prepared to submit any scheme to the House, in reference to the question of arrears of rent in Ireland?

MR. GLADSTONE: On Wednesday a Bill will be discussed which will give the hon. Member an opportunity of raising the question. If he likes he can put this Question then.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PRO- PERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—FO- REIGN SUBJECTS DETAINED UNDER THE ACT.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce some measure to enable the Executive to deal with suspects claiming foreign nationality, on the principles laid down in the Act 11 and 12 Vic. c. 20?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: It is not the intention of the Government to introduce such a measure.

ENGLAND AND FRANCE — THE CHANNEL TUNNEL SCHEME.

MR. ARTHUR VIVIAN asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether an opportunity will be afforded to Parliament of expressing an opinion on the general question of the desirability of a Channel Tunnel before any sort of sanction is given to any scheme by the Government?

MR. GLADSTONE: I have already stated that nothing should be done without the House having a full opportunity of expressing its opinion upon the subject. If my hon. Friend means to inquire whether the Executive Government, in their corporate capacity, will do anything to prejudge the opinion of the House or to limit its discretion in any way, I would say certainly not.

RATING — VALUATION OF GOVERN- MENT ESTABLISHMENTS.

MR. BOORD asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether the grant in lieu of rates, in respect of Government establishments situate in the parishes of Woolwich and Plumstead, is still paid on a valuation made in the year 1874; whether large additions and improvements have not been made in the said establishments since that date; and, whether he will consider the propriety of causing a fresh valuation to be made?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: The valuations on which the Treasury contributions in lieu of rates are made were settled in 1875 for the parishes of Woolwich and Plumstead. I believe it is true that since that date there has been considerable outlay on the property. It would be undesirable to reopen the question of the valuations until all the Government property in the United Kingdom has been assessed. This task will, I hope, be completed in about two months, after which the whole subject will be carefully considered.

LAW AND POLICE—THE RECENT ATTACK UPON THE SALVATION ARMY AT CHESTER.

MR. CAINE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been called to the recent trial, at the Chester Sessions, of the ringleaders of the riots against the Salvation Army, in that city, who were charged with violent assaults on the members of that religious body, by which many peaceable citizens were injured, one woman having been at the point of death for more than a week, and a young man having become totally blind in consequence; if he is aware that the prisoners were all found guilty by the jury, and were proved, during their trial, to have been persons of known bad character; and if it is true that the Recorder of Chester inflicted no punishment, but simply bound them over to come up for judgment if called upon; if he is aware that the rioters dealt with summarily by the borough magistrates, at the time these ringleaders were sent to trial, are still in prison; and, if he will take into consideration how far the Law is properly vindicated by the lesser offenders receiving a more severe punishment than the ringleaders?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he had no power over the magistrates in such matters. He could not order a heavier sentence than the magistrates thought fit to inflict.

FRANCE—THE COMMERCIAL TREATY—RENEWAL OF THE NEGOTIATIONS.

MR. MAGNIAC asked, Whether there was any truth in the report that the Government had made proposals to France for a renewal of the negotiations for a Treaty of Commerce, in consideration of certain concessions in respect to cotton and silk?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: There is no foundation for the report.

ISLAND OF CYPRUS—THE NEW CONSTITUTION—REPRESENTATION OF MUSSULMEN IN THE LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

MR. MACIVER inquired, Whether it was true that the Mussulman inhabitants of Cyprus were only to have three representatives on the Council out of a total of 18?

MR. COURTNEY, in reply, said, three Mussulman members would be elected to nine Christians—a proportion which fairly represented the population of the Island. The other members were official.

THE LAND LEAGUE AND FENIANISM—MR. ARNOLD FORSTER AND THE "PALL MALL GAZETTE."

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to a letter in to-day's Pall Mall Gazette, signed "Arnold Forster," maintaining that there is no distinction between the members of the Land League and the Fenians; whether it is a fact that the principal members of the executive are now in prison; and, whether it is usual to allow persons confined under the Protection of Person and Property Act to write letters to newspapers on political matters?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: The hon. Member should give Notice of his Question; but I do not think I am bound to answer such Questions at all.

CIVIL SERVICE APPOINTMENTS—PRIVATE SECRETARIES TO MINISTERS.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR, who had a Notice standing on the Paper to the effect—

"That the practice of appointing clerks of the Treasury Office, and other gentlemen who have acted as private secretaries to Prime Ministers and Chancellors of the Exchequer, to important posts in Departments of the Civil Service other than the Treasury, is calculated to discourage zeal and industry in such Departments to the prejudice of the Public Service," remarked that, although he regarded the subject of his Notice as one of great importance, still, as it appeared to be the general wish of the House that the Prime Minister should be allowed to make his Financial Statement at as early an hour as possible, he had yielded to the suggestion of his hon. Friends around him that he should withdraw his Motion. He therefore begged leave to give Notice that he should postpone his Motion until the next occasion when the House was asked to go into Committee of Supply.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

WAYS AND MEANS—FINANCIAL STATEMENT.—COMMITTEE.

WAYS AND MEANS—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. GLADSTONE): Mr. Lyon Playfair—I think that my first duty on this occasion is to tender my acknowledgments to hon. Gentlemen opposite, and especially to the hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. A. O'Connor), for the courteous announcement which he has just made to the House. I believe, however, that I may say, without offence, that the Motion of the hon. Member for Queen's County would have been an innovation, and that it would have been in my power to have counteracted it by another innovation quite within the limits of the Orders of this House—namely, by making the Financial Statement with the Speaker in the Chair. I think, however, that the Committee will feel that it is much better that these two innovations should pass into the usual place of unfulfilled resolutions, and that the Financial Statement should be made in the usual manner, by which perfect freedom of remark is allowed to all hon. Members who may see occasion to enter into the subject. With respect to the general financial condition of the country, I will only say that essentially the position of the Expenditure is that it is a somewhat growing Expenditure, and that with respect to the Revenue, that it is a sluggish Revenue. It is much as it has been during the last two years—this being the third occasion during the existence of the present Government on which I have had cast upon me the duty of making the Financial Statement to the House. It is very remarkable that although employment is generally active, and although the condition of trade cannot be said to be generally unsatisfactory, yet the recovery of the country from the point of extreme depression has been a slow and a languid recovery, especially as far as regards the action of that recovery upon the Revenue of the country. No doubt, there is a natural explanation of the circumstance in the extreme excitement—the unnatural and the unhealthy excitement—of prices which existed during the period of prosperity which preceded the time of depression; and it is to that cause that we must look for the slackness of the recovery to which I have referred, and not to any diminution whatsoever in the resources of the country, or any deterioration of its industrial prospects. I go at once now to lay before the Committee the particulars which it is customary for them to receive on this occasion. I shall have to deal in the first instance with the financial year 1881-2, which reached its close on the 31st of March. The Expenditure of that year was estimated at £86,190,000; the actual Expenditure was £85,472,000, showing that the Expenditure fell short of the Estimate by £718,000. The comparison of the Expenditure with the Expenditure of the preceding year is a more serious matter. Of course, it is well within the Estimate; but the topic to which I next pass—namely, the comparison with the preceding year—requires a little closer investigation. The Expenditure of 1880-1 was £83,180,000; the Expenditure of 1881-2 was £85,472,000, showing an augmentation of £2,365,000. But, in order that the House may understand the position of these two years relatively to other years, and of the second year relatively to the first, it is right that I should mention to them what was the amount of special War Charges connected with various subjects of policy which have been repeatedly before the House, and which came upon both of these years. I will give the particulars for the two years—first, for the year 1880-1; and, secondly, for the year 1881-2. In 1880-1 the Charge on account of the Transvaal was £656,000 in connection with warlike operations in that country; £446,000 of that sum was on account of the Army, and £210,000 on account of the Navy. The Charge imposed upon that year in respect of the debt created by an arrangement shortly before we came into Office, for the purpose of getting rid in a small number of years of the debt of £6,000,000, contracted a few years ago for purposes connected with the War between Russia and Turkey—that Charge—namely, the charge of the Annuity by which the debt is to be extinguished—was in 1880-1 £1,129,000. There was also a Loan of £2,000,000 contracted by my Predecessor in Office, and advanced without interest to India. The Charge in respect of that Loan in 1880-1 was £62,000. Besides, there was a Vote of £500,000 asked by the present Government from the House in aid of Indian Finance, and voted before the expiration of the financial year to which I am referring. The whole of these special Charges for the year 1880-1 was £2,347,000. In the year 1881-2 those Charges underwent a considerable increase. The Transvaal Army Charge was £1,066,000; the Transvaal Navy Charge was £303,000; and the Transvaal Civil Charge, for expenses which it was necessary to contract in connection with the re-transfer of the Civil Government, was £400,000; or in all, on account of the Transvaal, £1,769,000. The Charge in respect of the £6,000,000 Vote of 1878 was, for the year 1881-2, £1,350,000. The Charge for the Indian Loan was £88,000; and the Charge for the Grant in Aid of Indian Finance on account of the Afghan War, was, as before, £500,000. There was also a small special Vote for the Zulu War, to liquidate the account of £135,000; making the total amount of the special War Charges for the year 1881-2, £3,842,000, instead of £2,347,000. There was thus an excess of the War Charges for that year over those of 1880-1 of £1,495,000. That, however, still leaves an increase of Expenditure of between £800,000 and £900,000. I will not attempt minutely to explain that excess. The House is aware that some classes of increase in our Expenditure may be called normal, and that some classes of increase even represent a corresponding profit. Among what are commonly called normal augmentations are such augmentations as those in the Education Vote, and among those which are usually connected with a corresponding increase of profit are the very heavy and large augmentations of expenditure for the cost of establishments and buildings in connection with the Postal and Telegraph Services. In the particular case I refer to, the increase in the Postal and Telegraph Services for 1881-2 over the former year was £317,000. The cost of the Census was £140,000; the cost of the increased Education Estimates was £140,000; and the special Expenditure connected with the state of Ireland, partly for the increase of Constabulary and partly otherwise, was £190,000. These sums account for nearly £800,000 of the augmentation which I have pointed out to the House. It is not necessary to pursue the matter into more detail. Well, then, Sir, having compared the Expenditure with the Estimate, and having compared it with the Expenditure of the previous year, I have next to compare it with the Revenue of the year. That account will not be found to offer a very brilliant result; but, at the same time, it is so far a satisfactory result that the balance is on the right side. The Income for the year was £85,822,000, and the Expenditure £85,472,000; so that there is a small Surplus of Income over Expenditure amounting to £350,000. It is a matter of interest to compare the Revenue of the year with the Estimate of what that Revenue will be, because it tends to throw light on a subject to which I have referred—namely, the languid manner in which the Revenue is at present recovering from a state of depression. The subject, however, in one of its branches leads into discussions of very great moral and social interest, although they are discussions impossible at the present moment to lead to anything like a demonstrative result. Comparing the Revenue with the Estimates of the year, I find that the Customs, which were estimated to yield £19,180,000, yielded £19,287,000; the Excise, estimated to yield £27,444,000, yielded £27,240,000; Stamps, estimated at £12,290,000, yielded £12,260,000; the Taxes, estimated at £2,760,000, yielded £2,725,000; and the Income Tax, estimated at £9,540,000, yielded the unexpectedly large amount of £9,945,000. I take all these items together, adhering to the practice—the convenient practice which has now been established for some years—of distinguishing between the Tax Revenue of the country and the non-Tax Revenue—ween that which is derived directly that which is derived indirectly n taxes. I find that the Tax Renue, estimated at £71,210,000, yielded 1,457,000; an excess, although a very all excess, which I wish to bring er the notice of the House in con-tion with the present state of our tions between trade and industry on one hand and the Exchequer on the er. Coming to those portions of the venue not derived from taxes, they ad more favourably on the whole.

 Post Office, estimated to yield 800,000, yielded £7,000,000; Telephs, estimated to yield £1,600,000, ded £1,630,000; the Crown Lands, mated at £390,000, owing to diffiies connected with agricultural de-sion on a limited scale, yielded 0,000; the interest on Advances and r moneys included under the same d, estimated at £1,200,000, yielded 219,000; and the Miscellaneous ns, estimated at £3,900,000, yielded 136,000. Upon the whole, the non-Revenue, estimated at £13,890,000, ded £14,365,000; and the total venue of the country, estimated at 1,100,000, yielded £85,822,000; or excess of £722,000 over the amount which it had been taken at the commencement of the financial year. It has n my practice for a good many years ive the House what is necessarily a gh Estimate, but still an Estimate, on atter of great importance—namely, Estimate of the real increase, or the augmentation, of the Revenue, bese the accounts of the Revenue, as lished, are not sufficiently clear, and se who are conversant with the sub-are well aware that they are not ays a safe guide to the rapid concluis which some writers and observers apt to arrive at from a rough inspec-of them. I want, then, but not at great length, to compare the Tax venue of 1880-1 with the Tax Renue of 1881-2; but, of course, in order make that comparison just, I must oduce certain rectifications to insure t I am dealing with exactly the same nents. The Tax Revenue of 1880-1 d at £69,814,000. But then there a sum of no less than £1,320,000, ch was arrested on its way to the hequer, being part of the receipt of Malt Tax Duty, which in due and ular course was employed to discharge the claim of the malsters for drawback. Therefore, adding that sum, which I suppose to have been arrested, for the purpose of comparison, to the Revenue of 1881, the addition gives a total of £71,134,000. But now I have to make an addition on the other side; and I have to make a deduction, for the purposes of comparison, because in that year we received a very large sum from the imposition of an additional 1d.

 on the Income Tax, a sum estimated at £1,460,000. I do not, however, take the whole of that sum, because about £400,000 of the produce of that 1d. may be considered to have been also enjoyed by the year just expired. I, therefore, deduct £1,060,000, which leaves the Revenue for 1880-1, for the purposes of comparison, at £70,074,000. The Tax Revenue of 1881-2 stands at £71,457,000;
 but then it was augmented by two sums, one connected with the change in the Spirit Duties, and another connected with the change in the Probate and Legacy Duties, which were estimated to add to the Revenue £575,000, although they did not add quite so much. Therefore, deducting that sum for the purpose of comparison, it leaves the Tax Revenue of 1881-2 at £70,887,000. Deducting therefrom the Tax Revenue of 1880-1—£70,074,000—I have a residue of £813,000, which, as nearly as I am able to estimate, indicates to the House the true increase in the Revenue of the country from the same sources in the two years respectively. It is rather remarkable how closely that increase corresponds with the increase of population. The increase of the population is something over 1 per cent. This augmentation in the Tax Revenue is also something over 1 per cent. This is not the representation of a very bad year, neither is it the representation of a very good year, because in a fat year we ought to be able to do something more than merely keep pace with the increase of population, in order to make up for the deficit of the lean years in former times. The sum of £813,000 may be said to exhibit the true increase of the Revenue from the same sources and under the same supposed conditions of law. But I must not pass from this portion of the subject without adverting to those points in which changes have been introduced into the law, although there is only one of them upon which I shall have occasion to dwell. The first I shall mention is a subject on which no change has been introduced into the law, although I have been exceedingly desirous to introduce a change. That is the Duty on Silver Plate. There are two reasons that would recommend the abolition of that duty. The first and the special reason is the very great anxiety entertained by the Indian Government that that duty should, if possible, be removed, they believing it to be a very serious hindrance to the introduction of silver goods from India, and being under the belief admitted by all the authorities of this country, who, of course, speak with considerable weight, that a large trade would probably take place in the introduction of silver goods from India if the duty were abolished. But a more general reason, undoubtedly, recommends the abolition of this duty—namely, that it perplexes the market, and places transactions in new and in old plate on an embarrassed footing relatively, and inflicts much greater mischief in the limitation of industry, and possibly tends to lower the standard of our manufactured silver goods, while obstructing the progress of taste in design; these being objections which cannot at all correspond with any benefit derived from that source by the Revenue. Then, when it is said, “Why not abolish the duty?”—the abolition of the duty raises the formidable question of drawback; and the question of drawback is far more formidable, and far more difficult, and I will even say, in my opinion, far more questionable than it is in regard to any other Excise commodity whatever. Whenever this duty is abolished, if no drawback is given, at least the producers of silver goods in this country must be heard and their arguments considered. I am not prepared to make any proposal in this direction at the present time. As the House is aware, I have no Revenue to give away. The sum is not large enough, and, therefore, is not worth considering in that way. But I am not prepared to propose a drawback on silver goods; and, on the other hand, I doubt whether the trade is sufficiently lively and progressive to enable it to meet the change, or, at any rate, to make it content to meet the change without a drawback. The House will understand that, in this case, the drawback is extreme; I conceive it in principle to be disputable. Our rule is this. We give drawbacks upon Excisable commodities, but not on every commodity that has not yet reached the hands of the consumer, and only upon Excisable commodities, so far as we can get at them, in the hands of the wholesale dealer, where we have distinct cognizance of those commodities, and where we can know what we are about. But there is no such cognizance in the case of silver goods. When the duties are once paid on the goods they are distributed over the whole country, and the claim to drawback is a claim which, in this instance alone, is made on behalf of the retail dealer. The amount of that drawback would not be a large sum in itself; but still it is extremely large with reference to the revenue in question—from £50,000 to £60,000 a-year—and the drawback, if it were given, would not be less than three or four times that revenue. That forms a very awkward combination of circumstances on which to give it consideration. I do not myself, upon the whole, incline to believe that the consideration of drawback is applicable to the subject at all. It may be necessary to wait for a more favourable opinion before a change can be made; but it cannot be made now. I do not in the least degree grudge parting with the revenue, and I have adverted to the question now in order that it may be well understood in India that we are really desirous of making progress. But I am not prepared, as at present advised, to face the question of drawback, beset as it is with difficulty, formidable relatively to the Revenue while, in my opinion, there is no sound reason for making an exception in the case. Another subject of change last year, on which I need not dwell, was rectification of a small differential charge made upon foreign spirits. It was demonstrated that that charge was in excess, and would operate as a protective duty. It required re-adjustment, and the re-adjustment was made. It was estimated to produce about £180,000 a-year, and it has produced, as far as I can judge, about that amount. A more important change was made in relation to the Legacy and Probate Duty. It did not dispose of the whole of the Legacy and Probate Duty, but it circumscribed and simplified that subject.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

It got rid of most of the collateral points relating to it; but it left for the consideration of the House the very grave and serious question which, no doubt, will some day come under consideration—namely, what is known as the “consanguinity scale,” which makes the State distribute the tax upon succession and legacies according to the degree of proximity to the testator—whether that system of differentia is a sound system, or whether it is the business of the State to take an equal tax and leave it to the testators themselves to regulate their own proceedings under their own wills, and distribute their property with the full knowledge of what the law requires of them? But the change made last year failed to produce the whole revenue that was expected from it. It was estimated to produce £390,000; it has produced only £305,000. The Committee is aware that these duties are extremely variable; and, although it seems paradoxical to say it, they are greatly affected by the accident of seasons. One year there may be enormous fortunes falling in, and in another year there may be comparatively small sums. Indeed, the Revenue Department, when I called upon them to explain why we had not got the whole return that we expected, gave me a variety of causes, among them being the extremely mild character of the season, in consequence of which the grim monster, Death, had had but an indifferent harvest, and the Probate and Legacy Duty suffered in proportion. There was another cause—namely, this, that there was some rush to pay Probate Duty last year before the change came into effect. With regard to the changes introduced into the law, I can report very favourably indeed. According to the old practice, as the Committee knows, estates were admitted to probate without any deduction for debts. The duty was levied at once without that deduction. After the debts had all been paid and settled by a difficult process, which, no doubt, yielded abundant pickings to the Legal Profession, the duty, as far as regarded the debts, was returned. That system was a bad one, and is now entirely got rid of. The debts are deducted at once, without introducing any confusion into the operation of the law. I can give a curious instance of the effect of this. Not long ago a gentleman died, with an estate of £900,000; but he was not so rich as he seemed, because his debts were £900,000. Under the old law, £21,250 would have been paid and held for a certain time by an ingenious title in respect of that estate. As it was, nothing was paid whatever, and the parties were saved from a great deal of expense, as well as from the burden of a large and heavy payment. Another important change, which I endeavoured to explain fully at the time, was the change by which we not only imposed a low duty upon small estates, but undertook to manage the whole transaction by the officers of the Revenue, upon the payment of 30s. Every person having to deal with an estate under £300 in value may now put the matter in the hands of a Revenue officer, and receive the whole proceeds of the estate without any further charge whatever. It was a very common thing for persons in that predicament to have to pay £10, £20, £30, and even more, for the necessary expenses connected with the settlement of the estate; and I think I am justified in saying that the change we have introduced has been found to be a very great boon indeed. There is another small matter which tells the other way, inasmuch as I am afraid the gains will be insignificant; but they will be undoubtedly just. We abolish absolutely the absurdity of the law in exempting legacies under £20, from which there has grown up a practice of making a multitude of bequests of 19 guineas. These bequests, be it known to all and sundry whom it may concern, will not pass in future without paying duty. One of these bequests was left by a man whose estate reached several hundred thousand pounds to one of the wealthiest men in the country. There was no reason why that man should not be called upon to submit to the ordinary deduction without making a wry face. There is another point in regard to which some apprehension was not unnaturally felt. The Committee will remember there was some fear that by lightening the Legacy Duty, by taking off 1 per cent in case of direct descent, and making a corresponding increase in the Probate Duty, embarrassment would be caused to executors owing to the earlier payment of the Probate Duty. I am assured that no difficulty whatever has been experienced upon that subject, and that the working of the measure has been in all respects satisfactory. But a larger question, and one which deserves consideration, partly as being of much importance to a very extended trade, and partly as of great social and moral interest, was the change in the Beer Duty. I will first state how the proceeds of that change stand, only premising that, as regards all the difficulties which at one time used to be considered insuperable with respect to the levying of a Beer Duty, they have entirely vanished. Great credit, in my opinion, is due to the skilful Department which conducts the business on the part of the State; but the very highest credit is also due to the members of the trade, who, so far from opposing themselves through a blind adherence to past traditions to an exceedingly important and drastic change, entered into the spirit of it, and gave every assistance to the officers of the Revenue. The consequence is that the Beer Duty is universally levied with certainty and with facility, and, I believe, with general satisfaction to the trade, so far as the mere levying of the duty is concerned. Let me say a word on the subject of the amount. The Estimate which I gave last year for the Beer Duty was £8,800,000, and the Committee will be good enough to bear in mind that this is the first complete year in which we have had to deal with the Beer Duty. The year 1880-1 was a mixed year, and, therefore, is not available for purposes of comparison, because it consisted of half Malt Tax and half Beer Duty. This is a year of Beer Duty, and of nothing but Beer Duty. I mentioned that the levying of the tax had been perfectly satisfactory. I ought to have said, also—for it is a matter which may, undoubtedly, be looked at from different points of view—that the change has worked favourably and well in regard to the practice of private brewing. It has not extinguished the practice. The number of licences taken out is very large; no less than £46,000 has been received from those licences, the enormous majority of which are taken at only 6s. a-piece, so that the Committee will see what a large number of persons avail themselves of the facilities afforded for private brewing. I was certainly wrong in estimating the Revenue which I anticipated would be derived from the change. We estimated, as I have said, the total produce of the Beer Duty for the year at £8,800,000. That Estimate was taken rather high, in partial deference to the estimates made by gentlemen connected with the trade. They felt so great a confidence in the view they presented as to the mode in which we had tried to extend the law for the benefit of the Exchequer, and the weight due to their knowledge and experience was so considerable, that a small addition was made to the Estimate merely out of deference to them, there being some uncertainty as to the results of the change. The Estimate had been taken at £8,800,000; the actual yield has been £8,580,000.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Does that include the licence?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GLADSTONE): Yes; the licence, which amounted to £46,000, is included, and the actual yield is £220,000 short of the Estimate. The Estimate of the Revenue Department would have been very close indeed, but for the circumstances which I have mentioned. The Committee will be anxious to compare the proceeds of the Beer Duty with those of the old Malt Duty. If we compare the yield of the Beer Duty of the year just expired with the Malt Duty, then, indeed, we appear to have made marked progress, because the last complete year of the Malt Duty, and the last year of the finance of the late Administration, was the year 1879-80, when the product of brewing, in all its forms, malt, sugar, and licences, yielded £7,737,000, so that we appear to have gained £843,000. But that is entirely fallacious, because the barley harvest in 1879 was so bad, and the depression of trade was so great, that there is no fair standard of comparison. I have taken, therefore, for the purpose of comparison, the six preceding years of the Malt Duty; and I find that the average revenue from the Malt Duty, together with the sugar used in brewing, and the licences for the average of the six preceding years, from 1873 to 1879, was £8,672,000—that is, that the Malt Duty, upon an average of years, produced £92,000 a-year more than we have got out of the Beer Duty on the first full year of the duty. Effectively there is, in point of fact, for the time, a small diminution. Now, we do not allege that that diminution is in any degree due to having pitched the Beer Duty too low, in comparison with what the Malt Duty had been; but I will advert to that question in a moment or two. We look for an explanation to other circumstances, some of them circumstances of great interest. But I must meet the allegation which is made on the other side. It is still stated with confidence by the other side—namely, by the great brewers of the country, who represent and speak for the entire trade—that we have pitched the Beer Duty too high, and that we have received fully 2*s.* a-quarter more in the shape of Beer Duty upon the quarter of barley used in brewing than we received formerly from the Malt Duty. I apply it is always a very great advantage when there is no serious dispute upon the fact. Upon the whole, we do not deny that statement. We plead guilty to the soft impeachment so far—that, to an amount, at any rate, closely approaching to 2*s.*, we received that profit; but we contend that we are entitled to that profit, and upon that subject there is a friendly argument being carried on in the best possible humour between the members of the trade and ourselves. We point out, what is a known fact, that under the Malt Duty, the peculiar method in which the duty is levied—and this is an allegation admitted on both sides—gave the brewer certain advantage, and enabled him to contract his debt with perfect honour, and without the slightest reproach to him, but simply from the mode in which the law had been worked; and it enabled him to pay a duty somewhat less than the duty was, on the face of it, intended to be—that is to say, in consequence of the quantity of malt which was made out of a given quantity of barley, and of the mode in which the duty was levied, which was mainly on the barley, and not on the malt. I take it that the advantage which he got in that way was about 8*d.* in a quarter, and that is a moderate estimate of the advantage which he gained, and which we contend—although it is no reproach to him that he has enjoyed it—Parliament was entitled, and even bound in duty, to withdraw. Of course, as long as the Malt Duty existed, the maltster, who had to pay the duty, was compelled to take a profit upon the duty, just as he is compelled to take a profit on the port price that he paid for malt. The abolition of the Malt Duty relieved the trade of the charge of 10*d.* a-quarter, and that accounts for 1*s.* 6*d.* out of the 2*s.* that are in contest between us. Besides that, we always say that as we were relieving the trade from the compulsory regulations of the old law, which instructed every maltster, and which compelled every maltster, to build his malt kilns, and to shape the details of his premises in a particular way—not allowing him to choose what was best for his trade, but compelling him to raise his buildings according to what was deemed necessary for our security in levying the duty—we say that an advantage is derived from the abolition of these restrictions, and of other restrictions which were imposed by the law for the purpose of Excise. Those restrictions, now that they are gone, are estimated very lightly; but it is a matter of historical interest to go back to the period when the maltsters had to make good their case, not for a protective duty, but for an equivalent duty, and a compensating duty against foreign malt; and in those days, now perhaps forgotten, they steadily maintained, and were supposed to have proved to the satisfaction of the Government, that the tax imposed by these restrictions of Excise was a burden upon them to the extent of 1*s.* 9½*d.* a-quarter. That 1*s.* 9½*d.* has now almost wholly—I believe I might say has wholly—disappeared. One of the differences to which I have previously referred has been a gain, which we distinctly say we are entitled to. I do not know what effect time may have had in disposing of our friends—if I may be permitted to call them so, and I do not know why they should not be our friends—to recede from the claim which they made to this difference of nearly 2*s.* a-quarter in the Beer Duty, as compared with the Malt Duty. The other subject is a subject of a very wide and general interest, and the detail of it is, I should say, really a very curious detail. Obviously, as I have admitted, we get nearly 2*s.* a-quarter in the Beer Duty, as compared with the old Malt Duty; and as I have also shown that, notwithstanding the increase of population, our receipt from Beer Duty is less by £90,000 than the average receipt from the old Malt Duty in the years between 1873 and 1879, I represent the state of facts in which there is some collapse somewhere. Is that collapse due to any alteration in the habits and practices of the people? According to the Board of Inland Revenue and their officers, whom I consider to be good authorities on the subject, they do not exclude that supposition; but they do not look to it as the main cause. They say that although employment in the country is general, yet wages have not yet reached the full average level, and, undoubtedly, have not reached anything like the level which they reached in the years of prosperity between 1873 and 1879, although they fell at the close of that period. They also observe—and I have no doubt there is something in this—that last year in the cider counties there was a very great abundance of fruit, and a very large consumption of cider. Then comes another fact—the great increase of coffee-houses and clubs, which lead to the supposition that the more temperate habits of the people are the cause of this deficiency in the Revenue. I think the House will deem it quite worth their while to spend a few minutes in endeavouring to get as accurate information as we can upon this subject, and to put ourselves in a position to estimate fairly the influences which are at work. We have a group of simultaneous facts which, taken together, are curious, and which do not all run quite in the same direction. In the first place, there is a very decided decline of the drink revenues proper. I hope my hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) approves of that term “drink revenues.” It is something disparaging, and that, I am sure, will be agreeable to his feelings. I have got here a statement of the revenue derived from spirits, wine, malt, and beer, with the attendant Licence Duties and so forth, at three separate periods. I have taken 1867-8, which was before the great rise of prices; 1874-5, when that rise of prices and wages was still, on the whole, in operation; and 1881-2, the last financial year. The entire revenue from these sources in 1867-8 was £23,001,000. In 1874-5 the revenue had sprung to £31,029,000. In 1881-2 it had gone back to £28,444,000. The most curious circumstance in this is the history of the Wine Duties. The wine revenue advanced from the time of the important change in the duties in 1860 in a very steady manner for a great number of years, and in 1874-5 it was

£1,719,000; so that with our duties on wine, varying from 1s. to 2s. 6d. a-gallon, we were deriving about the same revenue as we had been accustomed to receive with a uniform duty of 5s. 10d. a-gallon. But ever since that time the duty upon wine has been receding in a much greater proportion than other revenues from alcoholic liquors. The total of these revenues fell from £31,029,000 to about £28,500,000, or, roundly, they fell by about one-eighth; but the duty on wine fell from £1,719,000 to £1,366,000, or by more than one-fifth. However, there is the fact that there is a great diminution, notwithstanding the large increase of population between 1867 and 1881—an increase in the population which could not be less than 4,000,000 people. The gross revenue from these sources, which had risen to £31,029,000 in 1874, fell by more than £2,500,000, with an increase of population between 1874-5 and 1881-2 of considerably over 2,000,000 people. It is also rather curious to take the proportion in which we have been dependent on this source of the Revenue of the country; and I have compared the liquor taxation of the country, as I would call it, with the non-liquor taxation—meaning by the non-liquor taxation all the Tax Revenue of the country except the Income Tax, which I do not include on account of its frequent variation; but I put on one side the taxation derived from alcoholic liquors, and on the other side the taxes derived from all other sources except the Income Tax. Taking the percentage on that basis, they stand as follows. In the six years from 1859 to 1865 we levied 37½ per cent of our taxation from alcoholic drinks, and 62 per cent from non-alcoholic drinks. In the three years from 1866 to 1868 we levied 42 per cent from alcoholic drinks, and 57½ per cent from all other sources. In the five years from 1869 to 1873 we levied 46½ per cent from alcoholic drinks—the Committee will, perhaps, observe that the percentage is continually mounting—and 53½ per cent from all other sources. From 1874-5 to 1879-80 we levied 51 per cent of our whole taxation, except Income Tax, from alcoholic drinks, and 49 per cent from all other sources. That is a very curious state of facts. Since the last period I have named there has been some re-action. I have carried the comparison up to 1879-80; but during the last three years re-action has begun, and the alcoholic revenue has gone down to 46½ per cent, and the non-alcoholic revenue has risen to 53½ per cent, showing a real and serious diminution in the consumption of alcohol. Then you will say—"If that diminution is going on, which you have shown to be so considerable, and if the main cause of it is to be found in those useful and valuable institutions"—to be met with, believe, in most of our great towns and in many country places, and known all over the country as coffee and cocoa houses—"we ought to see a large increase of Revenue from the other sources." But, Sir, that increase we do not find. It is a very curious fact, and therefore I mention it to the Committee. The Committee will perceive the effect of this upon tea; but I will not include that now, because tea is not much used in these public institutions. The revenue derived in 1867-8, jointly—I will not give all the details—from chicory, cocoa, and coffee, was £523,000. The revenue derived from the same sources in 1874-5 had fallen to £310,000. But, in the first place, the movement adverse to alcoholic liquors had not then commenced; and, in the second place, a large reduction had been made in the Coffee Duty, which, in 1867, yielded £390,000—it was reduced in 1872 from 3d. to 1½d. per lb.—and which, in 1874, only yielded £207,000. It is worthy of remark that, whereas this great movement, adverse to alcohol and so eminently favourable to coffee and cocoa, has been at work since 1874-5, it has not produced the slightest fall in the revenue from coffee; but, on the contrary, during the last seven years, there has been a further diminution in the coffee revenue. In 1874 the Coffee Duty was £207,000; in 1881 it was only £189,000; and although the Chicory Duty slightly increased, it only increased by £8,000, and did not make up the whole difference. The Cocoa Duty increased from £40,000 to £46,000; but the joint yield of these three articles, which in 1874 was £310,000, was only £306,000 in 1881. When we turn to tea the case is indeed different. My own opinion is that not a very great deal of tea is consumed in the tea houses; yet its domestic use is advancing at such a rate that there undoubtedly is a powerful champion able to encounter alcoholic drink in a fair field, and contest the ground in fair fight. The revenue from tea, which in 1867 was £3,350,000, had risen in 1874 to £3,878,000, and in 1881 to £4,280,000. The increase of the population during that period of 14 years was no less than £4,900,000; but there is no corresponding augmentation in the revenue from coffee and chicory. I am bound to say that there is a peculiar state of the law to which, I think, we ought to ask the House to apply a remedy, and I shall lay a Resolution on the Table of the House this very evening with that view. At present, every description of admixture with coffee is permitted; and we have long proceeded on the principle that the admixture of chicory with coffee was not adulteration—that it was an admixture so rooted in the estimation of many countries, that many people—those of France and Belgium for instance—would not drink their coffee without it. But of late a practice has grown up of producing all kinds of substitutes, under the name of coffee—roots and berries—and that I cannot but think must account for the strange and singular state of the figures I have laid before the Committee. We shall not attempt to interfere with the admixture of chicory with coffee; but we propose that it should not be allowed to introduce other miscellaneous admixtures with coffee. There is one other circumstance in connection with this state of facts and this great diminution in alcoholic drinks which I am anxious to lay before the Committee; for certainly I do not hesitate to say that I think the Committee will agree with me that we can trace the operation of this diminution in the use of alcoholic drinks precisely where we should wish to trace it—that is, in the augmented savings of the people. Now, Sir, I will show what those savings are so far as they come under the cognizance of Her Majesty's Government. Of course, what does come under the direct cognizance of the Government is, I hope, a very small portion of those savings; but, at the same time, for the purpose of comparison, that small portion is perfectly effective. I look first to the Old Savings Banks, and I find these have fluctuated a good deal. In 1846 the deposits amounted to £31,750,000; in 1861 they had risen to £41,500,000; in 1867, perhaps owing to the competition of the Post Office Savings Banks, which paid a considerably lower rate of interest, they had fallen to £36,500,000. Since that time they have been advancing not rapidly, but to this extent. In 1874 the deposits were £41,500,000; and in 1881 they were £44,175,000, showing an annual increment of about £350,000. The Post Office Savings Banks, as the Committee is aware, were founded in 1861. They have advanced, on the whole, with very great regularity. Even the most unfavourable state of circumstances amongst the labouring classes has never done more than reduce—not inconsiderably, but still not vitally—not the amount of deposits, but the increment upon the yearly amount of deposits. The ordinary increment in the Post Office Savings Banks' deposits has been from £1,600,000 to £1,800,000. The lowest amount for any year in the first decade of their existence was £1,533,000, and the highest was £1,926,000. The lowest year in the second decade was 1879, when there was great distress and want of employment, and even in that year the deposits amounted to £1,600,000. In the highest of the prosperity years—1872—the savings rose to £2,293,000; but there is no doubt that the wages of the labouring classes are much lower at this moment than they were in that year. And yet, although wages are now lower than in 1872, the deposits made in the Post Office Savings Banks have risen even higher than they were then, and I take them thus. The deposits made there, and remaining there, are now £2,449,000, or nearly £2,500,000. Besides that, we have invested for depositors £750,000; so that the whole sum placed in our hands by the depositors—although a portion has passed into the Funds—in the year 1881-2, with a great diminution of means on the part of the labouring population, has risen to £3,189,000. I think this shows that, whatever other effects this diminution of the duty on spirits is producing, it is clearly associated with the gradual extension of more saving habits amongst the people. I pass now from these subjects altogether; and I have only to state, in a very few words, what it has now become customary to lay before the Committee—namely, the aggregate operations upon the National Debt in the course of the year; and I do so now, because if they look at the figures that should be presented in a Parliamentary Return they might possibly fail to grasp the exact state of the case. The Debt was returned on the 31st of March, 1881, at £768,703,000. But there was an item existing at that time which had never been valued or reduced to figures—that was the deficiency in the funds of the Savings Banks, which we are bound, notwithstanding, to make good. Since the 31st of March, 1881, that deficiency has been ascertained, and an Annuity adequate to gradually diminishing it has been created. We now, therefore, value that Annuity as part of the Debt, just like any other Annuity; and, of course, we must add it to the Debt existing on the 31st of March, 1881, for the purpose of comparison with the amount of the Debt on the 31st of March, 1882. The value of that Annuity is £1,622,000. Adding that sum to the Debt as it stood in March, 1881, the total effective Debt was £770,325,000. The total on the 31st of March, 1882, was £763,166,000, so that the reduction of Debt in the year when the liquidation took place is £7,159,000. [SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Is that Debt of all kinds?] That is Debt of all kinds. There still remains a small subject which has not been dealt with, but which will have to be dealt with this year or next—namely, the small deficiency on the Friendly Societies' Account. I need not, however, refer to that in detail. I may say, also, that last year I proposed to make a conversion of Capital Debt into Annuities for the purpose of preparing for the year 1885, when a large portion of Annuities would lapse. I intend again to bring in that Bill during the present Session if the state of Public Business should be favourable to it. But it is not a matter of extreme urgency, and it might be introduced next year without any essential difference. Therefore, I shall proceed with it this Session only if the state of affairs renders it advisable to introduce the Bill. I come now to the year 1882-3, which is no longer retrospective, but prospective, and relates to the practical portion of the subject with which we have to deal. The Committee will not, I think, expect me to offer them any very brilliant or alluring prospect, after what I have already said. I am now going, as is usual, to estimate the Expenditure for the year 1882-3. The total Charge of the Debt, including Interest on Local Loans and Charges on the Consolidated Fund, will be £31,415,000. The Charge for the Army is £15,458,000; Indian Home Charges amount to £1,100,000; and the Charges on account of the Navy to £10,484,000. We shall again ask the House to vote a Grant to India, as last year, which will entail a further Charge of £500,000. The expenses of the Civil Service will be £16,503,000—I am now going on the Estimates which are already in the possession of the House—the Customs and Inland Revenue charges of collection will be £2,901,000; which, with £5,889,000 for the Post Office, Telegraph, and Packet Services, makes a total of £84,258,000. But I am sorry to say that does not entirely close the account, because there are three or four items remaining, of which I must mention three of a serious character. The Committee will understand that in Ireland, owing to the circumstances of the last two or three years, the extra duties cast upon the Irish Constabulary have been extremely heavy. I cannot refer to this subject without stating my belief that the experience of that period has tended to raise even the high character of that Force. I am aware there are opinions entertained by some on the subject of having another description of Constabulary Force in Ireland; but into those opinions I do not now enter. As to the conduct of that Force, its fidelity and efficiency upon the footing of its present organization, I believe it is impossible to commend it too highly. However, Sir, it is a fact, according to the examination which we have made, that with the great amount of extra duty entailed upon them, the extra allowances have been decidedly insufficient; and it will, therefore, be an obligation on us to ask Parliament, besides the sum named in the Constabulary Estimates, which are already on the Table of the House, to vote a further sum in order to make good the deficiencies in those allowances. I do not now say in what form that will be voted; but the amount has been pretty closely investigated by the representatives of the Irish Government, together with able representatives of the Treasury, and they have agreed that it must be a sum of about £180,000. This sum it will be necessary to ask Parliament to accord. Then, Sir, we have, unfortunately, to ask for a Vote of £100,000 in connection with the Prisons Act of a few years ago. I believe that when this Act was passed it was intended that the cost of conveying prisoners should be charged upon the counties; but, unhappily, it appears, according to the view of the Courts of Justice, that the Act does not give effect to that intention; and the consequence is we are called upon to pay the sum of arrears for the three years which have elapsed since the Act came into operation. Of course, there may be a question, which I do not enter into, whether the original intention of Parliament ought not to be fulfilled? Still, we have these arrears to deal with, and it will be our duty to ask Parliament, in the course of the present year, for the sum I have specified, representing the three years' arrears for the conveyance of prisoners. Well, Sir, the third subject of serious difficulty to which I have referred is one that will not sound over-musically in the ears of the Committee. It is the Vote for the Civil Government of Cyprus. The Civil Government of Cyprus has never been settled. A large sum was taken for this purpose last year—I think more than £90,000—but the season has been an extremely bad one, and the Committee will be aware that in Cyprus, just as it used to be in Corfu, if there comes a bad olive year, the Revenue of the year was ruined. Consequently, the deficiency of this year in Cyprus is even greater than usual. We have thought it our duty to have the matter carefully examined, and to provide for squaring the account, more especially as my noble Friend the Secretary of State for the Colonies has been engaged in organizing a scheme of government for Cyprus, which will introduce local influences into the Government, and give it something like regularity and efficiency. We shall be obliged to ask the House to vote, during the present Session, £90,000 for that purpose. Out of that sum £12,000 is due to the former year; but between £70,000 and £80,000 is the charge which we find actually existing. I think about £30,000 of that sum is due to the circumstance I have named—that is to say, the peculiarly unfavourable character of the season. The Committee will naturally ask whether they are to be called upon for a corresponding sum year after year. Well, Sir, my noble Friend has made the closest investigation of this subject in his power, and has ordered what, so far as he can judge, is a most stringent system of economy and retrenchment in the administration of affairs in Cyprus, and what he hopes to do—I am not going beyond our real expectation of the effect—is next year to get the Vote down to £40,000. That may not be pleasant; but it is my duty to tell an unvarnished tale, and let the Committee know how the case stands. Therefore, together with minor charges, this makes an increase of £380,000, and raises the total estimated Expenditure to £84,630,000. I think it is an essential part of my duty briefly to compare this, as well as I can, with the Expenditure of last year. As I have said, £84,630,000 is the total Charge before us. The Expenditure of last year, according to the Estimates, was £86,190,000; so there is an apparent reduction of charge to the extent of £1,560,000. But a large proportion of that reduction is only apparent, because the Military and Naval Estimates of this year are presented in a form in which credit is at once taken for extra receipts, instead of having them presented without that reduction, and bringing the extra receipts to account on the other side. The disturbance which is thus introduced into the Account represents a sum of £809,000, and the real reduction in the Estimates is, in consequence, reduced to £750,000. But the relief from War Charges has been much larger than that. The War Charges are still very considerable. We have still £1,460,000 on account of the five years' Annuity for the Vote of £6,000,000. We have £500,000 for the Afghan Vote, and I think about £120,000 this year on account of the Indian Loan. Still, the year is relieved in respect of War Charges, upon the whole, to the extent of £2,250,000, or, more exactly, £2,276,000, against which I am only able to state a reduction upon the Estimates of £751,000; and, therefore, I must tell the Committee what becomes of the difference of £1,500,000 between these two sums. Some part of that represents permanent increase, some part of it represents normal increase; but undoubtedly there are portions of it which I am not able to place under one description or the other. I could not give the Committee a minutely accurate statement; it would be idle to attempt it; but I think I can, with general clearness and accuracy, state the main facts. The augmentation as connected with the Government of Ireland this year will be no less than £430,000. The Constabulary Estimate is £139,000; the Constabulary further Estimate, £180,000; and Resident Magistrates, £12,000. The Land Court, established in Ireland, which we have offered to landlords and tenants, not free of all expense—for I am afraid that legal expense in connection with it cannot be annihilated—but almost entirely free of expense, so far as the Exchequer is concerned, imposes on the taxpayers of the Three Countries the heavy charge for the year of £93,000, which brings up the total of the Irish Votes for this year to the sum I have already stated of £430,000. There is an increase of about £90,000 on the Non-Effective Votes for the Army and Navy, which may be contemplated by the Committee without great dissatisfaction, because, as they are aware, it belongs essentially to the transition period between the old system of general pensions in the Service and the new system based on Reserves. We are, at present, in the unfortunate position of having to pay all the charges connected with the New Reserve system, and of having also approached the maximum connected with the old system of pensions for long service. I believe, in the course of two years, that process will be reversed, and a very considerable although gradual relief will be experienced. The Charge for the Postal and Telegraph Services has largely increased. I will not enter into the causes of that increase; but I think I ought to state, in justice to all parties, that great care appears to have been taken by the late Government in restraining the extension of the Establishment. The pressure since we came into Office has reached a point which is nearly irresistible; and although, I hope, the Post Office will go on increasing, yet the percentage of cost for collection of revenue, I am afraid, will show some increase also. There is an increase of £207,000 in the Post Office Charge for this year; there is the sum to which I have referred for the conveyance of prisoners; and there is a Charge, which may be contemplated with unmixed satisfaction, of £85,000 in the increased payments for the liquidation of the National Debt, of which you have had the fruit in the statement I have made of a reduction of nearly £7,000,000 of Debt in the course of two years. That accounts for £900,000 out of a sum of £1,500,000, which I have represented as the increase to be accounted for. Effectively, the great bulk of the remainder of that increase is Navy Charge, and is represented by demands with which the Committee is familiar. There are the changes of armament, which cause an augmentation of 250,000 in the Vote for Guns. There is another sum of £100,000 in the Vote for Shipbuilding; and, whatever the amount for shipbuilding may be, I must say that we look forward with considerable confidence to economy in matters connected with building, and to the securing of greater results for our money, in consequence of the arrangements which have been sanctioned by the first Lord of the Admiralty for placing a gentleman of the highest skill and character, and well acquainted with the practical details of the Service, on the board of Admiralty. I will not enter into the remainder of the augmentations; but they amount to £500,000. I hope I have laid clearly before the Committee the reasons why this £1,500,000 is required. If I am asked whether the expenditure is deemed satisfactory, I am afraid my notions are too old-fashioned to allow me to view it with as much complacency as that with which it is viewed by others. I wish, however, to state the case impartially, and to point out that a considerable portion of the increase will not, I hope, be permanent. It is not connected with Offices of permanent character, and more than half of it is either in itself good and normal, or of a character purely temporary; but I do not see in the country that great desire for the restriction of expenditure which characterized this country and all Parties 40 or 50 years ago. It is an evil, I think, that public vigilance on this subject should be diminished, and that the attitude of the House of Commons should have been so sensibly changed. I confess I have great doubts—I have not arrived at any conclusion on the subject—as to whether the system under which our Estimates are now framed upon the exclusive responsibility of the Government, and without any responsibility on the part of the House, is a good system. It is a very important subject for consideration. For my own part, although I have not arrived at any absolute conclusion, I am very dissatisfied with the working of the system, especially during the last 20 or 30 years. Sir, there are three principles, greater than all others, on which, in my opinion, all good finance should be based. The first of them is that there should always be a certainty that whatever the charge may be it can be paid. That, I believe, is of vital importance. The second is that, in times of peace and prosperity, the people of the country should reduce their Debt; and the third point is that they should reduce their Expenditure. With regard to the first point, we are at present fulfilling that condition; with regard to the second, we ought to do more in the direction indicated than we have actually done; but at the same time we are doing a good deal more than was usually done in a long series of years. I do not refer to recent years in particular, but to what has been done on the average during the last 25 years. With regard to the diminution of Expenditure, I sorrowfully admit that the contagion and sympathy of foreign countries necessarily affects us; and I should arrive at very different conclusions indeed, according to the standard of comparison which I might take. If I am to look to American ideas and institutions, and the extraordinary vigour, determination, and forethought, which the people of America show as a Democracy in providing for the future by reducing their Debt, and in resolutely enduring the most painful taxation—I do not speak now of Protective Duties—in order to set free their hands and relieve those who come after them, I say it is impossible to praise them too highly, and that a comparison with them would not redound greatly to our credit. Perhaps, having said that, and not wishing to take a too saturnine view of the matter, instead of looking westward we may look eastward, and consider what has happened in other countries of Europe. Even though we may somewhat bend to the storm, and may, to a certain extent, follow this fashion of large Expenditure, yet certainly we may derive the materials of comparative congratulation when we see the course which other great countries follow.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

There is one country in particular which cannot be named in this House without great respect and sympathy; first, on account of its eminence; and, secondly, on account of the close friendship and associations in which she stands with us. I allude to France. I do not believe that country will ever involve itself in any great financial difficulties, because such is the skill, industry, and thrift of her people, that the moment she becomes clearly aware of her difficulty she will surmount it. At the same time, if I take a sketch of the history of France and England during the last half century, we may see that the causes which have brought about a large increase in our own Expenditure have been causes that have not exclusively operated in this country. We have not doubled our gross Expenditure; but it has nearly doubled since the Peace of 1815. Our Tax Expenditure has also largely increased, although I am happy to say it has not nearly doubled. But the increase in the Expenditure of France has been greater and more rapid than our own; and I will put this before the Committee in very few and simple figures. Between 1814 and 1829 the Expenditure of France was £40,000,000 a-year, and she made no addition to her Debt. Between 1830 and 1847 the Expenditure of France rose to £51,000,000 a-year, and there was an average annual deficit of £2,250,000. I do not take the years from 1848 to 1851, because of the then unsatisfactory state of the country; but from 1852 to 1870, under the Empire, the average annual deficit had diminished, and I believe it was something between £2,000,000 and £1,500,000. But the Expenditure had enormously increased; and it is only fair to say that, in my judgment, it was the enlightened policy of an approach to Free Trade that enabled France to bear with willingness the enormous increase of Expenditure then imposed on her. The average Expenditure of France, which under the previous régime was £51,000,000, under the Empire reached £83,000,000. But a Budget has been presented to the French Chamber for the year 1883—as the Committee is aware, the French Budgets are presented in anticipation—which, I believe, shows an Expenditure of £120,000,000 sterling. Our Expenditure, therefore, becomes insignificant when we compare it with the portentous scale it has reached in a neighbouring country which is not more wealthy than our own. Now I pass to the Revenue of the year, and my task will be completed. The Tax Revenue of the year amounts to £69,850,000, and the non-Tax Revenue to £14,595,000, or a total of £84,445,000. The Tax Revenue is made up as follows:—Customs, £19,300,000; Excise, £27,230,000; Stamps, £11,145; Land Tax, £1,035,000; Income Tax, £9,400,000. The non-Tax Revenue is made up of the Receipts from Post Office, Telegraphs, Crown Lands, Interest on Advances, and Miscellaneous, and amounts altogether to £14,595,000, making the total Revenue £84,445,000. But as there are certain items of Expenditure which are not yet before the House, so there are some items of Revenue which it has not been in our power to bring to account, but which are so closely in prospect and which stand on such a footing that it is my duty to state them to the House, and to take credit for them, as I have already done, in setting out the general finances of the year. There are two payments from South Africa, both of which I have already reckoned, although I did not mention them to the House when I spoke of the comparative relief from War Charges which the coming year will enjoy. There is a sum of £150,000, which the responsible Government of the Cape will propose on the Estimates for Cape Colony in liquidation of their liability in respect to the cost of the Transvaal War—undoubtedly a small and most moderate Estimate, but an Estimate which will readily be voted by the Cape Parliament. Then there is a sum of £250,000 which has been virtually raised in Natal on account of the Zulu War; and there is a sum of £90,000 which will come to the Exchequer in connection with Cyprus, but with regard to which, lest I should obtain, upon false pretences, cheers from some quarters in which there has recently been some dissatisfaction, I must state that it does not seem to be anything in the nature of a Cyprus receipt. We hold certain sums of money on account of Cyprus for the Porte. The Porte owes us and the French the payment of the dividends on the Guaranteed Turkish Loan of 1855. It has not been in the power of the Porte to supply all the money from her own resources; and,

consequently, it falls to her to pay that money in the shape of deductions or stoppages from the Revenues of Cyprus. We are collectors on behalf of our friends across the Channel not less than for ourselves; and of this £90,000 one-half will pass through the British Exchequer and pass across to the Exchequer of France. However, there is a sum of £490,000 available for the balances of the year, which makes the grand total of Revenue for the year £84,935,000 as against a grand total Expenditure of £84,630,000. There is, therefore, a surplus of £305,000. That is a very small and modest surplus; but it is a surplus with which, under the circumstances, we might be content to move onwards, provided only that it could be subjected to no deductions. But the House will recollect—and the hon. Member for the County of Oxford (Mr. Harcourt) will see that I have not forgotten him, and that I have not been unmindful of the pledge given at the commencement of the Session. The hon. Member then proposed to move a resolution, in guarded and qualified terms, that some relief should be given to the ratepayers of this country in respect to the charge which has been transferred to them through the abolition of turnpikes and the consequent augmentation of the highway rate. I am engaged on the part of the Government, but without pledging myself as to details, to propose something in conformity with the spirit of his Resolution. The hon. Gentleman will have seen that we have not yet presented any proposal for redemption of that pledge. The surplus of £305,000 is a surplus that will not bear diminution. At the time when we gave that pledge undoubtedly it was my hope—perhaps it was too sanguine a hope—that we should be able to deal with the matter in a distinctive way and as part of a considerable settlement. I no longer am able to cherish that expectation. The prospect which we then thought was good of being able to carry through the House a Bill for the establishment of County Boards, and depending to it an important financial adjustment, has become quite hopeless, and we no longer expect to be able to introduce that measure. But I engaged myself to the hon. Member to endeavour, if possible, to detach this subject from any general scheme of legislation, and there remained open to us as a mode of honourably redeeming that pledge—and at the same time doing nothing to perplex future operations—it remained open to us to resort to some plan which, while partial in itself, and provisional in its general character, would be such as to fit in with any more enlarged scheme which might be considered hereafter when local government and financial re-adjustment should come to receive the definitive consideration of the House. Therefore, what we have thought is, not that this is an occasion on which to enter on the Motion of the hon. Gentleman, or to contract any new engagement, but we have felt it to be our duty to ask the House to place us in funds so far that we may, at the proper time, when my right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Dodson) can deal with the subject, be enabled to give a fair interpretation to the promise which was then passed across the Table of the House. We think it necessary for that purpose, for this year, to ask the House to give us a sum of £250,000 to go in relief of the rates in reference to highways; and after considering the various modes in which that money may be raised, we think that, on the whole, considering what is the nature of the grievance, and how it has arisen, and how, in the main, it turns on the very large use of the roads by those who do not contribute to their cost, the best course we can take is to ask the House to authorize a moderate addition to the duty upon carriages. The Licence Duty on carriages is a matter which has been dealt with very tenderly by Parliament. I do not now speak of hired carriages; but, after all, it is a grievance—and there can be no doubt about the facts—that the roads are used and worn by carriages. I am proposing this as a temporary operation. If it were a settlement of the entire question, it might be right to make a larger proposal; it might be right to consider the present total exemption of all wheeled vehicles, except what are called carriages, from taxes of any kind. I do not at all exclude that from prospective consideration, although it is not free from difficulty; but for the present we feel certain that when that question comes to be considered, it will have to be considered in conjunction with some augmentation of the present very moderate Licence Duty on carriages. The rates of Carriage Duties down to 1854, when I had the honour of proposing a change, were these:—Every four-wheeled carriage paid a minimum duty of £6; and in proportion as persons owned more than one carriage, the charge rose till it reached the case of a person with nine carriages, and he was liable to pay £9 1s. 6d. upon each carriage. It is true that that was qualified, to a considerable extent, by a composition; but the basis of that composition was an augmentation of 10 per cent on the minimum duty. The Committee will therefore see how very high the duty was; yet, at the same time, when in 1839 Lord Northbrook, then Mr. Baring, as Chancellor of the Exchequer, made an addition all round to the Assessed Taxes, it was found that there was hardly any perceptible effect produced so far as the Assessed Taxes were concerned. An addition of 5 per cent on consumable commodities was then made, but of 10 per cent on the Assessed Taxes, and that had no perceptible effect. So stood the duty till 1854, and then, on my proposal, the rates were reduced as follows:—Every four-wheeled carriage with two horses paid £3 10s.; every four-wheeled carriage with one horse paid £2; and carriages with two wheels and two horses paid £2, or if they had only one horse they paid 15s. and 10s. The system was rather anomalous, and when Lord Sherbrooke, then Mr. Lowe, was Chancellor of the Exchequer, in 1869, he further reduced the duties. He reduced them to £2 for four-wheeled carriages, unless they were extremely light, and to 15s. for two-wheeled carriages. Perhaps I ought here to say a word as to hired carriages. Hired carriages in that year, or shortly afterwards, were relieved from the very heavy Licence Duty they had formerly paid. I will not say that it is desirable that on hired carriages, such as omnibuses, there should be any duty; but, at the same time, the duty I shall propose is very trifling as regards a trade of that description, and the great relief to them has not been the reduction of the rate they now pay in common with private carriages, but in the abolition of the old Licence and Mileage Duty. What we propose is that the £2 2s. now paid by four-wheeled carriages shall be raised to £3 3s., and that the 15s. paid on the two-wheeled carriages, or light four-wheeled carriages, shall be raised to 21s. The computation made is that 150,000 carriages with four wheels, and over 4 cwt., paying £3 3s., will bring in £157,500; and 300,000 carriages with two wheels or four wheels, if under 4 cwt., paying 21s., will bring in £90,000, or a total increase of £247,500, for which the House is asked in order to give effect to the sentiment contained in the Motion of the hon. Gentleman opposite, and accepted by the Government. The House will at once see that the account now before us is a very simple one. We have a surplus of £305,000, which we regard as the minimum with which we ought to enter on the operations of the year. The £247,000 which we propose to raise will bring that up to £552,000, which places us in funds to consider, when the proper time comes, any proposal which my right hon. Friend may be able to make, and which it will be his duty to make for the purpose of fulfilling the engagement into which we entered at the beginning of the Session. I have now only to refer in one word to a very easy and simple question of detail. The House will see that this humble Financial Statement raises but a single point of novelty. The usual Resolution for the renewal of the Income Tax and the Tea Duty will be moved, and there will be, as I have said, a Resolution relating to the adulteration and spurious representations of coffee. The Carriage Duty will also require a Resolution; but the House is aware that these Resolutions for licences are not like the old Resolutions on Customs and Excise, which took effect immediately on being voted. They do not take effect until the Act of Parliament of which they form a part shall have become law of the land. I would, therefore, submit to the House what I think will be the most convenient course to pursue—namely, that we should be allowed to proceed with the Resolutions and with the preliminary stages of the Bill at once, or from day to day, and that such a day as shall be convenient shall be fixed for the discussion, either on the second reading or on the Motion to go into Committee. That is a matter upon which I shall be very happy to know what will best suit the convenience of the House; but I think there should be no difficulty in bringing the measure before the House in a definite shape, because it is advantageous, especially as to the Income Tax, that there should be no longer delay than is absolutely necessary. I hope I have made clear to the House, without any attempt at varnishing, or keeping in the shade, or suppressing anything in the Statement it has been my duty to make. I, for my part, am certainly most grateful for the kind and unbroken attention of the House; and I am sure the House will deal with the subject in that spirit of gravity and considerateness which all the important considerations, political, social, and moral, connected with it, and branching out of it, undoubtedly demand.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“(1.) That, towards raising the Supply granted to Her Majesty, there shall be charged, collected, and paid for the year which commenced on the sixth day of April, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-two, in respect of all Property, Profits, and Gains mentioned or described as chargeable in the Act of the sixteenth and seventeenth years of Her Majesty's reign, chapter thirty-four, the following Duties of Income Tax (that is to say):

For every Twenty Shillings of the annual value or amount of Property, Profits, and Gains chargeable under Schedules (A), (C), (D), or (E) of the said Act, the Duty of Five Pence;

And For every Twenty Shillings of the annual value of the occupation of Lands, Tenements, Hereditaments, and Heritages chargeable under Schedule (B) of the said Act,—

In England, the Duty of Two Pence Halfpenny;

In Scotland and Ireland respectively, the Duty of One Penny Three Farthings;

Subject to the provisions contained in section one hundred and sixty-three of the Act of the fifth and sixth years of Her Majesty's reign, chapter thirty-five, for the exemption of persons whose income is less than One Hundred and Fifty Pounds, and in section eight of “The Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1876,” for the relief of persons whose income is less than Four Hundred Pounds.”—(Mr. Gladstone.)

MR. GLADSTONE: I may mention two particulars which may be of interest to those persons whom they affect. We do not propose that this increase in the Carriage Duty shall affect any vehicle or hire of which the fares are fixed under the authority of any Imperial or Local Act; and, further, we do not propose that the increase shall affect any carriages habitually and solely used by coachmakers to be lent to their customers during repairs; and the mode in which that provision will take effect will be that they will have to claim a repayment of duty.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I think it has not been useful, certainly not in late years, to enter upon any serious discussion of the Budget at the moment of its being presented, and although there are one or two points in connection with, and arising from, the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, upon which I shall be glad, at the proper time, to offer some observations, I do not think there would be any advantage in departing from the usual course. I cannot help feeling that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has made his interesting Statement at, I fear, some personal inconvenience to himself, though we must feel much pleased at seeing that he has been able to resume his place and go through the interesting speech to which we have been listening, and I hope without any serious injury. I only rise, therefore, to say that the course he proposes for the discussion of the measure appears to me, and to my friends around me, to be the most convenient for the House.

MR. WILLS said, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had intimated, some two months ago, that no alteration was, on this occasion, to be looked for in the duties affecting tobacco, and, therefore, he had not to-night expected any statement upon that subject; but the decision at which the right hon. Gentleman had arrived had been received with so much disappointment throughout the United Kingdom, especially by the working classes—and the subject was one of such vast fiscal importance, affecting, as it did, about one-ninth of the total Revenue of the country—that he ventured to ask the indulgence of the House while he made a few observations in reference to the duties on that article. Between the years 1840 and 1877—during all the vicissitudes of bad harvests and bad trade—there were only five years in which the duties on tobacco exhibited anything like a decline. Throughout the whole of that period the manufactured tobacco supplied to the public was exceedingly good. In 1878 the financial embarrassments of the late Government compelled the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Devon

(Sir Stafford Northcote) to look about for some means of increasing his Revenue, and in that year he added the sum of 4*d.* on the pound, thus raising the duty from 3*s.* 2*d.* to 3*s.* 6*d.* The right hon. Gentleman stated at the time that his necessity was but a temporary one; but the House knew how easy it was to put on an additional tax on the plea of temporary necessity, and how long a period frequently elapsed before it was possible to repeal that addition. Fourpence on the pound of tobacco seemed to be an exceedingly simple arrangement, and only meant $\frac{1}{4}$ d. on the ounce; but that was quite enough to disorganize the trade, which produced a Revenue last year of something like £8,750,000. He desired to show the House briefly how it affected the consumer and the Revenue. Of the entire amount received from the duty on tobacco, £6,500,000 were contributed by the working classes of the country, who purchased their tobacco by the ounce, or even by the half-ounce. During 30 years the uniform price had been 3*d.* per ounce. A farthing was theoretically a current coin of the Realm; but it was not a very practical coin, and, therefore, the question had been between making the price 3 $\frac{1}{4}$ d. the ounce, or adhering to the old price of 3*d.* It was obvious that when an advance in the duty took place it was utterly impossible to supply to the consumer the same quality as heretofore; in fact, the value of the article supplied was reduced to the extent of 4*d.* a pound. Allowing for variations in the price of the raw material, with a duty of 3*s.* 2*d.*, there was never any difficulty in supplying tobacco suitable for the public taste. The years 1878, 1879, and 1880 were noted for their very large imports, and for the very low prices, which proved, in many cases, almost ruinous to the planters in the United States; but which enabled the English manufacturers partially to meet the additional duty imposed upon them by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote). But those who looked ahead and understood the subject were well aware that one bad crop would make the trade almost impossible under the new duty. They had witnessed the effects of the bad crop of 1880. Stocks were reduced, prices were forced up—in many cases from 10 to even 20 per cent—and manufacturers whose capital was not large were failing; and, in his opinion, with the prospect of a bad crop during the present year, a still larger number would have to succumb to the difficulty. The result of poor crops would be that, in a very short time, when stocks were exhausted, it would not be possible for the British consumer to buy for 3*d.* an ounce an article which was at all smokable; he would have to pay a higher price, and, as a consequence, the consumption would decrease. As to the effect upon the Revenue, for many years before 1878 the yearly increase in the consumption was 1,250,000 lbs. weight, resulting in an increase of the Revenue of £180,000. From the experience of former years they would very naturally have expected that this increase would have continued; but immediately the late Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed the additional duty the increase disappeared altogether, and during the two years 1878-9 the consumption was nearly 1,000,000 lbs. weight less in the two years than that of 1877 for the same period. The present scarcity was acting in other ways. He had the opportunity of pointing out, the other day, to the Chairman of Inland Revenue that the number of persons who took out licences to retail tobacco had very largely decreased. The Returns made up to the 31st of March showed that 1,137 fewer licences had been issued this year than in the preceding year, representing a loss to the Revenue, on this head alone, of £409. The probability was that the quality supplied under the present duty would become worse and worse. In any case, the Revenue must suffer, and should another short crop be reaped, the loss would be reckoned, not by thousands, but by millions. He desired to place before the Committee two or three simple figures, which were furnished by the Returns of the United States Government. In 1879 the United States Government reduced the tax from 24 cents to 16 cents, or, in other words, 4*d.* per pound weight. Up to the 30th of June, 1879, their Revenue from tobacco was \$40,000,000, and in 1881, notwithstanding the reduction of duty, the Revenue from the same source amounted to \$50,000,000. In 1879 the quantity of tobacco used in the United States amounted to 206,000,000 lbs. weight; in 1880 it had risen to 233,000,000 weight, showing an increase of 1,000 lbs. weight. These were important facts ; they were too important to be overlooked or disregarded. For the purposes no article could be fairly or more properly taxed than malt ; but the limit of taxation should be calculated to expand, and not to contract, either the trade or the Revenue. He asked the Committee whether in its opinion, the facts which he had been permitted to place before them would show that the limits he had defined had been already considerably exceeded ?

CHAPLIN said, the right hon. Gentleman had, in the course of his observations, reminded the Committee that 1880 was the first complete year in which they could experience the effects of the repeal of the Malt Duty. He (Mr. Chaplin) would take the opportunity of saying that it enabled them also to see what had been the effects otherwise of a purely fiscal character. The House would remember that in the year 1880 the repeal of the Malt Tax proposed by the right hon. Gentleman was a great boon to the farmers. He remembered that the right hon. Gentleman stated at the time that such was the addition of the agricultural interest to the benefit was the special duty of any Government, no matter the Party to which it belonged, to consider the case of the interests of the country. He (Mr. Chaplin) was not in the least ashamed to acknowledge that he cordially approved of the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman and that he accepted it with gratitude in the full belief that it would bring the benefit on the agricultural community that he had no doubt was intended. He had always held it was an error to place a restriction upon the cultivators of the soil, especially upon those in the barley-growing districts, that they should not be allowed to use or dispose of the produce of their farms in the way most profitable to them. The right hon. Gentleman, in 1880, expressed some doubts as to whether the repeal of the Malt Tax would have any considerable effect in inducing a larger consumption of malt as food for cattle. From the information he possessed he had reason to believe that in that respect the right hon. Gentleman was mistaken. There was no doubt that since the repeal of the

Malt Tax malt had in all parts of the country come rapidly into use as food for stock, and on that ground he had no doubt the expectations of the most sanguine Gentleman had been greatly exceeded. He was afraid, however, the benefits received in that direction had not by any means compensated for the injuries the farmers had received from the repeal of the tax on other grounds. The repeal of the tax benefited the farmer in so much as it enabled them to use malt freely as food for cattle. It had, however, another effect, and that was that, by the admission of a great variety of substitutes for malt in the manufacture of beer, the price of barley had been very considerably depreciated. Under ordinary circumstances, a depreciation of the price of barley would probably have been treated by right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench as a matter of comparatively small importance ; but he could not believe the Government would regard with indifference this result of a measure which was introduced by themselves with the special object, as the House understood, and as he believed the Government acknowledged, of conferring a benefit upon the agricultural interest of England. What he ventured to propose was this, and he was sanguine enough to believe the right hon. Gentleman would be disposed to entertain the proposition which it was intended to make on behalf of the agricultural class—what he would propose would be this—that in future they should not prohibit the use of rice or maize, or other substitutes for malt, in the manufacture of beer ; but it should be made obligatory upon the persons using such substitutes to declare and publish the fact. He had been reliably informed that the beer manufactured out of such articles was of an inferior and unwholesome quality ; an injury was inflicted upon the public at large ; and, therefore, if beer was made from such articles, let it be stated. If the public chose to drink beer made from rice and maize, and the like, it was their business, and not his ; but he was confident that if it was generally known that beer was made from articles of this description, the British public would soon exhibit a preference for beer made from malt and hops. If the Committee adopted his suggestion, they would discourage the public from making use of a beverage of an inferior and unwholesome character, and they would create a larger demand for barley, and in that way they would convert the repeal of the tax, which was intended to be a boon to the farmers, from an injury into a real benefit to the agricultural interest. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would take the question into his consideration, and that he would see his way to introduce into his Bill some clause which would have the effect he had described. While the adoption of his proposition could inflict no injustice upon anyone, it would confer a considerable boon upon the distressed agriculturists; and if the Government would not take the matter in hand he should be obliged to do so himself.

MR. WATNEY agreed with the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the whole brewing trade were paying 2s. per quarter more under the Beer Duty than under the old Malt Tax and Brewing Licence Duty; but, while that was the case, many of the larger brewers were paying 3s. a-quarter more than they had previously done; and he wished to call the attention of the Committee to the fact that, when the question was under discussion in 1880, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in asking the House to adopt his Beer Duty, stated that he only wanted something like a fair equivalent with a turn of the scale in favour of the Government. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said he had given brewers relief from vexatious restrictions which existed under the Malt Tax; but those vexatious restrictions might have been removed without doing away with the Malt Tax. Still, for removing these restrictions, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in 1880, said the trade must pay 1s. per quarter; and, as the Government agreed they were now getting 2s. extra per quarter, he hoped that at some future time the right hon. Gentleman would give the brewers back the extra 1s. a-quarter he had exacted from them. The right hon. Gentleman had said the revenue from the Beer Duty did not come up to his anticipations. He (Mr. Watney) did not know whether he ought to be glad or not; but that was in consequence of the depression of trade. The beer trade, in times of depression, suffered like all other trades. Within the last four years the total consumption of malt had decreased 10 per cent. It must not, however, be supposed that the brewers did not pay as much per quarter. The truth was that brewing had been depressed just as had been the case with the general trade of the country. He hoped that at no distant date the Chancellor of the Exchequer would take a more liberal view of the trade, and remit the extra 1s. he was now receiving from them.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had reviewed, in a very interesting manner, the general policy of his Budgets of the last two years; but there was one subject which formed part of the Budget of 1880 to which the right hon. Gentleman had not alluded, and with regard to which he would like to address a few observations to the Committee—he meant the increase in the spirit licences which the right hon. Gentleman then proposed. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had said that evening he had no revenue to give away. He was not about to ask the right hon. Gentleman for any remission of taxation; but he did wish to draw his attention for a minute or two to the subject of that increase, and to the results of it. When the increase of taxation upon spirit licences was introduced in 1880, he ventured to call the attention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the pressure, and, as it seemed to him, under the circumstances, the unjust pressure, which that taxation caused, especially about the middle of the scale. At the present time, if a man occupied a house rated at £50 a-year, he paid for his licence 50 per cent; if his house was rated at £100, he paid 30 per cent; if his house was rated at £400, he paid 10 per cent; and if his house was rated at £1,000 a-year, he paid 6 per cent. Now, the Committee would see that was not a very just scale of charge. In 1880 there was a feeling that the sum which the Chancellor of the Exchequer estimated to obtain from such a source should be so obtained. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in 1880, estimated to get £305,000 from that change of taxation. Now, in the year 1880-1 he received £432,730 from the increase on spirit licences; and in the year 1881-2 he received within £12,000 of the same amount; so that during these two years the Chancellor of the Exchequer had obtained from spirit licences as much as £120,000 a-year more than the estimate le in 1880. What was the reason the Chancellor of the Exchequer had that increased charge upon licences? He justified himself by attention to the Report of the Committee upon Intemperance, had recommended an increase in charge for spirit licences. It was, er, notorious that that Committee it of consideration one circumstance which was well known to every er of the House of Commons, and ally to those who, like himself, ented a large town. It was true had virtually been no increase of d houses in the United King- In the year 1880-1 the increase of licences in England and Wales nder 220; therefore, there had ratically no increase, and the mo- of existing licences had been for ; series of years preserved. It n the ground that the present possessed that monopoly, and ere was practically no increase in mber of licensed houses, that the on. Gentleman proposed the ad- l charge. But it must be known .. Members that licensed houses ublic to the competition of clubs, ally in the large boroughs. In the gh of Salford, which he had the : to represent, there was a con- ple number of political and other He looked with favour upon many e institutions, because he believed ad been, and were, doing for the g classes what clubs for the higher of the community had done for ore wealthy and favoured classes. s the clubs in Pall Mall destroyed ade of many public-houses of the time, so the political clubs which l for the advantage of the working and which were doing good work way of social improvement, had r diminished the trade of licensed . That was one reason, and, to nd, a very strong reason, which mitted, in 1880, against the heavy e in spirit licences, especially upon . rated at from £50 to £150 . To-night the right hon. Gentle- n what in this part of the House be considered the most satisfac- ortion of his Statement, told them wing to the altered habits of the there had been a great decline in ink revenue, and that, in the right Gentleman's own words, "there has been a real and serious decrease in the consumption of intoxicating drink." That statement was exactly in accordance with his (Mr. Arnold's) own observation amongst the large population from which he came. He believed it was perfectly true, and to him it was a matter of great satisfaction, that there was a sensible decrease in the consumption of intoxicating drink. The fact, however, to which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had borne testimony strengthened very considerably the claim of the holders of spirit licences. No society or body of persons had asked him to make the observations he now offered to the Committee; he was simply moved to make them from his own observation of what he considered to be the improvement that was going on amongst the large populations of the towns and the difficulties under which the smaller classes of licensed houses were suffering from the increase of taxation. And considering that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had received, and was receiving, at least £120,000 a-year more than the sum he calculated upon from this source, he (Mr. Arnold) did hope that, not on this occasion perhaps, but on another occasion when he had Revenue to give away, he would bear in mind the claims which this class of people—especially those in houses rated at from £50 to £150 a-year—had on his consideration. There was only one other subject upon which he desired to say a word, and that was the largely-increased Vote to be asked from Parliament in aid of Cyprus. As he intended to oppose that Vote—and he now gave Notice of that intention—he would not offer many remarks on this occasion. He would only say that last year, when the Colonial Office presented a prosperity Budget, and seemed particularly satisfied in regard to their policy concerning Cyprus, he had ventured to say—of course, making allowance for the fact that the present Under Secretary for the Colonies was at that time extremely new to his Office, and for the fact that the Government was not responsible for our present connection with the Island—that the figures would not turn out to realize the expectations placed before the House. He should be failing in his duty if, in regard to the Charge for Cyprus, he did not oppose the Vote. They were told it was Lord Kimberley's hope that he might be able to reduce the Vote by £40,000 a-year; but what did that mean? He had no doubt it was that the Chancellor of the Exchequer anticipated that in future years he might obtain the assent of the Porte to the deduction from the tribute which we were liable to pay in respect of Cyprus of the amount which was due under the Guarantee of this country in regard to the Loan of 1855. But that would not be reducing the cost of Cyprus to this country by £40,000 a-year, because this country was entitled to receive from the Porte the payment of the guaranteed interest. The whole condition and management of the Island of Cyprus seemed to him to be highly unsatisfactory, and he hoped that when he fulfilled his promise to move the rejection of the Vote he should receive the support of the House.

Mr. Chaplin

SIR BALDWIN LEIGHTON was understood to say he rose for the purpose of putting a Question to the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, but, in his absence, the President of the Local Government Board, no doubt, would answer. On that (the Opposition) side of the House the point of the grant in aid of Highway rates was not quite clear. They understood that a sum of about £250,000 was to be applied to this purpose, and he was not going now to criticize the amount nor the mode of raising it. As he understood it, it was a provisional Vote of small amount, and, in the mode of collecting, it did not fall upon the traffic which caused the wear and tear. But in what way was it proposed to dispense it—according to mileage of turnpike road, or of main road, or of cost, or how? Would not the simplest way of applying it be to hand it over to the county authorities, saying, "There, that is the sum we give you as a mileage grant?" He did not know whether that was the way in which the Government proposed to do it. There were two or three other subjects in which he was interested, which would, no doubt, be amply discussed when they were reached. He greatly regretted that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not seen his way to extending the limit of house assessment in respect of private-house licences, particularly in the case of farm-houses. If he had done so the advantages would have been greatly appreciated, whilst the loss to the Exchequer would have been infinitesimal. These people paid more under the Beer Tax than they did under the Malt Tax, and he hoped that when the Committee came to this subject they would fully discuss it. He did not know the right hon. Gentleman would be able to see his way to making the change he proposed this year; but probably some other year he would be in a position to propose it. There were, no doubt, many other subjects about which they would hear more, and about which questions would be asked. For instance, they were told that a large amount was required for Post Office and Telegraph Office buildings, and he must say it seemed hard that this charge should be paid in one year. It seemed to him that it should rather have been a debt spread over three or four years, especially as the increased revenue from this source was £200,000 this last year. If the Postmaster General had been present he might have explained the matter.

MR. DODDS said, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had referred to the very important changes introduced by him last year in relation to the Probate and Legacy Duties, and had given the Committee particulars of some of those changes. Having, on several previous occasions, brought the whole of those changes under the consideration of the House, it was extremely gratifying to him (Mr. Dodds) personally to find that the right hon. Gentleman reported so very favourably as to the whole of them. He would, however, remind the Committee that a year had not elapsed since those changes were adopted, and that for only a short period had they been in active operation in Somerset House; and it was, therefore, all the more satisfactory to receive so favourable a report as to their operation. When these changes were better understood throughout the country they would, he had no doubt, be still more favourably received, and prove satisfactory alike to the Government and to the public. He (Mr. Dodds) had looked forward very anxiously for that Financial Statement, and had indulged the earnest hope that the right hon. Gentleman would see his way to take a further step very much in advance of that taken last year in the direction of reforming the death duties. The right hon. Gentleman had himself stated last year that he was only able to deal with the fringe of the subject on that occasion, and that considerable elbow-room would be required to enable the House to deal comprehensively with the remaining anomalies. The right hon. Gentleman had last year referred especially to three anomalies—three gross anomalies he termed them—in connection with these death duties. The first was the total exemption of property held in mortmain; secondly, the great difference in the charges upon settled and unsettled personalty; and, thirdly, the mode of charging the devolution of inheritance upon real property. He (Mr. Dodds) had indulged the sanguine hope that some one at least of these gross anomalies would have been dealt with on the present occasion. He contended that the death duty was strictly a charge upon the capital left by a deceased person, and that it should be charged at a uniform rate upon all persons, irrespective of consanguinity, and upon every description of property. Consanguinity, he contended, should for that purpose be disregarded, and, as the right hon. Gentleman had stated, the question would have to be considered and discussed of by the House. In connection with this matter, he wished to remind the Committee of one or two gross anomalies in connection with the charge upon real property. It was alleged that real property was unduly burdened, and that relief from local taxation was urgently required; but he (Mr. Dodds) begged to point out that real property was entirely free from any tax of an analogous character to the Probate Duty charged upon personalty; whilst the Succession Duties charged upon real property, which he had always understood were intended to be about equivalent in amount to the charge imposed upon personalty in the form of Legacy Duty, was very much smaller in proportion to the value of the real estate charged than the Legacy Duty as now levied upon personalty. In a recent case which had come under his (Mr. Dodds's) own cognizance, a small reversionary interest in personalty had been, from circumstances, no doubt, of an exceptional and peculiar character, charged in the form of Probate and Legacy Duties very many times in excess of the amount that would have been charged upon a similar amount of real property. Had the right hon. Gentleman seen his way to assimilate the death duties on real property to similar duties now charged upon personal property, he would have been in a position to afford adequate relief to the local taxpayer by contributions from the Consolidated Fund for a variety of purposes; and he ventured to think that had that course been adopted, the right hon. Gentleman would have been able to redeem his promise to the hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. E. W. Harcourt), by making his proposed contribution of £250,000 per annum towards the repairing of main roads and highways, without resorting to any other taxation, or increasing the duty charged upon carriages. However much he (Mr. Dodds) regretted that the right hon. Gentleman had not been able to deal with the subject on the present occasion, he most earnestly indulged the hope that the right hon. Gentleman might continue to hold the Office of Chancellor of the Exchequer until the state of Business in that House enabled him to deal exhaustively with these death duties. He felt sure, if such was the case, he would sweep away the remaining anomalies, and especially the gross anomalies to which he himself adverted last year.

Mr. Arthur Arnold

MR. MOSS was sure the brewers would be glad to hear the high compliment the right hon. Gentleman had paid them, and, in their name, he thanked the Chancellor of the Exchequer for what he had said. He had expressed his acknowledgments to them for the manner in which they had assisted the officers of the Government in the collection of the Beer Tax, and he (Mr. Moss) would, on their part, take this opportunity of thanking the officers of the Excise for the able and courteous manner in which they had performed their part of the duty. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had said that the Beer Tax had not realized the amount he had anticipated. Well, one could scarcely be surprised at that, because, up to this moment, they had not been told how much of the duty had been thrown away by permitting private persons to brew without taking note of the quantity they consumed. It could be shown, he thought, that the private licences, amounting to £46,000, represented from 150,000 to 200,000 quarters of malt. The gain to the Exchequer, through substituting a Beer for a Malt

Duty, had been something like £800,000, but that had not come from the pockets of the brewers. The brewers were merely the collectors of the tax—they collected it from those who consumed the beer. The consumers of the beer were the wage-earning class, and it was from their pockets that this £800,000 came. This sum took the place of an Income Tax of 1*d.* in the pound on the wage-earning class. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in introducing his Bill for the change of the Malt Duty into a Beer Duty, said that the result of the change would leave a simple balance—just a turn—in favour of the Exchequer. He now said that he had obtained an additional duty of 2*s.* per quarter. He (Mr. Moss) said that he held in his hand a statement of the actual duty paid by a large maltster, showing that, during a period of five years, he had actually paid 20*s.* 5*d.* per quarter, so that, as the duty now charged was equal to 24*s.* 2*d.* per quarter, that was an increase of 3*s.* 9*d.* per quarter. It had been said that taking the duty off malt would bring about a change which had been very much sought after by the agricultural interests of the country. Well, it was true the agriculturists were always anxious for relief in this matter, not that they wished the change to be from the Malt to the Beer Duty, but they desired that the burden on their trade should be lightened and placed somewhere else, to give them an opportunity of conducting their business successfully. The agriculturists had been deceived into the belief that the effect of the change would be to lead to the consumption of a greater amount of home-grown barley, of a superior and medium quality, whereas it had simply led to a larger consumption of low-class foreign-grown barley. It was a matter of no consequence to the brewer what he used. He might as well use foreign barley, or a worse class of barley, as he now paid on the result of the operation, and not on the quality of the material. Of course, the pale ale brewers used the best barley; but the lower class was used in enormous quantities by ordinary brewers who now paid duty on result. And foreign barleys had not yet been introduced into the country quite to the extent he believed they would be. There could be no doubt that, in the future, very large quantities would be imported. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had congratulated the country upon the advance of temperance. If they would turn to the Blue Book containing the result of the labours of the Committee which sat in that House, to consider the subject of Temperance, some time ago, they would see it stated in evidence by one of the principal London brewers, that so far from the London brewers desiring the spread of intemperance, it was the greatest obstacle to the increase of their trade; and that there were no greater advocates of temperance than the brewers of the United Kingdom. He (Mr. Moss) fully endorsed the view of this gentleman, and congratulated the country on the spread of temperance. He trusted the Chancellor of the Exchequer would do all that lay in his power to cause it to spread further. It benefited the country, and he was sure the brewers would be found as strong advocates of that which advanced the interests of the country as anyone outside their particular trade. It was not to be expected that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would have been able to make a change in the Beer Duty this year, looking at the state of the Revenue; still he thought the duty had been heavier than the right hon. Gentleman could have anticipated. As time went on, and we had good seasons, and the quality of the barley improved, it would be found that the charge of duty per quarter would be much larger than when seasons and the quality of the barley were bad. In conclusion, as he had said before, the increased taxation, in consequence of the change which had been made in the duty, fell not upon the brewers, but upon the consumers.

Mr. Moss

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, he would not detain the Committee more than two or three moments, his object being to support, as far as possible, the contention of the hon. Member for Coventry (Mr. Wills) in regard to the Tobacco Duties. He had more than once endeavoured to bring this subject before the House, but had not been successful; and now that he had an opportunity he would remind the Chancellor of the Exchequer how hardly these duties pressed on the working classes, and how desirable it was that they should be lightened. The first step towards lightening them, he thought, ought to be the abolition of the additional duty imposed on tobacco in 1878 by the right hon. Baronet the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote). The result of the addition to the tax in that year was very slightly to increase the Revenue, but to cause a much more inferior article to be supplied to the working classes. It was perfectly plain that the article must be worse considering that the duty had been raised, although not to a very large extent, without the price to the consumer having been enhanced. Up to the year 1878 the Revenue had increased by large jumps. In 1871 it increased £174,000 over the preceding year, in 1872 the increase was £209,000, in 1873 £223,000, and so on, until in 1877 the increase was £243,000 over the preceding year. The increase in the duty was £388,000 in 1878, owing to the additional $\frac{1}{2}$ d. imposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The actual importation of tobacco diminished. In the following year the duty increased slightly, and there was a similar decrease of imports; so that at present, whilst we have an advance of £47,000 on the duty on last year, the consumption of tobacco was about 500,000 lbs. less than it was in 1877, the year before the new duty was imposed. It was not generally known how far the working classes suffered from these enormous duties on tobacco. For every 3d. the working man spent in tobacco about 2d. went to the Revenue. When the Tobacco Duty was increased in 1878, it was the custom of the tobacconists to sell tobacco to the working classes at the rate of 3d. an oz., which made 48 pence, or 4s. per lb. How did the tobacconists obtain their profit? They had to pay 2s. 2d. to the Revenue, they paid about 1d. for the tobacco, and their profit was 1d., that being increased 10 per cent by moisture added to the tobacco. After 1878 it was found that the working classes would not stand an advance on the price of their tobacco, and a simple process had to be resorted to. Ten per cent of water was added to the tobacco, thus enabling the increased duty to be paid, and keeping the price of the tobacco at its original amount. He hoped that the noble Lord (Lord Frederick Cavendish), who was listening for the Chancellor of the Exchequer, would reflect on the great hardship to the working classes of this extra 4d. on tobacco, which, while it did not add much to the Revenue, deteriorated so seriously that which was almost the only luxury of these people. On another point he wished to ask Her Majesty's Government whether they had come to any arrangement with the Turkish Government for the remission of the Revenue of Cyprus, which we had impounded on behalf of France? Unless Turkey agreed to it the transaction was one of doubtful character, and scarcely consistent with the undertaking upon which we took over the government of Cyprus. We took it on the understanding that we were to pay over to the Porte so much a year; but we did not take power to impound money belonging to Turkey. We might have a right to impound revenues on account of what was owing to ourselves; but it was rather remarkable that we should act as the assignees of France, unless Turkey had agreed that we should do so.

MR. R. N. FOWLER said, he was sure the Committee had listened with great interest to the very lucid statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He had taken his Estimates very judiciously, and the Committee must feel that he had acted wisely. At the same time, he (Mr. Fowler) was anxious to say this—and in 12 months' time hon. Members would know whether he was right or not—that he believed, and hoped, that the right hon. Gentleman's Estimate of the Revenue of the country would be very much exceeded by the actual receipts. It was a remarkable thing that during the period to which reference had been made—say, from 1872 to 1878 or 1879—while it was notorious that the trade of the country was not in a prosperous condition, the Revenue kept up much better than could have been expected. Well, now everyone was agreed that the trade of the country was reviving; nevertheless, they did not see those evidences of it in the Revenue of the country which they might have expected. His explanation of it was this—that either when trade declined or revived the last thing to be affected was the Revenue. They knew that one great item of Revenue was Excise, and particularly those duties which the right hon. Gentleman had called "Drink duties." The circumstances, he took it, were these. When the working classes got good wages a good deal of it went in drink. It was unfortunate; but it was, nevertheless, the fact. They might all lament it; but it was a fact which the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Members of the House had to bear in mind. On the other hand, when times were bad the working classes became economical, and retrenched their consumption of drink. They did not begin again to drink largely when times improved and their wages increased. Therefore, the right hon. Gentleman might possibly find his Estimates exceeded during the coming year. He threw this out, because he thought it well that it should be remembered that this question of Revenue and Revenue facilities was guided by given laws. He thought the Prime Minister would come down next year and tell the House that the Estimates of Revenue had been very much exceeded. He thought the right hon. Gentleman was perfectly right in taking cautious Estimates; but neither he nor the noble Lord could claim next year that it was owing to their good management that the Estimates had been exceeded, because he thought it was a thing the House might legitimately look forward to. He thoroughly agreed with the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman as to the great importance, under all circumstances, of having a Surplus. He only wished they could do more in the way of making a Surplus for the purpose of reducing the National Debt. The right hon. Gentleman had drawn a picture of what had been done in America and in the different countries of Europe, particularly France; and it was gratifying to see that he adhered to the policy of always having a Surplus; and it was to be hoped that the Estimates—barring accidents, such as wars and famines, and events which were not anticipated—would produce more than the right hon. Gentleman expected. He should like to make a remark with regard to the Wine Duties. It was true they were not going to deal with them this year; but they had been referred to by the right hon. Gentleman in his speech. During a visit he had recently made to the Cape, he had found a very strong feeling existing there to the effect that the manner in which the Wine Duties were levied was very unfair towards the wine-growers of the Colony. It was declared that the alcoholic test was such that it prevented them from sending their wines to Europe. He made this remark and called the attention of the noble Lord to the subject because, whenever the Government determined upon dealing with the question of the Wine Duties—and there was reason to suppose that it was under their consideration—and there was a great change in the taxation of the country, the views of the Cape Colonists must not be lost sight of. He hoped something would be done to enable this important Colony to send their wines into this country. The only change introduced by the Budget—and it was an important one—was with regard to the duty on carriages. For his own part, he would rather see a duty on wheels than on carriages. He did not represent an agricultural constituency, therefore he must apologize to the House for alluding to the subject; but it certainly seemed to him that the roads in the country districts were cut up, not by carriages, but by waggons. In the parish in which he lived in the country the roads were very much cut up by the passage of heavy, powerful stone-waggons. He and others like him had to pay for this—had to pay for the damage done to the roads by those who were carrying on an important business in the conveyance of stone. No doubt, the Government could not this Session devote attention to more subjects than they had dealt with—the right hon. Gentleman was unable, in consequence of having only a small Surplus, to make more change than that which was necessary in consequence of the promise he had held out to the hon. Member for Oxfordshire. He (Mr. R. N. Fowler) trusted the Government would elaborate the idea thrown out by the right hon. Gentleman, and that in the future they would be able to see their way to setting a duty upon wheels rather than upon carriages. No one could deny that the statement in which the right hon. Gentleman had introduced his Budget was a most lucid one. It was, of course, natural for Gentlemen whose interests had been referred to by the right hon. Gentleman in his speech, but not dealt with in his Budget, to take this opportunity of speaking of them; but the only new proposal in the Budget—that with regard to carriages—was one which he did not expect would lead to much discussion. The Budget was not a very ambitious one, and, no doubt, it would receive the general support of the House.

Mr. R. N. Fowler

MR. BIDDELL said, that when the present Government came into Office the country was led to expect great relief from local taxation; but he could not say at present that their expectations had been realized. Although they gratefully accepted the instalments they had received, they looked forward to a great deal more—although he, of course, admitted that the state of the Revenue did not allow of their having more at present. As to the right hon. Gentleman's proposal affecting coffee, no doubt it was a very good thing to protect the public from the adulteration of that article; but he failed to see why the same consideration should not be extended to the public in regard to beer. They had always thought that genuine beer should be made of malt and hops. They found it made of all manner of things, as there was no protection against adulteration. The Government, in protecting coffee, had given them good reason to hope that the protection of beer would follow. The arguments of the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) on that point were strong. It was hard on the brewer who sold the genuine article made of malt and hops, that other brewers who manufactured a spurious article should not be compelled to declare its true character to the purchaser. As to the relief given in the case of highways, he did not think the right hon. Gentleman had altogether understood the complaints of the farming community. If highways were opened, those who used to pay hundreds and thousands a-year in passing the turnpikes—brewers and the like—would pay nothing. People of this kind had a great deal of very heavy traffic on the roads. It was not the light traffic that wore the roads, but the heavy traffic—such as brewers' drays, which were constantly on the road heavily laden. He should have liked to have seen some scheme prepared which would compel traffic of this sort to contribute to the maintenance of the roads. There was a point he had noticed the other day in a Question he had put to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, which he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would take this opportunity of explaining. He had pointed out—and the right hon. Gentleman had admitted the accuracy of his figures—that the farming constituency in Mid Lothian paid less income tax than people similarly situated in England. Some explanation should be given of the inequality. He failed to see that anything could be said in defence of the existing principle, and he should look to the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the necessary relief in the matter. The Scotch farmers were quite as well able to pay the income tax as the English farmers. The latter had, during recent years, been paying on an income they had never received; and it was only fair that the people of both countries should be treated alike.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“(2.) That, on and after the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-three, in lieu of the Duties imposed upon Carriages by the Act of the thirty-second and thirty-third years of Her Majesty's reign, chapter fourteen, save as hereinafter provided with respect to Hackney Carriages, there shall be granted and paid to Her Majesty, Her heirs and successors, in and throughout Great Britain, the Duties following (that is to say):

For every Carriage—

£ s. d.

If such Carriage shall have four or more wheels, and shall be of the weight of four hundred weight and upwards. . . . 3 3 0

If such Carriage shall have less than four wheels, or, having four or more wheels, shall be of a less weight than four hundred weight 1 1 0

Provided, That Excise Licences for a Carriage deemed to be a Hackney Carriage, by virtue of 'The Town Police Clauses Act, 1847' or 'The General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862,' and a Hackney Carriage, as defined by 'The Metropolitan Stage Carriage Act, 1869,' shall continue to be charged with the existing Duties."

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS: I wish to have this matter made quite clear. The Resolution will only apply to carriage licences taken out after the 1st of January next?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: The right hon. Gentleman has quite correctly understood the intention of the Resolution.

Resolution agreed to.

(3.) Resolved, That the Duty of Excise on vegetable matter grown in the United Kingdom applicable to the uses of Chicory or Coffee (other than Chicory) shall cease to be payable, and the sale or exposure for sale of any such vegetable matter in imitation of, or mixed with, Chicory or Coffee shall be rendered illegal.

(4.) Resolved, That, towards raising the Supply granted to Her Majesty, the Duties of Customs now charged on Tea shall continue to be levied and charged on and after the first day of August, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-two, until the first day of August, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-three, on importation into Great Britain or Ireland (that is to say): on

	£ s. d.
Tea . . . the lb.	0 0 6

(5.) Resolved, That the Duties of Customs on Vegetable Matter applicable to the uses of Chicory or Coffee (other than Chicory) shall cease to be payable, and the Importation as Merchandise of any such Vegetable Matter mixed with Coffee or Chicory shall be prohibited.

(6.) Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Law relating to the Inland Revenue and the Customs.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow, at Two of the clock;

Committee to sit again upon Wednesday.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS
(CORRUPT AND ILLEGAL PRACTICES)
BILL.—[BILL 21.]

(Mr. Attorney General, Secretary Sir William Harcourt, Mr. Chamberlain, Sir Charles W. Dilke, Mr. Solicitor General.)

SECOND READING. [FIRST NIGHT.]

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Attorney General.)

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, the Bill was one the importance of which could not be too much exaggerated. He regretted, however, that the Attorney General had not, after further consideration, introduced more alterations into the Bill, but had presented it again in much the same shape which it assumed when it was originally brought in last Session. He entirely approved of that House taking steps to put a stop to the bribery of which they had recently had such startling revelations in the Report of the Commissioners. The Act of 1854 did a good deal at first in the way of checking bribery and corruption; but the ingenuity of lawyers and of others concerned in elections subsequently enabled them to evade many of its extremely beneficial provisions. Therefore, he thought the hon. and learned Gentleman was perfectly right in bringing in another Bill to do away with the scandal which undoubtedly existed. He rose for the purpose of saying that if hon. Gentlemen on his side of the House would be guided by his advice, and that of those who sat with him, they would assent to the second reading of the Bill, in order to take a step in the right direction and stop bribery. He thought the bribery which went on was a disgrace to the age; and anything that he could do to put a stop to it he would do to assist the hon. and learned Gentleman. Having said this, he should best discharge his duty by pointing out, in no captious spirit, what he considered to be serious defects in the measure. He quite concurred in the propriety of the provision which made treating an offence on the part, not of the candidate only, but of all persons who resorted to it. Nor had he any objection to that part of the Bill relating to corrupt practices, except that, in his opinion, the penalties enacted were far too severe. Indeed, he feared that by their severity the Government would defeat the very object they had in view. Where a candidate was guilty of corrupt practices in any shape—whether of bribery, treating, undue influence, or of intimidation—no punishment could be too severe for him; but the case was different with regard to acts done by agents and other persons, over whom the candidate had practically little or no control. When they came to the 4th section, where they were dealing with a candidate who had been guilty by his agents, what was the penalty they were going to impose upon him? He should never be capable of again sitting in the House of Commons for such a county or borough, and if elected such election should be void. That was a terrible penalty. The candidate might have no knowledge whatever, morally or practically, of the corruption. He might be a man who had represented the place for many years, and who had an excellent character. He thought it would be going a great deal too far to impose such a severe penalty as that. He thought that the tendency of the present age in all Criminal Law was rather to diminish than to increase the penalty. He did not want to lessen the liability of the candidate, or his agent, as it at present stood; but he was strongly against increasing it as proposed. The other candidate might be as guilty, and yet get off scot-free. He thought that undue severity would defeat its own object. Treachery might be introduced into the opposite camp; and he did not see how a man could possibly be safe against treachery. When they came to the question of illegal practices, they were introducing quite a new element into the Law of Elections. These illegal practices, although they rendered persons liable to a penalty—and, very properly, a heavy penalty—had not the same effect as corrupt practices, so far as the seat was concerned. There was a great deal which he would like to see stopped very much. It would be well to do away absolutely and entirely with paid canvassers. There was the question of conveyance of voters to the polls. He was prepared to discuss that when he came to it. Then there was the question of placards; but he did not know how, in the case of a constituency like Westminster, a man was to bring his views before the electors, except by placard, in certain cases. But, under this Bill, if a man paid for the posting of placards, he would come under the penalties. The next head related to election expenses. He approved of the attempt which the Attorney General had made to limit the expense of an election, because there was no doubt that if they allowed extravagant expenditure, somehow or other it ended in bribery or corruption, or that something was wrong. He had always appreciated the great difficulty of the House with regard to that question. It was impossible to lay down a hard-and-fast line on the subject of expenditure. The General Election in 1868 did not take place until December. What was the result? During the whole of the Recess, from the time that Parliament was prorogued to December, electioneering work went on. He addressed the people of Lancaster; but his friends came, he thought, to a very wise determination. They had one meeting immediately after Parliament broke up, and they agreed not to speak for three months. But he did not think everybody else took that course; and the expenses went on increasing during the whole of the three months. In 1874 the Election was wanted as soon as possible. It could not be said that the Elections of 1868 and 1874 were conducted with the same expenditure. He wanted to know whether all the expenditure, from the time of a Dissolution till the time of Election, which might be some months afterwards, was to be allowed? There was, of course, a very great difference on the question of election expenditure between the case of a large straggling county and that of a small borough. In fact, the circumstances of the two were as different as they could possibly be. He wanted to call the attention of the hon. and learned Gentleman to the definition in Clause 55 of the time at which the expenses were to begin. He could not make out from the Bill the time when the expenditure was to begin. That time should be made absolutely clear. There never had been a rule that a candidate must not spend beyond a certain sum. But the moment they laid down a scale beyond which a candidate might not go, it was absolutely necessary that they should state in the Bill itself at what time the expenditure was to begin and when it was to end. The Bill provided that no payment or deposit was to be made by a candidate except through an election agent; but the election agent was not to be appointed until just before the election. A person might be a candidate months or years before an election took place. As to the question of expenses he was referred to the Schedules. As he read it, all the expenditure which might legally take place was contained in the Schedules—that was to say, the expenses you incurred under the 1st Schedule must be included in the 2nd. The 1st Schedule showed how many persons you might employ; and as he read the 2nd Schedule, it showed how much money you might spend. The Bill provided that there should be only one election agent. He himself would not like to pay for more than one. But take the case of a large county. How could one agent have control over what was going on in different parts of the county unless he was allowed to appoint throughout the county some persons whom he could trust? The Bill should provide that the agent should be entitled to appoint a sub-agent for each polling district, in order that his instructions might be carried out. The Bill provided that the agent might not vote; but if you employed your own solicitor to act as agent, why he could not vote he (Sir R. Assheton Cross) could not understand. The Bill would prevent you from employing as agent those who were most conversant with the subject simply because they were voters. He could not help thinking that the Schedules were drawn up by some person who had had nothing to do with large boroughs or counties. With regard to the clerks and messengers that might be employed, he contended that, under the Bill, very great inequalities would arise; so that while in Westminster, for instance, 40 clerks and the same number of messengers would be employed, in East Surrey only nine clerks and nine messengers; and in Herefordshire, with a constituency of 10,000 electors, there would be 34 clerks and 34 messengers. [The right hon. Gentleman made several other comparisons between the number of clerks and messengers to be allowed in boroughs and in counties to enforce his objection to the provision of the Bill on the subject.] Again, the election agent had to make a return of expenses within 40 days from the day of election, according to the very proper provisions of this Bill. But what would be the consequence? A newly-elected Member might not sit or vote until that return had been made under penalty of £100 for every occasion on which he sat or voted; and the result would surely be that no Member would take his seat within a period of 40 days from his election, unless he felt absolutely certain that his agent had complied with the law. He submitted that in the case of a new Minister taking Office after a General Election, this part of the Act would have an absurd and unintended effect. With the provisions of the Bill by which an agent was compelled to make up his accounts within a certain time, he cordially agreed; and he held with the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite that the concealment of election expenses was a serious offence. But while there was in the Bill much that he approved, there were matters of detail, such as the 25th clause, to which he entertained a decided objection. That clause provided—

[First Night.]

“That any elector letting a committee-room for the purposes of an election, or beneficially interested in the proceeds of such letting, is prohibited from voting at the election.”

There was a great snare in that clause, because, in many cases, no meeting rooms could be hired for the purposes of elections, except public halls, which were usually the property of Companies; and surely it could not be intended by the framers of the Bill that the shareholders in such Companies should be disqualified for voting if meetings were held in the buildings owned by them. These and similar details showed the imperfections of the Bill, but, were, after all, minor matters. The measure had a far more considerable defect, to which he felt bound to call attention. The authors of the Bill proposed to inflict penalties hitherto unheard of, which, he hoped, would not be allowed to be enacted in their present shape; and the worst of it all was that the Bill, while diminishing the control of a candidate over his agent, left the political character and Parliamentary prospects of the candidate to the decision of a single Judge. To such a principle he absolutely and entirely demurred. He was sure the House would never pass that. Other offences were dealt with by Courts, from which appeals were allowed; but the class of malpractices against which the Bill was directed were left to the decision of a Judge who sat without a jury, and from whose decision there was no appeal. He would give all the help he could to the passing of the Bill through Parliament; but, as at present framed, two effects would happen. It was a great snare for the innocent candidate; while the man who contested a seat, and did not happen to get it, might get off scot-free, unless a Public Prosecutor was introduced. He was very much afraid it would lead to political clubs, not in burghs, not in counties, but organizations elsewhere who had their own particular crotchets—anti-vaccinators and anti-vivisectionists—who would send down their agents to particular towns at election times. They would greatly increase the strength of those political agencies which some people were wicked enough to call Caucus, and the elections would not be conducted by the best men. They would also leave the candidate much more helpless than at present, unless they put some safeguards in this direction.

MR. R. N. FOWLER pointed out that the chief expenses at elections were those of advertising, supplying committee-rooms, and of agents. In London, for instance, it was necessary to advertise in the daily papers, and such a paper as The Times could not, of course, publish an election address on the same terms as those of The Little Pedlington News. He did not see how an election could take place in a large constituency if this Bill were passed into law. In the City the rent of committee-rooms, as his hon. Friend—a late opponent—the Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Martin) would bear him out, was enormous. In the City of London, which returned four Members, with a University vote, and had a constituency of 22,000, the cost allowed under the Bill would be £2,940, or £980 for each candidate. He wished to know, in the event of a bye-election, which was almost as costly as a General Election, whether this £980 was all that the candidate in the great constituency of the City of London would be allowed to incur? It was proposed in this measure to prohibit the use of rooms in public-houses as committee-rooms. Although he approved of this provision, it was a step which was calculated to increase the expenses of an election, as publicans granted the use of their premises at a cheaper rate than that at which they could be obtained from any other tradesman. Another cause of expense was the employment of agents. In the City there were 19 polling districts, and where there were a large number of districts an election could not be conducted without considerable expense. The defects of the Bill seemed to him to be those parts of it which dealt with the points at which he had glanced. He should be as glad as any hon. Member on the opposite side of the House to see an end put to those improper and illegal practices at some elections, which, wherever they prevailed, caused disgrace. At the same time, he recognized the fact that it was a great mistake to go in advance of public opinion in this matter. Certain questionable acts public opinion did not brand as corrupt, and to punish persons who committed them would be to enlist the sympathy of the House in their behalf. He hoped the House would seriously consider the provisions of the Bill, and when they got into Committee would materially alter and modify them. The hon. Member concluded by moving—

Sir. R. Assheton Cross

“That, considering no corruption has been proved to exist in the larger town constituencies, or in any county constituency, it is inexpedient to adopt such uniform restrictions and punishments as will render the fair conduct of an election in a great constituency perilous and penal.”

MR. WARTON, who seconded the Amendment, criticized the drafting of the Schedule of the Bill. There were, he said, some proposals in the Bill which, in his opinion, were quite impracticable. How was it possible, for instance, to pay the expenses of public meetings with such a sum as £20, or to defray the charge of postage and telegrams with £10 per 1,000? He felt quite sure that, in the large constituencies particularly, the Bill would prove useless.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “considering no corruption has been proved to exist in the larger town constituencies, or in any county constituency, it is inexpedient to adopt such uniform restrictions and punishments as will render the fair conduct of an election in a great constituency perilous and penal,”—(Mr. Robert Fowler,)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question.”

MR. HINDE PALMER approved of the spirit in which the proposed second reading of the Bill had been met by the right hon. Gentleman (Sir R. Assheton Cross). He regarded the Bill as a great and useful attempt to remove a scandal that had for too long a period existed among the electoral body, bearing on its face an evident sense of political immorality. He believed the Bill would be open to considerable criticism when it got into Committee; but he could hardly believe the worthy Alderman hoped to carry his Amendment, which did not go to the root of the mischief. He had always thought the right principle was to lay down a distinct law, setting forth what were to be illegal and corrupt practices, and then prohibit anything like an indulgence, directly or indirectly, in those corrupt and illegal practices. The difficulty he felt in the Bill was to be found in the Schedule, which established a maximum for the expenses of all elections, according to a graduated scale. He feared it was impossible to do this. At the same time, other parts of the Bill—as, for instance, the 6th section—struck a blow at many things in detail which rendered expenses in frequent cases enormous. Again, he had an objection to that part which dealt with the solemn declaration to be made by the candidate, and filed with the election agent's account. In addition to the affidavit so provided by the Bill, he would propose that the candidate, on taking his seat, should present to the Clerk of the House a duplicate of such declaration, verifying a true statement as to the total amount of expenses. He believed that a provision to that effect would work very satisfactorily. He hoped his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General would take into consideration the suggestions which had been made from both sides of the House.

[First Night.]

CAPTAIN AYLMER regarded the Bill as unworkable, owing to the attempt of its authors to apply it to constituencies wholly diverse in their character. For example, the maximum expenditure allowed for constituencies of 20,000 was £920; but a candidate who contested Westminster, observing a reasonable calculation for the employments allowed for in the Bill, would incur an expenditure of £1,377, while in East Surrey his expenses would not exceed £769. In other matters of detail the Bill appeared equally impracticable. For instance, a man who gave a dinner to two or three friends six months before the election would, if he were known to be a candidate, be disqualified. It seemed unfair, also, that disqualification should result from the mere act of an agent for so great a length of time as the Bill provided; and that the same number of agents, messengers, and clerks should be provided for constituencies extending over large and small areas. He was not particularly interested in protecting the Licensed Victualler; but he thought that in this Bill he was extremely hardly treated. He would give one instance. Clause 37 stated that—

“The holder of a licence for the sale by retail of any intoxicating liquor (whether for consumption on or off the premises), who permits any act which constitutes bribery, treating, or undue influence within the meaning of the Corrupt Practices Prevention Acts as amended by this Act, to take place upon his licensed premises, shall be guilty of bribery, treating, or undue influence, as the case may be.”

How could he possibly prevent these acts in some cases? If the words “knowingly permits” had been inserted it would have been right; but only the word “permits” was contained in the clause. In short, the Bill was full of pitfalls for candidate, agent, and voter, and made them liable to severe punishment. It would be unworkable owing to its stringency. He thought the wisest course the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General could adopt would be to refer the Bill to a Select Committee, with orders to report to the House in three or four weeks; and it might get through this Session, after being carefully amended in Committee.

MR. CARBUTT considered that no Bill would meet the wants of this country unless it had a clause in it to the effect that public-houses should be closed on the day of election. He had intended to move that as an Amendment, but was informed that if he were successful it would have the effect of throwing out the Attorney General's Bill, and, as that was not his wish, he did not intend to move his Amendment; still, he hoped the Attorney General would consent to a clause to that effect being inserted in the Bill in Committee. Last year he had a Bill for the purpose, and a Wednesday's Sitting was set apart for it. They did not go to a division; but he believed they would have carried it if they had. This year he wished to re-introduce the same measure; but the Motion was blocked by the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton), who stated that his reason for doing so was because he preferred pure beer to pure elections. It was the belief of many persons that if they closed public-houses on election days, elections would be conducted in comfort and there would be much less bribery, because it was when people got “fuddled” with beer they committed acts of bribery and corruption, for which they were punished. He had again gone through the evidence which bore upon the point, and it appeared to be conclusive as to the demoralizing effects resulting from the practice of giving away refreshments from public-houses during elections. The closing of public-houses at Newport had a marked effect in putting a stop to the riot and disorder which formerly prevailed there.

MR. EDWARD CLARKE said, he wished to call attention to a few points which had not been touched upon by the previous speakers; and, in doing so, he was sure his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General would acquit him of all hostile intention towards the Bill. In his opinion, the immediate duty of the House of Commons was to apply some remedy to the mischiefs which were growing to an enormous extent at elections. He only envied the hon. and learned Gentleman his great opportunity for applying some real remedy to this present state of things. He was afraid, however, that the House was attaching more importance to that part of the Bill which referred to the amount of election expenses, than to that part of it which dealt with corrupt and illegal practices. The Bill ought, in fact, to be called, not the Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Bill, but the Parliamentary Elections (Limitation of Expenses) Bill, for that was much the more prominent portion of the Bill, and the House was likely to lose sight of the main and most important portion of the measure, which was the suppression of corrupt practices. He did not wish, on the present occasion, to say anything upon the closing of public-houses on the day of election; but when that proposal was made he should certainly oppose it. He thought the Bill, as it stood, was unfair to the Licensed Victuallers, who would be affected by that proposition, and did not see any defence for two sections of it in particular—namely, the 8th and the 38th, which affected licensed houses. He could not see why there should be a legislative prohibition against the holding of committee-rooms at public-houses. He sat for a constituency among whom, at the election, there were no committee-rooms held at public-houses; but he had also been concerned in two other elections, in which committee-rooms were held at public-houses, and his experience had been that there was no connection between the work of the committee-room and the business carried on in the public-house in which the committee-room was held. ["Oh, oh!"] Well, he could only say that had been his experience; and the House should bear in mind that there were many places in which it was impossible to obtain committee-rooms except at public-houses. He was entirely disinterested, as far as his constituency was concerned; but he did not see any reason for imposing a special disqualification upon a particular trade, when it had not been rendered necessary by anything which had occurred in the course of election proceedings. But there was a still more indefensible proceeding proposed in the Bill. The 38th section provided that—

Mr. Hinde Palmer

"Where a holder of a license for the sale by retail of any intoxicating liquor on any premises (whether the license be for consumption on or off the premises) is found guilty of any corrupt practice, either on conviction or by the report of an election court, such holder shall, in addition to any other punishment or incapacity, and if in the case of a report by an election court he has obtained a certificate of indemnity notwithstanding that certificate, be liable to forfeit his license and to be disqualified for a period not exceeding three years from holding a license for the sale of intoxicating liquors on those premises."

That was making a special penalty for one trade; but let them see what the penalty was for those who were found guilty. In Section 30 there was a provision to which the attention of the House had not been called, and which, in his opinion, ought certainly to be struck out of the Bill. It was to the effect that one Judge should have the power of giving judgment on an Election Petition. The position of a Judge was already invidious enough; but this would be throwing on him a burden too heavy. Section 32 made an entire change in the duties which the Judges had to perform, and the altered position of the Judges deserved the serious attention of the House. He believed that that provision would unduly enlarge the duty of the Judge. Again, in the 12th section of the Bill, there was an unjust distinction instituted between those who were charged with illegal and those who were charged with corrupt practices. Those who were accused of illegal practices might demand to have their cases tried before the ordinary tribunal of Judge and Jury; while those charged with corrupt practices had no option given to them whatever, but might, without having any legal advice, be then and there summarily convicted, and on conviction fined a sum not exceeding £100, and be declared incapable for five years of voting, or of being put upon any registry in the United Kingdom. That was a power too large to give to any tribunal whatever, and certainly too large to be given to a single Judge. Again, the 42nd section provided that—

"Where an indictment for any offence under the Corrupt Practices Prevention Acts or this Act is removed into the High Court by a writ of certiorari issued at the instance of the Attorney General, and the Attorney General suggests on the part of the Crown that it is expedient for the purposes of justice that the indictment should be tried in the Central Criminal Court, the order that such indictment shall be so tried shall be made as of course by the High Court."

A case occurred within the last few months in which the Attorney General

[First Night.]

made an application to the High Court to change the venue in a case like that; but the Court declined to do so, as no ground had been shown to induce it to think that the case could not be fairly tried within the local jurisdiction. The proposal, however, here was that the Attorney General, who must always be more or less a political partizan, should suo motu remove the trial of a case from one Court to another. The 36th clause contained a remarkable provision. It was to this effect—that if, within six months after an election, the Director of Public Prosecutions, or any number of the residents in any borough or county, not fewer than 10, should apply to the High Court, stating they had evidence to show that a considerable portion of the electors had been guilty of corrupt practices, the Court might then appoint a barrister, being one of Her Majesty's Counsel, as a Special Commissioner to inquire into the matter, and on proof, fine or imprison the persons so charged. If the applicants failed to substantiate their allegation, they should then pay the costs of the procedure. It was hardly likely, however, that electors would put themselves in such peril, when they could, without incurring any risk in regard to costs, go to the ordinary tribunals of the country. The expression “a considerable number” was too vague, and the power given to the Special Commissioner, whom he hoped to see swept from the Bill, was too large. A speedy and effectual means of putting an end to corrupt practices was that suggested by Lord Beaconsfield in proposing the Reform Bill in 1867. The suggestion was that after an election a certain number of electors should, upon finding a security for £250, be allowed to present a Petition to the Supreme Court, stating that they had reason to believe that corrupt practices had taken place. Thereupon two Commissioners were to go down, not to try the case as between two parties, but with power to examine witnesses and to report to the House whether corrupt practices had been resorted to or not, and their Report was to be conclusive, unless it were challenged within 30 days it was laid upon the Table. If such a scheme were adopted a speedy stop would be put to corrupt practices. The real mischief at present was that the hearing of an Election Petition was the trial of a cause between two parties. Two things were a great scandal under the present system of dealing with corrupt practices. In a good many boroughs, especially those in which the representation was divided between one Liberal and one Conservative, inquiry was avoided because of the risk of disfranchisement. There were at least a dozen boroughs in the country which, if brought to the test of an Election Inquiry, would share the fate of those corrupt constituencies with which the House would, he hoped, shortly deal. The other matter was, that when a seat was attacked, and a particular case of corrupt practices was proved, the advisers of the sitting Member confessed that the election was void. By confessing that at an early period, in most cases, though not at Gloucester, the Judges had been prevented from making a Report which would lead to the discovery of extensive corrupt practices. In many cases the prevalence of corrupt practices was suppressed by both sides. If the House would only send down within a month of an election a couple of barristers, with power to examine witnesses and call for documents, their Report would seldom be challenged. He wished to make one observation with regard to canvassers. In the Schedule of the Bill he found that one election agent might be employed who might be an elector, but who could not vote. But the clerks and messengers could not be electors. He did not see any reason for that. Now that the electoral body was so greatly increased, it would be most difficult to find men who could be depended upon and who knew the place, and yet were not voters. It would be much better to deal with the question in a straightforward way. In one cathedral city he believed that as many as 800 persons were employed on one side as canvassers or poll clerks. The straightforward course would be to provide that 40 or 24 hours before the opening of the poll the agent of each candidate should send a list of the persons he had employed for reward to the Returning Officer, and that that officer should be bound to refuse the vote of every person so employed. At present the Returning Officer could not refuse the vote of such persons, although the votes would be struck out on a scrutiny. He hoped that some of the matters he had indicated might be incorporated into the Bill. It was his desire, and that of other hon. Members on that side of the House, to assist, by every means in their power, the passage of a substantial measure for the prevention of corrupt practices.

Mr. Edward Clarke

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES), after expressing a hope that the House would allow the second reading of the Bill to be taken that night, said, it would, perhaps, be convenient if he were now to reply to some of the observations which had been made by the hon. Members who had taken part in the debate. He felt it his duty, in the first place, to acknowledge the fairness of the tone in which the debate had been conducted, and also of the way in which the attempt of Her Majesty's Government to deal with the question of corrupt practices had been received. Above all, he must express his gratification at the courtesy which had been shown by the right hon. Gentlemen the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross), and the value of the criticisms which the right hon. Gentleman had applied to the clauses of the Bill. He could assure the House that no Member who had taken any interest in the subject could be more sensible than he (the Attorney General) was of the difficulty of dealing with the matter. To adopt a general measure dealing with the interests of different constituencies, entirely distinct in size, differing in the density of their population, and varying in their circumstances, would be, under the most favourable circumstances, no easy task. He was sure that neither the experience nor the ability of any one Member would enable him to carry such a measure; and, therefore, every suggestion and every amendment which hon. Members representing different constituencies with different interests might wish to make would be at least accepted for the purpose of being fairly considered, and would not be objected to simply because it was an amendment of the Bill. There was, no doubt, very much in the Bill which was deserving of discussion and consideration; and if, after consideration and discussion by the House, it should be found that any clause either required alteration or should be struck out of the Bill altogether, hon. Members would find him at least ready to accept to the extent of fully considering any suggestion they might make. He trusted that, having said so much, the House would now allow him to make one or two general observations. The Bill proceeded upon two distinct lines, and had two distinct objects in view. As his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Plymouth (Mr. Edward Clarke) had said, one object was to lessen the expenses of elections, and the other was to deal vigorously, and he hoped successfully, with corrupt practices. He believed that the Bill satisfactorily dealt with the growing evil of unnecessary expenditure at elections, and that it would do a great deal in the direction of putting an end to corrupt practices. His objection to the great expenditure which it was now necessary to incur proceeded from three distinct grounds. In the first place, this large expenditure deprived the House of the services of many men who would be useful in the House; secondly, it threw an unnecessary burden upon those who were there; and, thirdly, the expenditure itself led to corrupt practices. It was almost impossible to draw a line between the expenditure that was lavish and extravagant in a great degree, and that which involved the commission of corrupt practices. One kind of expenditure led to another; and by paying a man highly and extravagantly for services rendered at elections, and by that means making it a source of great profit to him, they enlisted the services of a class of men whose minds naturally had a tendency towards corrupt practices. If they could enlist the services of volunteers, instead of these paid agents, they would get rid of the class who now set an example of corruption, and were the means of corrupting others; while, at the same time, they would obtain a much juster representation. Then, thirdly, he attached considerable importance to the changing of paid agents into voluntary services; because he entertained a great hope that if they could get rid of the influence of wealth, if they could diminish the chances of the success of a rich man as against a poor man, if they could enlist the services of volunteers, who would be actuated less by the hope of personal advantage and gain than by the enthusiasm of their political convictions, they would obtain a much truer representation in the House of Commons, and would return to the House

[First Night.]

those who would represent the majority of the people, and not so much the wealth of the country. Dealing with the subject of the reduction of expenditure, he knew there were many who felt that it was impossible to reduce the expenditure—at least, to the extent that was attempted by the present Bill. He admitted that if they were to continue to conduct elections on the system upon which they were conducted at present, there would be great force in that idea; but the object of the Bill was to alter the system on which elections were now conducted. If they were to pursue the old system of paid agents and paid canvassers, of circulating addresses in three or four different ways; if they were to continue in the large constituencies to issue 50,000 or 60,000 circulars, and to employ small armies to carry about printed addresses and notices, he was prepared to admit that no result could be produced in diminishing the expense of elections. But it was to get rid of this system that the present Bill had been introduced. He was afraid that the provisions of the measure would not meet with universal favour; but he trusted that the experience of hon. Members would induce them to admit that the worst evil of the present large expenditure was that it did not enable the country to obtain a true expression of the political opinion of the constituencies. Some assistance in considering this question would be derived from a perusal of the Return which had been presented to the House of the Expenses incurred at the last General Election. He believed that those expenses in the last Election reached a larger sum than they had ever reached in any previous General Election. In looking over the Return, hon. Members could not help seeing that the expenditure was not a matter of necessity, but rather a matter of fashion and custom. At present, it was a matter of habit to place upon the candidate many expenses which were altogether unnecessary. He would take two cases. First, the Welsh county of Montgomery. In that county there was a constituency representing 5,291 electors, and of those 4,273 polled. The unsuccessful candidate polled 2,041 votes, and expended £13,053—that was to say, he expended the sum of about £6 5s. per vote. This was the published expenditure, returned by the agents of the candidate; and he altogether failed to see what necessity there could be for such an expenditure. Turning to another county—Herefordshire—the contrast was most remarkable, and it showed what the necessary expenditure really ought to be. He found that in Herefordshire the lowest of the successful candidates polled 2,726 votes, and his expenses came to £296, or 2s. 1d. per head. How was it that the hon. Member for Herefordshire (Mr. Duckham) was successful with so small an expenditure, when the candidate for Montgomeryshire was unsuccessful, notwithstanding the enormous expenditure to which he was put? The real reason was that the hon. Member for Herefordshire worked with a voluntary force. He represented the tenant farmers of the county, who set to work with willing enthusiasm. They brought their gigs and their dog-carts, and carried the voters to the poll, and they carried the election for the smallest conceivable amount of expenditure. They carried it simply by the force of public opinion. That was not the case with regard to the candidate for Montgomeryshire. He had paid agents all round him, who were not animated by enthusiasm for his cause, and who imposed black mail upon him at every stage of the contest. He had no doubt that that gentleman most reluctantly yielded to the demands made upon him, and his opponent, who was successful, also spent a very large sum indeed, showing that the excessive expenditure was simply the habit of those who conducted the election on both sides. It was quite possible to keep the expenditure within the amount provided by the Bill. In 35 of the borough constituencies, the expenditure that was returned was less than that which had been suggested by the Bill. In some cases all the candidates spent less; in some the successful candidates spent considerably less; but in 35 constituencies candidates were able to conduct their elections for an expenditure much less than that specified in the Bill. In the Metropolis itself—in Hackney and Finsbury—the successful candidates incurred expenses within the limit fixed by the Bill; and he would ask the attention of the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. R. N. Fowler) to the fact, that while the hon. Gentleman said it was impossible to contest the City of London on the scale of expenditure suggested by the Bill, it was nevertheless possible for two Members of the Government now sitting on the Bench with him (Mr. Fawcett and Mr. J. Holms) to be returned for Hackney for a sum considerably within the limit. How was it they were able to do so? It was because they appealed to voluntary support. They had no paid agencies, and no committee rooms. They told the electors that they were not going to spend money; but that, if they were returned, it would be because the electors agreed with them in political opinion, and would be prepared to return them free from all expense, except that which was strictly legitimate. How was it that one of the Members for Finsbury (Mr. W. M. Torrens) was able to win his election, and to poll more than 15,000 votes for an expenditure far below the sum mentioned in the Bill. He was a totally independent candidate, and he appealed as an old Member to the electors for their support. His success was entirely due to voluntary effort. Then, again, his right hon. Friends the Members for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright and Mr. Chamberlain) had been enabled, by means of an organization, to which reference had frequently been made—[Cries of "Oh!"]—an organization perfectly voluntary, and without any paid agency, to become successful candidates, and to carry their elections at a moderate expense, quite within the limit fixed by the Bill. His hon. Friend the Member for Oldham (Mr. Hibbert) had not spent one-half the sum which would be allowed under the Bill, and yet he was successful. He might go through many other constituencies of different sizes. His right hon. Friend opposite, who sat for King's Lynn (Mr. Bourke), conducted his candidature on the same principle, and was equally successful. There were many other Members in the House who had been returned the same way, and without unnecessary expense. He could mention, at least, 35 cases, which proved that, with voluntary effort, this very large expenditure was altogether unnecessary. Some hon. Members thought there would be considerable difficulty in reducing their expenditure to the figure mentioned in the Bill. But the inconvenience suggested would apply to every candidate alike. The Bill dealt with no one unfairly, but left the same and equal weapons to all parties. If they found that they had to reduce the amount of their printer's bill they would find that their opponent would also find it necessary to reduce his. They would find it essential to keep the amount expended for paid agency on both sides to the same figure; and if they found it requisite to measure the length of their weapons they might depend upon it that their opponents would be placed under a similar disadvantage. They would simply be required to collect their forces with care and caution, and to rely upon voluntary effort and the strength of their political convictions, instead of trusting, as was the case in too many instances, upon the length of the purse of one candidate or the other. It was impossible to press this point too strongly upon the attention of the House—namely, the necessity of establishing an entirely new order of things. It had become absolutely essential that the present vast and useless expenditure incurred in election contests should be got rid of, and that corrupt practices should be put an end to; but, of course, the details of the Bill would have to be considered in Committee. He desired now to refer to the criticisms which had been passed upon the Bill, and especially to those of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross). The right hon. Gentleman had pointed out one matter, which he would assure his right hon. Friend had already engaged his attention. The right hon. Gentleman had pointed out the existence of an inequality in respect of a borough constituency and a county constituency, which proceeded from one or two causes. The principle he (the Attorney General) had gone upon was to make a paid agent applicable to 500 electors in one constituency, and to a polling district in another. Now, he thought there was a reason why a county, in this respect, should be treated differently from a borough. It had occurred to him that if the House of Commons preferred to have two Schedules instead of one, the principle might be met by adhering to the principle of restraining the agencies, and by acknowledging the application of a principle of difference in the case of a borough and of a county constituency. He, therefore, hoped the proposal he had introduced into the Bill would meet the views of the House. The right hon. Gentleman had also expressed a fear lest treacherous agents might be introduced from the camp of the enemy. He had heard a similar objection raised before; but he was of opinion that a treacherous agent existed only in theory, and never in fact. He derived his experience from the evidence given in the trial of Election Petitions; and he was prepared to say that it was next to impossible for a treacherous agent to go through an election contest without being detected, and his treachery being proved. And he ceased to be an agent directly his treachery was proved. At the present moment a treacherous agent, if undetected, could cause a Member to lose his seat; and, therefore, he had the candidate at his mercy, and every man who desired to become a Member of the House of Commons must run this risk. It was, however, a risk which was more nominal than real, and was a matter which, among other things, must be left to the Judge. The right hon. Gentleman said he wanted an absolute definition of the time when a person could be said to have become a candidate. Now, he (the Attorney General) contended that that was an impossibility. They might define who was a candidate; but it was an impossibility to define when the expenses connected with an election should have commenced. Of course, the expenses must be connected with the election; but they might commence several years before a contest became probable or imminent. Expenses might be incurred long prior to the actual contest in inducing the electors to look favourably upon a particular candidate; but they would not be expenses "in and about the election." The same difficulty existed at the present moment as that which the right hon. Gentleman predicted under the provisions of the Bill. But by practice they knew what were election expenses, and what were not election expenses; and if they found that a candidate did not return what really formed part of his election expenses, then a heavy penalty was imposed upon him, which would not be imposed if the Judge came to the conclusion that they were legitimate election expenses. Then the right hon. Gentleman went on to say that a distinction should be drawn in the expenses incurred in an election campaign that was long, and another that was only short. Now, personally, he (the Attorney General) thought that the campaign of 1874 was quite long enough. What advantage could there be in having a six months' campaign? What advantage could there be in prolonging an election contest, with all its difficulties and animosities, for a period of six months? The sharper and shorter the contest was the better, and there was no satisfactory result to be attained by disturbing a constituency for six or eight months by commencing the campaign at an unnecessarily early period. There might be some justice in the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman as to the maximum expenditure allowed by the Bill; but he (the Attorney General) felt that there would be considerable advantage in fixing a maximum expenditure, and that the principle could not be abandoned by the Government. It must not be forgotten that they had a very skilful class of persons to deal with when they found it necessary to engage electioneering agents, who had always been in the habit of making money out of an election. And when they said, as they did by the Bill—"You shall only employ a certain limited number of people," there was a possibility that their directions would only be nominally obeyed, because the persons who had always been in the habit of making money out of the candidates would still be on the look-out for it. He would give an instance to explain what he meant. Suppose the candidate were to say—"I will only employ one agent and one clerk or messenger;" the agent would reply—"Well, if I am bound to employ only one person to assist me, I can only say that I will only employ one clerk or one messenger; but I will enter into a contract with a printer, and will issue 5,000 circulars, paying men for distributing them." In that way the money would be spent all the same in employing voters to deliver the circulars, and the difficulty would still exist unless Parliament fixed a maximum expenditure in the Bill. Therefore, while he was willing and anxious to meet the evils that had been pointed out, and to accept any practical suggestion that might be offered for meeting those evils—especially that which related to the inequality of fixing

The Attorney General

the same maximum for constituencies differently placed—he must ask the House to support him in laying down the principle of a maximum expenditure. He made these observations in reply to the speech of his right hon. Friend the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross), who had criticized the maximum principle, and had pointed out the effects which it was likely to produce; but he was satisfied that if the Government were compelled to give up that clause the greatest benefit of the Bill would be got rid of. At the same time he hoped the House would not suppose that he suggested that there should not be a perfectly free discussion of the matter. All he desired to point out was that unless they wished to make the Bill comparatively useless in its operation the principle of a maximum expenditure must be retained. Then, again, the right hon. Gentleman had said that the penalties imposed by the Bill were too severe; and he had given as an instance, that a candidate who had all his life represented a particular constituency would, in the event of losing his seat, in consequence of the improper practices of an agent, be disqualified for ever afterwards from representing the constituency in which the offence was committed. He quite agreed with the right hon. Gentleman that it would be a very great hardship that a corrupt agent should be the means of inflicting great hardship upon an innocent candidate, and that the innocent candidate should have to bear the burden of his agent's malpractices. But it must not be forgotten that penalties for this offence already existed; but that they had proved ineffective, and after an absence of a year or two the same candidate had been returned, and the same agent had been guilty of similar illegal practices. The right hon. Gentleman complained that a candidate should lose his seat for the acts of another person; but the law already said that, and the reason why it was now proposed to make the penalty more severe was that while in some cases an undoubted hardship was inflicted upon an innocent candidate, in other cases a candidate who had lost his seat for corrupt practices immediately set his agents to work to regain it; and although without hope of regaining it in that particular Parliament, as soon as a new Parliament was summoned he was returned for the old constituency. The reason why it was now proposed that a candidate should be disqualified for life for sitting for a constituency which had been corrupted by his agent was because it was felt that if an agent knew that in the event of his being guilty of corrupt practices he would lose his candidate, he would be much less likely to resort to corrupt practices than he was now. The fact was that the inadequacy of the existing penalties had led to the introduction of the Bill; and this provision was to be defended, like the others, on the ground that it would make both candidates and agents more careful in future. The consciousness that the candidate would lose the seat for ever, if corrupt practices were established, would make the agent much more careful than he was now. He had very little more to say. He quite admitted that this was one of the matters of the very highest importance, and it ought to be discussed by the House without Party feeling, in the desire to arrive at the best possible conclusion. If it was considered that the penalty proposed by the Bill was too severe, it was open to the revision of the House; but he should certainly adhere to the opinion which he had expressed. There were many other minor matters dealt with in the Bill; but he hoped he had satisfied the House that the Government were anxious to change the present system of elections, and to cause them to be conducted in a more satisfactory manner in future. The hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. R. N. Fowler) spoke of the difficulty connected with the sending out of circulars. He (the Attorney General) wished to get rid of the system altogether; but it was not convenient, neither would it be proper, that he should enter into a criticism of the details of the Bill upon the Motion for the second reading. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Lincoln (Mr. Hinde Palmer) said that a Member should be required to make a declaration, when he came to the Table to be sworn, that he had complied with the provisions of the Act. There was, however, a practical difficulty in the way of the adoption of such a provision. Forty days were allowed for the return of the election expenses; but the candidate who had been returned was allowed to take the Oath and his seat as soon as the

Return to the Writ had been made. It would, therefore, not be in the power of a Member to make such a declaration until after the 40 days had expired; and he might have been sitting and voting in the House for many days before that period arrived. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir R. Assheton Cross) had pointed out a difficulty in regard to one particular clause, and had stated that it would require alteration. The difficulty was this—that a Member might have taken his seat, and at the last moment find that an improper expenditure had been incurred through inadvertence, which incapacitated him from legally discharging his duties as a Member. He (the Attorney General) had been under the impression that the clause had been drawn so as to meet that difficulty. It had been drawn, at any rate, with that intention, and he would see that it was framed in that sense. By the 14th clause, protection was extended to Members in all cases where the expenditure had been incurred inadvertently, or through miscalculation; and where it was plain that there had been no intention of breaking through the provisions of the Act no penalty would be incurred. Any person placed in such circumstances would be at liberty to make an application to the Judge; and a discretion was allowed to the Judge which he could exercise in giving relief to any candidate or agent who might be innocent. He should have no objection to extend the provisions of the Bill even more generously than he had attempted to frame them in behalf of persons who might have offended innocently. Suggestions had also been made of an alternative character. It had been pointed out, in the course of the debate, that there were other courses that might be taken as well as those which were provided in the Bill. The hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Edward Clarke) had referred to a suggestion made by Lord Beaconsfield in 1857 that, apart from the Election Petition, there should be power to obtain a Commission of Inquiry into the existence of corruption at previous elections. For some reason or other, a Bill upon that subject was not introduced until long after the suggestion was originally made, in 1868, when the Government of Lord Beaconsfield brought forward a Bill dealing with the question of corrupt practices at elections. By the 57th section, the view which Lord Beaconsfield had put forward was carried into effect, and provision was made that, in the event of the electors petitioning, there should be power to issue a Commission. That power had existed since 1868, and in introducing the present Bill he had considered it advisable to carry that principle still further, and to give the Election Judges and Commissions power to deal with a much wider range of questions than was at present submitted to them. There was one other point which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross) had referred to, and that was the proposal to allow one Judge instead of two to inquire into an Election Petition. Originally the investigation was intrusted to a single Judge; but in 1879 a change was made, and it was directed that the inquiry into Election Petitions should in future be conducted by two Judges. The principal reason for the determination to revert to a system of single Judges was that it was proposed by the present Bill to cast a great many duties upon the Election Judges in investigating corrupt practices, from which they were altogether free now. As a matter of necessity, this would tend to prolong the inquiry before the Judges; and if two Judges were insisted upon he doubted whether the judicial strength of the country would be sufficient to meet the demands upon it. It was therefore proposed that they should go back to the system which prevailed previously to 1879, and which past experience proved to have worked very well. He had not succeeded in discovering that the decisions given by two Judges had been any more satisfactory than those which were given formerly by one, and there was certainly a greater sense of responsibility in one Judge than existed in the case of two. Not only the necessity of economizing the judicial strength of the country, but also the result of past experience, justified the proposal to return to the system of trying Election Petitions by one Judge only. But here, again, although he was personally in favour of a single Judge, he had no wish to press his view too strongly, if he found that the feeling of the House was against him. He thought he had now touched upon almost every subject, except one, and that was one which had been referred to by his hon. Friend the Member for Youghal (Sir Joseph M'Kenna). His hon. Friend had spoken strongly upon the necessity of closing the public-houses on the polling day. That was a matter which certainly required very grave consideration indeed, and in respect of which there was a great deal to be said on both sides. No one who was acquainted with the way in which elections were now conducted could fail to see that there was a great deal of force in the arguments of his hon. Friend. The great mass of the corrupt practices now resorted to took place in the public-houses. Not only did treating take place in the public-houses, or in some room adjoining, or connected with it, but bribery as well; and he was certainly of opinion that if it were practicable to compel the public-houses to close on the polling-day that they would get rid of a vast amount of the corrupt practices which took place under the roof of these houses. When the argument was used that such a provision would penalize the Licensed Victuallers, he did not believe that that view would be accepted by the Licensed Victuallers themselves—at any rate, by the respectable portion of them, who wished to conduct their business respectably. He had received a deputation from the Licensed Victuallers, and they had expressed themselves most reasonably and sensibly upon the subject. There was, undoubtedly, a great deal to be said on both sides; and they had mentioned, as a matter worthy of consideration, whether, rather than be placed under restrictive legislation, which would make them incur the risk of losing their licences in the event of any breach of the Act being committed on their premises, they would not prefer to have their premises closed altogether on the polling day. But there were other considerations which affected the question. For instance, if they were to close the public-houses on the polling day were they to close them absolutely? Was there to be no opening of the door to the bond fide traveller? On the other hand, was the restriction to be applied only to borough elections, because in county elections a voter frequently had to travel seven or eight miles before he reached the polling-place, and was he to be prohibited from putting up his horse at a public-house, or from obtaining anything to eat for himself? Was it intended that the operation of public-house closing should only be partial, and not general—that it should be confined to borough constituencies, and should not include the county constituencies? Then, again, another question would arise—Was the clause to be confined to Parliamentary elections, or must they have the necessity placed before them of extending the legislation to municipal contests also? If, for instance, there was a municipal election in Birmingham, and it was confined to a single ward, were they to close the whole of the public-houses in the municipality? If that were not done, there would be no advantage in closing them in one ward and in allowing them to remain open in all the others. He wished to point out these considerations to hon. Members; but he thought he was justified in saying that if such a clause were proposed the Government would be quite ready to consider it, and the objections to it would not come from that Bench. He had only one observation more to add. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Plymouth (Mr. Edward Clarke), who had often bravely fought the battle of the Licensed Victuallers, no doubt from a feeling of gratitude towards them for their efforts on his own behalf, said that the legislation proposed by the Bill with regard to the Licensed Victuallers was exceptional legislation. He (the Attorney General) altogether dissented from that view. At the same time, he was prepared to admit that they had to deal with the Licensed Victuallers, in one sense, exceptionally, because it became their duty to deal with a particular class of corruption, which consisted of treating; and treating was only carried out at public-houses, because liquor was the article by which it was carried out. If treating took place with other commodities, restrictions would have to be placed on those who sold those commodities. They dealt with the evil of corruption wherever they had reason to believe that it existed. They dealt with it as far as the agents were concerned, and they dealt with it where members of his own Profession were concerned. It was the desire of the Government to deal with it wherever it was likely to be found. Why, then, were they bound to deal with the Licensed Victuallers and to have the appearance of dealing with them exceptionally? It was because treating took place in the Licensed Victuallers' houses. As he had already pointed out, if treating took place by giving a penny bun to the voter, it would be their duty to go to the confectioner's shop and to lay down the same restriction. But those who committed the corrupt practices never attempted to treat with anything but the liquor sold at the Licensed Victuallers' houses. There the evil was; and they went to the fountain head, and endeavoured to destroy it wherever they found it to exist. It was even to the interest of the Licensed Victualler himself that the evil should be dealt with; and the matter was very much in his own hands, because he could speedily put a stop to it if he thought proper. He was certain there was no honest man in the country, who knew what had taken place in certain constituencies, but must admit the necessity for passing a Bill to deal with the evil of corruption; and he hoped and believed that the House would see that the time had come when they must take upon themselves the duty of aiding the honest and thwarting the dishonest man. In that case, he felt sure it would not be long before the Bill which he now asked should be read a second time would pass into law.

The Attorney General

[First Night.]

COLONEL NOLAN said, he was very much in favour of a measure for the prevention of corrupt and illegal practices at elections; but he was bound to say that some portions of the present Bill were too Draconian in their severity. The first provision to which he applied that remark was that which proposed to keep a candidate out of his constituency for ever on account of acts committed by his agent, of which he might know absolutely nothing, except in the legal meaning of the term. His agent might, for instance, have made a speech which he had not had the opportunity of repudiating. Surely, such an offence was too severely dealt with by excluding him for ever from the representation of his constituency. The next fault he found in the Bill was that it proposed to keep a candidate out of Parliament for 10 years who was found guilty of corrupt practices. The House should bear in mind that these clauses not only included bribery, but treating, amongst the corrupt practices on account of which a man would be precluded from sitting in Parliament. Bribery, of course, stood in a different position to other acts, because it was an offence which could hardly be committed without the cognizance of the candidate; but with regard to treating and other trifling acts of the kind, he defied the most careful candidate to prevent them. The Bill, therefore, in his opinion, was too severe in dealing with these matters. The same remark applied to what was called "undue influence," a term which raised a question of great importance in connection with Irish elections, because it was well known that it would be construed by the Irish Judges in a very different manner to that in which it would be construed by the Judges in England. He was confident that for every case of undue influence recorded against an English candidate there would be five or six against Irish candidates; and, therefore, for the reasons he had assigned, he was compelled to drop the defence of the portions of the Bill to which he had referred. It would seem that the Attorney General believed that, in all cases of corrupt practice, he would be dealing with a dishonest candidate and a dishonest constituency, but not a dishonest Judge. The latter, however, was not an impossibility; and he contended that some protection against the action of a dishonest Judge should be afforded by the Bill; and, for his own part, he did not know of any more effectual means of keeping Election Judges in order than by allowing the re-election of candidates. The clauses in question certainly appeared to him to require alteration, and, unless they were modified, he should feel it his duty to oppose the Bill very strongly. He would go farther, and say that Irish Members would act very unwisely if they allowed the clauses to remain in the Bill in their present form, because there was nothing whatever to prevent a Judge keeping a leader of the Irish Party out of Parliament on the plea of undue influence. It must be remembered that most of the Judges on the Irish Bench were by no means unscrupulous; and it would be a very easy matter to effect the exclusion of a candidate, because, as he had already pointed out, the term "undue influence" would be differently construed in Ireland to what it would be in England. It was, therefore, incumbent upon Irish

The Attorney General

Members to scrutinize the clauses of a Bill which gave power to any Judge to keep a candidate out of Parliament during a period of 10 years. For his own part, he hoped the clauses would be modified by the Attorney General in the direction indicated; if not, the hon. and learned Gentleman would find that he should take a very keen interest in every line of the Bill when it went into Committee.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR trusted the Government did not propose to insist upon the second reading of the Bill at that Sitting. It was difficult to over-estimate the importance of a measure that was to alter the whole system under which Members were elected to that House. But what was the occasion on which they were expected to accept the second reading of the Bill? He would not say it had taken the House by surprise, because he supposed hon. Members ought to have known that it was coming on that evening; but his own impression was that it was part of the arrangement of last week that it should be taken, not on Monday, but on Tuesday. That might have been a mistake for which he alone was to blame; but, however it might be, it was a mistake very largely shared by Members on both sides of the House, and, that being so, he thought the Government ought not to press the Motion for the second reading to a division on the present occasion. But that was not the only reason. How much time had been given to the discussion of the Bill? The second reading, he believed, was only moved at half-past 9 o'clock that evening, and hon. Members would know very well that the hours after that time were of much less value for the purpose of a debate of this kind than the hours that preceded it, and this was especially true on the day when the Prime Minister made his Financial Statement. Was it possible that the House, after listening with the closest attention to a speech by the Prime Minister of two hours in length, presenting arguments which it required the utmost stretch of the mind to follow, lucidly as the right hon. Gentleman unfolded them, should be in a condition to give the present most important Bill the attention which it required? Since the conclusion of the right hon. Gentleman's Statement, the House had been addressed by some of the foremost and ablest Members, and yet no one who had listened to them could doubt how flat their speeches fell upon the ears of hon. Members, and how feeble was the attention given to arguments even such as those of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Plymouth (Mr. Edward Clarke). They had also been addressed by his hon. and learned Friend who had charge of the Bill (the Attorney General), and even that speech had fallen upon a wearied and inattentive House. Under the circumstances, he trusted the discussion would be allowed to extend to another day, when the House would be able to approach it unfatigued by any previous question, and, doubtless, continue the favourable criticism which had up to that time been extended to the well-meaning measure under discussion. For these reasons, and in order to give the House an opportunity of further discussion, he begged to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Debate be now adjourned."
 —(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he hoped the second reading would be allowed to be taken that evening. He appealed to hon. Members opposite to consider whether it was desirable to spend another day in debating matters which could be perfectly well discussed upon the clauses of the Bill in Committee. For his own part, he did not think there would be any injustice to Members of the House in asking them to continue the discussion upon the present Motion; and he was, therefore, compelled to express a hope that the hon. Member for Hertford would withdraw his Motion for the adjournment of the debate.

MR. GORST said, he could but express his astonishment at the course taken that evening by the Government with regard to this Bill, because it was within his recollection that Tuesday next was the day appointed for the express purpose of the discussion on the Motion for the second reading. Private Members had been asked to give up their rights for the purpose of taking this stage of the Bill on Tuesday, and the day was named after a debate in which the subject was thoroughly discussed. The Bill before them was of the greatest interest to hon. Members, and the discussion which had taken place was by no means proportioned to its importance. It had certainly been a very short one, and he appealed to hon. Members in all parts of the House as to whether they would not like a further opportunity of discussing subjects upon which they could bring their own personal experiences to bear. For his own part, he was sure that if the Government would consent to adjourn the debate until to-morrow morning they would have the advantage of listening to many interesting experiences from Members of the House, who had not been able to take part in the discussion; and he believed also that the hon. and learned Gentleman in charge of the Bill would receive suggestions from various parts of the House which could not but be of use when it went into Committee. His approval of the Motion of the hon. Member for Hertford (Mr. A. J. Balfour) was given from no feeling of hostility to the Bill, because he had already promised his active support to a measure of this kind. He thought it well that Members who desired to address the House on the principle of the Bill should not be denied the opportunity of doing so. He believed, for instance, that the observations which his right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Kent (Sir William Hart Dyke) might make would be listened to by the House with great attention; and although he did not desire to enter into his own experiences of elections, he very much wished to offer some observations upon the principles involved in the Bill. If the debate were adjourned until to-morrow he should ask permission to do this. It was hardly possible that the debate of that evening could be prolonged to any great extent, seeing that it was then half-past 12 o'clock, and bearing in mind the speech to which they had listened at the beginning of the evening. For these reasons he hoped the Government would, out of consistency with their own desire to obtain Tuesday for the discussion of the Bill, consent to the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Hertford.

[First Night.]

MR. CALLAN said, he had no hostile feeling towards the Bill. On the contrary, he only regretted that it was not retrospective in its character, because, if it were, it would clear the House of nearly half its Members. He agreed with the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) that the Bill would be better taken again to-morrow, because it related to Ireland as well as to England, and the columns both of English and Irish newspapers would be filled up with the debate on the Budget, and only a very small portion of space would be allotted to the debate on the present Bill. If the debate were adjourned until Tuesday the question would be better ventilated in the public Press, and the experience of many hon. Gentlemen in regard to elections would be added to the information already possessed by the House. While he held that the Bill was very much desired by the country, and was in an especial manner necessary for some English and Welsh constituencies, he considered that the principles of the measure required to be narrowly scanned. He had been struck by the altogether insufficient, and he might almost say the absurd reason given by the Attorney General for reverting to the practice of trying Election Petitions with one Judge only—a practice which had been condemned by the House so recently as in the year 1879. This was a question upon which he desired to address the House, and he accordingly appealed to the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Hartington) to consent to the adjournment of the debate, the Motion for which, he was quite sure, was made without any intention to delay the progress of the Bill, which he was as anxious as any Member of the House to see passed, amongst other reasons, because it struck at the rich parvenus who spent money corruptly in order to obtain seats in the House. Feeling that the question ought to be fully discussed and ventilated, he suggested that the debate might be adjourned with advantage until to-morrow.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, he hoped the Government would reconsider their objection to the adjournment of the debate, because he had understood that a Morning Sitting was to be taken to-morrow for the especial purpose of discussing the Bill. The hon. and learned Attorney General, having courteously invited Members who had experience in electioneering matters to suggest to him Amendments by which the Bill might be improved, he would ask him how it was possible that those amendments could be properly considered by him unless he allowed hon. members an opportunity of giving reasons in support of them on the second reading? As he understood that the noble Marquess in moving that the House should meet to-morrow at 2 o'clock indicated that it was for the purpose of discussing this Bill, he hoped the noble Marquess would adhere to the arrangement he then made.

Mr. Gorst

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Certainly it is the intention of the Government that the Morning Sitting shall be devoted to the discussion of the Municipal Corporations Bill, and there is not the slightest desire on the part of the Government to shorten the debate if it appears to be the desire of a considerable number of Members to take part in the further discussion. What we have asked the House to do is to continue this debate a short time longer—say for an hour—and if there then appears to be a still unsatisfied desire on the part of a considerable number of Members to take part in it we should not feel justified in our opposition to the adjournment of the debate. All that we have asked the House to do is not at this somewhat early hour to adjourn the debate, but to continue to a reasonable time, and then, if it seems desirable, to adjourn the debate.

MR. WARTON said, he thought the noble Marquess, in speaking of this as an early hour, had forgotten that the House was bound by his Resolution to meet at 2 o'clock. He did not think the Government would gain any advantage by continuing this debate any further this evening. The Budget speech had been able, as it always was; but it proposed very few changes, and there was no reason for discussing it further now.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: There is nothing more difficult than to decide whether a debate should close or not; but I think, on the present occasion, we should save time by agreeing to an adjournment for one or two reasons. In the first place, considering the understanding there undoubtedly was that to-morrow was the day on which there would be a continuation of this discussion, we must bear in mind that those who are now present may be ready to go to a division; but there may be other

hon. Gentlemen who have expected that the debate would be further continued. I must point out also that there is a general opinion throughout the House that not only should some measure be passed this Session for the restraint of corrupt and illegal practices, but also that the Bill of the Government furnishes a basis upon which such legislation should be founded; although, on the other hand, there may be some Amendments which it would be desirable to discuss. Those may, of course, be discussed in Committee; but I always find that a discussion on a second reading gives a good opportunity for bringing forward points that have to be considered, and I think that if there is any considerable number of hon. Gentlemen who wish to bring forward such points, it must be remembered that it was the expectation of the Government, when they first proposed a Morning Sitting for to-morrow, that this Bill would not have made such progress, and it would be necessary to go on with it to-morrow; and many Members have taken it for granted that the Business for to-morrow will be the discussion of this Bill. I think some who are not present might have reason to complain that they had not an opportunity of making speeches and suggestions which they wished to offer if that is not so. But the noble Marquess fairly says that if after another hour's discussion the House wishes to adjourn the debate he would have no objection to adjourning. According to my experience of the conduct of Business, I am of opinion that we should save time by adjourning now and seeing if we could get on with other Business. At the same time, I think the House will do well if it can come to a decision on the second reading of this Bill, because I feel that it is a Bill drawn with considerable care, and one which furnishes ground for legislation of an important character; and it is in no spirit of hostility to that Bill that I make this suggestion.

MR. BUXTON said, he hoped the Government would not consent to an adjournment. Much had been heard this Session about the extraordinary waste of time and the amount of Business to be got through. No argument had yet been brought forward which might not have been equally well advanced in Committee; and it seemed to him that now was the time for taking the second reading. The hon. Member for Hertford had expressed some surprise at the opposition to the second reading, and he agreed with the hon. Member. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir R. Assheton Cross) had given his support generally to the principles of the Bill, and the points which the right hon. Gentleman had raised referred entirely to matters which might be brought forward in Committee. Many of those points were of considerable importance, and it might be well for the Government to consider them; but they were not directed against the second reading of the Bill, and he hoped the Government would press for a division.

[First Night.]

MR. CHAPLIN said, the noble Marquess stated that undoubtedly a Morning Sitting was asked for for Tuesday to take this Bill, and it was on that understanding that hon. Members consented to the proposal. If the Government did not accede to the adjournment of this debate he wished to know whether, if the second reading was carried to-night—though he did not suppose it would be—the noble Marquess would agree to the House meeting at the usual hour to-morrow?

MR. O'DONNELL said, he hoped the Government would consent to what was really inevitable—namely, to put off the further discussion on the second reading of this Bill until to-morrow. A fair discussion on the second reading really shortened and facilitated the discussion on the clauses in Committee; and in a Bill of this character, with so many clauses, it was exceedingly difficult when in Committee to discuss some of the clauses and, in the light of other clauses, keep within the limits of Order. It might continually happen in discussing the clauses that it was necessary to refer to other clauses, and in that way Members might run themselves against the Rules of Order, which were drawn somewhat tightly on some occasions. It would be impossible to discuss those clauses when there had been no preliminary discussion on the joint working of the clauses. He was certain the Government would lose no time by consenting to adjourning the debate until to-morrow. On the contrary, they would very likely lose time if they tried to force on the Committee stage of this Bill. The Irish Members took very great interest in the Bill for the repression of corrupt practices, because corrupt practices had been the main enemy of nationality in the Irish elections; and therefore it was from no objection to the Bill that they asked for further time, not only for the discussion of the clauses, but for the consideration of the general scope of the Bill, taking the clauses together. That was a matter upon which they claimed to have a right of speech; and although he entirely appreciated the great zeal which the Attorney General had shown in this matter, and though he was certain that it would be much appreciated in the borough of Taunton, yet he hoped that out of consideration for other boroughs, which, perhaps, did not take so great an interest in the prevention of corrupt and illegal practices, the Government would kindly consent to the adjournment of the present discussion.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I should like to assure the House that the Government have no desire to prevent the fullest discussion of this measure. The information which has been given to the House is rather scanty, and the desire to prolong the debate appears to be attributed to some hon. Members who are not here now. But enough has been said to convince the Government that considerable opposition will be offered to the progress of the Bill; and as we do not wish to have the appearance of desiring to limit the discussion of so important a measure, we shall offer no opposition to the adjournment of this debate. The Bill will be taken at the Morning Sitting to-morrow, and I hope it will not be necessary to occupy the whole of the Sitting with it, but that, after the second reading, we may be able to utilize the remainder of the Sitting. The second Order will be the Municipal Corporations Bill; but that is only on a formal stage, and I hope we shall be able to proceed with the third Order, which relates to the Ballot Act.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he hoped the House would assent to the suggestion of the noble Marquess that if this debate was adjourned the whole of the Sitting to-morrow would not be taken up by the same Bill. He should not have risen except to thank the Attorney General for the way in which he had received the suggestion he himself ade ; and he should give his support to the Bill.

Mr. Buxton

W. H. SMITH asked if the Resolutions would be taken to-
?

FREDERICK CAVENDISH ; would be convenient to take to-morrow.

tion put, and agreed to.

to adjourned till To-morrow, at the clock.

W HARBOUR (re-committed) BILL.
Herbert Gladstone, Lord Frederick Cavendish.)

[BILL 137.] COMMITTEE.

considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

ies 1 and 2 agreed to.

ie 3 (Charge upon baronies. Pay-
Wicklow Copper Mine Com-Transfer of Harbour to Board).

adment proposed, in page 5, line ave out the words "and other gs."

adment agreed to.

ie, as amended, agreed to.

ie 4 agreed to.

ie 5 (Special meeting to consider arging town rates with expendi-excess of estimate).

WILLIAMSON said, the Bill ed that if, from any unforeseen he estimate was insufficient, the ment should be authorized to ad-y a further loan whatever might ted. Clause 5 proposed that in emergency a special meeting of clow Town Commissioners should ed to consider it. Suppose they o the conclusion that the whole was thrown away, and that they not charge the rates with any sum, what would be the condiaffairs then?

FREDERICK CAVENDISH is provision was only inserted to contingency of which it was be-here was no danger. The esti-ad been most carefully considered;
om experience of all estimates, uld not be absolutely certain that ther cost could possibly be in-

If there was such a necessity,

it was intended to be met by this clause, which had been framed with every possible care.

MR. WILLIAMSON said, he did not wish to throw any obstacle in the way of the Bill; but he was satisfied that more consideration ought to be given to the subject involved.

MR. W. H. SMITH agreed with the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Williamson) that there was a real danger to apprehend ;
but he had no doubt his noble Friend (Lord Frederick Cavendish) had taken great pains to satisfy himself that the estimates were correct and sufficient.
He believed that if the noble Lord had to meet the House two or three years hence he would have to propose an additional Vote, and that it would not be met by the Town Commissioners of Arklow.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, the estimates were made by their Predecessors, and the Government had taken every possible care to guard against the risk incurred by their Predecessors.

Clause agreed to.

Remaining clauses agreed to.

House resumed.

Bill reported ; as amended, to be considered To - morrow, at Two of the clock.

BANKRUPTCY LAW AMENDMENT

BILL.—[BILL 87.]

(Mr. Barran, Mr. Norwood, Mr. Edward Clarke, Mr. Monk.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. BARRAN, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, he did not forget that in the very able speech which was delivered by the President of the Board of Trade during last Session upon Bankruptcy Law the right hon. Gentleman foreshadowed a Bill which was of very great national importance; and it was in no spirit of opposition to the measure of the right hon.
Gentleman that he now asked the House to read this Bill a second time. The Bill was promoted by the Associated Chambers of Commerce; it was approved of by all the Chambers of Commerce in England; and he might also state that the Association of Bankers,

Merchants, and Traders of the United Kingdom had passed a resolution supporting almost fully the Bill which he now moved should be read a second time. This was a question which affected the whole trading community of the Three Kingdoms, and it was one which demanded the attention of Parliament. They had been promised, from time to time, that a Bill should be introduced meeting the requirements of the Chambers of Commerce; but unfortunately the state of the Business of the House had been such as to preclude the possibility of the President of the Board of Trade introducing his Bill. Those hon. Gentlemen whose names were at the back of the Bill now under consideration were not at all anxious to in any way intercept the President of the Board of Trade. On the contrary, if the right hon. Gentleman would consent to the second reading of the Bill to-night, they would be quite disposed to postpone the Committee stage until such reasonable time as the President of the Board of Trade might wish to be allowed him for the purpose of introducing his own Bill. There were very considerable questions involved, which traders deemed of the utmost importance. They had known in the past what had been the very serious objection to too much officialism. The trading community generally were anxious to avoid undue officialism, and this Bill proposed to give to the creditors such power that they might have both the responsibility and direction in matters which affected very largely their own interests. At that late hour (1.10) he did not think it right to go into any particulars as to the merits of the Bill; but he asked the House to read the Bill a second time, in order that they, as Representatives of large commercial interests, might take up a position befitting them when the President of the Board of Trade should see fit, and have the opportunity of bringing forward the measure which he foreshadowed during the last Session of Parliament.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Barran.)

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, he was sorry he could not assent to the proposition which had just been made by his hon. Friend the Member for Leeds (Mr. Barran); and he thought that, upon consideration, the hon. Member would feel it was hardly fair or reasonable to ask the House of Commons to commit itself to the principle of a Bill on so important a subject as the present at that late hour. The hon. Member had said that, in consequence of the lateness of the hour, he did not feel justified in trespassing upon the House; and, consequently, the House had not had the advantage of hearing any explanation of the clauses of the Bill, or of the general principle it proposed to carry into law. If they passed the second reading with the assent of the Government they would be committed to the principle of the Bill. He could not undertake to pledge the Government to the Bill. It was an extremely inadequate measure for dealing with a great subject; and if he thought the present a fair opportunity he should explain to the House that there were many objectionable features of the Bill which would tend to increase the scandals of the existing system rather than remove them. His hon. Friend talked about the importance of the creditors possessing the power to prevent anything like extensive officialism. The present Bill would tend to sustain the system under which there had been a quasi-official management; but there was no efficient supervision to prevent abuse. Officials of the Trade Protection Societies had, in many cases, had the management of bankrupt estates; and the control, if properly looked after, answered well. Of course, in some cases there had been great abuse. He supposed it was of no use to ask his hon. Friend to withdraw the Bill; and, therefore, it was his duty to move that the debate be adjourned. If his hon. Friend would take another, and a fitting opportunity, he should be glad that his Bill should be discussed. He hoped he would be able, at a later period of the Session, to introduce the Bill, which was promised in the Queen's Speech, for dealing with the subject. In that case he supposed it might be the pleasure of the House to refer the Bill to a Grand Committee, if the proposal for Grand Committees on Trade and Commerce should meet with the approval of the House; and he should not see any objection to the Bill of his hon. Friend, as well as any other Bill dealing with the same subject, going before the same Committee. That, however, should only be done after the House had had a full opportunity of discussing the principle of the Bill on the second reading. He would move that the debate be now adjourned.

Mr. Barran

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Mr. Chamberlain.)

MR. EDWARD CLARKE said, there was an ominous tone in the right hon. Gentleman's voice when he spoke of the prospect of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Barran) getting another opportunity for discussing the Bill. The President of the Board of Trade said it would be his duty to move the adjournment of the debate; but if his hon. Friend could get another opportunity of bringing forward the Bill, possibly he might enter into the merits of the measure. He quite agreed with the right hon. Gentleman that this was a late hour to discuss matters of this kind; but the opportunities that private Members had of bringing in Bills was so very limited that they were glad to avail themselves of any that presented themselves. The President of the Board of Trade might have shown a little more respect to the opinions of the Associated Chambers of Commerce, and to the other commercial bodies in the country, than to dismiss in so cavalier a fashion a Bill which had their unanimous support. The right hon. Gentleman said the Bill contained many mischievous provisions, not one of which he had condescended to point out to the House. The right hon. Gentleman said the Bill would continue the present officialism, and then he said the officialism was that of the Trade Protection Society. If no other measure could be passed this year—and there was very little hope that the right hon. Gentleman himself would be able to pass any measure this year on the Law of Bankruptcy—if no other measure than this were passed, and if this measure contained but one of its clauses, it would be an enormous advance and improvement in the Bankruptcy Law of the country. If only that section of the present Act which allowed liquidation by arrangement could be repealed, it would be of great service to trade. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not persist in his Motion for Adjournment. He had said that ultimately he would be prepared to consent to this Bill being submitted to the same Select or Grand Committee as the Bill he hoped to shortly bring forward. The Bill now under consideration would, before it could be referred to a Committee, have to be read a second time. It would not be fair to adjourn this debate and allow the right hon. Gentleman to bring in his Bill, with all the advantage of the Government authority for the arrangement of matters in the House, and very probably leave the hon. Member (Mr. Barran), and the other hon. Gentlemen who were acting with him, in the position of being unable to bring their Bill on again; and, therefore, precluded from having it submitted to the same tribunal as the Government measure. He hoped a division would be taken on the question of adjournment.

MR. MONK regretted to hear the President of the Board of Trade speak in so doubtful a manner as to the probability of his being able to introduce his own Bill on this subject this Session. The right hon. Gentleman was as well aware as they were that the commercial community were looking anxiously for some move on the part of the right hon. Gentleman; and he (Mr. Monk) and others had heard very serious complaints that the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman had not been brought in before this, and circulated in the country. The Bill which had been brought in by his hon. Friend had been carefully considered by the Associated Chambers of Commerce. It was an amending Bill; it was a Bill amending the Act of 1869. His right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade intended to bring in a Bill entirely repealing that Act, and altering materially the Law of Bankruptcy; still, as that Bill was in embryo, and as they did not know whether the right hon. Gentleman would be able to introduce it at all this Session, he hoped the House would not refuse the second reading of the Bill of the hon. Member for Leeds. As the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth (Mr. Edward Clarke) had said, the Bill must be read a second time before it could be sent to a Committee. He must confess he had very serious doubts whether the Grand Committee of which his right hon. Friend had spoken would ever come to anything. At all events, the Bankruptcy Bill would not pass into law, if it had to be sent to a Grand Committee, this Session. Under the circumstances, his hon. Friend was quite entitled to go to a division.

Question put.

The House divided :—Ayes 84; Noes 37: Majority 3.—(Div. List, No. 71.)

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

House adjourned at half after One o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, 25th April, 1882.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Army Alternative Punishment* (68).
Second Reading—Referred to Select Committee—Stolen Goods (64).
Committee—Report—Metropolitan Commons Supplemental* (38); Army (Annual) (65).
Third Reading—General Police and Improvement (Scotland)* (48); Drainage (Ireland) Provisional Order* (51), and passed.

STOLEN GOODS BILL.—(No. 64.)

(The Lord Chancellor.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, it contained exactly the same provisions as the Bill which was sent to the Commons on the same subject last year; and he would move the re-appointment of, as far as possible, the same Committee next week, to which he would move that the Bill should be referred.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Chancellor.)

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly; and referred to a Select Committee.

ARMY (ANNUAL) BILL.—(No. 65.)

(The Earl of Morley.)

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee read.

Moved, "That the House do now resolve itself into Committee."—(The Earl of Morley.)

VISCOUNT BURY said, it was remarkable that in a year which was distinguished more than any other for Army changes there had been no adequate opportunity afforded for discussing those changes in either House of Parliament. The exigencies of the public service in the other House of Parliament had obliged the Estimates to be taken at a very late hour, and only the most cursory opportunity had since been given for touching on the few important points that arose. It was only by putting Questions occasionally that any information could be obtained in regard to the Army, for there had been no regular debate. When the present Bill was read a second time in their Lordships' House, there was little opportunity for discussion, although there were a great number of points which ought to be considered in regard to recent legislation in the Army. He was not going to find fault with the changes that had been made, for as to a great many, a consensus of military opinion was very much in their favour; but he did complain of this—that since 1871 the Army had been in a perpetual state of change, and noble Lords had been constantly told that the Army was in "a transition state," and that "they must not expect too much." Only last night the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Morley) had repeated what had often been said before—that the Army was in a transition state, and that the full value of the changes could not be yet appreciated. It was undeniable that the main object of our great Army expenditure was to be able to put an efficient Army in the field on a few days' notice; that was the long and the short of the whole question, and so long as they stopped short of that they had not got that for which they paid £15,500,000 a-year. Well, were they in that position now? The noble and gallant Earl who spoke last night (the Earl of Longford) went so far as to say that there was not a regiment in the Service in an efficient condition. He (Viscount Bury) would not go that length; but he must say they were not in a position which had been so long promised. They were not, in the case of a small war, able to put an Army Corps into the field. In the event of a large war, there were legislative provisions which they could put into operation to enable them to raise a Force; but in regard to a small war, they were very little better off than they were in 1877. They were still in a transition state, and would have, in case of necessity, to resort to the system which had been denounced by the late Adjutant General Sir Charles Ellice as the most pernicious system which had ever been invented by the ingenuity of man—namely, to call upon men to volunteer from one regiment to another, and thus to leave the already attenuated home regiments still further emasculated. The noble Earl opposite would, no doubt, say that a great deal had been done since Mr. Childers and he had been in Office, and he (Viscount Bury) was not going to deny it. He believed they had improved the condition of the Army; but he would go so far as to say, without fear of contradiction, that there was not one officer in 100—nay, not one officer in the whole Army—who thoroughly understood the position in which the Army stood at the present moment, so much confusion having been created by different Acts of Parliament, Royal Warrants, General Orders, and other Regulations. Those details were only known to those within the War Office, and he doubted if they were known to half-a-dozen even in that Department. They had now a new Army, for the old had entirely disappeared. The system, too, of Indian reliefs had been so altered that they had now a local Army in India, and the system of promotion had been altered so as to fit in with the short service. He did not wish to put a definite Resolution which would produce a debate; but he wished to explain to his noble Friend the difficulties under which those who took an interest in the Army laboured. The public also took an interest in the Army; but that interest would be increased if they could follow, in an intelligible manner, the changes which had been made during the last 10 years. He wished, therefore, to ask his noble Friend (the Earl of Morley) whether it would not be possible to issue a Memorandum, showing the various changes which had been made since Lord Cardwell introduced the short service system, and showing the effect of all the Acts of Parliament bearing on the Army, all the recommendations of Committees and Commissions, and the suggestions which had been made in their Office in reference to the Army, in order to show, at a glance, the actual condition of the Army?

No doubt, many Ministerial speeches had been made on the subject of Army reform; but they necessarily lacked the value of an official Paper such as he suggested.

THE EARL OF MORLEY said, he was sure their Lordships would not find fault with his noble Friend (Viscount Bury) for taking that opportunity of bringing those matters before the House. He quite agreed with his noble Friend as to the desirability of making the changes which had been, and which were being made in the Army intelligible alike to officers and to the public. As to the importance of being able on brief notice to place a small Army in the field, there could be no doubt about it, and the object of the War Office had been to place the battalions not at the strength they would be at in time of war, but at a higher strength, which would give a margin, allowing untrained or unfit men to be left at home, and yet having a full-strength battalion fit for foreign service. It had been the wish of the Government to bring about such a state of things as that; and if they had not as yet succeeded it would be admitted that the battalions had been much improved in strength, and that generally they were in a state of transition. They had been so since 1871, and it was inevitable that it should be so until the short service system, and the changes of organization which resulted from its adoption, had come thoroughly into effect. Steps which had recently been taken had been in the direction pointed out by the Predecessors of the present Government, and with a natural and necessary result of what had been initiated by Lord Cardwell, and lately developed by Lord Cranbrook and Colonel Stanley. At the present time the Government were endeavouring to carry out a most important change, which would give them a certain number of battalions ready to go abroad at short notice. Lord Cardwell's system, it was said, was based on the assumption that when one battalion was abroad another would be at home; but it also embraced the supposition that the battalions at the top of the Roster should be of a certain strength; but for various reasons—and he (the Earl of Morley) did not blame one Government more than another—the conditions on which the noble Lord had based his calculation, no doubt, had not been rigidly adhered to. The War Office saw the importance of keeping the battalions comprised in the First Army Corps always fit for service. But those battalions could not be brought up to their new establishments and rendered efficient by a stroke of the pen. To increase their strength it was necessary to pour recruits into them—that was the only course which could be pursued; and consequently at the present time, no doubt, the proportion of young soldiers in the high-strength battalions at home was greater than was desirable, and their condition could not be regarded as quite satisfactory. That difficulty had been aggravated by the fact that the changes of organization had necessitated alterations in the Roster, bringing weaker battalions suddenly higher up on the Roster. It could only be remedied by time. Soldiers serving in the First Army Corps would not be sent to the Reserve before completing seven years' service, and by degrees the battalions would harden into efficiency; and when the temporary circumstances referred to, which necessitated rapid recruiting, had passed away, he hoped and believed that the object which all parties wished to attain would be gained—namely, they would have a number of battalions sufficient to constitute a small Army for sudden emergencies, or for small Colonial wars, fit to take the field at very short notice. As to there having been no discussion on the condition of the Army, the noble Viscount rather exaggerated the state of the case. Almost all the great changes that had been carried out of late years had been ably discussed and ably criticized, and if they had not, it was not the fault of the Government who had carried them into effect. He thought that, from the discussions which had taken place with regard to recent reforms, they met with the approval of the public generally, and it was only fair that time should be given for the development of the changes which they had already effected. How far it would be possible to carry out the suggestion of his noble Friend, by drawing up a Memorandum showing all the changes that had been introduced since 1871, and collating them with the recommendations of the various Committees and Commissions which had sat upon the subject, he could not at present say; but he would take an opportunity of talking over the subject with him, and would see what could be done.

The Earl of Morley

Motion agreed to.

House in Committee accordingly.

EARL FORTESCUE pointed out that last Session he had given Notice of a Motion for a Return as to the impressment of means of transport for soldiers in Ireland, under certain ancient statutory powers empowering the Executive in Ireland to authorize the impressment of horses and animals of all kinds, together with vehicles and boats of all descriptions, for the service of Her Majesty, under an order of emergency, enabling any field officer to impress any of these at a reasonable price. To his surprise, last year he (Earl Fortescue) was requested to abstain from so moving by the noble Under Secretary of State for War (the Earl of Morley), by the direction of the Secretary of State (Mr. Childers), who considered it undesirable for the Public Service to introduce the Motion at that time. It seemed to him that the moral effect produced by the spectacle of a car owner being allowed successfully to refuse the use of cars to troops, without recourse being instantly had to the powers conferred by statute upon the Executive to enable the officers to impress them, could not fail to have the worst influence, by encouraging the spirit of defiance to the law, and bringing contempt upon the Executive in the minds of people of all classes. He read with shame and indignation accounts of soldiers and constabulary, weary and way-worn, marching along the road, while jeering Land Leaguers drove beside them in cars which had been refused to them. He wished to ask whether, during the past year, since he gave Notice of his Motion, the powers of the Government in that respect had been exercised at all? Turning to another subject, he would like to have some information about the localization scheme, as to how it was likely to work in Ireland. Owing to the influence it exercised in encouraging recruiting, it, no doubt, answered admirably in loyal districts—that was, he was glad to say, throughout all England, Wales, and Scotland; but it might not be as safely applied to the county of Tipperary in Ireland. He desired to cast no imputation whatever on the regiment in question, long recruited from different parts of Ireland, which, ever since the time of William III. had been conspicuous for its loyalty. He hoped, however, that the Government would not, for the sake of symmetry and uniformity, commit the rash act of exclusively recruiting for an Irish regiment in a district far from well affected to the English Crown and to the maintenance of law and order.

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE said, he fully concurred with what had been said by the noble Earl opposite (Earl Fortescue). When the new system of recruiting particular regiments from particular districts only was introduced, he had stated that in parts of Ireland it would result in forming a rebel army. He questioned, in the present disturbed state of Ireland, when they saw the people so disaffected as they were at present, whether it would not be a most unfortunate thing that recruiting should be carried on in districts in which there was no concealment of the disaffection that existed. He wished to call attention to another thing, and that was to the fact that soldiers were being sent about in Ireland in twos and threes to give protection to those who were in danger, and there was much fear of their being altogether demoralized. If it was said that only the old and steady men were taken for this service, and not raw recruits, it was quite clear that the steady men were just those who were required with their regiments to set the recruits a good example. Policemen were also sent with the soldiers; and he wished to know who would command a party consisting of two policemen and two soldiers? Such occurrences could not tend to increase the discipline of the Army or of the Police.

House resumed.

Bill reported without amendment; and to be read 3^d on Thursday next.

HIGHWAY RATES.

OBSERVATIONS. QUESTION.

EARL DE LA WARR said, that, in putting the Question to Her Majesty's Government of which he had given Notice, he might, perhaps, be allowed to refer for one moment to a statement made by the Prime Minister in "another place," from which it might be gathered that the only advantage which rate-payers were likely to gain from the long-expected amendment of the Highway Acts would be the appropriation of a certain sum, amounting to about £247,000, to the purposes of highways, to be raised by increasing the tax upon private carriages. The boon would be not a very considerable one, especially as a large proportion of the increased tax would be paid by the owners of property who were already the overburdened class; while hired carriages, which, as had been admitted by the Prime Minister, used the roads, were exempted. In like manner, also, brewers' drays and other heavy vehicles engaged in trade would escape contribution in any shape towards the maintenance of highways. He might, therefore, be allowed to ask whether the proposed subvention was to be applied to all highways, or only to what were designated as main roads; whether highway districts were to be left in their present unsatisfactory state, many of which had been dissolved, or were in process of dissolution, in consequence of the prevailing dissatisfaction with regard to them; or whether the Act of 1878 was to remain in force without any Amendment? If Her Majesty's Government proposed to do no more than grant the subvention of a portion of the Carriage Tax, he believed it would be more satisfactory to the country if the Highway Act of 1878 were repealed, and the management of highways were to return to what it was before the passing of that Act, until the Government were able to deal more effectually with the question. He would conclude by asking the Question of which he had given Notice—namely, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce any measure this Session on the subject of highways?

EARL GRANVILLE, in reply, said, he would call attention to the fact that the noble Earl (Earl De La Warr) had put down his Question before the Financial Statement of Government had been made; and, therefore, before he could possibly have known what would be said by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in "another place." He believed it would be necessary for a measure to be introduced in "another place" to give effect to the intentions of his right hon. Friend, and then the noble Earl would be enabled to see what those intentions were.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—
WORKING OF THE ACT.

PRESENTATION OF PETITION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF LONGFORD, according to Notice, presented a Petition from owners of land and others living in Ireland, containing the three following points:—

“1. Your Petitioners humbly pray, that the principles adopted by the Land Commissioners in the assessment of fair rents may as soon as possible be made public.

“2. Your Petitioners respectfully submit that while the operation of the Land Act of 1881 is necessarily of an arbitrary character, the inconvenience arising from such inherent defect would be minimized by a declaration of the principles adopted in its administration.

“3. That the speedy and ultimate result of such a declaration would be great acceleration in the application of the Act, lessening the number of appeals, multiplying the cases settled out of court,” and said, that the matter had, to a certain extent, been dealt with during the discussion of a kindred subject on the previous evening, for many of the observations made to their Lordships then would apply extremely well to that Petition. If the subject were not so serious, there was something almost partaking of the nature of a comedy in the notion that after an Act had occupied three months of discussion during last Session, and had been several months in operation, it should now be thought necessary to consider upon what principles it ought to be administered; but the present Petitioners, of whom he himself was one, found it absolutely necessary to ask for some information upon the subject, though he was afraid they would ask in vain. The Petitioners included landed proprietors who had cases before the Land Courts, and landed proprietors who were likely to find themselves in the position of those who had charges upon lands and were anxious about their security, and also outsiders, who were astonished at the new system of conveyancing and the novel proceedings sanctioned by the Land Act. They had closely examined the Act, but were utterly unable to discover upon what principle it was supposed to work. They had followed the decisions of the Land Court, and were equally unable to discover a principle. The legal points were, indeed, principally almost entirely disposed of by the Superior Commissioners; but the instances were so rare in which the Superior Commissioners had interfered with the judicial rents fixed by the Assistant Commissioners, that practically, so far as regards the fixing of rent, the Assistant Commissioners were the ruling powers. The names of the Assistant Commissioners were not inserted in the Act; but he (the Earl of Longford) was satisfied that if their names had been before Parliament at the time the Act was under discussion, Parliament would have hesitated placing in such hands the extensive powers they now exercised. They might, perhaps, have been competent to deal with small properties, or cases of extravagant rents; but their jurisdiction extended over properties of large value. The reasons for some of their decisions were of an extraordinary kind. In one case the rent was reduced on account of the good character of the tenant. In a case in the county of Roscommon, the rent was reduced because the tenant was honest and industrious. It seemed rather a caricature on Irish life that when an instance was found of a tenant being honest and industrious his rent should be at once reduced. Probably, it was because they thought an honest and industrious man in that condition of Ireland so rare a thing that it justified them in giving him a slice of somebody else's estate. One Sub-Commissioner had, indeed, stated that he acted throughout on a consistent principle, but he kept the secret to himself; and he (the Earl of Longford) was not aware that any other Court made such a confession as that. He admitted that, as a general rule, the proceedings of the Land Court were conducted with patience and good order, though there were exceptions where the people had been warmed up by the approach of their liberators, and then the decisions of the Court were racy of the soil. If Parliament had acceded to the view that a general reduction of rent was desirable, they would have submitted to its decision; but the Government and Parliament did the reverse. They said the rents were not generally extravagant, and that, on the whole, no general reduction of rents would be effected by the Act. That, however, had not been found to be the case; for wherever the property in Ireland was situated, whether it was rich pasture or mountain moorland, it had all been brought into the Land Court, and the result was uniformly the same—a reduction of rent, notwithstanding the plainest proofs that it was already of the fairest possible character. Again, if the Government had said they thought it desirable to have a re-valuation of property, that would have been an intelligible principle, from which they could gather what the mind of Parliament was; but they had no guide whatever. The Petitioners did not come denouncing the Land Act; but they expressed the wish to facilitate the working of the Act by coming to arrangements out of Court, provided they could understand that such arrangements were necessary. Their Petition was that, as Parliament had imposed that Act of Parliament upon them, they should explain to them what the Act was, and on what principle it was to be administered. That was a request which no one could regard as unreasonable; and he trusted that, from some quarter or other, they would have some explanation given them that would prove satisfactory. He should have been very glad to have urged further arguments in their behalf; but he had been really forestalled by the discussion which had taken place on the subject last night.

Earl Granville

Petition for a speedy declaration of the principles adopted in the administration of the Act by the Land Commissioners in Ireland; of Owners of Land and others living in Ireland, or interested in its welfare; read.

LORD DUNSANY said, that, in his opinion, nothing could be more reasonable than for the land proprietors, or ex-land proprietors of Ireland, as they might be more properly called, to ask to be informed on what tenure they held the small shred of ownership, as regarded their property in land, that remained to them. He, for one, would like to know on what principle the Land Act was being administered? He had not the slightest notion, at the present moment, to whom the land belonged. It used to be called "real property;" but, in his opinion, it constituted at present about the most unreal investment that could be found. What was to be the new title for it? Lord Dufferin had written that in no other country but Ireland did such a state of things exist as that a landlord, who had let his land on reasonable conditions to-day, did not know to whom it would pass to-morrow. No one could doubt that the Act had proved a failure; and he did not know that it would be more consolatory, if it had succeeded, instead of having failed, since success might have led to further experiments in bribing the many with the property of the few, and then the present miserable state of Ireland would have been still more deplorable. Last year they had conceded the three F's, and now they had received in return for them the three R's—roguery, robbery, and rapine. But the policy by which those three R's were secured to Ireland had not even the recommendation of success. If it was necessary that the Irish landlords should be robbed, it was only reasonable they should know the principle upon which they were to be so.

LORD CARLINGFORD said, that the speech which they had just heard, with every word of which he entirely disagreed, and the panic of which he hoped would soon pass away from men's minds, though he could not undertake to say whether or not it would pass away from the mind of the noble Lord opposite (Lord Dunsany)—that speech was just nine months too late. It ought to have been delivered before the Land Act of 1881 passed their Lordships' House, and he would not discuss it at the present time. But he wished to say one word with respect to the Petition presented by the noble Earl (the Earl of Longford). It was, in fact, a Petition to Parliament for further legislation; it was a Petition which requested Parliament to amend and alter the Land Act of last year in a most important respect—namely, with regard to the definition of fair rent. The question whether any principles for the ascertainment of fair rent should be laid down by the Legislature was considered by both Houses of Parliament last year; and it was deliberately decided by Parliament that beyond the terms of the 8th section of the Act no attempt should be made to lay down any such principles. He might point out to the noble Earl that the Government had not given any recommendation to the Land Commission as to the adoption or renouncement of any principles. If the Land Commission were to be invited to declare the principles upon which they proceeded, they would probably point to the Act of Parliament, and would say that they were doing their best under the terms of the Act to ascertain in each case, in a way very closely analogous to a Court of Arbitration, what was a fair rent, either by inspection by the Sub-Commissioners, or by the employment of valuers, in addition to the evidence on both sides. They would also say, no doubt, that whenever any important case of law arose, that case was decided by the Courts of Appeal, and that all the inferior Land Courts were absolutely bound by such decision. If, however, they were invited to go beyond some such statement as that, and to declare what they considered to be the principle for ascertaining a fair rent, they would point out that Parliament itself had absolutely refused to lay down such a principle; and they would say that until Parliament had further legislated and amended the Act of 1881, they could hardly be expected to do what Parliament had not done.

Petition ordered to lie upon the Table.

CRIMINAL LAW—THE CONDEMNED CONVICT LAMSON.

QUESTION. MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN, in rising to ask the Government the Question of which he had given Notice with respect to the Lamson case, said, after a long and patient trial, George Henry Lamson was convicted of a most deliberate and cruel murder on a helpless, crippled boy; and the learned Judge who passed upon him the extreme sentence of the law expressed his full concurrence with the verdict and his deep abhorrence of the crime. The prisoner had the good fortune to be defended most fully and ably by some of the most eminent counsel at the Criminal Bar, and they, no doubt, after full consideration and consultation with the prisoner's friends, resolved not to raise the plea of insanity, probably thinking it hopeless; and the sole question left to the jury was whether Percy John was murdered by George Henry Lamson, the result being that the jury declared their firm conviction that he was. After the trial, as was now always the case on such occasions, an attempt was made by the friends of the condemned man to obtain from the Secretary of State for the Home Department a remission of the extreme penalty of the law on the ground of the prisoner's insanity; but that functionary, in the face of the recent trial and sentence by the learned Judge, most properly declined to interfere. Such was the state of affairs with regard to this matter, until some two or three days before the date fixed for the execution of the sentence, when the country was astounded by the intelligence that the Secretary of State, at the request of the President of the United States, conveyed through the noble Earl at the Foreign Office (Earl Granville), had determined to postpone the execution of the sentence for 10 days, in order to obtain some further evidence from America with regard to the prisoner's insanity. Although perfectly satisfied with the justice and propriety of the verdict, the Secretary of State had allowed a foreign Government to interfere in this absolutely English question with the due course of the Criminal Law. That had been done at the instance of a Government which prided itself upon its Monroe doctrine, and would refuse to permit the smallest interference on the part of any European Government, not only with its own internal affairs, but with anything affecting the two vast Continents of North and South America. He (the Earl of Milltown) was far from wishing to say anything offensive to the citizens—for the most part their kinsmen—of that great Transatlantic Republic, for which he felt the greatest respect and the most unbounded admiration. No other country more strenuously resented such interference than the United States; and he could not help thinking that if, during the trial of Guiteau, the Government of this or any other country had requested that a trial which had become, in his (the Earl of Milltown's) opinion, and in the opinion of many other persons as well, a positive scandal to civilization, should be conducted with some regard to decency, they would have been most properly met by the Government of the United States telling them to mind their own business. It was true that our Government never thought either of remonstrating or interfering in the slightest degree in that trial; and, therefore, such was the answer which he ventured to submit should have been given by the noble Earl opposite, though in the courteous language of diplomacy, to the President of the United States. But even supposing that this American evidence as to the insanity of Lamson was of the strongest possible description, it could, he submitted, in no way affect the issue tried at the Old Bailey. Whether he or his ancestors had or had not shown symptoms of insanity, America could not affect the question whether, at the time he committed the murder, he was responsible for his own acts. Reference was made by the Judge, in the trial of Maclean for the atrocious crime of shooting at the Queen, to the principles laid down in M'Naughten's trial, that it was the duty of the jury to say whether the person charged was insane at the time of the offence; and the test was whether he could then distinguish right from wrong; and he (the Earl of Milltown) thought it equally applied to this case. There was another dilemma. If the Secretary of State were to set aside the verdict of the jury and the opinion of the learned Judge, was he to send the murderer forth into the world, or was he to mitigate his sentence to penal servitude? As to confining him as a criminal lunatic, he did not believe that a man whom a jury had found guilty of murder, and who had not been acquitted on the ground of insanity, could be so confined. Besides that, the proceedings in this case were positively cruel, and the last respite reminded him of nothing so much as of a cat playing with a mouse. He hoped the Government would not yield to the arrogant and presumptuous interference of the United States, which was inconsistent with the dignity of this country, and would, if submitted to, create a dangerous precedent for them and their successors. He would, in conclusion, ask the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether there is any existing precedent of a Foreign Government having interfered to arrest a judgment pronounced on a British subject by an English court of justice for a crime committed in England of which he had been found guilty by a regularly constituted jury; and, if not, whether the Secretary of State will inform the House what are the reasons which have induced Her Majesty's Government to accede to such an interference on the part of the President of the United States in the case of the convict Lamson? and would also move for copies of all the correspondence that has taken place with the United States Government on the subject.

Lord Carlingford

Moved, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for copies of all the correspondence that has taken place with the United States Government on the subject of the postponement of the execution of the sentence passed upon the convict Lamson."—(The Earl of Milltown.)

VISCOUNT MIDLETON said, he did not desire to enter into the details of the question before the House, but wished to call attention to a state of things which made a single individual—though that individual was a Secretary of State—the sole quarter whence remissions of sentence in cases of such magnitude proceeded. He would ask whether what had happened did not form the strongest possible argument in favour of a Court of Appeal, before which such cases should be judicially decided? He hoped the Government would be induced by the facts of the case either to institute some inquiry into the present system, or to introduce some measure for the establishment of an Appeal Court in such cases as that of Lamson.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I do not think I am called upon to answer the Question which has been put to me by the noble Viscount who spoke last (Viscount Midleton). It most certainly raises a very important issue; but, for myself, I would say that I have very great doubt whether it would be easy to find a practical and good substitute for the present arrangement. With regard to the Motion of the noble Earl (the Earl of Milltown), I have no objection to it as it stands; but, under the circumstances, it possibly might be more regular that I should postpone any discussion of the question until the Papers are in your Lordships' hands. But, considering the courtesy the noble Earl has already shown me, I would ask your Lordships to be allowed to give a very short answer to the Question he has put to me. The first part of the Question is, whether there is any existing precedent of a Foreign Government having interfered to arrest a judgment pronounced on a British subject by an English court of justice for a crime committed in England of which he had been found guilty by a regularly constituted jury? The second is contingent upon my answer—namely, that, if there is no precedent, whether I will state the reasons for the course that has been followed? I remember the late Lord John Russell once telling me that which often happened in Parliament—that you gave the best possible reasons for a thing without producing any effect; but if you could say that a thing had been done in the time of Queen Elizabeth, the thing was settled. With regard to precedents, all I have to say is, that it is a thing of very constant occurrence that foreign Governments should interfere with regard to persons under the sentence of a Judicial Court; and if I may find a precedent of not only what a foreign Government has done, but of what we have done in foreign countries, I take as a type what happened, as I daresay the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Salisbury) recollects, in 1877, when the German Ambassador made an appeal in behalf of two Germans, one of whom was sentenced to imprisonment for unlawfully wounding—

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: It was in Lord Derby's time that this occurred, not in mine.

EARL GRANVILLE: The other was sentenced to penal servitude for forgery. The noble Lord who then presided at the Foreign Office did not show the slightest resentment at the interference, though Sir R. Assheton Cross decided, after a full investigation of the circumstances, that there were no grounds for the revision of the sentences. And I think that is really the thing that makes the whole difference. Were it assumed, in the slightest degree, that that was an interference, on the part either of the United States or of Germany, with the action of our Municipal Law, I think there are no words too strong to express our resentment at such interference. In this case before your Lordships, I feel there is no assumption of that sort. Formerly, in this country, after a criminal had been condemned to death the execution took place almost immediately. In later times a considerable period was allowed to elapse, for the express purpose of enabling the Secretary of State to consider any circumstances which might appear from their nature to be desirable to lay before the Sovereign with regard to the exercise of the Prerogative of Mercy. Now, this term of a fortnight is generally amply sufficient for circumstances confined to this country; but in cases where a person has been in Canada, or in India, or in one of our large Colonies, and there are circumstances connected with those places, a greater time has been given; and I own I think the Secretary of State for the Home Department would have taken a grave responsibility on himself if he had entirely refused to consider information which the American Secretary of State guaranteed to be of a bond fide and important character, and on which he had been advised by the highest legal authority of the country. In reference to what has fallen from the noble Earl, as to the cruelty of the proceedings, I think the argument has been pushed a little too far. If I were sentenced to be hanged to-morrow, and this alternative had been offered to me, I do not think I should have quarrelled with it on the score of humanity. I am glad to have had the opportunity of stating, in the most clear manner, that we should resent, as affecting the dignity of this country, any interference on the part of a foreign Government with the course of English law. But here we have merely the fact of information given and stated on high authority to be of an important character; and I should hardly like myself to refuse to foreign Governments the same power with reference to their subjects in this country which we have frequently claimed on behalf of our own subjects abroad.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that, in his opinion, his noble Friend behind him (the Earl of Milltown) was justified in bringing this subject before the consideration of the House. The manner in which the Secretary of State for the Home Department had exercised his powers in respect to the Prerogative of Mercy was not a matter usually discussed in that House; but the Question of the noble Earl raised considerations affecting our national independence. At the same time, he did not think it was possible to form any judgment till the Papers were before their Lordships which the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville) had promised. It was impossible to lay down a rule that we would not listen to the suggestions of any foreign Government in regard to criminal sentences, especially in the case of a man born, as Lamson was, on American soil. We could not do so without laying down a rule with respect to other Governments which we did not observe ourselves. There were many cases showing that this country was not sparing in its efforts in that direction, and sometimes we were a great plague to foreign Governments in our interferences on behalf of British subjects. On the other hand, it was perfectly conceivable that the American Government might have interfered in an improper manner, and might make claims which could not be entertained on the ground of their inadequacy. But, as he had already observed, it was impossible to form any judgment on that point till they had the Papers before them. Perhaps some prejudices had been raised upon that matter, and a greater sensitiveness generated by two circumstances. One was the mere synchronism with certain cases of American interference on behalf of other persons detained in another part of Her Majesty's Dominions, with respect to whom there would be much to say when the question came before their Lordships. But, besides, there was the objection to the punishment of death largely prevalent in some countries, and especially in America; and there was a fear that if such interference were to become a precedent, it might be used, not for purposes which ought to be present to the mind of a Secretary of State, but for the purpose of forwarding the particular notion that the punishment of death ought not to be inflicted. Of course, if there was any interference on the part of foreign Governments, such as that of suggesting to this country the kind of punishment by which we ought to visit particular offences, it would very properly be resented as unsuited to the dignity and independence of the country. As, however, the case appeared at present, and subject to any considerations that might arise out of the Papers to be presented, he did not see that there was any ground for censuring the action of the Home Secretary.

Earl Granville

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that the subject of a Court of Criminal Appeal was a very important one; and it would, no doubt, receive from Parliament the consideration which its importance deserved, whenever it might be brought forward. But the noble Viscount (Viscount Midleton) was mistaken in supposing that an improvement in such cases as this would necessarily be effected by the establishment of a Court of Criminal Appeal. It must be manifest that delay and suspense would be among the inevitable consequences—delay probably greater than had taken place in the present instance. It was also a mistake to suppose that by such a Court you would get rid of the Prerogative of Mercy in the Crown, and the duty of the responsible Minister to advise the Crown as to the exercise of that Prerogative. It was part of the duty of the Secretary of State to advise the Crown as to the exercise of that Prerogative upon grounds which no Court of Appeal, or, indeed, Court of Law whatever, could entertain—namely, upon the view which he might take of the moral importance of circumstances which were not, and could not be in any sense, legal evidence. On the other hand, to establish a Court to deal with matters which never could form the subject-matter of legal evidence would be contrary to all sound principles of legislation. If a Court of Criminal Appeal were established, it must proceed upon legal evidence, and upon that alone.

Motion agreed to.

Resolved, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for copies of all the correspondence that has taken place with the United States Government on the subject of the postponement of the execution of the sentence passed upon the convict Lamson.

STATE OF IRELAND—THREATENING LETTERS.

OBSERVATIONS. QUESTION.

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY, in rising to ask the Question of which he had given Notice, said, he was quite well enough aware that it was not customary for a Member of their Lordships' House to take notice of an expression used in debate in the other House of Parliament; but he thought that when a sentiment which he might describe as of a novel and unprecedented character, such as that given effect to by the Prime Minister in the other House some short time since, was made, he should be pardoned if he brought it under the notice of their Lordships. It so happened that a few days after their Lordships' House had adjourned for the Easter Recess, he was in a somewhat remote part of Scotland, where he read the speech of the Prime Minister, and the thought struck him at once that the speech would be also read throughout the length and breadth of Ireland, and that it must necessarily have the most disastrous effect. It seemed to him there were two points specially deserving of attention in this paragraph of the Prime Minister's speech. The first was, whether it was consistent with propriety that anyone, however exalted his position, should venture to criticize the words of a learned Judge in the administration of the law; and the second was, whether the sentiment given effect to was one of itself of propriety? He felt much inclined to advert to such observations as justification of what the Prime Minister termed "land-hunger," or, again, the special line of demarcation between "social" and "political" revolution; but on this occasion he would limit himself to those parts of the speech incorporated in his Question. He certainly had hitherto been under the impression that it was the first duty of the First Minister of the Crown to uphold the dignity of the law. He was further under the impression that it was also the duty of the First Minister of the Crown to uphold the authority of the administrators of the law; and, further, he thought it was the duty of the Prime Minister, no less than of every other subject of the Realm, to accept—he might almost say with sanctity—every word which fell from the lips of a learned Judge on the Bench. It was on that account that he had ventured to put this Question to the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, as the highest functionary in that learned Profession of which he was himself such a distinguished ornament. In allusion to his Question, he was not going to say that every murder or attempted murder in Ireland during the last 18 months had been preceded by a threatening letter. Indeed, his (the Earl of Galloway's) own brother-in-law, who had the management of the Irish property of a noble Member of their Lordships' House, had several months ago received a threatening letter; but he was thankful to say that, at present, his life had not been taken, nor, as far as he was aware, had it been attempted. But their Lordships were aware that more than one murder had been actually perpetrated as well as attempted in Ireland, which had been preceded by a threatening letter. Therefore, he thought it was a matter of the most serious importance for anyone in the position of the First Minister of the Crown to venture to give expression to such a sentiment as that to which he had now referred. He did not wish to say anything unnecessarily harsh as regarded Mr. Gladstone; but, at the same time, he ventured to express it as his firm belief that if anyone else, in the whole civilized part of the globe, had ventured to utter such a sentiment he would have been stigmatized by the whole of the public Press as the very reverse of a human being. He would make no further comment than that it was high time to stop such reprehensible language. He must, however, be permitted to point out that the statement was directly contrary to the fact; for, by two recent Statutes—namely, 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 50, amended by 27 & 28 Vict. c. 47, s. 2—"Sending letters, threatening to burn or destroy houses, or kill, maim, or wound cattle," &c., was stated to be felony, punishable by penal servitude "not exceeding ten, and not less than five years." And, again, 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 16, amended by 27 & 28 Vict. c. 47, s. 2—"Sending letters, threatening to murder, felony, punishable by penal servitude not exceeding ten, and not less than five years." It was a curious thing that at the time these Statutes were passed—namely, in 1861 and 1864—the Prime Minister occupied the same position as he did now—that of Chancellor of the Exchequer—and, therefore, he might be quite accurately described as a co-author of the very Statutes which he had now denounced. He felt that he owed some apology to the noble and learned Lord for having framed the Question so as to suggest that he thought it possible his Lordship could have any sympathy whatever with this, which he (the Earl of Galloway) considered a most hideous sentiment uttered by the Prime Minister. It would hardly be necessary for the noble and learned Lord to disavow that; but he hoped his Lordship would be able to inform the House that Mr. Gladstone had already expressed the deepest contrition for the expression; and had further explained that it was only one more of those innumerable instances of that helter-skelter, reckless as well as vilifying volubility, which so poisoned the air of Mid Lothian in the month of December, 1879, and again in the month of March, 1880, the natural—nay, the inevitable fruits of which, he regretted to think, they were now reaping in the present distracted and semi-barbarous state of Ireland. In conclusion, he begged, in the terms of his Notice, to ask the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, Whether he is prepared to endorse the sentiment reported in the public journals to have been expressed by the Prime Minister on the eve of the Easter Recess in regard to the state of Ireland; viz., that “threatening letters” . . . “falling into the category of serious crimes” (and again) . . . “falling into the class of serious criminal offences” . . . “is an overstatement on the part of the judge”; who, in the person of Chief Justice Morris, had been quoted to have made a statement of such general import in a court of justice?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, the noble Earl (the Earl of Gallo-way) commenced his speech by admitting that it is not very usual in this House to enter upon questions as to what may have been said in the other House of Parliament by particular Members of that House; but I am afraid that, with the example of last night and of to-night before you, your Lordships will be of opinion that that practice is in danger of becoming more usual than it has heretofore been. I cannot think that it is a very convenient practice to put to a Minister in this House Questions as to what has been reported in the newspapers to have been said by another Minister in the other House; and if anything could make that practice more inconvenient, it would be to put a Question in the form proposed by the noble Earl upon the Paper, and then to follow it up by a discursive speech, in which reference is made to the Mid Lothian Campaign, and to the great facilities of oratory which is possessed by the Prime Minister, and a great many other matters, as to which no Notice had been given. The noble Earl said he would not allude to other parts of the same speech, because he had not given any Notice of asking a Question upon them; but, while disclaiming that intention, he had, in fact, done more than allude to them. With regard to the Question addressed to me by the noble Earl, I am not prepared to inform the House that the Prime Minister has expressed the deepest contrition for anything which he has said, neither am I prepared to endorse the statement of the noble Earl that the Prime Minister has ever given utterance, or intended to do so, to anything that can be described as most hideous, to use the words of the noble Earl. In truth, the noble Earl has, I think, misunderstood what the Prime Minister really said. Last night a misconstruction was put upon the words of the Prime Minister; but to-night his language has been still more seriously misinterpreted. I entirely agree that, by the two Acts of Parliament to which the noble Earl has referred, the offence of sending letters threatening to commit murder, arson, or other grave offences are not only made crimes, but are made crimes of a very serious character; and these crimes and offences, in the present disturbed state of Ireland, should be treated as being very serious, and liable to be visited, according to the difference in particular cases, with serious punishment. Therefore, I have no hesitation in saying that no exception can be taken to any words of the learned Judge, in which he may have spoken of threatening letters as falling into the category of serious crimes, and I do not believe that Mr. Gladstone ever intended to take any such exception. I will take the liberty of explaining what I believe he really intended by what he said on this subject. As a matter of fact, most unhappily, offences falling within this category have become very numerous of late, and they differ very much among themselves in point of gravity. Some—a small proportion—are doubtless connected with heinous offences, either actually perpetrated, or of which the perpetration is really meditated by the writers; but the great majority are not, in truth, of that character; and although the circumstances of Ireland make it necessary to legislate against all such offences as a class, yet when we are referring to them, not for the purpose of administering the Criminal Law, but with the object of classifying the statistics of Irish crime in discussions before Parliament, it becomes of importance to distinguish between them and outrages against life and property of a heinous character.

Accordingly, when in this House and in the House of Commons, in order to arrive at a correct view of the comparative state of Ireland at different periods, the statistics of crime in that country are referred to, it has always been found necessary to separate this class of offences from the more heinous offences of actual outrage and violence against person and property, and not to bring them all into one class; because the value of those statistics for Parliamentary purposes would be greatly vitiated if the whole number of cases in which threatening letters had been sent were included, without any discrimination, under the head of heinous offences. Although the law properly treats the sending of threatening letters as a serious offence, it is not to be put upon a par with actual outrage, such as murder, attempt to murder, shooting into a dwelling-house, and destruction of property. Mr. Gladstone, when he used the words attributed to him, was speaking from that point of view; and it was in a comparative, and not in a positive sense, that he took exception to what had fallen from some other Members of the other House of Parliament, who had not made that distinction between the most serious criminal offences and the other class, numerically very much greater, but a large proportion of which was not of so important or serious a character. Mr. Gladstone did not take upon himself to criticize the language of the learned Judge, neither did he go out of his way for that purpose; but, as I understand the matter, a Member of the other House, in referring to the expressions of the learned Judge, interpreted them in a manner which Mr. Gladstone, rightly or wrongly, considered to be an overstatement. I do not believe that Mr. Gladstone had any intention whatever to show the slightest disrespect to the learned Judge or to criticize his statement. I do not believe that Mr. Gladstone had seen the whole context of the language used by the learned Judge; but he was commenting upon the speech of another Member of the House of Commons, who had pressed into his service the expressions which were used by the learned Judge. I am perfectly satisfied that Mr. Gladstone never intended to express any opinion which could encourage any person to suppose that he regarded this class of offences as anything less than serious, although, in estimating the present state of Ireland, he did not think that they should be brought into the same class, or regarded as being of the same character, as the most heinous crimes.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, I sympathize with the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack at the constant imposition upon him of the task of having to explain the meaning of the words of the Prime Minister. I feel the gravity of that task, and how gladly the noble and learned Lord would escape from it. Mr. Gladstone's language has this happy peculiarity that, while it is capable of inciting to acts of violence in Ireland and of arousing the most dangerous passions and feelings of the people of that country, it is also capable, under the subtle handling of the noble and learned Lord, of bearing a comparatively innocent construction. I must, however, take exception to the ruling of the noble and learned Lord when he says that we should take no notice of the language used in the other House. Since I have been in this House I have always understood that to deal with language used by Members of the other House was irregular, with this exception—if the Member of Parliament was a Minister of the Crown. If it were not so, we should be debarred from asking notice politically of many of the most important statements that are made, and from passing our judgment upon the action, and upon the grounds stated for that action, by the occupants of the most important Departments of the State. The noble and learned Lord, I think, strained his well-known power in attempting to establish that Mr. Gladstone had not spoken lightly of this particular class of offences. What Mr. Gladstone said was this—and I wish to repeat it in the presence of those who have heard the noble and learned Lord's statement. The Prime Minister said—

“ I think it is an over-statement on the part of the hon. and learned Member, or on the part of the Judge whose language and sentiments he has adopted, to describe threatening letters as falling into the class of serious criminal offences.”

Now, what are threatening letters in the present disturbed state of Ireland? They are the machinery by which all the present occult government of Ireland is maintained—they are the instruments by which all the decrees of the Land League, of the Fenians, and of the Riband conspirators of Ireland are enforced upon the reluctant farmers. What test will you adopt to estimate the seriousness of a criminal offence? Do you not ask whether it interferes with the liberty and safety of individuals, with their peace of mind, and brings about the prostration of their industries? It is the threatening letters which maintain a state of panic in the country, which prevent men from pursuing their ordinary avocations in peace and security, and which give terrible width and effect to the crimes which are perpetrated by order of these secret organizations. It is through these threatening letters that the criminals who control the action of persons and destroy the liberty of a large class in Ireland are able to act in the districts which are dominated by their criminal action. Considered in the light of their effects upon the tranquillity of the country and the liberty of individuals, these threats to murder are most serious criminal offences; and it will have no salutary effect in Ireland that those who commit them, and that those who are the subject of them, should know that they should be lightly spoken of by the Prime Minister, and defended from the Wool-sack by the noble and learned Lord the Lord Chancellor of England.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, there is not the slightest occasion for me to defend Mr. Gladstone; but I must congratulate the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Salisbury) upon the opportunities he finds, and which he sometimes creates, of making personal attacks upon Mr. Gladstone, and of attributing the worst possible motives to ordinary expressions of opinion when uttered by my right hon. Friend. I will not go over the whole ground again, which has been so ably covered by the noble and learned Lord on the Wool-sack; but this remark I may be permitted to make, that it has been the constant habit, in giving accounts of the state of Ireland, carefully to separate threatening letters—which there is not the slightest doubt are mischievous and illegal—from the more serious crimes of murder and destruction of property. I have not one word more to add to what the noble and learned Lord said; but that is what he did say.

ARMY ALTERNATIVE PUNISHMENT BILL [H.L.]

A Bill for alternative punishments under the Army Discipline and Regulation Act, 1881—Was presented by The Lord DENMAN; read 1^a. (No. 68.)

House adjourned at half past Six o'clock, to Thursday next, a quarter past
Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 25th April, 1882.

The House met at Two of the clock.

MINUTES.]—WAYS AND MEANS—considered in Committee—Resolutions [April 24] reported.
PRIVATE BILL (by Order)—Second Reading—Dundee Lighting *.
PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—First Reading—Customs and Inland Revenue * [140].
Second Reading—Local Government Provisional Orders (Poor Law) * [130]; Local Government Provisional Order (Highways) * [129]; Local Government Provisional Orders * [131]; Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) [21] [Second Night], adjourned debate further adjourned.
Committee—Judgments (Inferior Courts) * [44]—R.P.; Places of Worship Sites [97]—R.P.
Report—Roads Provisional Order (Edinburgh) * [93-139].

QUESTIONS.

THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY— APPOINTMENTS OF COUNTY AND SUB-INSPECTORS AT LONDONDERRY.

MR. REDMOND asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that when in 1872 the Royal Irish Constabulary were introduced into the city of Londonderry in place of the old local police, the rule was laid down that of the two officers to be stationed there, namely, the county inspector and the sub-inspector, one was to be a Catholic and the other a Protestant; whether for some time this condition was observed, but for the last five years it has been departed from and both the officers have been Protestants; whether the position of sub-inspector in Derry is worth some £50 or £60 a-year more than that of an ordinary one; and, whether he will state the reasons for not observing the rule made in 1872?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, the Inspector General informed him that he was not aware of any such rule as that referred to in the Question. For some years subsequent to 1872 one of the officers stationed in Derry was a Roman Catholic. In 1876 a vacancy occurred, which was filled up by the appointment of a Protestant. That was the only change which had been made since 1872. The salary and allowances of the Sub-Inspector stationed in Derry were precisely the same as those received by Sub-Inspectors elsewhere. It was true that he received a small additional remuneration for the discharge of duties in connection with the inspection of weights and measures; but it did not come out of the Constabulary Votes, and did not amount to £50.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MR. M. P. KENNY AND MR. CANTWELL.

MR. REDMOND asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Mr. M. P. Kenny and Mr. Cantwell, of Castlecomer, were arrested on the same day, the 4th November last, and upon the same charge; whether Mr. Cantwell was released upon the 26th of February; and, whether he will state the reasons for the continued imprisonment, under these circumstances, of Mr. Kenny?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that these men were arrested on the same day under similar warrants. Mr. Cantwell was released on the 26th of February; but they did not consider they could yet prudently release Mr. Kenny.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—RELEASE OF PERSONS DETAINED UNDER THE ACT.

MR. O'SULLIVAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that six persons were arrested in Charleville, in October last, under the Coercion Act, on the same grounds of suspicion; and, whether it is true that three of those prisoners have been discharged from prison within the last month; and, if so, was it because those three men were returned Americans they were discharged, while the other three, who always lived in the district, are still detained in prison?

Mr. Redmond

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, it was not true that any prisoners had been released on the grounds stated in the Question; that Patrick O'Brien, Edward Synan, and Denis O'Connor had been released, but it was news to him that the two first-named were Americans; Denis O'Connor certainly was one. The Resident Magistrate had expressed the opinion that there was no necessity to detain O'Brien any longer. Synan was released because his wife was in a delicate state of health, her mother had recently died, and his friends offered to guarantee his good behaviour, and he was only too glad to expedite the return of O'Connor to America.

MR. O'SULLIVAN asked if there was any offence charged against the three remaining prisoners which was not charged against the three who had been liberated?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the question the Executive had to consider before liberating the other prisoners was—would the district be made worse by their release?

CRIMINAL LAW—THE MAGISTRACY—FLOGGING.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is true, as stated in the "Newcastle Daily Chronicle" of the 22nd instant, that, at the Newcastle Police Court, Patrick Murray, a boy of 13, was, on the 21st instant, sentenced to receive twelve stripes of the birch for having stolen four scarfs, value one shilling and sixpence, from the door of a shop, the committing magistrate, Alderman Milvain, observing that the lad had been twice whipped before, and it was evident that he had not been whipped severely enough, or he would not have come back, and he therefore ordered the police to lay on the strokes till the blood should come from the boy's back; and, if the statement be true, if he will recommend the removal of Alderman Milvain from the Bench?

MR. HIBBERT, in reply, said, that the matter had been under the consideration of the Home Secretary for some time. He received a letter from Mr. Alderman Milvain stating that the report in The Newcastle Daily Chronicle was substantially correct; that the police reported the boy to be the associate of boys of bad character, some older and some younger than himself; that in October, 1881, he had been convicted of larceny from a dwelling, and sentenced to receive 12 stripes; that in November, 1881, he was convicted of larceny from a shop, and was again sentenced to receive 12 stripes; and that it was on the third conviction—the subject of the Question—that the language was used. The Alderman went on to say that an officer superintended the whipping; and he reported that, although the boy was more severely whipped than on previous occasions, no blood was drawn. In reply, the Home Secretary expressed his regret that the Alderman had used language which had shocked public feeling; said he was glad to learn that the sentence had not been carried out with the severity which had been enjoined; and expressed the opinion that punishments of this kind could not be employed with safety, unless they were administered with moderation and with regard to humanity, especially in the case of children of tender years. Believing that these words would not be without effect upon the Alderman, and that the strong public opinion which had been expressed in reference to this case would have a salutary influence, the Home Secretary did not deem it necessary to adopt the course suggested by the Question.

POOR LAW (IRELAND) — RELIEF OF DISTRESS—SWINFORD UNION.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If, considering the exceptional state of the Swinford Poor Law Union, as evidenced in the reports of the Local Government Board Inspector, Major Spaight, and the inability of the impoverished tenant-farmers who incurred liabilities to the guardians during the distress of 1880 to meet their obligations, the Government will consider the advisability of introducing a short Bill for their relief, and also for the relief of distressed tenant farmers similarly circumstanced in other unions?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, the hon. Member was, doubtless, aware that Swinford Union was scheduled under the Act of last year. The advances made by the Guardians to farmers and others were ordered to be collected in four annual instalments. During the past year Swinford Union had been largely aided by grants. The condition of the Union required constant attention, and the Local Government Board had been giving constant attention to it. He did not think any further Bill was necessary at present.

PRISONS (ENGLAND) ACT, 1877—COST OF CONVEYING PRISONERS.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether it is a fact that, under "The English Prisons Act, 1877," English counties are relieved from the payment of expenses for the conveyance of certain prisoners, these expenses being payable out of Parliamentary funds, whereas under the General Prisons (Ireland) Act of 1877, Irish counties are still liable for similar expenses, and have to defray them out of county funds?

COLONEL COLTHURST asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether he is aware that the Grand Jury of the county Cork have recently submitted a case to counsel respecting the incidence of the charge for conveyance of prisoners, and have been informed that under section 21, Prisons Act (Ireland), 1878, the said charge falls upon the county rates; and, if he is prepared to suggest any remedy?

MR. O'CONNOR POWER remarked, that the difference in the law in both countries affected the county which he represented to the extent of £1,000 a-year.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): Sir, the hon. and learned Member for the County Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power) has strictly and accurately stated the difference under the existing law in England and Ireland as to the source from which the conveyance of prisoners is defrayed. In England it is out of moneys voted by Parliament; in Ireland it is out of the county rates. With reference to the Question of the hon. and gallant Member for Cork County (Colonel Colthurst), it is the fact, as stated in his Question, that the Grand Jury of that county, at the last Spring Assizes, took counsel's opinion on the subject, and were advised as stated in his Question. Accordingly, by a Resolution, they drew attention to the fact that this annual charge for Cork County was about £1,800, and expressed a hope that this hardship would be redressed and a remedy found by making the source for this expense the same in both countries—namely, moneys voted by Parliament. That, however, is a question of policy, and should be addressed to the Prime Minister.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—MANORHAMILTON UNION—ELECTION OF GUARDIANS.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is the fact that Mr. Laurance McDermott has twice applied to the Local Government Board for an investigation into the late election of Guardians for the Manorhamilton Union without reply; why no reply has been given; and, whether an investigation can be granted; and, if not, if he would state why?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, this gentleman had written several times to the Local Government Board, and had on each occasion received a reply. The Local Government Board were in communication with the Returning Officer on the subject of the late election of Guardians in the Manorhamilton Union; and Mr. McDermott was informed, as recently as the 21st instant, that the Local Government Board were not yet able to determine whether an inquiry was necessary.

MR. HEALY asked if the reply of the Local Government Board was given after the Question was put upon the Paper?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he could not say that. The last letter written to him was on the 21st instant, and to each of his previous communications he received no answer.

PRISONS (IRELAND)—LIMERICK GAOL—GOVERNOR EAGER.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What has been the result of the sworn inquiry into the conduct of Governor Eager, of Limerick Gaol; whether on Sunday the 2nd instant bread was refused by the "suspects" as being sour; whether on the doctor certifying that this was not the case, and the opinion of an independent doctor being asked, this was refused; whether in every case of complaint an independent inquiry apart from the regular officials will be granted; if not, whether it is the fact that it is the officials who supply him with the information which he gives to this House; whether Mr. Power, confined in Limerick Gaol, wrote to him on the 31st March, pointing out that, although no outrage had been committed in Tralee since his imprisonment on the 20th October last, he is still detained in prison; whether no reply has been given to this letter; and, whether there is any reason for the further detention of Mr. Power?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that the result of the inquiry into the conduct of Governor Eager was that he had been cautioned to be more careful in future that improper communications should not be passed out of the prison, and that all unnecessary interference with letters should be carefully avoided. He had also been directed to avoid as much as possible the infliction of punishment, and all unnecessarily stringent regulations, especially with regard to visits to prisoners. With regard to the bread supplied in the gaol, a few of the prisoners had complained of it, and this and other complaints had been inquired into by the Prisons Board, and most of them were found to be trivial. No request was made for an independent inquiry. The medical officer, however, had reported favourably on the bread. As for the case of Mr. Power, a letter had been received from him, and his complaint had been considered by the Lord Lieutenant, who had been forced to the conclusion that he ought to remain in custody. He was, however, allowed out on parole, and on his further application it was extended to the 18th instant.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—INVESTIGATION OF CASES OF PRISONERS DETAINED UNDER THE ACT.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether a form printed in the "Waterford Mail" of March 22nd, purporting to be the form to be used by political prisoners who seek investigation into their case, is correct?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that no form whatever was required by persons detained under the Protection of Person and Property Act.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACT—EMIGRANT SHIPS.

MR. A. MOORE asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether, having regard to the numerous complaints and abuses brought to light during last Session, and to the very rapid emigration taking place at the present moment, he is prepared to revise the Passenger Acts, more particularly in the interests of young unprotected girls, and in the direction of the recommendations put forward by the Board of Trade officials and sanctioned by himself in his Minute of 5th July 1881?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: Sir, I hope the object the hon. Member has in view, in common with myself, will be obtained without further legislation. The Report of the Board of Trade officials and my Minute thereon were forwarded in August last to the principal shipowners in the United Kingdom, and also to the principal officers in the various ports, with instructions to report to the Board of Trade any ship carrying emigrants to the United States which did not comply with the recommendations issued by the Board. The principal shipowners, with very few exceptions, have expressed their willingness to meet the suggestions of the Board as soon as they possibly can. The Reports of the principal officers at the various ports show that the number of vessels in which the suggestions of the Board of Trade had not been adopted is steadily diminishing, and there are now very few vessels carrying emigrants that have neglected to adopt them. The Board of Trade will continue their efforts to secure the compliance of all shipowners; but they hope to be able to secure this without further legislation.

MR. A. MOORE gave Notice that, in consequence of the unsatisfactory answer of the right hon. Gentleman, he would take an early opportunity of calling attention to this subject; and on Thursday he would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether his attention had been called to a paragraph in the papers stating that seven emigrants had died on the way to New York on board an emigrant ship, and that the surgeon reported that these persons embarked in a very weak state of health, and were passed by the emigration officer at the English port; and whether he would cause full inquiry to be made as to how it was that those persons were passed by the emigration agent at the English port?

UNITED STATES—TRIAL OF BRITISH SUBJECTS.

MR. PULESTON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is true that Lord Granville, the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, recently interfered in behalf of a British subject, accused in the State of Michigan, in the United States of America, of administering the poison morphine?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, an application was made last month to Mr. West by William Lane, a British subject, who stated he had been arrested on the 18th of June last on a charge of attempted murder, and had since then been held in gaol awaiting trial, which he was utterly unable to obtain. Mr. West accordingly wrote to the Secretary of State, asking that inquiry should be made respecting the case. Mr. Frelinghuysen replied that Lane was arraigned for trial on the 29th of September, 1881, since which time repeated continuances have been had, but in every instance at the request of Lane's attorney. The trial was commenced on the 24th of March last, and Mr. West reports that it has ended in the conviction of the accused.

STATE OF IRELAND—COUNTY WICKLOW.

MR. W. J. CORBET asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he has read the charge delivered to the Grand Jury at Wicklow by the County Court Judge, at the Quarter Sessions just concluded, as reported in the local journal of the 22nd April, as follows:—

“Gentlemen, as there is no case to go before you, you will be discharged. . . . I have just come from Baltinglass, where also there was no case for the jury. This shows very satisfactorily for your county. I am exceedingly glad to be able to discharge you from your duties;”

whether the Judges at Assizes and Quarter Sessions have frequently borne testimony, in their charges to Grand Juries of the county, to the peace and quietness prevailing in Wicklow; whether the returns of crime and outrage, and of malicious injury, indicate the same; and, whether he can inform the House upon what grounds he refuses to advise the Lord Lieutenant, in the face of these facts, to revoke the Orders in Council under which the county has been proclaimed?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he regretted that, notwithstanding the testimony borne by the Judges of Assize and the Chairman of Quarter Sessions as to the peace and quietness prevailing in the county Wicklow, the Government did not feel justified in revoking the Orders under which the county was proclaimed. It was quite possible there might be an absence of outrages, and yet that the county might not be free from intimidation.

MEDICAL GRANT (SCOTLAND).

MR. RAMSAY asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether any decision has yet been come to as to the amount of the medical grant to be made for Scotland for the year 1882-3?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: Sir, the Government had hoped to deal with the Grant for Medical Relief in Scotland in connection with the general question of Grants in Aid of local taxation. As they had been reluctantly obliged to abandon that hope, it is considered that this particular anomaly is too great to be any longer continued. It will be my duty, therefore, as a temporary arrangement, to substitute for the Estimate of £10,000 now before the House one for £20,000. It may probably be necessary to amend the law with respect to the conditions under which the Grant is made.

TURKEY—MIDHAT PASHA.

MR. M'COAN asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Foreign Office has received any confirmation of the statements reported in yesterday's papers, that Midhat Pasha is kept in chains at Taif, and that his wife and family at Smyrna are in a state of destitution; and, if so, whether Earl Granville will instruct Lord Dufferin to use his private good offices at the Porte to obtain some mitigation of the cruelty thus inflicted on a Minister who, while in office, always manifested a just regard for British interests in the East?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: No information respecting Midhat Pasha has been received at the Foreign Office; but Lord Dufferin has been instructed by telegraph to make inquiries as to the truth of the painful report to which my hon. Friend refers.

IRELAND — POTATO CROP COMMITTEE, 1880.

COLONEL NOLAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, with reference to the Resolution of this House of the 20th July 1881,

"That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient that Her Majesty's Government should take steps to carry into effect such of the recommendations of the Potato Crop Committee of 1880 as relate to Ireland, by facilitating the progress of further experiments as to the best means of lessening the spread of the potato disease and promoting the creation and establishment of new varieties of the potato;"

If any attempt has been made to give effect to the above Resolution of the House either at Glasnevin, or elsewhere; and, if any provision has been made in the Estimates for the experiments and cultivation referred to in the above Resolution?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Yes, Sir; steps have been taken for giving effect to the Resolution of the House referred to by the hon. and gallant Member, and are, shortly, as follows:—In 1880-1 two sets of experiments were tried at the Munster Model Farm, under the auspices of the Cork Agricultural Society; and Mr. Carroll, the Agricultural Superintendent under the Board of National Education, will continue to make similar experiments this year at Glasnevin and Cork. He will also extend the scope of the experiments to the production of new varieties of the potato by the propagation from the seed of the apple of the potato. The process is slow, and takes four years to produce the fully developed potato; but Mr. Carroll looks on it as a most important feature in his experiments. Last year seeds of different varieties were sown at the Glasnevin farm. The small tubers which those seeds produced have this year been planted, and in 1884 the fully developed varieties will be obtained. Furthermore, Mr. Carroll has got some seed from America to raise new varieties. This seed, in small quantities, will be sent gratis to the principal agricultural schools, with instructions as to its treat-

It will also be sown at the Glasad Cork farms. Mr. Carroll will spring the seed of an old Irish of great excellence—the “Black

The development of the sowing complete in 1885; and, in order urage the production of new s of the plant, through the of their agricultural schools, the sioners of National Education tained the sanction of the Trea-
: offering prizes for competition the teachers of those schools.
will be four sets of prizes for t varieties of the potato; each consist of a 1st, 2nd, and 3rd nd the directions for sowing seed issued.

ply to Mr. HEALY,

W. E. FORSTER said, he had rmation as to the weight of seed extent of ground.

MITCHELL HENRY asked se experiments were to be con-agricultural schools in Ireland?
s did not grow only in Ireland;
re was a distinct understanding s was to be a national expendi-

W. E. FORSTER said, he conthat as the schools he had re-o were supported at the expense ation, it was the fittest place for eriments.

STER OF AGRICULTURE AND COMMERCE.

MASSEY LOPES asked Mr.
llor of the Exchequer, If he can ate when the financial arrange-or the year have been announced, rovision has been made to give o the Resolution of the 13th May th reference to the appointment inister of Agriculture and Com-

CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHE-
(Mr. GLADSTONE), in reply, said, never intended in what he had hen the Resolution was passed to the impression that this par-subject, any more than any other of administration, was to be ted with the Financial Statement year. He did not think the mo-ad arrived when they could con-tly enter upon it. What he had ther in view were the Votes reg the Department with which the

L. COLXVIII. [THIRD SERIES.]

proposed Minister might possibly be connected. He would, however, endeavour to find an opportunity, when the state of Public Business would permit, to refer to the subject.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

—o:—

WAYS AND MEANS.—REPORT.

Resolutions [April 24] reported.

Resolution 1.

MR. E. W. HARCOURT said, he wished to take the opportunity of thanking the Prime Minister for the very literal way in which he had carried out the promises he had made earlier in the Session on the subject of roads. He believed the sum which the right hon.
Gentleman proposed to appropriate to the maintenance of disturnpiked roads was exactly the sum which those roads at present cost. He thought, however, what they had chiefly to congratulate themselves upon was that the principle was conceded that main roads were to be maintained, not out of the rates, but from other sources. The satisfaction, nevertheless, with which the arrangement would be regarded, would depend entirely upon the manner in which the relief was to be distributed; and, again, as to the method of relief, it was to be remembered that the chief offenders in destroying roads were brewers' vans, timber waggons, and other carriages drawing heavy weights, as well as traction engines, and these ought to be dealt with before it could be said that any justice was done. He had had a large correspondence with highway authorities throughout England, perhaps larger than any other Member in the House; and he thought he could undertake to say that if any degree of justice were done in the matter of maintaining main roads from sources other than the rates the President of the Local Government Board would find very little difficulty in making such alterations as were necessary in the Highway Act of 1878 in a way which would give general satisfaction.

MR. RYLANDS said, he understood from the Prime Minister that it was his desire that they should take this stage of the Budget without much discussion, and that sufficient opportunity would be given on the second reading of the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill. His object in rising now was to express a hope that that Bill would be made the first Order of the Day, because he was bound to tell the Prime Minister, in regard to the great Expenditure, there would be considerable examination and discussion. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to think that public opinion was indifferent on this question; but he must say, on behalf of his own constituents and the populous constituencies of Lancashire, that one of the main causes of dissatisfaction with the late Government was their large Public Expenditure. He must also tell the Prime Minister that he had hardly gauged the feelings of the House when he said that the House was indifferent to the Expenditure of the country. He (Mr. Rylands) had a Notice on the Paper on that subject, and he should have pressed it had he not desired to avoid, in the present state of Business, embarrassing the Government. There must be full opportunity for discussion, and they ought also to have an opportunity of redeeming the pledges they gave prior to the General Election.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I rise, Sir, not to prolong this conversation, for it is, I think, undesirable the matter should now be gone into. It is quite obvious that the question raised with regard to Expenditure, and the financial position generally, ought to be fully discussed. I have no doubt that a full discussion will bring out some points that are not at once evident upon the mere statement of the amount of Expenditure; and there will, perhaps, be an opportunity of dispelling some false ideas on the subject. At the same time, it is quite clear that the position, as stated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer yesterday, is one that demands the serious consideration of the country and of this House, and that we should not be doing our duty, or satisfying the general expectations of the country at large, if we did not make it the subject of serious debate. I could not help noticing the suggestion thrown out yesterday by the Prime Minister that it might be necessary to adopt further or other measures for checking expenditure. I confess that that raises a very large question, upon which I should be sorry off-hand to express an opinion; but it is one very worthy of discussion. I hope, however, we shall not now run into a general or particular discussion, because we have other Business before us; but let it be understood that a full and fair opportunity will be afforded hereafter to discuss the statement of the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Rylands

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GLADSTONE): Nothing could be fairer or more reasonable than that. It is quite in conformity with what I endeavoured to convey last night, that full opportunity should be given for discussion; and if the best opportunity arises on the second reading, rather than on going into Committee, I am perfectly willing to consult the convenience of the House. Since full opportunity will be given, it is very desirable not to make any partial anticipations. With regard to the remarks of the hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Harcourt), they were in place, and I thank him for them. Our pledge was limited by the arrangement made at the beginning of the Session, and I do not regard the principle in this grant as having quite so extensive an application as he does. That, however, is not the question. It is not necessary to enter into details; but I must remind the hon. Gentleman that in his estimate of the amount he must take Scotland into consideration, because Scotland is entitled to receive some fair proportion of the amount in respect to main roads.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, he did not think the taxpayers would be quite so pleased as his hon. Friend (Mr. Harcourt) appeared to be, especially when they found that a certain proportion of the small amount which was to go to highways was to be given to Scotland. He asked the right hon. Gentleman to give this subject that fair consideration which it required. He recollected the pledges the right hon. Gentleman made to his own tenants with regard to local taxation. He now proposed to increase the Carriage Duty, a duty which had been reduced, and which would again make it a most objectionable tax. The Prime Minister had entirely overlooked that class of traffic which had done the most harm to the roads—the large vans and heavy locomotives. These and the omnibuses, which went to railway stations, were allowed to go free; while the light carriages, which caused little wear to the roads, were to be more heavily taxed. He hoped the right hon.

Gentleman would reconsider this matter. With regard to the Malt Tax he was one of those who always strongly advocated the repeal of the tax when barley was at a very low price; but he did not when barley rose to the extraordinary high price it did during prosperous years. But since the right hon. Gentleman had taken off the Malt Duty and placed the duty on beer the price of barley had gone down very considerably. We could grow far better barley in this country than could be grown abroad; but the price of barley was depreciated because, as the right hon. Gentleman knew, he had permitted anything to be used in brewing, and such ingredients as rice and maize and a greater quantity of sugar were now used. Many brewers, especially the small brewers, using substitutes for all kinds of malt and hops, produced beer of a very inferior quality, to the detriment of the people of this country. [A laugh.] The hon. Member for Scarborough might laugh, because he was one of those who recommended his countrymen to drink water only; but all did not share his opinion, and many a man in drinking his glass of beer desired to have it good. He would venture to say that unless something was done to check the evil he alluded to, the repeal of the tax would be anything but a benefit either to the farmers or the country.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN said, that, acting in accord with the general desire of the House, he would not enter into a discussion on the Ministerial proposals. But he desired to give Notice that when the Bill based on the Budget Resolutions came on for second reading, he would move an Amendment condemnatory of the intended additional duty on carriages. He recognized the justice of the demand that had been made for concession with respect to turnpikes; and he did not think the sum the Chancellor of the Exchequer contemplated setting aside for that purpose was excessive. He wished to speak with becoming deference and respect of any fiscal propositions of the right hon. Gentleman; but he could not help saying that he thought he had not shown his customary skill in discovering the means for raising the required funds. The mode of assisting those who paid for highways did not strike him as a satisfactory one; but, apart from that, the proposal to increase the tax on carriages would hamper a useful, varied, and important trade, which was already suffering from depression. There was a large capital embarked in the coach-building business, and there were thousands of workmen employed in it. That trade had suffered proportionately more than any other trade from the recent bad times. The duty at present imposed was a bar to development, and the additional duty would be a further deterrent. The coach-building business was one of the few trades now that were taxed. The Chancellor of the Exchequer pointed out very lucidly on the previous day how the duty on malt was doubly injurious to the trade. It not only imposed a duty, but impeded the maltsters by compelling them to conduct their operations subject to Excise control. The same thing applied to the coach business. Carriage builders were crippled in their operations by the action of the representatives of the Inland Revenue. The persons who used carriages in the usual way were best able to pay the extra tax; but it was not them he was considering. It was the men directly engaged in the trade itself; and when the time came he would endeavour to adduce reasons why the Government should abandon the intended increase of duty. It might be possible, he thought, to extend the proposed relief to the highways without imposing any duty at all.

MR. MAC IVER asked for some assurance that an opportunity would be given for discussing the Motion of which he had given Notice the previous night, and which it was certainly his intention to bring forward at some stage of the Budget discussion—

“That Customs duties shall be replaced on such foreign importations as come into unfair competition with the industries of Great Britain and Ireland.”

He asked for this on two grounds. There were many people who seemed to think that importations of luxuries from France might very well be subjected to a tax; and there were many who regarded with alarm the extraordinary depreciation of the revenue derived from intoxicating drinks. Many people felt greatly alarmed at the fact that the Revenue was dependent upon intoxicating drinks for nearly one-half of it; and, so far as that went, it created a state of things which contributed largely to prevent any serious remedial measures being adopted to check intemperance. It was with a desire to forward the cause of temperance, as well as with a desire to free our industries at home from unfair competition, that he trusted a proper opportunity would be given to raise this question at some future stage of the financial Bill.

MR. EARP contended that it was incorrect to say that many substitutes had been used for malt for brewing purposes. The diminution in the consumption of barley and the fall in its price were not results of the repeal of the Malt Duty. The diminution in question was partly the result of those changes in the habits of the people to which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had alluded. The brewing trade had been depressed, and consequently there had been less demand than formerly for barley. When the brewing interest should revive higher prices would be got for barley; and in the long run the repeal of the Malt Tax, instead of bearing prejudicially upon the farmer, would affect him beneficially.

MR. RAMSAY said, he did not wish to prolong this desultory discussion; but he was glad to hear the Prime Minister announce that he had not forgotten Scotland when he proposed the Budget last night. He wished, however, to draw the right hon. Gentleman's attention to the fact that it was not from Scotland that the outcry for grants in aid had chiefly come. Their complaint had been directed hitherto to the fact that the grants allowed to Scotland had not been in proportion either to her population or taxation, and that the share they had got of those grants was less than they were fairly entitled to. If he was correct in saying that the grants in aid had not been demanded by Scotland, he would ask the right hon. Gentleman to consider whether it would be expedient to give any new grants in aid for any purpose whatever, in addition to the subsidy derived by the people of England from the Imperial Exchequer. He thought it was a very doubtful question—he did not know what the opinion of the majority of the House would be upon it—whether the counties that received those grants in aid derived any such benefit as was supposed by many of those who demanded them. His experience was the opposite. In the county with which he was connected, they used to get from the Exchequer a share of the sum of £5,000 for maintaining the military roads in the Highlands of Scotland; and he believed the roads in the same district now were maintained at less expense to the ratepayers within the several districts than when the Road Trustees had the £5,000 from the Imperial Treasury in addition to their own contributions. Now, if such was the case, and if the assessment levied for the maintenance of the Police Force had increased since the Government came to pay one-half of the whole amount, these facts should lead the right hon. Gentleman to reconsider the question of renewing those grants in aid, and, at the same time, whether it would not be better to give efficient local administration to the several counties, and so enable them within themselves to levy and control local charges instead of drawing from the Imperial Treasury. He had no wish to detain the House further than to say that it would be desirable that Scotland should be exempted from the increase proposed to be made in the duty on carriages, and left very much as she was—only the Prime Minister taking care to give her, for all purposes, the same proportion of the grants, except special grants for the roads in England, but leaving them in other respects as they were.

MR. DUCKHAM maintained that when samples of barley were of as good a quality as in past years they realized a satisfactory price. The low price now obtainable for barley he attributed to a deterioration in the samples. He could not connect it with the repeal of the Malt Tax. He begged to express his gratitude to the Prime Minister for the relief to the agricultural interest which he had shadowed forth in his Budget.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, nothing could be more certain than that the Prime Minister, in proposing the abolition of the Malt Tax, had in view the enabling of the brewer to use other materials than barley in the manufacture of beer. If the Prime Minister was right one or two things would be the result—if barley was used as before the abolition of the Malt Tax, the amount of barley used in the manufacture of beer would be largely increased; if, on the other hand, other materials than barley were used in the manufacture of beer, it was perfectly obvious that the price of barley must fall, irrespective of the foreign barley that might be imported. The brewer, therefore, was now exposed to two sorts of competition, to neither of which he was exposed before—first, to the competition of foreign barley and foreign malt; and, secondly, to the competition of other substances than barley.

MR. H. H. FOWLER said, he wished to take that opportunity of giving Notice that, on the second reading of the Budget Bill, he would endeavour to justify himself with respect to a charge which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Devonshire (Sir Stafford Northcote) had brought against him, with reference to a statement he had made as to his administration of finance. The right hon. Gentleman had said his statements were of a misleading and inaccurate character. He could assure the right hon. Gentleman that he had no intention of misrepresenting him. At the proper time and the proper occasion, he would ask the House to listen to his justification of the statements he had made. He heartily endorsed the expression of his hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands), with reference to the dissatisfaction of large constituencies in this country with regard to the National Expenditure. Members on the Liberal side of the House, he believed, were bound to say as honest men that they won their places by pledges to reduce that Expenditure. They were bound to support the most economical Chancellor of the Exchequer this country ever had in reducing the present enormous Expenditure, which was both extravagant and unnecessary.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he had no intention of imputing to the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) any desire to misrepresent him. He simply said, or rather wrote, that certain statements which the hon. Member made were, as he considered, inaccurate or misleading.

MR. CAINE said, that if the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) would study the statement of the Prime Minister with reference to the falling-off of the revenue derived from alcoholic liquors, he would find that the depression was caused by the great increase in society of those who, like himself, believed it was better to drink wholesome water than unwholesome beer.

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE regretted that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not found himself able to deal with the anomalies in the Probate Duty. Freehold property ought to be brought under the same taxation as leasehold property. They ought either to abolish the Probate Duty on leasehold property, or to impose Probate Duty on freehold as well as leasehold property.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, he was sorry the Prime Minister was not present, because he wished to repeat a question he put last night, and on which he received no information. The right hon. Gentleman last night stated that the Government had sent to France a portion of the Revenues of Cyprus, which this country had impounded. He should like to know whether that arrangement took place after an understanding with Turkey or before? When we took Cyprus, we did not give Turkey to understand that we would impound a portion of the Revenue for ourselves or anybody else. It appeared to him that if we acted spontaneously as agents of France, and laid a distringas upon moneys due by Turkey to France, we established a principle of a very doubtful character.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, the reason why the hon. Gentleman's question of last night was not answered was simply because he went away without waiting for an answer. The answer was this—that the loan was jointly guaranteed by England and France; and Her Majesty's Government believed they would have been acting most dishonourably if they had not secured what was due to France as well as what was due to this country.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: Was there an understanding with the Porte?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: There was no understanding with the Porte, and the Treasury simply acted in accordance with the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown, who said it was perfectly clear that they were within their rights in stopping those sums out of the guarantee fund.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD said, as the guarantee was joint, our Government could not justly have received a single sixpence from the Porte without dividing it with France; but he thought such joint guarantees were greatly to be deprecated.

MR. ECROYD said, he hoped an assurance would be given by the Government that opportunity would be afforded for the discussion of questions of deep importance connected with the Budget. He should like to discuss the possibility of reducing the duties on tea, coffee, cocoa, and dried fruits, which bore upon the labouring population very severely, and of imposing duties upon the articles of luxury from France and other foreign countries, with which our shops were filled. He concurred with the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. Joseph Cowen) in his objection to the increased duty on carriages, inasmuch as it would operate as a distinct discouragement to coach-building, which was an important branch of English industry. It would have been infinitely better had the Chancellor of the Exchequer raised a considerable revenue from articles of pure luxury, instead of maintaining an exorbitant duty on tea. If only in the interest of temperance, they ought to encourage the consumption of an article which was acquiring a more and more important place in the domestic economy of our labouring classes.

Resolution agreed to.

Resolution 2.

MR. PELL declared his inability to join in the expression of pleasure at the Chancellor of the Exchequer's proposal for rectifying the admitted injustice which arose from the abolition of toll-gates. The redress which the right hon. Gentleman had offered was not of an equitable nature. In fact, the right hon. Gentleman could hardly intend that his proposals should receive the sanction of Parliament. It occurred to him that the right hon. Gentleman would not be surprised if, on the second reading of the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill, the proposals of the Government were rejected, and if the hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. E. W. Harcourt) were left where he was at the beginning of the Session. The roads were said to be worn down by the trading classes. It was the heavy and the rapid traffic, which really rendered the maintenance of the roads costly, that brought a heavy charge upon the rate-payers. But the trading classes were not to be taxed, except when they took their evening drives in a light carriage.

Those who would be taxed were the innumerable people who, after a life of diligence and thrift, had been enabled in their old age to provide themselves with a light carriage and a horse in order that they might enjoy the pleasure of a drive from the town into the country. Of course, the upper classes would also be hit by the Chancellor of the Exchequer's proposal; but the middle classes, who did not use the roads in a way calculated to damage them, would, in a very large degree, have to provide the funds for the restoration of the wear and tear caused by the traders and the representatives of the large commercial houses. This did not appear to be an equitable way of dealing with the question, and he thought the Resolution ought to have pointed to a contribution of a more general nature from all classes of the community.

MR. BIGGAR said, he really thought that the Prime Minister, when proposing the additional duty on carriages, was intending it as a practical joke. The right hon. Gentleman was simply repeating his former tactics with regard to the Malt Tax of shifting money from one pocket to another. The tax which the right hon. Gentleman proposed to raise upon carriages was one of an injurious nature, for the simple reason that the manufacturers of cars and carriages in this country gave purely local employment. He was disposed to support the view of the hon. Member who thought it would be more satisfactory if the right hon. Gentleman taxed some articles of luxury which were not manufactured in this country, and were imported. The effect of the tax on carriages would be, he feared, to lessen the number of those vehicles used by the classes who keep carriages, and thus to strike a blow at the coach-building trade, which had not been at all prosperous in recent years.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE asked when it was proposed to take the second reading of the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, that the second reading of the Bill would be set down for Thursday, with a view to a day being fixed for its discussion.

Resolution agreed to.

Resolutions 3, 4, 5, and 6 agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. PLAYFAIR, Mr. CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, and Lord FREDERICK CAVENDISH.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 140.]

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS
(CORRUPT AND ILLEGAL PRACTICES)
BILL.—[BILL 21.]

(Mr. Attorney General, Secretary Sir William Harcourt, Mr. Chamberlain, Sir Charles W. Dilke, Mr. Solicitor General.)

SECOND READING. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

[SECOND NIGHT.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [24th April], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

And which Amendment was,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "considering no corruption has been proved to exist in the larger town constituencies, or in any county constituency, it is inexpedient to adopt such uniform restrictions and punishments as will render the fair conduct of an election in a great constituency perilous and penal,"—(Mr. Robert Fowler,)

—instead thereof.

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he did not wish to introduce a discordant note into the general chorus of approval with which the measure had been met; but he could not forget how very many Bills had been introduced in the course of the last 50 years for improving the methods by which Members were returned; and yet it was questionable whether the House now compared favourably with the House of 50 years ago; tested by results, it might be questioned whether they had gained or lost, whether the Assembly was more competent to do Business, and whether it was more disposed to do it in a patriotic spirit. They must all sympathize with the desire of making elections cheaper, with the object of placing Parliamentary honours within the reach of classes who now could not hope to compete for them, for it was a melancholy reflection how many persons there were in the country anxious to spend their time for the benefit of the public, and able to distinguish themselves in that House, who were prevented from doing so solely by the want of means. The reason why so much money was spent on elections was that so many persons desired to be elected, and rich men desired and were ready to pay for the privilege of a seat in the House. Although the occupation was neither pleasurable nor easy, the position was so keenly sought after that men were prepared to give thousands for it. However deplorable this might be when we considered who were excluded, it showed that there was some healthy political feeling in the country, and that we had not descended to the level of some countries, where a man could not be a politician without some sacrifice of respect. They must all sympathize with the further object of the Bill, which was to make elections pure; he confessed, however, he looked at it with much less enthusiasm than he did at the first object, not because it was less important, but because he thought it was far less capable of attainment. Corruption by hard cash was not the corruption which, at this moment, we had most to fear from. There were other forms of corrupting constituencies besides giving electors money, or treating them in public-houses. And these methods were likely to increase rather than diminish with every successive extension of the suffrage and increase of the constituencies. Old forms of corruption would fall into disuse without stringent measures to put them down. The bribery, not of individuals, but of classes, was likely to increase rather than diminish. The bribes he spoke of could be clothed in the most eloquent language, put in the form and outward semblance of the loftiest morality, and those who used them would very likely be rewarded by the highest honours of the State. Such appeals to the ignorant classes in the constituencies were becoming more frequent, and they were responded to as salmon were drawn by flies. The bribery to be dealt with by the Bill touched a small fraction of the class which the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster called the "residuum" when he differed from them and the "people" when he agreed with them. It was a very small fraction of that class who were corrupt in the manner contemplated; but the corruption of which he spoke reached every class. It must be admitted that organizations like the Caucus produced the same benumbing and deadening effect that bribery did. The evil of money bribery was that it taught the elector to regard his vote, not as a trust which he used for the highest political purposes, but as a something to be sold; and the organizations of which he spoke had a not less deadening effect upon the individuals who composed them, upon the electoral body, and upon Members of Parliament. If organizations of that kind were to become common over the country, the result would be that, in spite of all they might do against bribery, they would find they were not a higher Legislative Assembly, but a lower one. Passing from these vaticinations to the Bill, he would ask the Attorney General to consider whether the penal provisions were not much too severe? There was no use in showing zeal against corruption by heaping up one penalty upon another. Judges might be trusted to administer the law, although a Judge might have reached his position through a seat in that House attained by corrupt practices; but we could not expect juries to do the same. It was of no use making our laws in advance of the morality of the country; and if we made penalties too severe, juries would insist upon returning verdicts of "Not guilty." The only result of the undue severity of the Bill would be, not to promote purity, but to shelter corruption. His hon. and learned Friend would, he had no doubt, consider from this point of view the suggestions that would be made in Committee. In making these observations, his object had been, not to chill the ardour of the Government in the cause of purity, but to remind the House how small a proportion of the present corrupt practices took the form of actual money bribery, and to point out that Parliament seldom showed to advantage when it congratulated itself on its virtues.

[Second Night.]

MR. SERJEANT SIMON said, he thought they must all recognize the courageous endeavour made by the Bill to suppress a great and crying evil—an evil from which every Member of the House had more or less suffered, from which every candidate had suffered, and which was a scandal to the country. When an appeal was made to the people for their decision on the course of policy which was desirable for the country, they expected an honest and faithful answer; but if that answer were procured by corrupt practices, the appeal had been in vain, and the answer was not a true and faithful one. The attempt of his hon. and learned Friend to put an end to such a scandal they must hail with satisfaction. At the same time, while he recognized great merits in the Bill he thought it susceptible of considerable improvement. He agreed with the principle of a fixed maximum amount of expenditure, and he held that this provision constituted one of the best and most important parts of the Bill; but the maximum, he thought, should be more elastic, and that it should be fixed with reference to the will, character, and circumstances of constituencies. Like the hon. Member opposite, he was anxious for the return to the House of men of moderate means. The endeavour to make the House one not for rich men only was a proper endeavour, and which, if it succeeded, would add to the dignity of the House and be a benefit to the country. There were men of great ability and high character, but who could not face the extravagant expense of elections as now conducted; whereas men who had passed their lives in amassing wealth, and had not given, perhaps, a continuous half-hour's consideration to a single question of public concern, could, by lavish expenditure, find an entrance into the House. It was time to put an end to such a state of things, and encourage men of ability and character, but of moderate means, to enter public life and devote themselves to the service of the country. The same remark also applied to the working-men candidates. It was conceded on both sides of the House that it would be desirable to have labour represented in that House to a greater extent than it was now represented. He hoped to see the time when, instead of one or two, there would be, at least, a dozen working men sitting on those Benches. Some years ago, to the honour of the Party opposite, the property qualification was abolished; but it still existed, for all practical purposes, in the form of fees to the Returning Officers. Some parts of the Bill were not altogether satisfactory, and required explanation. The 4th clause, for example, would operate very severely in making a candidate liable for all the acts of his agent. Nothing, of course, could be more criminal than the conduct of the corrupt candidate; but it was not just that a candidate should be punished for all that his agents might do. The doctrine of agency was not the same in election matters as in Common Law, as, in the former case, the employer was held liable for acts done by his agent, not only without orders, but even in direct contravention of his orders. He put it to the House to say whether it was fair to punish a candidate for illegalities committed in such a manner, in the way and to the extent proposed by the Bill? He thought that there should be some limit fixed to the time during which an election might be said to continue. At present it was not easy to say when an election began. Candidates were often announced years beforehand; and perhaps the penal clauses of the Bill might treat as a corrupt practice a dinner given to his neighbours by a candidate who was announced years before to come forward at the next vacancy. As for the proposal to revert to the practice of trying Election Petitions by one Judge, he was entirely opposed to it. In 1874 he moved for a Select Committee on the subject, and the Committee came to the almost unanimous conclusion that Petitions should be tried by more than one Judge; and the law was altered accordingly. He, therefore, could not support the proposal to return to the trial by one Judge. Either two Judges must try election cases, or there should be an appeal from the decision of a single Judge, which would considerably increase expense. He regarded the Bill, on the whole, as an honest endeavour to remedy a great evil; but its details would require careful examination. He hoped, therefore, the Attorney General would have regard to the views of Members expressed in this discussion and in Committee; and the result, he believed, would be an efficient measure.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, that some hon. Members appeared to think that it would be advisable not to pass observations on the details of the measure before the stage of Committee. He, however, was of opinion that such a course must, in the end, be productive of considerable delay; and, therefore, he should not take the advice of those who counselled reticence at the present time. The first point to which he wished to draw attention was that that portion of the Bill which dealt with "illegal practices" would apply to every constituency in the Kingdom. Any candidate for the representation of a constituency who should be guilty of such practices would be disqualified for life from representing that constituency. Now, that would be a tremendous punishment. When seeking in the Bill for a definition of the offences which were to entail so severe a penalty, some friends and himself had at first thought that they must be the victims of an optical delusion. Their difficulty was explained by the fact that the Schedules purporting to explain the nature of these illegal practices were inverted. As it had been proved that corruption existed to a certain extent in the smaller constituencies, but that there was none in the large ones, it would be supposed that in the case of the smaller constituencies the expenditure would be limited, and that a higher scale of expenditure would be tolerated in the large constituencies. But, according to the Schedules, the smaller the constituency the larger might be the expenditure per head, and the larger the constituency the smaller the expenditure per head. The Attorney General, for example, in the borough of Taunton, might spend about 7s. per head in an election contest; but if in contesting Middlesex, which was a much larger constituency, he (Lord George Hamilton) were to spend 2s. per head, he would be prevented for life from representing that county. Surely, so ridiculous a disproportion could not be justified. The Attorney General had pointed out that certain candidates had reduced their expenses at the last Election below the amount permitted by the Bill, and had cited the case of the Members for Birmingham. Their expenses amounted to a little less than £6,000, and that sum would have been admissible according to the provisions of this Bill had it been law, because three candidates stood together; but a proportionate expenditure would not have been allowed to one candidate standing by himself, whom an expenditure of £2,200 would have disqualified for life. What he objected to was that severe and inequitable restrictions were placed upon large constituencies because a certain number of small constituencies had been proved to be corrupt. The Bill practically put all the constituencies of England in swaddling clothes because a certain number of small boroughs had shown themselves unable to walk uprightly without assistance. Now, the smaller constituencies were the remains of the old system of representation, and it was tolerably certain that the next Reform Bill would efface them. The Government, therefore, were now legislating for a moribund system; and, in order to protect constituencies which sooner or later must cease to exist, were imposing such restrictions upon candidates in large constituencies as would make the fair conduct of elections almost impossible. He held that the Schedules could not be allowed to stand. Something must be substituted for them which would work fairly. He suggested that a distinction should be drawn between counties and boroughs. Had hon. Gentlemen who were likely to stand for large constituencies realized what would be their position under this Bill? They would not be able to communicate with their constituents by post, because that course would be too expensive. The only way in which the candidate could make his views known was by public meetings. But then he was not allowed to advertise the public meeting. [The ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir Henry James) dissented.] At any rate, one of the clauses was capable of that contention. Anyone contesting a county constituency would find himself in a position of great embarrassment. Another difficulty which would confront him under the Bill would be that he could not employ a sufficient number of clerks for carrying on the necessary business. He would suggest that a section ought to be taken out of the Ballot Act Continuance Amendment Bill. He would further suggest that, in regard to these Schedules as to expenditure, the Attorney General should reverse his system. He should calculate for the largest constituencies first and estimate what expenses were necessary. He then could reduce the scale of expenditure in proportion to the size of the constituencies, and in that way he would arrive at a uniform system. It was quite clear that it was not necessary to have so large an expenditure for a small borough as for a large constituency. Or, if the Attorney General objected to that, let him estimate what sum might fairly be spent per head of the electorate, and then say that, in no circumstances, was the expenditure to exceed so many shillings per head. In that way candidates would know what to do, and a far better check than the one proposed would be placed on the evil complained of. Then, as regarded the employment of individuals, he did not believe that large constituencies were affected—though in small constituencies it was different—by the number of persons employed by the candidates. It might be necessary to employ 50 clerks for a day to get through necessary clerical work, and they would not be employed again. But, under this Bill, the most absurd restriction was imposed; and he did not see how, under it, it would be possible to get through the legitimate business of the central committee. Therefore, he thought it would be well to strike out the first Schedule, so far as large constituencies were concerned. If they put all these tremendous penalties on Parliamentary candidates to stop bribery and corruption, the ingenuity of man would, in some way or other, carry out those practices without rendering the guilty parties responsible, and a ready method was at once suggested in the municipal elections. Now, he did not suppose that, in the small boroughs in which corruption prevailed, they would do any good unless they applied the corrupt practices penalties to municipal as well as Parliamentary elections. Moreover, there was another danger which was perfectly certain to occur under this Bill if candidates were to be subject to great penalties. In a very short time, he believed, almost every political association would enter into an arrangement to the effect that those employed would have their salaries raised in ordinary years if they gave their services gratuitously whenever an election occurred. Some such system as that would be adopted, and he failed to see how that Bill would check it. He might illustrate this by referring to what was called the Home Counties Liberal Union. The operations of this Society extended to a good many constituencies; and if an election occurred in any one of these constituencies within the area covered, it would always be possible for this Association or any other to turn on to help the candidate the whole of the officers employed by the Association. If they incurred a penalty it could not be a severe one, and, of course, the penalty would be paid by the Association. If the

[Second Night.]

Lord George Hamilton

Schedules remained as they were when they came into Committee, they would not make as satisfactory and rapid progress as they otherwise might do.

MR. H. SAMUELSON said, it was a matter for congratulation that at last the House found itself engaged in practical legislation. He congratulated his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General on the favourable reception, upon the whole, which his Bill had met with on both sides of the House, and thanked him for his promise to consider suggestions, from whatever quarter of the House they might proceed. The Bill was said to be too stringent; but the disease of corruption was undoubtedly spread very widely, and virulent diseases required drastic remedies. They had been told that this Bill was an attempt to legislate in advance of public opinion. It was certainly not in advance of the opinion of persons who had considered the subject, and he did not believe the Bill was much in advance of public opinion generally. The constituencies were deeply interested in the matters dealt with by the Bill; and there existed a healthy state of opinion, which only required the stimulus of sincere and vigorous action on the part of the Government, showing a real recognition of the magnitude of the evil and a positive determination to eradicate it, to come prominently to the surface. Such a stimulus was afforded by that Bill. He would advert to one or two evils which the Bill did not touch; and if no other Member proposed any Amendment with reference to them, he himself would do so. Nothing was more foreign to the spirit, though not to the practice, of our elections than intimidation. The Ballot, to a great extent, diminished the evil of intimidation; at any rate, so far as employers and customers were concerned. But there were certain other forms of intimidation against which there was no provision in the Bill. There was the requisition dodge. Requisitions in favour of candidates were sent out by the friends of the candidates to electors, who were requested to return the requisitions with their signatures to a candidate's committee or some influential person. The person to whom the requisitions were to be returned could do great injury, if they would, to electors who refused to sign the requisitions; therefore, weak and timid voters were thus intimidated into signing a promise which they often had every intention of breaking. There was also the custom of sending to every voter a polling card, to be personally returned to the committee room after the poll. A man might as well vote openly as take his voting card to the committee room. These practices ought to be declared to be illegal. There was the custom of inserting in newspapers a long list of voters as members of a candidate's committee. Every person who was named in such a list as a supporter of a candidate ought to be regarded, for the purposes of the Corrupt Practices Act, as an agent of that candidate, who ought, to a certain extent, to be made responsible for the acts of that agent.

MR. DIXON-HARTLAND said, that, having lately contested two constituencies, and having had the misfortune of fighting two Election Petitions and one scrutiny, he thought he had some experience of the question now before the House. That experience was all the greater because the constituency which he last fought, and which he now represented, was described by the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) as the rottenest of rotten boroughs. He thought it was a great mistake for any hon. Gentleman so to stigmatize a constituency of which he had no knowledge, and where he was perfectly unknown. It was a charge very easy to make, and very difficult to refute, as very few boroughs had the good fortune to be able to prove, by the decision of Her Majesty's Judges, as Evesham had done, that such a statement was not only unfounded, but unjust. In his own case, after a trial which lasted from the 2nd to the 17th of the month inclusive, the Judges not only unseated his opponent and gave him the seat, but also awarded him all the costs, yet the law was such that taxing-masters were able to put the Judges' decision at defiance and mulct him in several thousand pounds. He was told that that was always the case; but if that was a question of such national importance that two of Her Majesty's Judges were kept for over a fortnight in a country town, should the cost be so heavy in case of success, and nearly ruinous in case of failure? Was not the knowledge that such must be the result sufficient to deter men from presenting Petitions? He thought a measure ought to be passed to put a stop to the evils disclosed by the recent Commissions; but the present Bill was, in his judgment, at the same time too weak and too strong—too weak because it held out no inducement to keep a party straight, too strong because it was nothing more or less than a Coercion Bill against candidates, and, if it passed, it would put an end to any Member being able to do good in his own borough at any time when he was sitting for it. And though he would be one of the last to encourage bribery under the name of charity, yet he thought that true charity was one of the greatest privileges of Members, and to take away from Members the power of doing good would be a great misfortune. He hoped a clause would be introduced to make the system of Petitions very much cheaper, for it was useless to give a luxury which was too dear to be enjoyed. He also thought it desirable that the present provision of the law relating to a scrutiny should be abolished.

[Second Night.]

MR. STANTON said, he represented a constituency (Stroud), which, in 13 months, had had five contested elections and four Petitions; and the House would believe that he spoke feelingly on the subject, considering the very dreadful experiences he had had. He believed there was a general feeling in favour of the second reading of the Bill; but, before it passed, he should like to see some provision introduced with regard to out-voters, who were frequently labouring men. Now that the expense of elections was to be curtailed, that class, being unable to bear the cost of a journey to the polling-booth themselves, would, unless some system were devised, be practically disfranchised. He would therefore suggest that the out-voters should have the power to apply to the Returning Officer for a voting paper, to be signed in the presence of a magistrate, and to be returned to the Returning Officer through the Post Office. It might be said that that was interfering with the secrecy of voting; but he would trust to the magistrates not to exercise undue influence nor to divulge their knowledge. The events at Stroud, he might observe, occurred because, at the trial of Petitions, the parties who petitioned were wise enough not to claim the seat. Consequently, the acts of the Petitioners could not be inquired into.

Mr. Dixon-Hartland

Might not the state of things he had described be dealt with in this measure? If the tribunal, whatever it might be, were allowed to inquire into the conduct of both sides, they would get rid of the abuse of Petitions, for Petitioners ought to come before the Court with clean hands, which was hardly ever the case at present.

MR. SCHREIBER: I could not help thinking, Sir, last night, that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General took a somewhat disparaging view of his own Bill, when he wished that it should be read a second time after three hours' discussion in a languid House. Now, in my view, no Bills are so important as those which deal with the franchises of the people and the return of Members to this House; and if, in the course of the present Session, we succeed in passing a measure founded on this Bill, and an analogous measure for the municipal elections, we shall do much, I think, to redeem the Session from the barrenness which otherwise seems likely to distinguish it. Now, Sir, no doubt this is an example of what Lord Palmerston once called a "spanking Bill." But, in my opinion, the occasion demands a "spanking Bill;" either that, or that the electors who are so minded should be free to dispose of their votes without those risks to the buyer and seller which are sometimes thought such an excellent joke, and sometimes are no joke at all—witness, the election agents who have been sent to prison, and the two Cabinet Ministers who have been sent—in search of other seats. One thing there is which cannot be tolerated—I mean that the law should remain as it is. Either it must be made more stringent, or it must be entirely repealed. Now, Sir, although I have listened most attentively to all that has been said in the course of this debate, I have not heard a single word about the causes of the flagrant corruption which marked the late General Election; and I do not know how we are to cure a malady, unless we are first clear as to its cause. Of the two causes which seem to me to be at work in the constituencies, the first connects itself so closely with the "struggle for existence," that I hardly like to speak of it as corruption. The poorest class of voters in our towns are so poor, that with them the great question of the day is always how they shall get through to-morrow. Those men, Sir, see two gentlemen, whose wealth is always grossly exaggerated by report, contending for the prize as if their lives depended on the result, and seeing also large sums of money spent on printing, agents, and committee rooms, they, too, put in their claim for a modest share of "what is going" with a force which the local agent finds himself unable to resist; and so, by colourable employment or otherwise, the candidate's return is vitiated. Now, there is only one way in which this pressure can be done away with. We must forbid by law the expenditure which causes it; and that I take to be the real defence of what the hon. and learned Attorney General calls his "Maximum Schedule," and on which, with the permission of the House, I shall wish to say a few words presently. The second cause of corruption I find in the annual recurrence of the municipal elections. Now, Sir, in speaking of that subject, I wish it to be distinctly understood that I know nothing but what is good of my own constituents, and that in anything I may say I refer to what I have read in Blue Books or in newspapers about the constituencies of other hon. Members. Well, what is happening now was distinctly foretold by me in 1868. Here is what I said—

"But, when all this had been done, he (Mr. Schreiber) would not have the House deceive itself—it would have done nothing until it had grappled with the evils of bribery at municipal elections. The Bill of last Session established an identity of Parliamentary and municipal franchise; and he said that while corruption was constant, annual, flagrant at the municipal elections, it was a mockery and a farce to send down Parliamentary candidates and tell them to hold pure elections;"—[3 Hansard, cxcii. 669.]

and, further on—

"Whether there would or would not be bribery depended on whether there was or was not a balance of party which made it worth while to contest the municipal elections. So surely as these were contested corruption would come in; and with a reduction of the franchise they would only extend the area of corruption."—[Ibid. 670.]

Encouraged, Sir, by the success which has attended on that prophecy, I now venture to make another, and it is this—that if "Financial Boards" are established in the counties, with a rating franchise, and with annual elections of their members, your county elections will also become corrupt. The fact is, Sir, that the working man is, as a rule, supremely indifferent whether the local grocer or the local ironmonger sits in the local Parliament; but to the local wire-puller the municipal elections are of supreme importance—first, as tests of the strength of Parties; and next, on account of the patronage which the local majority enjoys. In this way, certain corrupt conventions are set up in the municipal elections, which, when the Parliamentary election comes round, make themselves felt with fatal force; and we may spare all our labour on this Bill unless we are determined to deal with the same severity and, at the same time, with the question of the municipal elections. I now wish, Sir, to make a few remarks on one or two clauses of the Bill. The penalty imposed by Clause 4 would be excellent, if the present rate of expenditure is to be maintained. It is a matter within my own experience that a candidate may come down to a constituency; by a profuse expenditure may procure his return; may be unseated on Petition; may then transfer to a friend the interest which his corrupt expenditure has created; and may then, at the end of five or six years, return to the place himself, and make it a subject of the loudest complaint that he was ever unseated on Petition. For such a proceeding the penalties of Clause 4 furnish an effectual remedy; but, under the new scale of expenditure, I must say I do not see how they can be necessary; for the Schedule will go so near to starving an election that it will be quite impossible for a candidate in the future to make himself "agreeable" to a constituency by his expenditure. Passing to the question of "illegal," as distinguished from "corrupt" practices, I am not able to agree with the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton), for I think it simply monstrous to make laws only to break them. Either let us not make the sin by making the law, or, if we make the law, let us enforce it; either let us abolish the offence of "illegal" practices altogether, or let us visit the breach of the law with the heaviest penalties. I come next, Sir, to the "Maximum Schedule," and taking Poole as a model constituency, with some 2,000 electors, I find I should be permitted to spend £100 in printing and in placarding the walls of the borough. Well, Sir, I really could not undertake adequately to set forth the shortcomings of the present Government for the sum of £100; and I should greatly prefer some latitude in that respect, thinking that I might with advantage spend a larger sum. I therefore do hope, Sir, that the hon. and learned Gentleman will be willing to stretch what he calls his "Maximum Schedule." I ought, perhaps, to mention here that, in 1880, I found it necessary to spend as much as £450 on printing, my placards being torn down by an organized band of 20 men as fast as they were put up. Then, with regard to agency, I see that I shall be allowed the sum of £270 for all the other expenses of the election. How am I to secure out of that sum the services of a competent agent? I can only say, Sir, that I owe my election and my present opportunity of inflicting this speech upon the House to the fact that I was willing to pay for the services of the best agent that money could procure. And, speaking generally, it is my understanding that if I want a good thing I must expect to pay for it; and if I want the opinion of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General I should expect to have to pay for it. I have no wish, Sir, to see this House composed of poor men, for there is nothing of which I am more profoundly convinced than of this—that the liberties of this House and of the people have been won by men of independent fortune. Every Member of the House ought, I think, Sir, to satisfy these three conditions. First, it ought to be a matter of supreme indifference to him on which side of your Chair he and his Party sit; next, he ought to be able to snap his fingers at any Minister who threatens him with a Dissolution; and, lastly, his circumstances should be such as to place his motives beyond the reach of suspicion. It is, I believe, Sir, because its Members have, in the main, long satisfied these three conditions that this House has been able to establish its hold on the respect and the affections of the English people. I have to thank the House, Sir, for the indulgence with which it has listened to these observations; and I have now only to regret the absence of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department, whose long connection and intimate acquaintance with the politics of the City of Oxford give him a varied and a valuable experience which ought to have been placed at the disposal of the House; and along with that of the right hon. and learned Gentleman I have also to regret the absence of another Member of the Government, whose presence on this occasion was almost equally desirable—I mean, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Scarborough (Mr. Dodson).

[Second Night.]

MR. O'DONNELL agreed in general terms with the observations of the hon. Member who had just sat down as to the necessity of the House being composed of independent Members who would be able to snap their fingers at any Ministry which threatened them with a Dissolution. But the mere extent of a rent-roll would not bring about that happy consummation. He did not agree with the hon. Member that men of wealth had been exclusively the leading defenders of the liberties of this country. An Irishman (Edmund Burke) rose on many occasions in the House on behalf of liberty; and he was not aware that Mr. Burke was a man of independent fortune, though, indeed, from his wealth of brains he could have endowed the Members of several average Ministries. William Pitt (afterwards Lord Chatham) was for many a day anything but a man of independent fortune. This whole question of independence was a question of relative terms and relative work. The man who barely earned his weekly income might be a man of independence, while the man who counted his annual rent-roll by tens of thousands might be the most abject slave that ever crawled in the wake of a Ministerial Whip. This Bill might be accurately described as a Bill for the prevention of lucrative rewards for services rendered at Parliamentary elections. He was not sure that the House would succeed in convincing the electors at large of the reality of the abhorrence in which it held the system of lucrative rewards for political services until the House first commenced to abolish lucrative rewards for political services in its midst. The Bill was aimed at bribery. Was it anything short of bribery for the Government to invite the votes of Lancashire cotton spinners by proposing the abolition of the Cotton Duty? Was the granting of titles as a reward for political subservience far short of bribery? He thought it would be well that Governments should have clean hands before they ascended the pedestal of virtue to lecture half-starving electors with a view to prevent them accepting bribes. A very large dose of corruption seemed to be the necessary basis of Party Government. The hon. Member who last addressed the House considered £100 a small sum to expend in proclaiming throughout his constituency the shortcomings of the Liberal Government; but the printing bill which he (Mr. O'Donnell) had to pay for the little borough of Dungarvan—and he believed the sentiments he expressed were sufficiently vigorous—did not reach £25; and he thought that, with a judicious selection of sentences, and a careful attention to the most telling phrases of opprobrium, the hon. Member with his £100 would get exceedingly good value for his money. As for the Bill itself, it was very good as far as it affected the grosser forms of bribery; but they, he feared, were going out of fashion to make way for finer methods of corruption, which were growing up under the influence of civilization and culture. Under a changed order of things, the Bill would open the door to abuses of the most dangerous kind. He should be delighted to see a diminution in those scandalous bills of costs which disgraced many constituencies; but even after the legal expenses had been reduced to the maximum scale contained in the Bill, he was afraid there would still be the possibility of an enormous amount of corruption. The Bill would not prevent that most dangerous form of corruption—the “nursing” of constituencies, which might be done in various ways. It was carried on by candidates who were wealthy, and by others who were supposed to be wealthy. He knew a candidate who before an election filled the voters of an Irish borough with vain hopes of the speedy erection of a great mill in their midst. He knew another candidate who actually paraded through a town, some short time before his election, a procession of machines, conveying the idea that he was about to make that town the centre of a manufacturing industry. He knew another candidate who ostentatiously sent a staff of surveyors from London to survey the coast in the neighbourhood of a maritime borough, and thus created the impression that he was about to embark in the most lavish expenditure upon piers and harbours. These were illustrations of what “nursing” constituencies meant. A more dangerous form of corruption than that arose through the action of permanent organizations—he cared not whether Liberal or Tory—which manifested their activity with regard to every kind of election, and introduced corruption into every branch of the Representative system. There was nothing in the Bill to deal with such proceedings, and, indeed, he doubted if systematic corruption of that description could be stopped. He believed, however, that the Bill would stop the grosser form of corruption. That, perhaps, was all that the House had a right to expect. But, so far as the attempt to try Election Petitions by a single Judge was concerned, however objectionable in England that might be, it was absolutely intolerable in Ireland. They could not trust themselves to the intense partizans who continually found their way to the Judicial Bench in Ireland. They might have partizans in England, but in Ireland they habitually got partizans. He knew, in his own case, that the question whether he should be unseated or not depended upon who the Election Judge should be. He hoped, if the Government insisted on a single Judge for England, they would consent to allow at least two Judges for Ireland. He should support the second reading of the Bill, although he believed that it would not make any great impression upon the political morals of the country.

MR. W. H. JAMES said, that the expenditure of Conservative candidates, as returned to the House, was invariably greater than the expenditure of Liberal Members. He did not, however, wish to press that point. There was nothing more difficult to define than bribery. There could be no doubt that it was part of the social system, not merely in the matter of election, but in the ordinary affairs of life. It existed there to a deplorable extent. Sir Edmund Beckett, writing to The Times on this subject, pointed out the great extent of the evil. This was at the root of the electoral corruption which they now condemned. When a candidate came before the electors, many persons in humble position were, unhappily, trained in the belief that the vote they were asked for was hardly worth the having unless they could get something for it. He would give one illustration of this. In the course of a canvas in the county of Kent, a candidate applied to a butcher for his vote. The butcher replied—"Yes, Sir, I shall be very happy to vote for you if now and then you will give me a vote for a leg of mutton." This was the general view taken in a certain class—there should be a quid pro quo. When this Bill came into Committee, he should endeavour to make certain Amendments upon it with regard to the furnishing of all details of expenditure to some public officer. He believed that if such a principle were carried out a great discouragement would be given to corrupt practices.

[Second Night.]

SIR WILLIAM HART DYKE said, he was prepared to give his general support to the second reading of the Bill, and he was also opposed to the Amendment then before the House. He believed that the evil with which the Bill proposed to cope was not a stationary evil, but one which was growing in our very midst, and was one which required harsh measures to grapple with it. He thought the hon. and learned Gentleman might be congratulated on the favourable acceptance with which the Bill had been received at the hands of the House; and he was of opinion that he had done right in assenting to the further debate on the second reading of the Bill. His (Sir William Hart Dyke's) experience with reference to such matters was, that if a Bill was hurried through the second reading, it generally recoiled upon the promoter, who had much greater difficulty in dealing with it at the Committee stage, in consequence of his ignorance of the general feeling of the House. With reference to the remarks of an hon. Member opposite, he was strongly of opinion that if, instead of discussing the merits or the demerits of the Bill, they proceeded to throw stones at each other across the floor of the House, they would be only wasting the time of the House, and cause a sudden and abnormal rise in the price of plate glass. He wished to add his experience to the assistance of the Attorney General, with the object of making the Bill a good one; and with regard to any other matters he was utterly hard-hearted and reckless. Although the Bill was a most excellent endeavour to stop bribery, he was somewhat alarmed that it was so harsh in some of its provisions. However good their intention might be, the Bill would frustrate it by the harshness of the proposed remedy. He thought they ought to be careful, in order that they might not, by passing the Bill with such severe penalties, cause a swinging back of the pendulum and a re-action against it which might lead to a very serious modification in the future. They had been told that it was a very great hardship that many excellent men should be debarred, by the existing system, from taking part in the proceedings and debates of the House; but it seemed to him that if some of the provisions were not seriously altered, the Bill would have the effect also of preventing a large number of candidates, whose presence would be of great advantage to the House, from ever taking part in an election. He alluded to Clause 4 more particularly, in which it was laid down that if any unfortunate candidate, through his agent, was guilty of any illegal practices, he could not again become a candidate for the constituency. He thought that the clause was a very harsh one as it stood. In the first place, it was obvious that they could not restrict the time occupied in an election, which might last a week or 10 days, or, it was possible, might go on for many weeks, or even months, directly or indirectly. Under the clause, as it then stood, he could not conceive it possible that any two candidates, running a hard race for an election, could carry on the contest for many weeks without being almost distracted by the danger they would run under that harsh clause. Then, with regard to the appointment of only one agent for each constituency, the agent, under the Bill, was made a very important man indeed, and was, practically, the arbiter of the destiny of the candidate during the election. He thought that the severe provisions of the Bill would put a candidate for a large and straggling county in the utmost danger if he were only allowed to have one agent. In such a constituency, with a contest lasting three weeks, it would be utterly impossible for any one agent to prevent, "here and there," some illegal act, which might upset an election. There was not a single county constituency which he would dare fight to-morrow, with anything like security, with only one agent, as the return might be made invalid, with all the pains and penalties attaching to it. He had a great objection to the clause dealing with the maximum of expenditure, because there was too wide a margin. The maximum was not truly fixed, because if it were a correct scale for the expenditure of an election which might last a fortnight, he would say that it was not a true and correct scale for an election which lasted two months. It was certainly wrong in one case or the other. He could see a good and solid reason why there should be a maximum; but, at the same time, he did not see how any election could be conducted in a very large county constituency for a considerable time under the maximum scale. He did not think it would be fair to press the Attorney General to abandon the principle of a certain maximum; but perhaps the hon. and learned Gentleman would consider whether it would be possible to make some alteration in his maximum scale, more especially as they could not restrict the time of commencement or the duration of a contest. In Section 4, Clause 12, of the Bill, it was provided that where a person was prosecuted before an Election Court for any corrupt or illegal practice, the Court should immediately proceed to adjudicate. Supposing that some corrupt machinery outside the scope of the Bill should be introduced by irresponsible persons totally unknown to the candidate, he wanted to know why the section should not be applied to a tribunal sitting in a borough for the summary decision of any charges which might arise? His suggestion was that they should have two Justices sitting in a borough during an election, who could at once decide upon any case which should be brought before them. He thought by those means that they would deal a more leadly blow to corrupt practices than could be found in a great many clauses of the Bill before the House. It was necessary to deal with a difficulty when it arose, and he would venture to say that were such a system as that applied it would be found best calculated to afford immediate relief to any candidate placed in a difficult position. He trusted the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite would carefully consider the many suggestions and amendments which had been proposed with regard to the Bill;

and he could assure him that all on the Opposition side of the House would cordially co-operate with him in putting an end to a great evil which they had all talked about for many years, and all had regretted, but he believed had never seriously made up their minds, one and all, to obliterate from their electoral system.

MR. LEWIS said, he found himself in great difference with his Friends on the Opposition side of the House with regard to this Bill. He was unable to support the second reading on any ground. It was obvious to the House that it would not be right for him to withhold the expression of his opinion on the subject. He objected to the Bill strongly, because he considered that all the chief alterations which it made were alterations which were highly inexpedient, if not absolutely unjust. It appeared to him that the Bill was remarkable for the alterations it would make upon three leading points, one of them involving several other points of no little importance. In the first place, the character of treating for which the candidate was made responsible, was entirely altered by the Bill. In the second place, a totally new class of offences, with penal consequences, was created by the Bill. And, thirdly, they were asked to give the go-by to the benefit of legislation as to the strength of the Election tribunal, which was based upon the Report of the Select Committee of the House, to which he would refer presently. With reference to the constitution of tribunals to try Election Petitions, he had the strongest possible objection to the clause embodying that alteration. He looked upon it as a most reckless and vital invasion upon the safety of Members' candidates, that their liberties, their character, their political history, their hopes for the future, and all the objects which political men held most dear, should be placed in the power of one Judge, without appeal, under circumstances which did not preclude the possibility even of bias. From their past experience, he was entitled to say there were some sad cases as to which they had heard the remark that a political bias had existed. He had no hesitation in saying that there had been, in the decisions of one Judge especially, most painful evidence of political bias; and in saying, further, with reference to one decision, which was perfectly notorious throughout the Kingdom under the name of the "rabbit case," that it had excited grave dissatisfaction against the tribunal of a single Judge. Nothing would induce him to abstain from opposing this unjust Bill in every way which the Rules of the House would enable him to do so. The House, in a fit of self-denying generosity, thought it right to cease trying Election Petitions, and with a kind of idolatry for judicial personages which was, unfortunately, too rife in England, and for which there was no just foundation, said, "We will place the trial in the hands of one man." He was bound to say that in one or two cases in Ireland, in which Members not connected with the political Party to which he belonged were concerned, there were judgments by which one or two Members of the Home Rule Party were turned out, which he read almost with disgust. The House appointed a Committee in 1875, of which his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General was a Member. The Committee, by a majority of 11 to 5, decided that no decision turning a Member out of his seat should be allowed without the concurrence of two Judges. In the majority, he remembered, was his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General, and he was in a position to say there was no more determined supporter of that Resolution than the Solicitor General, whose name was on the back of this Bill. The Report of that Committee remained unnoticed for a considerable period. The late Government brought in more than one Bill in which they overlooked that recommendation of that Report; but the late Attorney General was so satisfied with its just requirements, that in the last Bill which they proposed before they left Office they decided to introduce trial by two Judges. In an Election Petition the Judge tried both the law and the facts. Had they any analogy in the whole of their judicial system to that? Yes, they had. All the members of the Judicial Bench in the Chancery Division were exactly in the same position; and what was the case with regard to appeal? Why, that there was an appeal in every case, which might ultimately reach the highest Court of Appeal in the House of Lords. From the decision of a single Judge in the Chancery Division there was an appeal even on interlocutory matters. But had the House the least idea how that appeal worked? Were the Judges always right? Those Judges were of great experience. Many of them had been in a leading position at the Bar, and others upon the Bench, for years. Did we find that even in the large majority of appealed cases their decisions were upheld? By no means. He had been able to obtain a Return for the year 1878 of the appeals from the decisions of the Chancery Judges. There were 253 appeals from the Master of the Rolls and the Vice Chancellors, and in no less than 106 cases their decisions were either reversed or materially altered. He believed that the fact of there being two Judges trying Election Petitions would frequently save a large amount of time. As regarded the new offence of illegal expenditure, the provisions of the Bill would probably be, he believed, evaded. If he were a single candidate for a double-barrelled constituency, he should only be allowed to spend some £500; but if he got three "bogus" candidates to stand with him during the whole time of the election, and if they gave him the advantage of their agents and expenses, he should be enabled to spend a considerable amount more than the Bill intended he should; while if a candidate contested a county with 30,000 electors, he would only be entitled to have one agent, and to pay him a wholly inadequate sum. The result must be that the candidate, unable to secure the services of a respectable man, would be obliged to employ some shady customer. At the last Election a certain gentleman stood for Middlesex alone, and his expenses amounted to £7,000. That candidate was the pure son of a pure father; he represented a pure interest, and it was impossible to suppose that he did any impure thing. Well, the benevolent author of this Bill would only allow him to spend £930. It was ridiculous to suggest that a Middlesex Election could be conducted, even in the most niggardly and miserly fashion, upon such an amount. How could the expenditure be controlled? At the Election for West Kent in 1865, it became known at half-past 3 on the day before the polling day that a forged circular had been sent to all the out-voters, stating that each Party had agreed to withdraw a candidate; and it at once became necessary to spend £200 in despatching messengers and telegrams throughout the county, in order to counteract the influence of this wicked and impudent forgery. Yet, under the Bill, payments made in such emergencies would be illegal payments, and would render a candidate liable to be for ever prevented from representing the constituency. If he might invent a title for the Bill, it would be—"A Bill for the purpose of frightening Persons from becoming Candidates for a seat in Parliament, and for imprisoning and disqualifying all those who do." If it were conceivable that it could be passed without modification, a pretty equal division on both sides of the House would find themselves in gaol. He intreated the House not to assent to the second reading, because it was impossible to mend a Bill like this when it got into Committee. ["Oh, oh!"] Well, they would ring the bell for a Division, and Gentlemen like the hon. Member for the North Riding of Yorkshire (Mr. Milbank), who so ejaculated, who was now reaping the advantage of sitting so long on that side of the House, would come trooping in to vote down every Amendment that was proposed. The whole legal and moral character of treating, he might remark, was changed by the omission of the word "corrupt." In conclusion, he asked the House not to agree to the second reading of a Bill which was a reckless, an inexpedient, and an unjust attack on the liberties of constituencies.

Sir R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he did not rise for the purpose of taking any part in the discussion, but merely to ask his hon. Friend to withdraw his Amendment.

MR. R. N. FOWLER said, he was quite willing to comply with the request of the right hon. Gentleman, but hoped to raise the question in Committee.

MR. CALLAN said, that, not being amenable to the blandishments of the Treasury Bench or the Front Opposition Bench, he had no intention of yielding, even at this late hour, to the request of the right hon. Gentleman, made probably by arrangement. He had observed the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs taking notes throughout the discussion. He supposed the hon. Gentleman declined to speak now, lest it should be said the Government contributed to prevent a division. No such consideration weighed with him (Mr. Callan) and therefore he proposed to speak his opinion regarding the Bill. ["Divide!"] Last night, when he asked the Attorney-General to grant an adjournment of the House, he would not consent to do so. No doubt, he wished that there should not be a discussion which might disclose some unpleasant facts about the borough of Taunton and other Liberal constituencies. The Attorney General did not desire to fish in troubled waters, and to expose the corruption of the Liberal Party. He regretted it was not proposed that the Bill should operate retrospectively, because he thought, with Baron Dowse, that if they were to view with a judicial mind all the proceedings that occurred in reference to Members of that House, they would scarcely have a House of Commons at all. Why had the word "corruptly," found in previous Acts, been omitted from this Bill? It must have been left out designedly. He was not surprised that a right hon. Gentleman representing Taunton should designedly leave out the word "corruptly." No explanation of this had been offered, and in the short time that remained it was not possible for the Attorney General to give an explanation.

And it being ten minutes before Seven of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned till this day.

The House suspended its Sitting at Seven of the clock.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

MOTION.

LUNACY LAWS.—RESOLUTION.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON, in rising to call attention to the impropriety and danger of permitting private persons to make pecuniary profit by keeping in their custody lunatics of the wealthier classes; and to the unfairness of requiring the ratepayers to maintain lunatics of the middle and lower classes; and to move, "That all lunatics ought to be committed to the keeping of the State," said, the Lunacy Laws were in such an anomalous state that the very gravest abuses were possible under them—abuses which, if these laws did not actually encourage, they certainly permitted. The present system, if system it could be called, had grown up during 40 years without revision or re-consideration, as a whole, and was wrong in principle, in practice, and in detail. He feared he would succeed in creating but little interest on the subject among the occupants of the Front Benches on either side of the House, for the official mind upon this question was absolutely dead. The President of the Local Government Board and the Home Secretary, who might be called the heads of the lunatics—he meant in their official capacity—cared for none of these things; and he had almost the same complaint to make of the lethargy of their Predecessors in Office. But he would warn the Government that the country was once roused to the fearful abuses that prevailed, and that the country might be roused again. The law divided lunatics into two classes, rich and poor—a mere arbitrary division without a true distinction. The rich lunatics were handed over to a body of private speculators, who made profit out of their detention. The poorer class—that was, the class below those who could pay £70 or £80 a-year to the owners of licensed houses—were placed in the category of paupers. He did not wish to speak harshly of persons, but only of the principle; he should mention no names; but he could not help speaking strongly of a system that encouraged speculation and large expenditure in licensed houses, with a view to the profit of their owners. The money so invested must pay interest. The owners of these licensed houses were anxious to receive lunatics, and found it difficult to release them. It was not easy to make up one's mind to get rid of a patient who was paying £1,000 a-year. What a temptation was thus placed before poor human nature! It was quite possible to retard the cure of a lunatic by the administration of drugs, and it was almost impossible to prove that any wrong had been done. He asked the Government to take away from the owners of these houses a great temptation. The law must necessarily permit, with regard to lunacy, the forcible arrest of individuals. Prompt measures were necessary without a long inquiry. Therefore, additional precaution was necessary to guard against undue detention. A Scotch Commissioner in Lunacy had said that the question of the detention of lunatics was generally determined by the convenience and comfort of others, not of the patient. That was a point he wished the House to realize. The discharge of a lunatic was a loss to the proprietors; and could they expect a man to clear out his own boarding-house? Inspection was provided, it was true; but the staff of Inspectors was small and overworked, and wholly inadequate to remedy the evils. Prevention was better than cure. Surely it was better to remove temptation. What he would propose in regard to the rich was that there should be a State proprietary of these licensed houses. That the State should gradually take over the establishments—it must be remembered they were more than self-supporting; they yielded a large profit from the payments of the patients—and pay the Medical Superintendent, who would then have no interest in the detention of lunatics, a fixed and adequate salary. Let all vested interest be recognized, and let the change be gradual, the house remaining in the same privacy, and in the care of the same medical man, if he was efficient. The only difference would be that the temptation of self-interest would be removed from the proprietors, whose vested interest would be saved, and that the profit would be utilized for those lunatics who were not able to pay for their maintenance. He was not proposing a mere ideal remedy for a theoretical grievance—real grievances were there. The Commissioners themselves in their Report said—

Mr. Stanley Leighton

“There is an uneasy feeling, somewhat widely spread, that further safeguards are needed for the protection of persons alleged to be insane.”

These were words founded on actual experience. He would give out of the last Lunacy Report two instances, one in which the Commissioners were compelled to require the resignation of the assistant medical man, so grievous was the dissatisfaction at his conduct. Another case he wished particularly to bring before the notice of the House. The Commissioners reported in respect of one licensed private lunatic asylum—

“Very considerable discontent was discovered among the patients, and numerous charges of cruel practices were brought forward. The cruelty was proved; it consisted in putting blisters on the nape of the necks of unruly pa-ients, which afforded opportunities, apparently really used, of causing pain by roughly dressing the patients. It appears also that tartar emetic was freely used to bring the patients into a low and weak state. None of the applications of tartar emetic or blisters were recorded in the books."

He brought forward those two cases from last year's Report of the Commissioners to prove that all things were not so well conducted in private asylums as many supposed. He had no wish to make a sensational speech; he only wished the Government to deal with this matter before a passionate feeling arose in the country on the subject. If he showed some reason why the State should take over the superintendence of private licensed asylums, it would follow almost as a necessary consequence that it should deal in the same way with the poor who were taken care of in the pauper asylums. Under the present system, all lunatics who could not afford to pay £80 or £100 a-year were placed in pauper asylums. The arrangements with respect to those asylums were simply chaotic, for there were no less than six conflicting authorities; they were the Home Secretary, the President of the Local Government Board, the Courts of Quarter Sessions, the Boards of Guardians, the Visiting Committees, and the Commissioners appointed by Government. Those different bodies were constantly in conflict. Again, a different system as to the care of lunatics existed in each of the Three Kingdoms. Moreover, pauper lunatic asylums were filled with persons belonging to the middle classes, comprising officers of the Army and Navy, clergymen, and literary men. If it were a hardship and a cruelty to associate pauperism and insanity, surely it was a hardship and an injustice to the ratepayers to make them provide for the insanity of the middle classes. The lunacy of the country was increasing; 1,500 persons were added every year to the list of pauper lunatics. Lancashire had recently been compelled to spend £80,000 on new buildings; Gloucestershire, £25,000; Shropshire, £46,000; Middlesex, £40,000; and Kingston-upon-Hull, £50,000. He might be told that this proposal was nothing but centralization; but, at the present moment, lunatic asylums were, in reality, governed from the Home Office, and local bodies had little or nothing to do in the matter. Nor did he think it possible that these institutions could be properly governed by the local authorities. If the Government were to take over the pauper lunatic asylums, they would be able to introduce a system of classification. At present all cases, whether acute or chronic, were thrust together into one large building very much to the injury of the lunatics themselves; the result being that the recoveries in pauper asylums were less numerous than in licensed houses. If the State took over all asylums, they would be able to create a regular gradation of payment, according to scale. They would be able to get rid of the present abominable system of subvention to the local rates, which the Prime Minister had declared to be the worst possible system that could exist with regard to rates. They did not want another subvention, but they demanded that Departments which properly belonged to the nation should be taken off the rates altogether. It might be said that he was bringing two questions forward at the same time; that was not the case, for he was calling attention to the whole system of the Lunacy Laws, which arbitrarily and wrongly divided lunatics into the two classes of rich and poor—an unsound and indefensible system. If his proposal were supported, they would succeed in dissociating pauperism and insanity, which would be a blessing to the poorer classes; at the same time, they would relieve the ratepayers of a most unjust burden. With regard to the rich, their detention as lunatics would be dissociated from any idea of private profit or speculation; thus a benefit would be conferred upon rich and poor, and a scandal removed from the laws of this country. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

MR. GURDON, in seconding the Motion, said, that among all the cases of unjust burdens cast upon the owners of real property, the maintenance of lunatics was the most unjust of all. What possible reason was there that the expenditure for the maintenance of lunatics should fall exclusively upon the owners of real property? Could it be contended for a moment that the owners of real property furnished a larger proportion of lunatics than the owners of other property? Lunacy was a national misfortune, and ought to be under national management and supported by national expenditure. To a certain extent the late Government recognized the fact by a subvention in aid of the maintenance of lunatics; but, like other subventions, it was not an unmixed good. The first result was that a large number of imbeciles were transferred from the Unions to the lunatic asylums—certainly not an economical proceeding. What they wanted was that the management and cost of maintenance of lunatics should be taken over by the State. He thought there was a far stronger case for State management of lunatic asylums than of prisons and police. There was no local provision for dealing with lunatics. The Visiting Justices of counties had really no power in the matter; the power was really in the hands of the Lunacy Commissioners. If the State took over the care and maintenance of lunatics, there would be the minimum of interference and the maximum of relief to the local ratepayers. He was quite willing to admit that the best private asylums were well managed; but, unfortunately, there were second and third-rate, and even in the best regulated among them there could not be such a thorough inspection and publicity as were desirable, and there was, in consequence, an uneasy feeling in the public mind on the subject. There was this important consideration to be borne in mind, that the proprietor of a private asylum had every inducement to keep a rich patient as long as he could; whereas in a public institution he would be discharged as soon as possible.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That all lunatics ought to be committed to the keeping of the State."—(Mr. Stanley Leighton.)

MR. DILLWYN said, he did not wish to go into the question whether the maintenance of lunatics ought to fall upon the State or the local rates. His own feeling was in favour of the charges being borne by the rates. While not agreeing with his hon. Friend on that question, he did think that there was great danger in permitting private asylums to keep lunatics of the wealthier classes. He did not say no private asylums should be allowed; but he thought there should not be such a monopoly as now existed of the custody of the wealthier lunatics in the hands of private proprietors. The law at present was most unsatisfactory. If he were an unscrupulous person, he did not see that there was anything to prevent his incarcerating anyone in a private asylum if it was his interest to do so. There were good and bad private asylums; and if he went to a bad one, he might offer to pay handsomely, say, £1,000 a-year, and he would be told that he must get the certificate of two medical men, and the asylum proprietor would probably add—"I can recommend you medical men for the purpose." The trick was then done, and the unfortunate victim was taken to the asylum vi et armis. That was the law at the present moment. He had carried the second reading of a Bill on the subject, and he was in hopes that the Government would deal with a question which was a scandal and disgrace to the country. The question had been before Committees of the House, and there was no excuse for the Government's not having dealt with it before now. They were bound to do so. Until Government took the matter up nothing would be done; and he hoped they would at last take the matter up in earnest, and deal with it as a Government alone could do.

MR. SALT said, that his experience was of public more than of private asylums. Private asylums ought, no doubt, to be under most careful supervision; but they had to consider not only the characters of asylums, but the wishes of those who honestly desired to do their best for their afflicted friends. There were cases in private families where the friends of the lunatic would be strongly indisposed to hand him over to the officials of the State. Private asylums ought to be subject to the inspection both of the Lunacy Commissioners and of the magistrates. Besides, medical men owning the best private asylums had, from their position and wealth, more opportunity to exercise a wise discretion, and to carry out the best methods of treatment, regardless of expense, than the officials of a public asylum, who were only paid a moderate salary. Although he was prepared to go a long way with his hon. Friend (Mr. Stanley Leighton), yet he could not say that, in his opinion, private asylums should never be permitted under any circumstances whatever. The best private establishments should be maintained, while those of an inferior character should gradually be suppressed. He believed there were some strong reasons why public asylums should be maintained by the State. As a financial matter, a good deal was to be said for it; and, moreover, such a course would be likely to get rid of some of the difficulties which now existed in regard to the removal of lunatics. There was one matter connected with the question to which he wished to draw particular attention. Whether lunatics were retained in private or public asylums, there should be a periodical visitation of them by the magistrates. It had been said that the magistrates were of no service in such a case, because they possessed no technical knowledge; but he felt sure—and he spoke from experience—that the occasional inspection of asylums by magistrates had a most beneficial effect. He thought that their acknowledgments were due to the hon. Gentleman the Member for North Shropshire for having drawn attention to this important subject.

Mr. Gordon

MR. GREGORY said, that in the course of his professional life he had happened to have some experience as to the custody of lunatics, and he ventured to say that nothing could be more conducive to their health, happiness, and cure than the treatment bestowed upon them in a well-managed asylum. He admitted that there might be private asylums that required more direction and control, or it might be that some of them deserved extinction. He knew a striking case that came under his own experience of an old lady who was, by order of the Court of Chancery, detained as a lunatic in a private asylum, and she gradually recovered, and the Medical Superintendent declared that she was not a fit subject for the Institution, and that she must be removed. When this was explained to the old lady, she said that she was willing to be guided by her friends if they desired her removal, and to have the Commission of Lunacy superseded; but she expressed her preference for remaining at the asylum where she had spent so many happy years, and a private arrangement gratifying her wishes was made. He knew one private asylum in his own neighbourhood which was most admirably managed. There were grounds, gardens, and plantations surrounding the premises, and there were billiard-rooms and concerts and other entertainments provided, and everything was done to promote the health and happiness, and, if possible, cure, of the patients. He questioned if this would be the case under the State. The management of asylums would then be managed under certain inflexible rules, and there would be one uniform system of treatment and control, which would not be beneficial in the interests of the patients, and there would not be the same varied experience in the efforts to cure their malady. He admitted that better management might be enforced by the Inspectors now appointed by the State; and with properly qualified Inspectors and control there would be nothing to complain of. He believed that those who managed private asylums were, as a rule, men who, out of respect for humanity and their own positions, would not do anything wrong against those left in their charge. With regard as to who was to pay for the support of pauper lunatics, that, in his opinion, was entirely another question; but the question now before the House was one of control and management. He doubted very much, however, whether the change now proposed would promote the interests of the country. In any case, if the present proposal was adopted an immense responsibility would necessarily be incurred by the Government, or the Department of it upon which the maintenance and control of all the present asylums throughout the country was to be thrown.

DR. FARQUHARSON only wished to say one word upon the subject before the House, as he had no wish to keep the House from the important discussion that was to follow, and that was that in the main he agreed with his hon. Friend that it might be desirable to change the law upon this question in some respects. He emphatically dissented from any argument brought against medical men using their position to keep patients in lunatic asylums. They had heard something of the retarding of cure by drugs; but the Royal Commission from which evidence had been given did not bear out that assertion. The temptation, although great, had been thoroughly resisted. The temptation in the case of medical men in private practice to get more out of their patients was also great; but that had likewise been resisted. He would not say more, as he had no desire to keep the House from the very important discussion which was to follow.

MR. ROUND said, he wished to say a word in favour of the Motion now before the House, and to thank the hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Stanley Leighton) for calling attention to the important question of the cost and treatment of lunatics. He looked at the question from the ratepayers' point of view, and he never could see why the whole cost of providing for insane persons should be thrown upon one description of property—namely, houses and land, while six-sevenths of the income of the country were exempt from any contribution. He thought lunacy was always considered a national calamity, and he remembered the Prime Minister saying, when he introduced the Irish Church Disestablishment Bill in 1869, and was alluding to the surplus funds, that “the maintenance of lunatics was a duty of the community.” These poor people were not drawn from one particular class, and he thought it unfair that the whole burden of their maintenance should be thrown upon ratepayers. At the present time the agricultural interest was suffering from an unprecedented depression, and he believed the ratepayers in the county he represented felt strongly on this subject. He thought that the increase of insane persons, and the necessary increase in buildings for their reception, was attracting attention, as in many counties a second asylum was now found to be required. In 1879 the cost of building asylums amounted to £290,000, in 1880 to £358,000, and in 1881 to £370,000. The whole cost in connection with lunacy was about £1,250,000. He wished to draw the attention of the Secretary of the Local Government Board to the difficulty of ascertaining the total cost from the present Returns and Reports. He had first to examine the accounts of the County Treasurer, then the Local Taxation accounts, and also the Lunacy Commission Report. He suggested that the information of the total cost of lunacy should be given in one Return. His own county was peculiarly unfortunate in respect of lunacy charges, for it was saddled with the cost of the maintenance of almost all pauper lunatics who were brought from India and landed on the Essex side of the Thames; and he hoped the Indian Government and the Local Government Board would give some further relief in this respect. He feared that there was a retrograde feeling in the present Parliament on the subject of local taxation. He remembered that the last Liberal Parliament, elected in 1868, supported by a majority of 100 a Resolution that many of these local charges should be borne by the whole community. He had looked at the Division List on that occasion, and saw the name of the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Dodson) amongst the majority. He trusted, therefore, that he would not refuse his support to the present Motion, and he earnestly pressed the consideration of the whole matter upon the attention of the Government.

MR. HIBBERT said, he fully recognized the inconvenience and expense to which the county represented by the hon. Member for East Essex (Mr. Round) had been put through the landing in the county of lunatics from India, and he could assure him that the Local Government Board would do all in their power to relieve the county of this additional burden as far as they could. The Motion of the hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Stanley Leighton) was chiefly directed to two points—to the question of private asylums, and to the taking over by the country of the lunatics in the country generally. With respect to the first question, he did not think the hon. Member would secure a majority in that House. He had listened very carefully to his remarks, and had only been able to gather two cases of hardship—one of cruelty, and one of unjust detention, in the private lunatic asylums in the country. Many of them, perhaps, were not satisfactory; but, as everyone knew, there were private asylums and private asylums. A very strong case would have to be made out before the Government abolished the system in this country and took over to themselves the care of the whole body of lunatics. There were no less than 6,300 private asylums in the country. [MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: 6,300! There cannot be so many.] He (Mr. Hibbert) was reading from the Commissioners' Report, which gave 2,880 registered private lunatic asylums, and 3,420 licensed houses for the reception of lunatics, making 6,300 in all; and he did not think the Government, after their experience of the expense of taking over the prisons, would be ready to adopt the same course with the lunatic asylums. Nor did he think that any case had been made out against the public lunatic asylums. He had himself been for many years a Visitor of a large one in Lancashire, and he thought he agreed with his hon. Friend that they were the better of the two. They required, however, great care in inspection, and greater care, perhaps, should be exercised in sending patients to them. While fully admitting that, he thought it must be well known to the House that it was almost useless for the Government to bring forward a Bill to remedy these defects with any fair chance of placing it upon the Statute Book. He must admit that there had been a very considerable increase in the number of lunatics. In private asylums the number had risen from 6,454, in 1871, to 7,741, in 1881; in public asylums from 56,735 to 73,113—a very large increase indeed. Much of this increase, however, was due to the subvention given a few years ago to lunatic asylums, and the Commissioners had pointed out that the Act of 1874 had tended to remove lunatics to public asylums. Many had been sent thither whom the managers felt disinclined to receive, on the ground that those institutions were to be regarded as curative institutions, and that confirmed lunatics ought not to be sent there. In this view, two establishments would be required—one for the hopeless cases, and one for patients who might recover; and such a system was not without its advantages. With respect, however, to the principal proposal of the hon. Member, the proposal that the State should take over the public asylums and thereby transfer the expense from the ratepayers to the country, he did not think the House would sanction any such proposal. It was evident, from the statement made last night, that the funds at the disposal of the Government were not large, and additional taxation would have to be proposed if any such scheme were contemplated. He did not think the pauper lunatic class ought to be treated differently to the pauper class in general. No doubt, some hon. Members were in favour of a subvention to the outdoor poor; personally, speaking for himself and not for the Government, he should be very sorry to see the State paying anything directly in aid of the poor. That would be a very dangerous and difficult step to take. If the Government undertook the treatment of all the lunatics, there was no reason why they should not act similarly towards the blind or the deaf-and-dumb class. It had been said that the magistrates had very little control in the matter. He did not agree with that statement; they certainly would have much less if asylums came under Government management. On these grounds, therefore, he could not, on the part of the Government, support the proposal of the hon. Member; and he should be obliged, if a division were taken, to vote against it.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, that, having had opportunities of closely watching the working of a private asylum, he should be able to bring down the subject from the world of romance to the level of indisputable fact. Horrifying pictures had been drawn by the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) of the treatment of lunatics. The House had heard from him of gentlemen who were desirous of spending £1,000 a-year for their own sinister purposes. They had heard how much a-year would go to the ruffianly madhouse keeper, how much to the doctor or surgeon, and how much to the Visiting Magistrates; and, no doubt, the House was carried away by such a picture, which was worthy of a novel by Zola. But, for the consolation of those who had relations with £1,000 a-year—which they were willing to spend to persecute them—he would explain to the hon. Member for Swansea and to the House the process by which a gentleman could be confined in such an asylum. In the first place, he must be handed over to the madhouse keeper by some other person; and it was not everyone who had £1,000 a-year and was willing to expend it in making someone else miserable. Then came the doctor who kept the madhouse, and then the two doctors who signed the certificate knowing that signing a false certificate would entail the utter ruin of their character. Then, again, any lunatics in an asylum were at liberty to write to the Commissioners, and this they could do over the heads of the keepers. How many cases of systematic cruelty and neglect had been heard of? Was the hon. Member for Swansea prepared to say that there had been more cases of assault in private than in public asylums? He had figures to prove the contrary. Then, another argument on which the hon. Member dwelt was that the doctors of these private asylums were tempted by motives of gain to keep their patients longer than patients in public asylums; but the actual facts were that, whereas in public asylums the average period of detention was rather more than three years and seven months, in private asylums it was less than two years and five months; so that the balance was in favour of the private asylum. In fact, he believed the tendency was to let the patients out too soon. How could these injurious charges be brought against a body of highly-educated gentlemen, who spent their lives in the pursuit of science and in works of charity, of their being actuated by low and base motives? The private asylums ought not to be abolished; but the treatment of lunatics should be left to private enterprise and science, as in the case of the treatment of other maladies, and the competition of private enterprise ought not to be discouraged. The old superstition that there was some wide difference between diseases of the mind and diseases of the body was vanishing away before scientific research. The great improvement of medical science in our days was vitally encouraged by personal competition. If they abolished this in the case of "mad doctors," they made them an inferior class, and they struck a disastrous blow at the growth of medical science in regard to the treatment of the insane. The great name of Lord Shaftesbury had been invoked during this discussion; he had fought the battle of the lunatics, and years ago his voice was raised against private asylums. Five years ago a Committee sat upon the subject. As no one had yet quoted a sentence from the Report of the proceedings before that Committee, he would now quote one. As the name of Lord Shaftesbury had been used in connection with that subject, he would quote what was said by that noble Lord in his evidence before the Committee. Lord Shaftesbury's evidence was to the effect that the state of things in private asylums had greatly improved since 1859; that he could not now say of them what he had said before that date, and that there had been continuous advance and improvement since that date. He (Mr. Beresford Hope) wished also to point out that the private asylums were more successful than the public ones. The percentage of cures in the former was 50 per cent of the whole number, whereas in the public institutions it was only 44 per cent. He quite agreed that it might be desirable to extend the powers of the magistrates, to extend the system of medical examinations, and to make it more careful and scientific. But if we were to go into the question of subvention by the State where were we to stop, and where was the money to be found? Was it to be found in an additional guinea on carriages, or by a tax on adulterated tea?

MR. HIBBERT said, he wished to correct the statement he had made as to the number of private asylums. The number ought to be 153.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, that he had had great experience of the subject, as for many years he had been Chairman of a Visiting Committee of Magistrates. He regretted the absence from his place of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary, as it was a question especially belonging to his Department, and he himself had had much to do with the question at the Home Office. There was a divided jurisdiction on the question of Lunacy, which belonged partly to the Lord Chancellor, partly to the Home Secretary, and partly also to the Local Government Board. He had been particularly engaged on the question some three years ago; and it struck him there were three points especially requiring attention—first, to see that there were sufficient safeguards to protect sane people from being taken into private asylums; secondly, to see that they were properly treated; and, thirdly, that there should be proper means to obtain their discharge when cured. When on the Visiting Committee he had found that many persons were detained who ought to be let out, and he was instrumental in letting them out. He had obtained the appointment of a Select Committee, and that Committee in its Report dwelt on the very points which he had mentioned. The public were not convinced, as they ought to be convinced, that proper precautions were taken before a person was confined in an asylum. He could not conceive anything more terrible than that a person who was not insane should be placed in an asylum out of which it was extremely difficult to get; and they could not be too careful in protecting persons against interested relatives. The Committee suggested that the certificate ought to be granted by two medical men; that the first order to commit should be confined to a limited period, and that a fresh examination of the patient should take place every year. That was a valuable recommendation, as the most important results of a good treatment were seen at an early stage of the disease. Then the Committee advised that precautions should be taken to prevent sane persons from being locked up, and that means should be secured for letting the patients out as soon as ever they were cured. He hoped the Government would take the matter into their serious consideration and carry these recommendations into effect. He had no doubt the Visiting Justices did excellent service in the matter and procured the release of many persons wrongfully detained, as he had himself done when the Chairman of a Visiting Committee. He desired to have a more certain assurance than at present that nobody would be confined in the present asylums who ought not to be confined there. As to the treatment which they received when they were confined there, little complaint was to be made. The Lunacy Commissioners came down and sometimes took things for granted. He was bound to say that once upon a time he paid a visit suspecting something to be wrong. He came down at 8 o'clock on a Sunday morning, when there were no Inspectors, and when he could see things for himself. He took a friend with him, and they did find a considerable amount of wrong going on. He believed that something like this would tend more than anything else to keep things right. He hoped his right hon. Friend would meet these observations in the spirit in which they were made.

Mr. Beresford Hope

MR. THOMAS COLLINS (who rose amid cries of "Agreed!") said, he was surprised at the impatience that was shown on the other side of the House. He thought it should be recollected that when it was said that persons were improperly detained, there were other cases, perhaps more frequent, when persons actually lunatics were allowed out of the asylum. He would allude to the case of

Maclean. That man had been let out, and the result of that might have been much more serious than it was. The question which the hon. Member for Shropshire (Mr. Stanley Leighton) had raised was a very large one; but he thought he had acted very unwisely in the interest he had at stake in mixing up two distinct propositions. They had some very strong language from the hon. Member for Shropshire and the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn), but they had no facts. A larger proportion of persons who went to the private asylums were restored to health than was the case in public asylums. He did not say that this proved that the public asylums were worse managed than the private asylums. Wealthy relatives of patients in private asylums might more frequently remove them, and this might account for the fact to which he had called attention. He contended that to hand over all lunatics to the control of the State would be a retrograde step, and that, at any rate, it would be a change for which public opinion was not yet prepared. Already the State was superseding individual action far more than was wholesome. Every year attempts were made in that House to make the State everything and the individual nothing. It appeared to him that the hon. Member for North Shropshire would have been better advised if he had restricted his Resolution to the question of the cost of pauper lunatics. In his mention of that topic the hon. Member had expressed his decided dislike to the principle of subventions; but did he mean that the whole cost of the maintenance of this class of lunatics should be borne by the locality itself? A great deal had been said of the increase of lunacy in the country, and, no doubt, the subvention given by the last Parliament had increased the demand for more accommodation in the county asylums. In the West Riding of Yorkshire, where the population was 1,800,000, a second asylum had lately been established, and within the last few months a site had been provided for a third; but the fact was, not that lunatics had increased of late years, but that they were better cared for now than formerly. He would rather have seen the lunatic asylums than the gaols transferred to the Treasury. He would not recommend the hon. Member for Shropshire to press his Resolution as it stood; but would suggest that he might consent to an amendment of it, and he invited some hon. Member to move an Amendment, so that they might then debate a definite issue.

VISCOUNT EMLYN said, that the request made by the hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Stanley Leighton) appeared to be a very large one. As to those who were maintained in private asylums, he quite agreed with the Secretary to the Local Government Board that the hon. Member failed to make out a case for the change he proposed. The cases he brought forward went to prove, not that the cost of maintenance ought to be transferred to Imperial funds, but that the supervision was not sufficient. He granted that it might be better; but all that we had a right to ask was that private and public asylums should be carefully, regularly, and efficiently supervised. He could not support the suggestion that private asylums should receive more assistance from the State. It was very difficult to discriminate between persons of the middle class and those of the lower class, and to draw a line separating one from the other. His hon. Friend proposed that all lunatics should be committed to the keeping of the State. With that he could not agree, for the proposal, if adopted, would have a tendency to lower the middle classes. Their object should be to make the middle class independent, and not to reduce it to the level of the pauper class. At the same time, necessary supervision should be exercised, in order to make sure that middle-class lunatics were not ill-treated or improperly confined. It was a mistake to suppose that lunatics of that class were maintained at the cost of the ratepayers. Where accommodation had been provided in pauper lunatic asylums for future tenants, the Visiting Justices had been ready to extend to those middle-class lunatics who approach nearly to the pauper class the assistance of which they stood in need, and had allowed them to enter asylums on payment at a remunerative rate. It could not, under such circumstances, be said that persons belonging to the middle class were thrown upon the rates. One complaint which was made was that subventions granted by the State to local authorities encouraged extravagance. It was not true, however, that the subvention of 4s. per lunatic had led to extravagance. A contrary tendency had, in fact, been apparent. An hon. Member had referred to the question of the removal of lunatics. On that subject he would say no more than that he hoped that when the question of the removal of paupers should be taken in hand the question of the removal of lunatics would be dealt with also. He was of opinion that a better classification of lunatics was needed, in order that the criminal lunatics now kept in the county asylums might be separated from ordinary pauper lunatics. The inconvenience of the present system would not be remedied by sweeping away all local control and handing over the asylums to the Imperial Government. Bearing in mind the troubles and sorrows caused to paupers by lunacy, he questioned whether they would benefit by being deprived of the local interest attaching to their cases. He thought that some supervision by the magistrates should be maintained over these institutions; but he considered there was no necessity for the sweeping changes recommended by his hon. Friend.

MR. DODSON said, that his right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary was absent owing to an unavoidable engagement, and not to any want of interest in that debate. The right hon. Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross) had called attention to three important points—namely, the conditions under which lunatics were admitted, their treatment, and the manner of their release. But the Report of the Committee which sat on the matter was not unfavourable to the existing system. So far as he was acquainted with the evidence, there was scarcely one proved case of undue detention for the sake of profit to the proprietor of an asylum, and not a single case of detention through the action of interested relatives or friends. If that be so, the existing system could not be said to be a bad one in that particular. So few Members had spoken in favour of the terms of the Resolution that he thought the hon. Member had better soon go to a division or withdraw his Motion. Under the present system many lunatics were paid for by their friends, whereas the hon. Member wished to throw the expense of their maintenance on the State. [MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: That is not my proposal.] The hon.

Member's proposal was that all lunatics should be committed to the keeping of the State. It appeared to him (Mr. Dodson), however, that the duty of the State with regard to these persons began and ended with the work of inspecting the places in which lunatics were confined to see if cases of oppression occurred. He could not see why the State should maintain all lunatics—[An hon. MEMBER: That is not suggested.]—well, he could not see why all lunatics should be "committed to the keeping of the State," which were the hon. Member's own words. He failed to see why it should be the duty of the State to undertake the charge of these persons any more than of persons suffering from infectious diseases. In his opinion, the State already undertook too many duties, several of which would be better left to the management of local authorities. With regard to the other part of the proposal of the hon. Member for Shropshire (Mr. Stanley Leighton)—namely, "the unfairness of requiring the rate-payers to maintain lunatics of the middle and lower classes," he understood it to mean that the State should completely, or to a greater extent than now, come to the assistance and support of the rate-payers. He would not enter into the question whether the subvention given by the State of late years had or had not been beneficial in its operation, or answered the purposes for which it was intended; but the hon. Member for Shropshire had, no doubt, heard the Budget of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and was perfectly well aware that the Government were not at present in a position to supply the means he referred to. Under the circumstances, he thought the debate should now be allowed to come to a conclusion, either by a division or the withdrawal of the Motion.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, he thought the right hon. Gentleman had hardly done justice to the complaints which had been made with very great force from time to time in this House, and, notably, by his right hon. Friend (Sir R. Assheton Cross) on the Front Opposition Bench within a few minutes, in regard to the condition of private lunatic asylums, and the uncertainty, to say the least of it, which existed in the public mind in regard to proper care being exercised in the discharge from the asylums of persons cured. The hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) had, no doubt, met with very great support in the action he had taken for years past on this branch of the subject. After the Report of the Select Committee it could not be said that they were not familiar with the subject, and his own opinion was that all apprehension ought to be removed from the public mind in regard to these private asylums; and though he was not in favour of the State taking these lunatics into its charge—and into its pay, as it were—he certainly thought the ideal system they ought to aim at was a system by which lunatics belonging to the wealthy and middle-class families might have that ample security which the poor enjoyed in pauper lunatic asylums—namely, the security that it was not to the interest of any human being in the asylum to retain them in it one minute after they were cured. In a public asylum the interest of all the officials was to discharge the patients as soon as possible; but in the private asylums this state of things was reversed, and his view was that no lunatics should be intrusted to those who were pecuniarily interested in their maintenance. It did not follow that the lunatics themselves or their relations or property should not be charged with the cost of their maintenance, or that they should not be kept in a manner adequate to their position and means. They need not be maintained at the cost of the public—that was the short way of putting it; and his hon. Friend was not, he thought, open to the charge of desiring to relieve the better class lunatics from the obligation of maintaining themselves, or relieve their relatives of the obligation of maintaining them. With regard to pauper asylums, for many years he had taken an interest in this subject, not only on account of his long connection with the Local Government Board, but because he had been for many years Chairman of a pauper lunatic asylum in his own county—one of the best managed asylums in the Kingdom. He was strongly convinced of the great advantages which had attended the establishment of these pauper lunatic asylums, and he thought it a very serious and onerous obligation on the local authorities that they should have been obliged, without any assistance from the State, to maintain these institutions. He looked with the greatest satisfaction to the part he had taken in this matter. The right hon. Gentleman was not enamoured of subventions; but there could be no doubt that in this particular case they had worked a vast amount of good. The amount was so small that it did not interfere with the Guardians in the exercise of the discretionary power of maintaining pauper lunatics in their homes or in workhouses, if they were fit to remain there. The cost of maintaining pauper lunatics at home or in the workhouse would still be less than half the amount it cost to maintain them in the asylum. He did not think anything could be more conducive to the interests of the poor as a body than that the State should relieve the ratepayers of some portion of the cost of keeping pauper lunatics. The institutions in which they were maintained were controlled by Government officials—the control being in no respect in the hands of the Guardians. It seemed to him it would be easy to have an extension of that principle, and that there would be no difficulty in providing for the maintenance of the whole of the lunatics of the country in that way. By this means the incomes of the managers, superintendents, and medical and other officers would be secured, and it would not be to the interest of anyone to keep a patient in an asylum after he was cured. He would not detain the House any longer, except to express the opinion that, although the terms of his hon. Friend's Motion were open to some question, their general object was worthy of the support of the House.

MR. R. H. PAGET begged to thank the hon. Member for Shropshire (Mr. Stanley Leighton) for having opened this interesting discussion on a question which all who had ever had anything to do with lunatic asylums must feel to be of considerable importance. He wished to say a word with regard to middle-class lunatics, to which allusion was made in the Resolution of the hon. Member. No class was placed in such a position of difficulty as the middle class, when members of their families were unfortunately afflicted with lunacy. It was well known that the expense of private asylums was so great as to render it impossible for all but the rich and well-to-do to have recourse to them; and, at the same time, it was felt that middle-class lunatics were not proper persons to be received into asylums maintained at the expense of the rates. They were considered an unfair burden on the rates; but the difficulty was there were no other asylums open to them, those of a private character being too expensive for them to resort to. Some very pertinent questions had been addressed to the Government on this question; and, without wishing for a moment to degrade or pauperize a class which was specially independent, he would say this—that the State should take some step to alleviate their unfortunate position. It had been brought to their notice to-night that under the State-subvention system lunatic asylums had become very full, and that in many cases it had been found necessary to make a considerable extension of buildings. He would venture to offer this for the consideration of the Local Government Board—that the time had now arrived when steps should be taken to remove from our pauper lunatic asylums the class of idiots. The question had been raised before in the House, and he very much regretted that, hitherto, no vigorous attempt had been made to effect this object. Everyone who had visited pauper lunatic asylums must know this—that in every one of these asylums there was a considerable class of idiots. They were as well looked after as the circumstances of the asylums would permit; but they were a hindrance to the discipline of the institutions, and there was no provision for improving the existing state of things. Everyone who was acquainted with the subject must know that idiots would and could be far better maintained in separate asylums. If this was true—as undoubtedly it was—of the adult idiots, it was ten-fold more true with regard to those unhappy idiots of a more youthful age. The experience of Earlswood and other idiot asylums showed what could be done when young children, in that unhappy state of idiocy, were taken by the hand and carefully trained and brought up. Instead of living lives of misery and helplessness, their latent faculties might be trained, and they could be made useful members of society—their faculties might be developed, and an extraordinary change might take place in their mental condition. This could only be done in institutions set aside for the training of these children, and at present there was no such provision made for their treatment. [An hon. MEMBER: There is in the Metropolis.] He (Mr. R. H. Paget) thanked the hon. Member for reminding him that provision of this kind had been made in the Metropolis; but it was not the case in the rest of England. He considered it one of the greatest blots in our arrangements for the care of lunatics that we had no such provision throughout the country; and now, whilst they were debating the whole question of the care of lunatics, was a fit opportunity for calling attention to the matter. He hoped, before the discussion terminated, to hear from some of those who were officially connected with the subject that they were prepared to take some steps to deal with this point, as he ventured to say that no more humane object could commend itself to the mind of the most philanthropic person than taking in hand and training those unhappy persons who had been idiots from their birth. It must be remembered that the maintenance of these persons in the present pauper asylums was one of the reasons why those institutions were so full. If they could be sent to proper asylums, where they ought to be maintained and trained, there would be more room in the pauper lunatic asylums. People talked about overcrowding, and the necessity of building; but what was it that had led so much to the overcrowding of lunatic asylums? Was it not this? Did not everyone who had been connected with the management of these asylums know this, that it was a constant practice to send aged, senile paupers into the lunatic asylums—paupers suffering simply from a decay of the mental faculties, who were not fit persons for the hospital treatment of lunatic asylums? Their condition was that of advanced years and of mental and physical decay. Cases of this kind were known to everyone—they were occurring every day. Large numbers of these poor creatures were sent into the asylums, to remain there months, or weeks, or days, until they were released by death from their sufferings. Why were these people received into the asylums? Why, because Boards of Guardians now received inducement to take them which was not offered them before. Perhaps it was not so much an inducement, and it might be more correct to say that that which was a positive hindrance before had now been removed. The President of the Local Government Board would do well to take this matter into his careful consideration. If the right. hon. Gentleman could see any way to exercising his authority, and producing new legislation under which places could be established for the care and maintenance of these people suffering simply from failure of mental faculties consequent, in most cases, upon advanced age, he would relieve the pauper lunatic asylums of a vast number of those who now crowded them out, and would obviate one of the great evils that were now complained of—namely, the necessity for largely increasing buildings and the staff of the asylums. There was one other remark he wished to make, which tended in the same direction, and it was this. He was not in the House at the time, but he understood from those who were that, in an official speech this evening, an opinion was expressed hostile to the idea of any State subvention in aid of the indoor poor. [Mr. HIBBERT: I simply expressed my own private opinion.] He was sorry the hon. Member entertained such an opinion, and trusted he might be able to convert him. He (Mr. R. H. Paget) believed that if State subventions were given in aid of outdoor poor, it would be by no means difficult to persuade the various Boards of Guardians not to consider the various Union-workhouses as belonging to a given local authority, but as belonging, as a whole, to the Poor Law authorities. He believed there were a great many vacant places and beds in some Union-workhouses, whilst others were overcrowded. If they were no longer isolated, but were classified and brought together, he believed it would be found that in many districts one or more of them could be dispensed with. If buildings of this kind could be dispensed with for Poor Law purposes, what more fit and proper use could be made of them than to fit one up as an asylum for the training of idiots, another for the care of harmless lunatics, and so on? These afflicted persons, in such institutions, could, no doubt, be maintained at a more moderate rate than they were at present in the pauper asylums. It would be a great advantage to free the lunatic asylums of harmless imbeciles. There would then be ample room in them for the treatment of that class for whom they were intended, and they could then be used in their proper capacity—namely, as great hospitals. A lunatic asylum should be a hospital for the care of persons afflicted with disease; and when the disease reached a stage from which there was no hope of recovery, and when all that was desired for a patient was that he should be carefully tended and well fed, the patients should be sent off to these buildings he had described. When the authorities had done this, they would have done all that humanity could demand. But the thing must be done in this way. It was in vain to say “Oh! send these people off to the various Union-workhouses.” They knew that to be wrong—they knew the poor imbeciles and idiots deteriorated there. [A laugh.] The President of the Local Government Board might laugh at this, but it had been actually proved to be the case. It had been proved within his own experience. Some years ago, in Somersetshire, their lunatic asylums being full, and it being necessary for them to send a number of people to another institution for a time, they, with the greatest anxiety and care, selected a definite number of the most harmless lunatics, whom it was thought could be transferred to workhouses without injury to their physical or mental condition. Before sending them out the precaution was taken to put them in the scales and weigh them. At the expiration of about two months the majority of them were brought back. But what was their condition? Why, they had all deteriorated, mentally and physically, and in every case they had lost largely in bodily weight. Nothing could be plainer than that the Union-workhouses was no place for them. The necessary appliances were not there. The necessary diet and care was wanting; and in the case he had mentioned the unhappy lunatics were all injured by their residence in the workhouse. Now, the whole result of the subvention which had been so much decried had been to do that which the Lunacy Commissioners for years past had told them they ought to do. Take these isolated instances of imbecility from the workhouses where they were badly treated—or, he would not say where they were badly treated, but where the circumstances were unfavourable to their treatment—and place them in the great hospitals for lunacy, which were, and ought to be, the proper asylums for such people. He must apologize to the House for having spoken somewhat warmly on this matter, but what he had stated he knew from his personal experience. He knew the injury that was done to these idiots and imbeciles when they were sent to the workhouses. He felt it was a step which ought not to be taken; and, so far as the 4s. a-week subvention had had the effect of freeing the workhouses and sending these people into the asylums, it had been one of unmixed good. As regarded this particular Motion of his hon. Friend, he could not help regretting that the hon. Member had got two or three subjects rather mixed up in it. He (Mr. R. H. Paget) could not agree to it as it stood. He could not assent to the proposition at the end, “that all lunatics ought to be committed to the keeping of the State.” He believed there was much the State ought to do in regard to middle-class lunatics, in regard to idiots, and in regard to the maintenance of the more harmless cases of lunatics in asylums, which might be linked on to, or connected in some way with, the great pauper asylums. This debate would have been of great value if it had had the effect of drawing the attention of those who were responsible in this matter to the fact that the Lunacy Laws were not so entirely satisfactory that there was not room for improvement, in more ways than one, and of teaching them that they were not to sit still and hug themselves in a sense of complacency, believing that all was good, and that there was no room for reform. There was plenty of room for reform, and he trusted that those in authority, and those who had the power to bring in useful legislation on the matter, would not be slow to deal with that which he ventured to assert was of great and urgent necessity, affecting, as it did, the welfare of a class whose case commanded the sympathies of all those who were actuated by the ordinary feelings of humanity.

Mr. Selater-Booth

SIR TREVOR LAWRENCE said, he was a Member of the Committee which sat on this subject in 1877 and 1878, and had attended almost all the meetings. He had heard a vast amount of evidence, and had given it a great deal of consideration, therefore he trusted he might be allowed to say a few words on the subject. If there was one thing which was conclusively proved during the inquiry, it was that the accusations brought against the private lunatic asylums were entirely without foundation. The hon. Member for Swansea, at whose instance, in a great measure, the Committee was appointed, after having investigated the facts, and taken a great deal of trouble to bring before the Committee the most promising cases, as he thought them—as showing the manner in which business was carried on in those places—came himself to the conclusion that no case had been made out against the private lunatic asylums. He would appeal to the Solicitor General, who was also a Member of that Committee, to hear him out when he said that no case was made out against the keepers of the private lunatic asylums. Every Member who had seen the interior of those asylums must be well aware that the greatest possible skill and the largest possible outlay was brought to bear within them on the treatment of the insane. Let anyone who doubted that statement pay a visit, for example, to the very admirable asylum of Dr. Newington—it would not be a long distance to go. He would ask anyone who had been over that establishment whether, if he was unfortunate enough to have a relative afflicted with lunacy, that would not be a place he would like to send him to? If there was any body of men to whom the thanks of these poor suffering people were due, it was the Commissioners of Lunacy, of whom Lord Shaftesbury was the head. If he might venture the remark, instead of there being a number of sane people shut up in lunatic asylums, there were many out of their minds at large who ought to be in confinement. He was sure hon. Gentlemen who received much correspondence would fully bear him out, when he said that a very considerable number of letters they received emanated from persons who ought to be under some restraint or other. There was one very important consideration in connection with the maintenance of private lunatic asylums. If the Motion of his hon. Friend were to be carried, the result would be that those persons who ought to be brought under the influence of immediate treatment would be kept as long as possible from the influence of that treatment, in the hope that the stigma supposed to be involved would be avoided, and that the family to which the lunatic belonged would be free from it. One of the advantages of private asylums was that they provided admirable treatment for the insane without real publicity. With regard to public asylums, his hon. Friend the Member for Mid Somerset (Mr. R. H. Paget), was right when he advocated the separation of the imbecile and idiots from lunatics. The county of Surrey, which he had the honour to belong to and to assist in representing, had large asylums, and they were constantly being called upon to build others for imbecile paupers and idiots, who, so far as treatment or security were concerned, might as well be out of them. There was no question of security; they were only put there to be taken care of; and if the President of the Local Government Board could see his way to separate imbeciles from lunatics he would do much to help the cure of the insane. One of the great difficulties about private asylums was the liberation of patients at the right moment. Mental disease was not like bodily disease. Bodily disease was over when it had been gone through; but mental disease very often passed away for a time, and then returned. Many cases were brought before the Committee which showed the necessity of extreme care and caution in liberating lunatics. With regard to the point of having patients in public asylums, it was well known, also, that pauper lunatics were occasionally found in private asylums. In Surrey, when their asylums had been gradually getting full, it had been necessary for the authorities to pay a large sum for the purpose of getting some patients in private asylums. He was one of those persons who thought that the Department which his right hon. Friend (Mr. Dodson) represented was already very greatly overburdened; and he was sure nothing could be worse and less desirable, in the interest of the lunatics themselves, or the community in general, than that the lunatics should be handed over to the Local Government Board. If his hon. Friend went to a division he should most certainly vote against the Motion.

Mr. R. H. Paget

COLONEL MAKINS said, he was glad that neither the condition of the atmosphere outside the House nor the depressing nature of the discussion itself, nor the visible impatience of some hon. Gentlemen opposite, had prevented them having a most valuable and interesting debate on this Motion. He was prepared to go into the question more particularly as to the very great variation in the cost of maintenance of lunatics in different parts of the country; and he was prepared to adduce figures with reference to that point, in order to show how necessary it was that hon. Gentlemen who took an interest in the subject should take the matter into their consideration. If the debate had done anything it had shown the great necessity which existed for a classification of the inmates in our lunatic asylums. If the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board would take into his consideration the desirability of the separation of the imbeciles and idiots from the more pronounced lunatics, the time which had been spent on this debate would not have been thrown away. As to private lunatic asylums, he admitted the force of the remarks that had been made by his right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Beresford Hope) and by his hon. Friend the Member for Mid Surrey (Sir Trevor Lawrence). There was no doubt that many of the proprietors of private asylums did conduct them in a most excellent way, and did provide shelter for those among the upper classes of society who were unhappily afflicted with lunacy. At the same time, there were objections which might be raised to the continuance of private asylums, and he thought one of them was the question of finance. If the inmates of private asylums were transferred to public lunatic asylums, not, of course, as paupers, not as patients to be paid for by the country or the ratepayers, but as patients under the care of the State, there would not only be a cessation of many anomalies, but he believed a large fund might be raised, which would go to the relief of the rates. He was not prepared to support the Resolution at the present moment; but he would not say the Resolution was not entitled to reasonable support. It was a Resolution which sooner or later would have to be considered by the House. The hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Local Government Board (Mr. Hibbert) agreed with him as to the necessity for classification. He did not think he need pursue the question.

Colonel Makins

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

COLONEL MAKINS said, he was sorry to find that the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) had so little sympathy with the mental sufferings of his fellow-creatures. He should, however, endeavour to meet the wishes of the hon. Gentleman, as far as he could, by abbreviating his remarks. He would not trouble the House with the statistics which he had prepared with reference to the variations in the cost of lunatics in different parts of the country, except to point out that, whereas the cost of lunatics in boroughs was 11s. 4½d., and in counties, 9s. 6½d.; in private asylums, which were generally under philanthropic management, it was very much greater. Therefore, he thought that even in that respect there would be a considerable advantage to the community if the management of lunatic asylums throughout the country was brought within the purview of some central authority. He was one of those who objected very much to the principle of centralization; but he thought this was one of the cases in which an exception might be made. He had to express the earnest hope that the Government would take into consideration this important subject, and would take an early opportunity of bringing the matter before the House in a legislative form and upon the authority of the Government.

MR. WARTON said, he must protest against the introduction of a little clôture by the President of the Board of Trade in reply to the hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Stanley Leighton).

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 34; Noes 81: Majority 47.—(Div. List, No. 72.)

ORDER OF THE DAY.

PLACES OF WORSHIP SITES BILL.

(Mr. Summers, Mr. Richard, Mr. William M^r Arthur, Mr. Alderman Cotton.)

[BILL 97.] COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Conveyance of lands by corporations and other public bodies), agreed to.

Clause 2 (Grant of superfluous lands).

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."—(Mr. Summers.)

MR. WHITLEY said, he wished to point out that there was no provision in this Bill to enable the Lords of the Treasury to put a veto upon sales by Corporations. According to existing Acts of Parliament, Corporations could not sell land without the authority of the Lords of the Treasury; but this Bill provided for no veto by the Treasury.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 3 (Short title) agreed to.

New Clause—

"A corporation or municipal body shall not make any such grant without the consent in writing of the Secretary of State for the Home Department, where such consent is now required by any existing Act of Parliament,"—(Mr. Whitley,)

—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the said Clause be now read a second time."

MR. HIBBERT said, he quite agreed with the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Whitley) as to the present law with regard to Corporations; but as this new clause was not on the Paper, he would suggest the hon. Member should put it down for Report, in order that time might be given for its consideration.

MR. R. N. FOWLER said, he hoped that, under the circumstances, the hon. Member for Staleybridge (Mr. Summers) would consent to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Mr. R. N. Fowler,)—put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday.

House adjourned at One o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, 26th April, 1882.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading—Land Law (Ireland) Act (1881) Amendment [2], debate adjourned; Bankruptcy [37]; *Metropolis Management and Building Acts Amendment [107]; *Interments (Felo de se) [98]; *Militia Storehouses [116].

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACT (1881) AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL 2.]

(Mr. Redmond, Mr. Parnell, Mr. Healy, Mr. Sexton, Mr. Justin M'Carthy.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. REDMOND said, the duty which devolved upon him of moving that the Bill be now read a second time was important and difficult. Its difficulty and importance must constitute his claim to the indulgence of the House while he endeavoured to explain the proposals they now made. He believed the necessity for legislation to amend the Land Act of last Session was now well-nigh universally recognized both inside and outside the House. That Act had two great objects, neither of which had been attained. The first was to bring redress within easy reach of every tenant in Ireland who was suffering from injustice; and the second—which, of course, depended, to a large extent, on the success of the first—was to conciliate the good-will of the Irish people, and to spread peace and prosperity throughout the land. The Land Act had been more than seven months in operation. Some of its provisions were only enacted for six months. Of those provisions which had expired they could speak absolutely, and say that they had proved melancholy and disastrous failures. The permanent provisions of the Land Act had been sufficiently long in operation to entitle them fairly to form an opinion as to the success they had had or were likely to achieve in the future. Of these also it might be said that they had failed to fulfil the object with which they were enacted. As the Act stood now, it could apply to only about one-half of the tenant farmers of Ireland; but the very class of tenants which, by reason of their poverty, most required protection was, owing to the failure of the Arrears Clause, excluded from the operation of the Act. Of all the tenants in Ireland who were entitled to apply to the Land Court, only about 80,000 had done so, and yet its machinery was so clogged that years must elapse before those cases could be disposed of. Consequently, widespread disappointment and disaffection prevailed among the people. Those who were precluded from applying to the Land Court denounced the invidious and unjust distinction by which they were excluded; those who had applied lamented the prolonged delay, coupled with the continued obligation which rested upon them of paying exorbitant rents pending the decisions of the Court upon their cases. All this time the work of eviction was steadily proceeding, and the Irish people, who were told to look upon this measure as a message of peace, and as a settlement of their just demands, saw now with consternation that the work of extermination was carried on with increased facility under its provisions. The natural result of the failure of the Land Act on the one hand, and of the provocation by Coercion on the other, was the condition in which Ireland was found to-day. The Bill which he had now the honour to propose afforded a means—he was almost tempted to say the only means—whereby peace, prosperity, and tranquillity could be restored to Ireland. The proposals in the Bill were moderate and just. They were made in the name of the Irish people, and he claimed for them the fair and unprejudiced consideration of the House. The Bill might be said to deal with four distinct matters of importance. He would take first in order that question which, by reason of its vital and pressing necessity, might be considered first in importance. He meant the question of arrears. It might be well to recall the history of those arrears. They had their origin in those years of bad harvests, when over a large portion of Ireland famine was averted only by the charity of the world. In the districts referred to small tenant farmers were unable to live without assistance, and, naturally, rents fell into arrear. The necessity of averting destruction from those men who were suffering from the act of God was recognized by the House of Commons, which two years ago passed the Compensation for Disturbance Bill. The necessity of lifting off the shoulders of the people the load of arrears it was impossible for them to meet was recognized by Parliament when last year it inserted the Arrears Clause in the Land Act. In recent times no responsible politician had alluded to the subject without acknowledging that the Land Act must remain, to a great extent, a failure so long as those arrears were allowed to continue an impassable barrier between a large portion of the people and the benefits of the Land Act. The Arrears Clause of the Act of last Session had expired. From first to last the Arrears Clause was inoperative. To-day the work of evicting from their homes those who were unable to pay rent in respect of years when the soil did not produce enough to enable them to live was being carried on with terrible rapidity. During the quarter ending the 31st of March last, no fewer than 1,300 families, or 7,000 souls, were evicted from their homes in Ireland; and as long as such scenes continued to be enacted peace would be an impossibility. At all cost the work of eviction must be stopped in Ireland. So long as it continued discontent, bloodshed, and outrage were absolute necessities of the situation. Now, the proposals of the Bill for dealing with the question of arrears were strictly moderate, and they had the merit, which the Arrears Clause of the Bill of last year had not, of being thoroughly practical. In a spirit of fairness to both landlord and tenant they recognized that Providence had blessed Ireland with, at least, one really good harvest since the arrears were incurred; and, consequently, the first requirement of the Bill was that the tenant should be obliged to pay a year's rent, or, at any rate, what the landlord should consider equivalent to one year's rent, in respect of the year ending the 31st of August last. When that had already been done by the tenant of a farm valued at not more than £30 a-year, and when the Court was satisfied that the tenant could not possibly pay the arrears, the Court was empowered to make a grant to the landlord not exceeding one year's rent, or not exceeding one-half the total arrears, which grant was to release the tenant from all liability for arrears up to the 31st of August last. The result of that proposal would be that, in the case of the tenant of a farm of the yearly value of not more than £30, if three years' rent were owing, the tenant would be bound to pay the rent for the year ending August 31 last; the Court would grant a sum equal to the second year's rent, and the third year's rent the landlord would be called upon to sacrifice. That sacrifice could not be considered unfair; because it must be remembered that these arrears were, for the most part, arrears of rack rents, and that under no conceivable circumstances could the landlord hope to recover, by any means, the total amount of arrears due to him. One great difference between the proposed clause and that in the Act of last year was that the latter was optional to the landlord, and the former to the tenant; while the grant proposed to be made to the landlord was absolute, and would not have to be repaid by the tenant. The Bill proposed that the money required for these grants should be supplied from the Irish Church Surplus Fund. The Irish Church Surplus Fund was the property of the Irish nation; and he knew of no more national object to which it could be devoted than to saving the Irish people from extermination and ruin. That, he thought, was a practical proposal, and moderate; and he thought when hon. Gentlemen, who in that House represented the landlord class, came to give their opinion, it would be found that, even in their eyes, the proposal did not deserve opposition or censure. There were also other provisions in the Bill connected with arrears, which he had, perhaps, better mention at once. In view of the block in the Land Courts, it was deemed absolutely necessary that some protection should be afforded to tenants pending the settlement of their rents. As things were a tenant might apply to the Court, but might have to wait years for the decision of his case, during which time he would be called upon to pay his present, perhaps, exorbitant rent. Moreover, when the judicial rent was fixed, it was only dated from the first gale day after the decision. This Bill stated that when a tenant applied to have a fair rent fixed all proceedings for recovering the full amount of the old rent should be stayed, pending the decision of the Court; that the rent payable in the meantime should be calculated on the basis of Griffith's Valuation; and that payment should be made of the new rent (when decided), not as now, from the next rent day after the decision, but from the next rent day after the application to the Court. It was provided also that, after the decision of the Court, the difference between the fair rent and the rent paid on the basis of Griffith's Valuation pending settlement should be refunded by either the landlord or the tenant as the case might be—an arrangement not unlike that recently suggested by the hon. Member for the County of Tyrone (Mr. Dickson). He might point out, in passing, that Griffith's Valuation, which had been the subject of many denunciations, and had been described as "confiscation" and "robbery," had been virtually approved by most of the Sub-Commissioners throughout the country. He now came to the second important matter dealt with by the Bill—namely, the question of leases. To the leaseholders of Ireland the Act of last year had unquestionably been a mockery and a delusion. By a process of reasoning not easy to understand, a distinction was drawn in the Land Act between leases made before 1870, and leases after 1870. The latter, if certain conditions were fulfilled, could be interfered with by the Court; but leases made before 1870 were held to be sacred. It was notorious that leases were forced upon tenants since 1870, with the intention of robbing them of the benefits of the Act passed that year; but it was equally notorious that in 1869 similar leases were forced upon the tenants in anticipation of that Act. The fact of a man paying an exorbitant rent under an unjust lease for 20 years instead of 10 was no reason why redress should be denied to him. However, in their wisdom, Ministers and Parliament thought otherwise; and they decided that the only leaseholders who should have the benefits of the Act last year were leaseholders holding under contracts made since 1870; but experience had proved that those men had been fooled to the top of their bent by the action of the Land Courts. He believed that only about 70 leases had been set aside, or about 5 per cent of the number of applications. He understood that Mr. Justice O'Hagan had stated no lease had been interfered with by his Court, which could not have been upset in an ordinary Court of Equity. The Lease Clause of the Land Act was hedged round with such conditions that it was practically useless even to holders of leases made since 1870. One reason which made the clause of last year useless was that the provision that leases forced upon a tenant since 1870, even under a threat of eviction, if it was at the expiration of an old lease, could not be interfered with by the Court. That was a needless and absurd provision. Its effect had been to cut away from the operation of the Act nine-tenths of the leaseholders who had accepted leases since 1870. He would give an illustration. He knew a farmer who held under a lease which expired towards the end of 1871. During the continuance of that lease, which had been a long one, the tenant had erected a house, in which he established the business of a general country shop. This business became valuable, and the landlord knew the tenant would pay anything rather than be deprived of it. At the expiration of his lease, accordingly, a new lease was forced on him at an exorbitant rent, and he had to pay to the landlord a fine of £500 in respect of the business which he had himself created. This lease was forced on him by threat of eviction in the very tangible form of notice to quit. This man had no remedy under the Land Act, for the reason that the lease was forced upon him, not when he was a tenant from year to year, but on the expiration of another lease. Another way in which the leaseholders since 1870 had been cheated out of the benefits of the Act was by the provision making it necessary to prove that the lease had been forced under threat of eviction. Many landlords or their agents had sworn that the notices to quit were not technically to make them accept a new lease, but to induce them to pay a higher rent. Upon that subtle distinction a large number of applications were dismissed. He had a curious piece of information with regard to how the Lease Clause had worked in the county Wicklow. Sir Edward Hutchinson had a number of tenants who, up to 1872, were tenants from year to year. In 1872 large increases of rent were demanded from them, and they were given the option either to take a lease or not. Many of them accepted leases as the lesser of two evils. Those people had to pay as high rents as those who did not accept leases, and were now shut out from the benefit of the Act. The others had gone into the Land Court and obtained reductions varying from 20 to 30 per cent. That illustration showed how the Lease Clause of the Land Act was a mockery. It had kept the word of promise to the ears of the people and broken it to their hopes. This Bill proposed to deal with the question of leases in a thorough and simple fashion. He proposed to place a leaseholder on the same footing as any other tenant in Ireland, so that if he considered that he was suffering injustice he could apply to the Land Court for redress, and trust to the Court to judge of the merits of each individual case. He trusted when the Bill was discussed they would hear no more about the exploded fallacy of freedom of contract between landlord and tenant; it no more existed in the case of leaseholders than in the case of yearly tenants. It was well known to all who were acquainted with Ireland that no tenants were more severely rack-rented than the leaseholders. Unless the protection and benefits of the Land Act were extended to this class of tenants, it must fail to meet the requirements and to satisfy the just demands of the Irish people. He now passed to the third matter of importance dealt with by this Bill. He referred to the "Healy Clause," which he might be permitted to call the heart of the Land Bill of last year. That heart had been paralyzed, if not killed, by the judgment of the Court of Appeal in the case of "Adams v. Dunseath." The "Healy Clause" enacted that no tenant should be charged rent in respect of improvements made by himself or predecessors in title for which he or they had not been compensated by the landlord. The Court of Appeal in "Adams v. Dunseath" practically killed this provision, by defining the word "improvements" to mean improvement works effected by the tenant, and not the increased letting value which was the consequence of that improvement. He might give from a magazine article which he read the other day an illustration which bore on this point. It was the case of a tenant who held a farm, a portion of which was waterlogged, and valueless in consequence. The tenant expended £100 in drainage works, thus largely increasing the letting value of the farm. According to the ruling in "Adams v. Dunseath," the tenant would be only entitled to a fair percentage on his £100, and all the increased letting value of the holding became the property of the landlord. He did not believe that this proposition would bear a moment's examination. Assuredly the farmer rented the land as it stood. If by his action he injured the farm, he had to pay the landlord compensation for deterioration. If by his action he improved it, why should the benefit not be his? If his speculation were unsuccessful, his was the loss. If successful, assuredly the entire benefit should be his. But this was only one point in the judgment to which he referred. The Court decided, and they laid down the doctrine that the enjoyment for a certain time was to be taken as compensation by the tenant. He did not believe that the Judges in the Court of Appeal had acted in accordance with the spirit in which the right hon. Gentleman the Premier framed the measure. The doctrine of enjoyment being compensation was unjust. In many cases tenants had been paying exorbitant rents in respect of their own improvements. This Bill provided that in cases of improvement the presumption should be in favour of the tenant, that the burden of proof should be thrown upon the landlord. This was manifestly fair, because the tenants had no records to show the money they expended; whereas the landlord could have very little difficulty in showing, from the accounts in his rent office, every farthing spent by him on improvements. The Bill proposed to define improvements as not only improvements in works, but improvements in the letting value of the holding. It proposed that the doctrine of compensation by enjoyment should be done away with. It also further defined and elucidated the term "predecessor in title." Up to this point they had been dealing with the relations of landlords and tenants in Ireland. They regarded that portion of the Land Act as a stop-gap. It could not provide a permanent settlement of the Land Question, and if they desired to make the defective clauses more efficient, it was only to secure protection and justice to tenants pending the settlement of the question on different lines. The Land League had, it seemed, accomplished a great work in the political world to-day. They found all sections of Irish politicians, and English politicians as well, acknowledging that the only permanent settlement of the Land Question which was possible was the settlement advocated in the first place by Michael Davitt and the Land League. Landlordism in Ireland was doomed; and the landlords were crying out in behalf of those doctrines which two years ago were denounced as confiscation and robbery. The Purchase Clauses of the Land Act were inoperative, because they were halting and half-hearted proposals in their conception. The proposals contained in this Bill were thorough and practical, and they were also, as he contended, strictly moderate. Where the Land Court was satisfied of the credit of the applicant it was empowered to advance the whole of the purchase money to the present tenant. In the case of a tenant over £30 valuation it was proposed that the Court should hand over the money on annuities of 5 per cent, extending over a period of 35 years. To tenants under £30 it was proposed that the Commissioners should be empowered to advance the whole of the money on annuities to be repaid at the rate of £3 16s. per annum, extending over 52 years. Those proposals worked out very simply. In the case of a tenant occupying a farm at £40 a-year, the Court would advance the £800 required for the purchase, and upon that amount the tenant would pay £5 per cent, or £40 a year for 35 years, when the farm would become his own; and in the case of a tenant occupying a farm at £20 rent, the Court would advance the £400 purchase money, and the tenant would pay £3 15s. per cent, or £15 4s. a-year for 52 years, at the end of which time he would become the owner of the soil. In the case of the tenant paying over £30 there would be no increase of rent; in the case of the tenant paying less than £30 a-year there would be an actual reduction of rent. To these proposals, which were moderate and practical, he did not anticipate any serious objection. From the landlords he certainly did not expect any opposition, because some such proposals as these must be carried if a large number of the landlords were to be saved from inevitable ruin. As for the Government, he confessed he did not know what to expect. If the Government had grasped the situation in Ireland they could have no hesitation in accepting the Bill. It provided the means of staying the strife of generations, and arriving at a generous, amicable, and just settlement. He could not conceive that the Government was so dead to the sense of its responsibility in Ireland as to refuse to give its approval to the proposals in the Bill. From the landlord's point of view, the proposals were just and fair. He was one of those who did not desire that every man in Ireland who was a landlord should be driven from the country; and he was convinced that if these proposals were carried out, some, at any rate, of the landlords, even though they might have to sell their estates, would be content to live in the country for the future. Those of them who had any love for Ireland, any sympathy with the wishes and aspirations of the people, would remain; and those of them who had not might go, for they were alien in spirit as well as in race. There were other proposals in the Bill, but he would not go into them, as they were matters of detail, and he must thank the House for having given him its attention. He had explained, as clearly as he could, the important provisions of the Bill. He had said that the proposals were moderate. They were not made on the responsibility of one Member of the House, but they were the proposals of the whole Irish Parliamentary Party for the amendment of the Land Act, for the restoration of peace and order in Ireland. It was their answer--and it was a complete and crushing answer—to those who said that they desired to deprive the tenants of the benefits of the Act of last year. He did not know what fate awaited the Bill; but this, at all events, he knew—that if the Government abandoned their hateful policy of Coercion, which baffled conciliation, and which proved utterly powerless to repress—if they accepted the proposals now submitted to them by the Irish Party, in a spirit of honesty and moderation, he believed in his heart they would be doing a great deal to hasten the arrival of the day when Ireland would no longer be what she was now—a disgrace and a danger to England—but when she would be a peaceful and prosperous nation, finding the best security for law and order in the existence and prosperity of a peasant proprietary, and finding her surest guarantee for liberty and Constitutional rights in laws made by Irishmen on Irish soil.

Mr. Redmond

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Redmond.)

MR. GLADSTONE: I do not think, Sir, that we have any right to complain either of the length of the speech of the hon. Gentleman, in which he has introduced an important, and what, I hope, will be a useful debate, or of the judicious method he has pursued in directing our attention rather to what he considers the principal and essential features of his Bill, than to a very full and exhaustive statement of its details—or, finally, of the spirit of that speech, in regard to which I make due allowance for the points of view from which he approaches the subject. Of course, there are parts of it—I mean parts of his general declaration—in which he will not expect me to concur; but I fully grant that, from the point of view of one who has approved of many proceedings in Ireland down to the present date, of which I am not able to approve, he has fairly and impartially said everything that he could in his speech towards opening a favourable prospect for the working of the system of the Land Law in Ireland. There is one extremely important portion of the speech and of the Bill which I intend to recognize as a most fair and proper subject—a most allowable subject—for present and immediate discussion; but on which I do not propose to dwell to-day, for a reason which I will give, and which, I think, the hon. Member will probably admit to be sufficient. My object in rising at this moment is, in the first place, to do such justice as I can to the spirit and to the language of the hon. Gentleman; and, in the second place, perhaps, to narrow, to some extent, the field of the debate. Sir, I undoubtedly regard this Bill as establishing, on the part of those who have brought it in, a fair claim to this acknowledgment—that we are bound to assume the perfect good faith of their proceeding; and, whether we agree or do not agree with the principal enactments of the Bill, we cannot, I think, in justice, construe it otherwise than as an authentic expression of the desire of the hon. Gentleman and his Friends to make the working of the Land Act such as that it shall be, in their view, an effectual security for the restoration of peace and tranquillity in Ireland. Indeed,

Sir, the language of the hon. Gentleman near the commencement of his speech—I do not know that I quote his exact words—left no room for doubt upon this head; because he said, in effect, that the Land Act and the provisions which it contained, plus the Bill of the hon. Member, with the provisions which that Bill contains, afforded the only means of restoring peace and prosperity to Ireland. That is, undoubtedly, a declaration worthy of notice, coming from the hon. Member, as the person principally in charge of this Bill, and as speaking for those whose names are on the back of the Bill, and for others. Under these circumstances, I regret that, for reasons which I will state, and for which the hon. Member himself must be prepared, it is not in the power of the Government to support the second reading of this Bill. He has spoken of the Bill as containing four main heads—one of them the subject of arrears, to which he assigns, at the present moment, an overwhelming importance; the second, the subject of the Purchase Clauses, to which he assigns not so much importance at the present moment, but which, under the ultimate development of the measure, is also of overwhelming importance; and the third, I will call it, though he took it second, the question of leases, to which he assigns a very great importance; and, lastly, the subject of improvements, to which he assigns, likewise, a very great importance. That is what I understand to be a very rough outline of the hon. Member's speech. Now, I draw a distinction in speaking of the provisions of this Bill. I am not prepared, and we are not prepared, to depart from the grounds upon which we originally objected to the institution of a Parliamentary inquiry into the working of the Land Act. We considered, and we still consider, that the Tenure Clauses of the Bill ought not to be disturbed, nor, at the present time, to be amended. That we consider as a general rule. But there are matters outside the main subject of these Tenure Clauses with respect to which that objection does not apply. It certainly does not apply to the question of the Purchase Clauses; and I am bound to say that, in our judgment, it does not apply to the question of arrears. The question of arrears is one that may be dealt with without, in the slightest degree, disturbing the general structure of the Tenure Clauses. But the question of the Purchase Clauses is one of a wholly different character. It is really not a question of interfering with the working of the Land Act—for the Purchase Clauses can hardly be said to have got to work—but it is a question whether, either by the modification of the plan which was embodied in the Bill, or by the development of the subject in accordance with some larger plan, good can be done with reference to what I think a very large majority of the House appear to contemplate as the ultimate solution of the Irish Land Question. Now, the hon. Member must not conclude from the remarks which I am about to make that I am derogating from what I have said with respect to the Purchase Clauses. The great Irish question will naturally present itself from three points of view to the mind of any Gentleman contemplating it. One point of view will be that which relates to the present Bill for the amendment of the Land Act—rather generally for the amendment of the Land Act. One will be the subject of the Purchase Clauses of the Act; and the third will be the important question of the proposals which it may be our duty to make during the present Session for the direct purpose of the maintenance of peace and order in Ireland. As regards the subject of peace and order in Ireland, I think, considering that that discussion stands in a certain form, at least, for an early day, it would be wrong on my part to advert to it at the present moment. I think, Sir, as respects the Purchase Clauses, the hon. Gentleman will probably feel that when a Notice has been given on the part of a large section of this House, which, in itself, leads to the expectation of proposals of great importance and great weight, considering the quarter from which they proceed, I should only prejudice that discussion; and I could not enter adequately upon this portion of the hon. Member's Bill were I to venture upon any remarks on that part of the subject beyond the admission I have made that it is a perfectly allowable subject for practical consideration, if we can have that consideration during the present Session. Now, Sir, the reason why we cannot support the second reading of this Bill is, that in many of the clauses of the Bill—in the majority of them—it does re-open, and re-opens very largely, the Land Tenure Clauses of the Act of last year. We have given the best advice and the best consideration in our power to the subject of those clauses. We did consider it at the time when the proposal for Parliamentary inquiry was made in the House of Lords. We opposed that inquiry, taking into view, undoubtedly, the associations under which the proposal was made. But, whatever those associations may have been, and even putting them aside—though I will not say that we have felt ourselves absolutely precluded by any preliminary bar, or by the idea of consistency with the course taken at the commencement of the Session, from reconsidering the subjects of leases and improvements, which I take as the two main divisions of the hon. Member's Bill with which I am now dealing—yet we are advisedly of opinion that, looking at the whole subject of the Act of last year, the delicacy of the questions raised, the gravity of the interests involved, and the amount of case which the hon. Gentleman is able to show for interference on those points, we should not be justified in acceding to the second reading of a Bill which involves the acceptance of a principle that so largely disturbs the framework of the Act. With respect to the question of improvements, we admit that, in certain points, the judgment to which the hon. Gentleman has referred does not accurately correspond—far be it for me to say it does not accurately correspond with the Act, because that would be a judgment questioning the legal authority of those who have given the decision—but does not accurately correspond with the intentions with which the Land Act was framed. But it has been our duty to consider carefully, in concert with our own Legal Advisers, and in concert with the Commissioners, so far as it has been in our power, what is the real scope and the real importance of those deviations, and we do not find that the scope of those deviations is such as—especially in the absence of a large experience—would justify us in re-opening the whole of that most difficult, complex question with regard to the relations of landlord and tenant in respect to improvements. Again, in respect to leases, I do not deny that there may be plausibility, and perhaps more than plausibility, in the claim made by the hon. Member that the tenant who takes a lease in succession to another lease may be entitled to have his claim, as against abuse, considered, as he would be entitled if he had been a yearly tenant before the conclusion of the lease. But we are not able to say that that, after all, is the question which is mainly kept in view by those who desire to re-open the subject of leases. The question mainly, in their view, evidently is this—they desire to place the lessee-tenant upon the same footing with the yearly tenant, not only with regard to his enjoyment of whatever advantage may arise in respect of abuses practised against him, but their claim—I do not say that Gentlemen may not be warranted, from their point of view, in raising it—is to have a reconsideration of rents under leases, in the same way as rents under yearly tenancies. Well, I must be frank to the hon. Members. We, I think, considered that matter pretty fully. I am not sure that the secondary point I have mentioned was considered last year; but, at any rate, the question of altering rents under leases was very distinctly considered, and the Government very distinctly gave their judgment that they would not be warranted in asking the House to interfere with the covenanting leases in regard to land. Our contention always, I think, was this—when we gave effect to the opinion of those who hold that a lease in Ireland does not extinguish tenant right, we contended that a lease was known and believed in Ireland to be a covenant to pay a certain rent for a certain number of years; and with that covenant we are not prepared to interfere. I now come to this most important question—the question of arrears. That is a provision of a temporary character; and I am bound to admit that, although the clause in the Act of last year has been by no means without utility, and although no inconsiderable claims have been made in respect to no inconsiderable amount of arrears under it; yet it has proved to be very far short indeed of the necessities of the case. The hon. Member, I think, himself spoke—at any rate, various Members sitting in that quarter of the House have spoken—of the failure of that clause as constituting the failure of the Land Act; and have described the failure of the Land Act, from their point of view, as a dismal failure, very much in connection with the operation of this clause. On the other hand, we have heard from our own side of the House—and from very many Members sitting on our own side of the House, who appear to me to be quite as well entitled to speak for their constituents in Ireland as those whom the hon. Gentleman calls the Irish Parliamentary Party—urgent and repeated applications to draw us into a discussion of the question of arrears. We have never repelled those applications; we have not been insensible to the great and serious difficulties with which the question has been surrounded. I am quite prepared to say that we think it demands our practical consideration; and that we certainly look with some confidence, provided we can attain certain substantial conditions, to legislating upon the subject at a somewhat early date during the present Session. Now, Sir, the conditions which we deem to be essential to a satisfactory plan are these. We do not look upon this as a matter which ought to lead us into a general contentious re-opening of questions that have been considered and dealt with. We desire to be able to approach it—when we do approach it—in a spirit of perfect impartiality. It is for the interest of landlords quite as much as of tenants—and it is to the interest of all classes in Ireland, and of the country, and of the Empire, which never can be well while Ireland is ill—that, if possible, we should arrive at some fair and impartial settlement of this question. Well, then, next to the impartiality with which it is our duty to approach the question—and, indeed, if possible, even beyond it in its importance—is our desire to move in accordance with Irish opinion. And here I am not about to draw any invidious distinctions. After the speech of the hon. Member, I should be totally without justification if I did not give expression on this occasion to what, after all, is a truism and a commonplace—namely, that Ministers charged with the Government of the country, and with advising the House in the work of legislation, have no right, even if they had the inclination, to bear in mind, upon a subject of this kind, former differences, however sharp; and that it is their duty to invite from every quarter every suggestion which they can obtain from persons qualified to speak which may contribute to a satisfactory solution of the question; and therefore, also, I hope that those whom I see sitting directly opposite—and I am glad to see both the right hon. and learned Gentlemen the Members for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson and Mr. Plunket) with a pen or pencil in hand—will not withhold their counsel in regard to a practical subject of great importance, and I trust that no barrier of Party differences or old recollections may arise. And, thirdly, what I feel is this. Having to re-open the question of arrears, our plan must not only be impartial, it must not only be sustained by a wide concurrence of Irish opinion; but I hope it may be so framed as to be effectual. We have had the advantage of a good deal of Irish opinion upon this subject; but I think those who have applied their minds to it will be prepared for a little further development from myself. It is obvious, I think, that the question of arrears may conceivably be dealt with upon either one of two bases. There are a great number of important secondary questions involved in the question of arrears. The source from which the money is to be derived, and many other points, are points of importance, upon which a responsible judgment must be exercised by the Government, and by the House. But there are two distinct and definite bases, upon either of which a measure may be founded. It may be a voluntary measure; it may be a compulsory measure. If it is a voluntary measure, then it will be framed on the basis of the Act of last year. It would proceed upon the principle of making loans to tenants, and of the repayment of these loans under their voluntary action, with an increase of the inducements which were offered by the Land Act. But the Bill of the hon. Member contains a Compulsory Clause, and I am not sorry that it contains that Compulsory Clause; because I think that the question between voluntary and compulsory action is a question which may, under the present circumstances, be fairly entertained; and that the choice which the Government might make between those two methods of procedure is a choice that would be materially influenced by what they find to be the state of Irish opinion. That Irish opinion, I hope, will be largely drawn forth by the discussion of the Bill which the hon. Gentleman has laid before us. I have nearly said all I have to say upon these matters; but I wish to speak a few words on the clause of the hon. Gentleman with regard to arrears. It is on the basis of compulsion, and, being on the basis of compulsion, I am bound to say that I think it a clause, upon the whole, drawn with great care and judgment. There are several points in that Clause to which I wish to refer. In the first place, arrears, in the language of that Clause, are to be arrears owing in respect of rents due before and down to November, 1880. That is an important—a very important—condition of the Clause. Secondly, the Clause of the hon. Gentleman proceeds upon proved incapacity to pay. That, likewise, is a provision of great importance, and of great value, if we can work it. When we induced the House to pass, in 1880, what was called the Compensation for Disturbance Bill—I am not going to refer to any matters associated with that name—we proposed to proceed upon the basis of proved incapacity to pay. We were under the belief that the Civil Bill Court would be competent to deal with that question; and I do not despair, if a plan of this kind be adopted, of its working this provision, which, in point of principle, is a very valuable provision. Thirdly, the Clause draws a distinction, which I think is just, at a certain point of valuation. It marks the intention of the framers to meet the necessities of the case, and not to go beyond that necessity. The fourth point, as I have said, is that the basis of it is compulsion—that is to say, the application of the one party will suffice to make it compulsory on the other party. Now, I do not know—I am not now giving any judgment on the part of the Government—but I hope, with the hon. Member, it will not be supposed that because its basis is compulsory, it is therefore a Clause conceived in a spirit of hostility to either party. I myself happen to be acquainted with the sentiments of some considerable number of Irish landlords, and men who have taken a large share in the discussion of this question—by no means on the side of the tenant—who appeared to desire that some compulsory plan, in the sense I have described, of dealing with arrears should be introduced and adopted. That is a subject of great importance, and a subject on which we are anxious for more light. The hon. Gentleman finally proposes that the sum which may be advanced in respect of arrears under his Clause shall be a gift, and not a loan. I entirely agree with him that if we are to proceed upon the basis that he has described, that is the proper course to take; and I will go one point further, and say I think he is right in drawing the sum that he desires to have from the Church Surplus, in so far as this—that I do not know that anything could be more emphatically a peace-offering, or a more legitimate application of that money, than the application of it to this proposal. But I will go a point further, and I will say this—it would not be fair, on my part, to ask the hon. Gentleman whether he has entered into a careful calculation to show that the Church Surplus will yield at the present moment money sufficient for this purpose. But, viewing the nature of his case, I would venture to go one point further, and say that, believing, as we do, that the matter, although serious and important in a pecuniary point of view, yet is limited, I should not myself be prepared to make it a fundamental objection to a Compulsory Clause that something might possibly be required from the Public Exchequer in order to work that Clause efficiently. I am very anxious, indeed, to take the care that properly appertains to my function in setting forth what I conceive to be the main parts of this very important Clause in order that it may draw the attention of the House, and that we may learn whether Irish opinion is favourable to the one mode of proceeding or to the other mode of proceeding. For my part, I have stated the three conditions which, I think, it is our duty absolutely to keep in view—namely, in the first place, to treat this subject impartially; secondly, to treat it in conformity with Irish opinion, so far as we can entertain it, and to allow no recollections of former transactions to interfere with our appreciation of that opinion; and, thirdly, to make, if we can, a plan which shall be effective. What I hope is, that considering the good and fair spirit in which the hon. Gentleman has opened this question, the debate may be a debate which will tend mainly to a practical issue, and which will give to the Government that light and aid which I think the House will feel that we must necessarily want, before we can endeavour to enter upon the reconsideration of this most important subject of arrears in connection with the section of the Act. Not alone, I must say, the speech of the hon. Gentleman, but the introduction of the Bill itself, I hold to be a favourable symptom; and I trust that the debate may throw a light upon a horizon which has long unhappily been darkened. If it is, I cannot say how great a value I attach to any expectations connected with it; because, though I know, and have perfect confidence in the power of this country, and in the solidity of this Empire, for the purpose of asserting everywhere the Imperial authority, yet I likewise know that it is an Empire organized on the principles of freedom—that the compulsory government of any of its parts is an idea hostile and alien to the entire spirit of the Constitution. Therefore, whatever may tend to the uniting of Ireland, for a great practical purpose such as that we have in view, which raises no subjects of Constitutional difficulty, but which touches the whole constitution of society in that country—the importance of it I cannot overstate. Nor can I overstate the earnest anxiety of the Government to know that no weakness and no pettiness on their part shall interfere with their adoption of such a course as may be most conducive, not only to the passing of legislation in a satisfactory manner, but to the completing, in a most essential point, the important labours of last year for the benefit and for the happiness of all classes of the people of Ireland.

Mr. Gladstone

MR. HEALY said, he was sure that he should not be expressing the opinion of hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House if he did not endeavour to reciprocate the expressions of the right hon. Gentleman in the temper in which he had met the proposals in this Bill. The right hon. Gentleman stated that he thought he saw in the Bill a gleam of hope; but their feeling of satisfaction with the course taken by the right hon. Gentleman was considerably mitigated by his statement that he would be obliged to vote against the second reading; and he (Mr. Healy) could not help regretting that when the Premier had stated that a gleam of hope which had been shed on the question the Government should proceed to place an extinguisher upon it. But he must say that their feeling was again mitigated by the statement that it was the intention of the Government to deal with the arrears question. He was very glad, indeed, that the Government had seen the great importance of it. It was a question which he might say, in the present condition of affairs in Ireland, was one of the greatest magnitude; and he thought, so far as he could judge from the expressions of the right hon. Gentleman, that the Government were about to meet the question in a proper spirit, as they were evidently intending to meet the wishes of the Irish people. With regard to the proposal to make the charge fall upon the Irish Church Surplus, which was an Irish fund, the Government must remember that it was not in the power of any private Member to propose to make a charge upon the public funds, and upon the pockets of the country; and, therefore, they were restricted to the Irish Church Surplus, as they were obliged to put forward some scheme, and he (Mr. Healy) considered it was a proper fund to be applied as they proposed. Therefore, he listened with satisfaction to the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, that his mind was not shut against the question of the augmentation of that fund for the purpose of a charge upon the Exchequer. The right hon. Gentleman stated that they could not disturb the Tenure Clauses of the Bill—namely, those relating to improvements and leases. As to the first point, he gathered that the right hon. Gentleman did not admit the accuracy of the statements made by them on that question. But he stated he would wait, in order to see the effect of "Adams v. Dunseath." He (Mr. Healy) had occasion to put a Question on this point to the right hon. Gentleman; and his reply intimated that, while the decisions of the Court did not express the intention of the Government, yet he would watch carefully any further manifestations of injustice that might be occasioned by the decision in "Adams v. Dunseath." Before coming down to the House he (Mr. Healy) had fortified himself with some cases of that description. He took the case of two tenants on the estate of the Knight of Glin—Dillon and Hanrahan—who had appealed against the decision of the Sub-Commissioners; and their rents were raised, in one case £4 and the other £3, by the Court of Appeal in consequence. Owing to the decision in "Adams v. Dunseath," the judgment given by Judge O'Hagan represented a loss for the next 15 years of £60 in the case of Dillon, and £45 in that of Hanrahan. They had before the Court at present no less than 70,000 cases; and he asked the Prime Minister if he could give them any assurance as to what percentage of those cases injustice would not be worked by similar decisions? Last year the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) proposed an Amendment which was intended to put it beyond doubt that no enjoyment of improvements by the tenant was to entitle the Court to increase rent. The declarations of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister on this point were remarkable. On the 9th of August the right hon. Gentleman said that—

"In the Act of 1870 we did, in respect to the tenant, recognize the principle that he might be recompensed by a reasonable lapse of time in respect of the improvements he had made, and that the use and profits of those improvements for a certain time might be considered as compensation; but we do not recognize that principle in the present Act."—[3 Hansard, cclxiv. 1393.]

On another occasion the right hon. Gentleman, speaking on an Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote), said that the doctrine accepted at the time of the passing of the Act of 1870 was one they must certainly decline to recognize then, as it was neither the basis of the Act of 1881, nor was there any occasion for it—that was the doctrine that the enjoyment by the tenant of the improvements on the property for a certain time should be a ground for raising the rent. But the language of the Government was still more remarkable when the hon. Member for the City of Cork moved his Amendment on that subject, to the effect that the time during which a tenant might have enjoyed the advantages of his improvements should not be held to be compensation. The present Lord Chancellor of Ireland (Mr. Law) said that it was absurd to suppose that the Court would hold enjoyment to mean that the tenant had been paid for his improvements. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) also said the Amendment was unnecessary, because it was little short of impossible to imagine that a Court could think that compensation was due to the landlord for an improvement which had not cost him a single farthing. He (Mr. Healy) then rose, and, being mindful of a racy expression which the right hon. Gentleman had made use of, asked him if he would lay 10 to 1 that the Court would not assess rents on tenants' improvements. The right hon. Gentleman nodded, as much as to say that he was prepared to do so. Perhaps it was fortunate there was no stake involved, for if there had been, he was inclined to think that he (Mr. Healy) would have been, by this time, a considerable winner. He wished to call attention to a still more important matter. In the Act of 1881 there was no definition of improvements. There was, however, a statement that the definition of matters not given in the Act of 1881 was to be ruled by the Act of 1870; and that defined "improvement" to mean any work on an agricultural holding which adds to the value of the holding, and which is necessary to the holding. The most important point in the Bill was that, while it approved the definition of the Act of 1870, it omitted the requirement that the improvement should be suitable to the holding. He thought he could show that the definition of improvements in that Act, in view of the 9th sub-section of the 8th clause of the latter Statute, worked very unfortunately for the tenant. Let them take a case. Suppose that under the Act of 1870 the tenant built a villa residence on a farm. That, not being an improvement suitable to the holding, the landlord would not be bound to pay compensation for. But in the Act of 1881, it was stated that no rent should be payable on a tenant's own improvements. In "Adams v. Dunseath," however, the Court of Appeal had laid down that such rent might be charged when there had been a user for a certain time. The effect was that where there was an improvement which might be very necessary for the holding, but which the landlord did not deem to be so, the tenant might be assessed for it. Therefore, they were in a worse position than ever under that Act, than if the tenants had been left to make any arrangements they could with their landlords. It was a most extraordinary state of things.

Mr. Healy

The tenant was put in a worse position by the Act of 1881, with regard to improvements, than he was by the Act of 1870, because, in the Act of 1870, he was dealing with a landlord who would deal with him, in reference to assessing rents upon improvements, from motives of policy; but the Act of 1881 had taken out of the landlord's hands altogether the power of fixing rents, and put it into the hands of the Court, which was bound to decide the matter on mathematical and legal principles; and the legal principle was—that no matter what improvements might be made by the tenant, so long as he got a user of them, the Court was bound to fix a rent on them. Under the Act of 1870, the landlord was not bound to assess rent upon improvements unsuitable to the holding; but now the landlord had no power in the matter, and the Court was bound to fix rent upon such improvements. The Prime Minister had admitted that it was not the view of Parliament that rent should be levied on improvements. The cases he (Mr. Healy) had quoted showed that it was so levied. Therefore, he considered that they had made out a very excellent case as regarded improvements; and he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it was not his intention that rents should not be assessed in those cases? What were the intentions of the Government in regard to the other thousands of tenants whose cases had yet to be heard? Because of a failure on the part of Parliament, were these men to go on paying what the Prime Minister himself had said was unjust and beyond the intention of Parliament? In effect the right hon. Gentleman practically stated that because the House of Lords had brought forward a Committee, and because he was obliged to put down his foot at an early period of the Session, and say he would not have the Act of last year disturbed, he did not want to take it up again, notwithstanding that he saw his putting his foot down was doing an injustice to a large class of the people. Owing to the decision in the case of "Adams v. Dunseath," if it continued to be followed in the cases of some 80,000 tenants who had applied to the Court, at a fair percentage the loss to the tenants would amount to at least £1,000,000. Yet the right hon. Gentleman said, because the House of Lords had asked for a Committee, that he was not prepared to disturb the Improvement Clauses, although he (Mr. Healy) had shown what the original intentions of the Government and of Parliament were, and notwithstanding that he had instanced cases in which the tenants were sustaining considerable loss, and that, upon a fair average, the loss to the thousands whose cases had yet to be dealt with would amount to millions of money. This only impressed the more strongly on the minds of the Irish Members the real reason why the Government did not wish to disturb this Act of Parliament. What they were thinking of was the time of Parliament. The House had not time to attend to this matter. When the right hon. Gentleman thought of the weary days and nights of last year, he might be well excused if he hesitated at the prospect of another series of nights such as they had last year. Although, in a sense, it was to the Irish Members a labour of love, still they had no desire for it to be repeated. But in plain justice to the people of Ireland the Government ought to tell them what they intended to do, seeing that their failure to carry out their original intention of the Act of last year would involve the Irish farmers in a loss of so large a sum of money. The failure of the Act in the respect pointed out had not been owing to any laches on the part of the Irish Party, for the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) had brought forward an Amendment which would have safeguarded the tenants, and saved these millions to the tenants; and it would be remembered that when that Amendment was submitted, the right hon. Gentleman stated that he could not conceive the probability of any Court ever holding that user by the tenant was a compensation for his improvements. The excuse given for not dealing with this matter was a very poor one; but he saw in his mind's eye a House that would be only too glad to lend its ear to the cry of the Irish tenant. But the only House which had the time and inclination to deal with that important matter had been destroyed, and the men who would constitute it were powerless. Therefore, when the foreign Government in Ireland had to consider whether, from the points of view of time and politics, they could deal with the question, it was humiliating for the Irish Party to come forward and to plead before foreigners, knowing well that the treatment of the question depended very much on how it would tend to serve Party purposes. That was, unfortunately, the conclusion which was forced on them. He had dealt at sufficient length with the first point—the improvements. As to the second, which was that the use by the tenant or his predecessors in title should be deemed compensation for improvements, the Court, in the case of “Adams v. Dunseath,” had held that the word “improvements” meant the labour and capital expended by the tenant on the land which tended to increase its value, and not the increase in value. For those improvements the tenant was to pay. Thus, if a man expended £1,000 on his land, according to the Court, he would be simply entitled to an interest on it, and not to gain anything from the improved working of the land, owing to this £1,000 having been put upon it. That meant that if the £1,000 brought no interest, the tenant would receive none; and, if it did, the landlord was to share it with the tenant. That seemed to admit the truth of the allegation which had been made in that House, that the improvability of the land belonged to the landlord. But he was prepared to prove that such was not the case. Supposing a landlord had two farms, and charged £50 per annum for them, one being improvable and the other non-improvable, was he to be told that £50 did not include, in the view of the landlord, the improvability, on the one hand, and the non-improvability on the other? The Irish landlord was not a fool, and when he let his land he would take care that he fixed such a rent as would include the improvability. The improvability was already taken into account in the rent, and all benefits arising from any expenditure which tended further to improve the land must necessarily, in common justice, belong to the tenant. This Bill, which the Government had refused, was intended, therefore, to make clear the decision of the Court in the case of “Adams v. Dunseath.” He wished to call attention for a moment to the pledge given last year by the Prime Minister on the subject of town parks. The right hon. Gentleman had then said that he could see no reason in principle why a man holding town parks land should be excluded from the benefit of the Act, and why they should not be treated like other holdings.

MR. GLADSTONE said, the hon. Member must have misunderstood him. He had stated that, in his opinion, it was worthy of consideration whether the cases of these persons ought not to be dealt with in some Bill. He had never intended to convey the belief that town parks ought to be dealt with like other holdings.

MR. HEALY said, this recalled to his mind the circumstance that, in the discussion on the matter, the Irish Members proposed that in respect to town parks the Act should be limited to towns of over 6,000 inhabitants, and the right hon. Gentleman said he could see no principle upon which distinction should be made between towns according to the number of their inhabitants; but he also said, during the course of the coming Recess, he would look into the subject. At any rate, he knew this—that when he had asked the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland whether he could give them any idea as to the area in Ireland covered by town parks, and the right hon. Gentleman having endeavoured to get the information through the only machinery for the purpose in the country—namely, the Local Government Board—stated that he was unable to find the area. The result was that nothing whatever had been done; but he (Mr. Healy) was sorry the matter had as yet remained undealt with, for the view had been conveyed to the Irish tenantry that it was the intention of the Government to inquire into it. These town parks, unfortunately, were very often held by persons carrying on some small business, perhaps the business of a publican, grocer, or general dealer, in a small village. According to the view of the right hon. Gentleman, these men were not farmers. He held that they were traders first and farmers afterwards. The people themselves, however, if asked what they were, would describe themselves as farmers first and shopkeepers afterwards. These men were excluded from the Act; and it appeared to them, and to him (Mr. Healy) also, very unfair that this should occur because a man eked out his living in the way described. Furthermore, there was what was called land let for accommodation purposes. It frequently appeared that a country doctor, with an income of about £90 a-year, or a parish priest or curate, whose income was generally small, found it necessary, to eke out his salary, to farm a little land. That was at once held to be accommodation land, and the consequence was that those who farmed it were subjected to rack rents. In dealing with these matters the right hon. Gentleman should take a broad and comprehensive view, and include all classes within the provisions of the Act except a very special class indeed, and leave it to the Court to decide whether the rent fixed was a fair one or not. Finally, he desired to draw the attention of the Prime Minister to a very important matter which was untouched by the Land Act. There were now some 70,000 cases remaining undealt with by the Court. In the 60th section of the Act it was stated that all applications made to the Court up to a certain time were to be considered as having been made on the first day the Court sat, and, therefore, that the rent fixed by it should date as from the first rent day before the Act came into operation in August, so that the rents would date from March. There were 60,000 of the cases still down for hearing to which this section would apply. The Court was blocked, and it might be two or three years before the cases were disposed of. Therefore, while it could cut down the rents from March, 1881, the landlords might in the three years the tenants were waiting to have their cases tried, proceed against them by ejectment and turn them out, although it might afterwards turn out that the rents were far too high, and ought to be lowered some 25 or 30 per cent. The right hon. Gentleman, merely for the sake of technicality, because he did not wish to interfere with the Tenure Clauses of the Bill, was going to exclude 60,000 people from the benefits of the Act. It appeared to him (Mr. Healy) that this was a very unfortunate thing—there was something almost ludicrous about it. He could not believe that it had ever entered into the heads of the Government that there would be at least 60,000 tenants who would have made application, and whose rents would have been cut down as from the day before the passing of the Act. If the Government had imagined that there would have been such a large rush, surely they would have made arrangements to have safeguarded the tenants' interests until the Court could fix the rents permanently. They had not made such arrangements, however. This was an Act for which the tenants were told they ought to be grateful; but it led to strange anomalies. But the present Bill, whilst it carefully recognized the title of the landlord to rent, said that only the Government valuation should be made payable until a fair rent was fixed, and contained provisions thoroughly securing the tenants who were waiting to have the rent so fixed. The Government did not deem it necessary to refer to this clause in the Bill, or to the poor people who, on the faith of the right hon. Gentleman's representation, had gone into the Court, and were practically liable to be shipwrecked in the meantime whilst waiting to have their cases heard, without any protection from the Government. It appeared to him that this was an extraordinary thing, so much so that attention could not be too often and too vigorously called to it. It was now proposed that until the decision of the Court could be obtained in these numerous cases, there should be a stay of all proceedings, and that the rents should be taken at Griffith's valuation from the date of the application which was to relate back to the day after the passing of the Act. Doubtless, in all human affairs, most proposals, which dealt with conflicting interests as between man and man, were more or less imperfect and open to improvements, and that Bill, of course, had its imperfections; but he should like to know, bound as they were to bring forward a proposition on behalf of the tenant which would not have the appearance of being too much opposed to the landlord's interest, what proposal a body of men could have brought forward that would have been more impartial or more just to all parties interested? If the Government had properly considered the position of these tenants, he should have thought they would have done something for them. He would, therefore, appeal to them now not to exclude this subject from their action. The right hon. Gentleman had described the bringing forward of that Bill that day as a gleam of light amid the clouds of the Irish difficulty, and had said he believed it was the intention of the Irish Home Rule Party to make the Land Act of 1881 a living reality in Irish minds. He desired to impress upon the right hon. Gentleman that when a proposal of that kind was brought forward, it must be taken as an indication of the desire of the Home Rule Party, in the first place, to answer the charge that had been brought against them of attempting to upset and to shipwreck the Act of 1881; and, in the second place, to set themselves right with the country and prove their bona fides by bringing in a Bill of this kind, which had been described by hon. Gentlemen on the Government side of the House as a moderate measure. Being a moderate one, it was necessarily the result of compromise. He would remind the right hon. Gentleman that he had told the Opposition in the course of the discussion on the Bill of last year that that was the smallest Bill the Government could ask the House of Commons to pass. The right hon. Gentleman had great difficulty in passing it; but he at length succeeded, and now he (Mr. Healy) would tell the Prime Minister in turn to remember that this was the smallest measure the Irish Party would be satisfied with. Knowing the condition of the country to be what it was, and knowing the charges that had been made against them, it was the desire of the Irish Party, animated as they were by patriotism and a desire to promote the best interests of their country, that the Bill should be accepted as it was presented; but he would tell the House that, coming from the quarter it did, it was the smallest measure they would ask the House to pass.

Mr. Healy

MR. O'SHEA said, that unsatisfactory as was part of the right hon. Gentleman's (the Prime Minister's) statement with regard to certain points of the Bill, he sincerely believed his declaration with regard to the intention of the Government to deal with arrears would be hailed with joy by the whole of Ireland to-morrow, and would do more for the pacification of the country than any number of superior Resident Magistrates or police. He was glad there appeared to be a mode of arranging this matter in a friendly way by—as the right hon. Gentleman himself described it—a “combination” of all Parties in the House. All sensible landlords in Ireland were most anxious that some peaceable settlement of this question should be arrived at. He (Mr. O'Shea) himself was in communication with a great many landlords in Munster and elsewhere, and all those who were desirous of seeing peace return were willing to make some sacrifice, and objected to the stringent measures taken by a few of their neighbours. It would be of the greatest possible importance that any arrangement of arrears arrived at should be made compulsory. In fixing the valuation of the holding to come within the operation of the Bill below £30, the hon. Member for New Ross (Mr. Redmond) had shown considerable moderation, and had hit the point of almost absolute justice, because tenants of such holdings were not the men who could but would not pay their rents; they were absolutely unable to pay. The proposal that all these cases should be adjudicated on by the Sub-Commissioners appeared to him, however, to be one of the ill-considered points in the Bill. The block of business in the Courts was already so great that he should be sorry to see extra work placed on its shoulders. A separate department should be formed in the Land Court in Dublin for carrying out the necessary arrangements. Power of intervention should be given to that department, and a severe penalty should be imposed upon anyone giving false testimony or making false affidavits. With regard to the right hon. Gentleman's statement on the subject of the date from which judicial rents should be paid, he quite agreed with the hon. Member for Wexford. It was illogical to compel a man whose name stood lower on a list to continue to pay a rack rent, while another man whose name stood higher had to pay merely a rent fixed by the Court. With regard to leases, during the progress of the Act last Session he had used every means in his power to bring forward information, in the hope that the Government would see their way to giving leaseholders the same advantage as the ordinary tenants from year to year. He could never understand how a contract made for a term of years became more sacred than a contract made for one year; and nothing had tended more to unfortunate dissension and to greater crime in certain localities with which he was acquainted than the omission of leaseholders from the operation of the Bill. The leaseholders saw on all sides of them men applying to the Court. They saw transactions between landlord and tenant out of Court. They saw the advantages gained by their neighbours who could state their cases, but they themselves had no hope under the Act. It was extremely mortifying to them, and it had created a sense of injustice in their minds that had led to horrible crimes. He hoped, then, it was not too late, although the questions of tenure were important, for the Government again to consider this matter, and, as they had already declared their intention to improve the Act of last year, that they would go still further. There was an amount of uncertainty about the decisions of the Court which produced unfortunate results. It was impossible that the case of "Adams v. Dunseath" could remain without effect on the Land Act, differing as it did from the interpretation which the Prime Minister put upon the clause. No theorist could defend such a contradiction as there had been given effect to. He was sorry that in the Bill there had been no mention of labourers, and believed it was time that some step by a Royal Commission or otherwise should be taken to obtain the evidence which would bring before the House the absolute necessity of legislating for this class. In conclusion, he would earnestly appeal to Her Majesty's Government, now that they were dealing with this question in a friendly spirit, to allow the hon. Members who were in prison, and who had largely assisted in the preparation of the present Bill—for it was the Bill of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell)—to take part in the discussion of these subjects whenever they came before the House. He was sure nothing would be lost by doing that. On the contrary, it would have a most tranquillizing effect.

MR. MACFARLANE said, he had listened with the greatest attention and interest to the speech of the Prime Minister on that the first occasion when a serious discussion had taken place on the subject since the passing of the Land Act. He wished that some parts of the speech had been a little more clear and defined; but the tone and the expressions he used were such as to convey entire satisfaction to all those interested in the Land Question. At that moment they were in the dark as to the precise length which the Prime Minister would go in dealing with the question of arrears. A great advance, however, had been made when the Prime Minister accepted the necessity for dealing with the arrears, even if it involved an advance from the Imperial Exchequer. There were hon. Members who would object to that, for, unfortunately, there was a small section in the House who were only willing to give Ireland as much justice as could be given for nothing; but he believed that if the right hon. Gentleman proposed, as he had pledged himself, to move a serious Resolution on this subject, he would obtain the support of an overwhelming majority. It was now eight months since this Land Act was launched. From that time to this it had been, in nautical language, so to speak, on its trial trip, and was now in dock for Her Majesty's Government to repair. It had been found that its machinery, like all new machinery, did not run smoothly and completely; and it was now once more back in dock for the Government to repair, in order that it might be rendered more suitable for the large number of passengers it had to carry. The great danger the Act had incurred was that of being swamped by the number of passengers. Eighty thousand rushed to avail themselves of it; but, up to the present, only 10,000 had received any benefit. He was sorry to say that the Prime Minister had said that he would not deal with the question of leaseholders, and he did not think the right hon. Gentleman had taken up a logical position on the point. The right hon. Gentleman objected to disturb contracts. But the Act of last Session provided that in the case of every lease which should fall in during 60 years after the passing of the Act, the tenant who occupied under that lease should be a present tenant according to the Act. There could be no greater interference with contract than that, for the material covenant in all those leases that at their termination the tenant should deliver up possession was cancelled by the Act of last Session. He could see no difference in principle between setting aside a material covenant in a lease and setting aside every lease in Ireland, and he regretted the determination of the Government. He could not see why the law had not stepped in and made them all free at one stroke. He had previously pointed out to the right hon. Gentleman during last Session that the Act would be no settlement of the Land Question if it left 120,000 of the leaseholders unprovided for. He would not, however, pursue that subject further, for he knew how useless it was to discuss a subject, especially one connected with Ireland, when the Government had set its foot down and said, "We will go no further." With regard to the question of improvements, he regretted that Her Majesty's Government had not followed the principle of the Land Laws of Bengal. That principle was extremely simple, and would have settled the whole question without difficulty. The Indian Act provided that no extra rent should be payable to the landlord by the tenant, unless he could show that the value of the land had been increased from causes other than the labour and capital of the tenant. Such a provision would amply protect the tenant for his outlay; and if the question came before the House in a practical form, he would endeavour to induce the Government to accept it, for it seemed to him the simplest and soundest principle of justice that could be used in the case of Ireland. As to the Purchase Clauses, he believed it was accepted by the House generally that in their development would be found the only final solution of the Irish Land Question. The compulsory purchase of estates was not contemplated by anyone; but what they wanted was that when the landlord wished to sell and the tenant to buy the Government would advance the money where the security was sufficient. He was sorry that the right hon. Gentleman had not specified for the satisfaction of the House the exact nature of the proposal he intended to make in respect to arrears. The question could not have come upon the Government by surprise, because he (Mr. Macfarlane) proposed an important Amendment on the subject last year, which he was only induced to withdraw on the introduction of the halting proposal introduced by the Government. He understood that the Government would deal with the question some time during the Session; but it should be an immediate one, for during the waiting tenants were being evicted. He thought the proper course would be for the Government to reinstate all the tenants evicted since the passing of the Act, if they could prove that the arrears were caused by rack-renting or the Providential destruction of the crops. He appealed to the Government on their behalf. They should remember that the tenants were being evicted in thousands for arrears at the present moment; and these poor people would be cast upon the world unless the measure contemplated by the Government was made retrospective. Though he disapproved of much of the policy of the Government, and condemned it as grossly mistaken and injurious to the interests of the country, yet he gave them credit for the best motives in introducing the Land Act, and in taking other measures which they had taken with respect to Ireland; but it was impossible for any man to govern a country with which he was not very familiar, if he absolutely refused to consult a single Representative of that country. It was impossible to derive proper and sufficient knowledge from the permanent officials at Dublin Castle. The right hon. Gentleman was perfectly capable of forming an opinion on any subject; but it was not in human nature not to be affected by the perpetual dropping of one story into one's ears. The Representatives of the land were not the persons whose advice had tended to the pacification of Ireland. It was these people whose principles, carried out for so many years, had brought Ireland to the state she was in. ["Question!"] He hoped it would be impressed upon the Prime Minister that a few millions of money laid out in solving this question and in reinstating these tenants would be money spent to advantage. Tenants so replaced would, he believed, never give the right hon. Gentleman an opportunity of reasonably suspecting them of anything disloyal. He, therefore, appealed to him to deal promptly and liberally with this question of arrears, the cost of which would be but as a drop in the ocean compared with the expenditure going on in Ireland at present.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, that, in his opinion, it was no exaggeration to say that the issues submitted then to the House by that Bill were in many respects of quite as great importance as those which were discussed at such length last year, and which most persons hoped had been settled for a considerable period. Personally, he did not last year—any more than he did now—believe that the Land Act could be a final settlement of the Irish Question. Indeed, he had prophesied so in the House last year in the debate on the second reading of the Bill, and on more than one occasion in Committee. He was then told by some of Her Majesty's Ministers that he was an evil prophet, and that he was doing his best to bring about the fulfilment of his own evil prophecies. He did not recall these observations from any wish to re-open old sources of difference or dispute, which must be painful and bitter to many in the House, but only for this reason—that, if upon this question he ventured now to say a very few words, he might remind Her Majesty's Ministers that what he told them last year had come to pass—namely, that before there would be a single future tenant under the Land Act, there would be several proposals made to amend it. This Bill was the first of such proposals, and it contained provisions of the utmost importance in regard to three of the main questions, and in regard to the four points which, though called subsidiary, were likewise of the utmost importance. He had great pleasure in paying a willing tribute to the ability and skill with which the hon. Gentleman the Member for New Ross (Mr. Redmond) had submitted his case to the House. He would also congratulate the hon. Gentleman on the friendly terms in which he spoke of the landlords, for he expressed his own opinion that whenever the hour of final social liquidation arrived, it would not be necessary for all the landlords to leave the country, but some might be allowed to remain. Animated by his example, the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) likewise spoke in quite friendly terms of the landlords. Therefore, he (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) felt that he could approach this subject in the same friendly spirit as hon. Members opposite had done. With regard to the question of arrears, when last year the Government submitted their proposals, which were not part of the Land Bill, he did not offer any opposition to them. His own opinion was, however, that the Government had only nibbled at the question. If he understood them rightly, the Arrears Clauses of the Land Act were purely temporary clauses, which had actually expired already. Therefore, it was not a question of amendment, since the measure was no longer a piece of legislation, and the Government were not now making any change of front at all. The Prime Minister had pointed out that the vital question in regard to arrears was this—Were the propositions which were to be laid before the House for ultimate acceptance to be permissive or compulsory? His (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice's) own conviction was that whatever was done in this matter ought to be compulsory. If it were not made compulsory, they had far better leave it alone altogether. Nobody could fail to see that the true reason for dealing with this question of arrears was to obtain peace and quiet in the land, and what was required was that there should be a new state of things in Ireland, when, if possible, all parties might start afresh; that there should be a burial of old feuds and differences; and that the fatal conditions of the country should be remedied so far as it was possible for propositions of this kind to remedy them. If they made the law optional, they placed it in the power of one or two individuals, who, by their own strong-headedness or unwillingness to operate, would have it in their power to nullify intended legislation. They would thus deprive themselves of the very objects they had in view. It would be advantageous, both to the landlord and to the tenant, to make these clauses compulsory, and he hoped that whatever the Government did would be compulsory. But this was not the only consideration which arose in regard to this question of arrears. The hon. Member for New Ross pointed out very clearly that there was an immediate connection between his proposals in the last clauses of his Bill relating to arrears and the first two clauses of the Bill, because he showed that unless something were done in the direction of the first two clauses, the very condition of affairs which they wished to remedy by legislating in regard to arrears might come into existence again in a slightly altered form. As regarded these proposals, he saw no objection to the 1st clause, which provided that the judicial rent was to date from the day succeeded the date of the application to the Court. The 2nd clause provided that, pending the decision of the Court, Griffith's valuation was to be taken as the rent. That proposition, as far as it related to Griffith's valuation, was one which he should feel bound to oppose. Every Commission which had inquired into the question had declared that Griffith's valuation could not be taken as representing in any way the existing condition of things in Ireland, for it was sometimes too high and sometimes too low, and was no actual criterion of the value of the land. As to the block in the Land Court, there was no appreciable diminution in the number of applications, and the adoption of Griffith's valuation would not only double but quadruple them. The consequence would be that the work of the Land Court would come to a standstill. He was sure that was not the object of the hon. Member for New Ross. He had no hesitation in stating that that was a terrible blot on the Land Bill, and he saw no sign of its immediate removal. Her Majesty's Government appeared rather in a state of unhappy optimism in considering this question, and were obviously unwilling to look the facts in the face. They continually spoke of the sensible impression that was being made in the number of cases; but he (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) absolutely denied the accuracy of such statements. Even where decisions were actually given the cases were renewable in 15 years; therefore, what the Government had to show was not that cases had been decided, but that this enormous rush of business would be well at an end a considerable number of years before the expiry of the first term. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department, in his speech at Derby, began talking about sunshine. An hon. Friend near him suggested that it was moonshine. The right hon. and learned Gentleman seemed to think that the number of cases in the Land Court was actually diminishing. It was the absolute duty of Parliament and of the Government to look in the face this question of a block in the Court, and to see whether some arrangement, even if it were of a rough-and-ready description, could not be made in order to diminish it. He would suggest that a sort of flying Commission should be sent into every Poor Law Union district, consisting of one person appointed by the head of the Survey Office, one representing Parliament, and another appointed by the Land Court. This Commission should be empowered to fix an interim rent, which would be so much above or below Griffith's valuation. In Ulster he believed that valuation would be found fair. In Munster it was notorious that the valuation was made at a time when the circumstances were altogether different from those of Ulster, so that he believed Munster would represent one end of the scale and Ulster the other. An interim rent being ascertained, he would suggest that it should be taken as the rent pending appeal. If either landlord or tenant liked to appeal, he should be able to do so before the Land Court; but if either failed to go to the Court within a short time, then the interim rent should be the fixed rent. In that manner we should clear the block in the Land Court, for there would be sent to it only the disputed cases, and there would be some chance of the work being done before the end of the first 15 years. But if the Government really desired the establishment of peace and order in Ireland, they must go a step still further. In regard to small holdings they must make up their minds to fix a rent that was not to be permanently quarrelled over for 15 years; there must be something practically approaching to a permanent rent; and they must give the landlord, if he were dissatisfied, the right of tendering the estate for purchase. He would give the landlord the right of tendering his estate at a certain number of years' purchase of the rent ascertained by the interim Commission in the manner just described. He assumed that the rent so fixed would be low, and the tenants would be glad either to go on holding at that rent, or to buy up the estate in the same manner that they enfranchised copyholds in England. In this way they should deal with the arrears, as desired by the hon. Member for New Ross and by the Government, and they would arrive at a way of carrying out the Purchase Clauses conformably with the views of the writer in the Quarterly Review, which were supposed to be endorsed by right hon. Gentlemen opposite. ["No, no!"] He heard an hon. Friend near him say "No, no!" Let him tell the Radical Party it was of no use their saying "No, no!" to these propositions. It was high time that hon. Members who, like himself, believed themselves to be just as good Liberals as any Radicals in the House, and who also had a connection with Ireland, should say—

Mr. Macfarlane

"Whatever the future of Ireland may be, whether good, bad, or indifferent, it is perfectly certain that the very worst thing that can happen to Ireland would be for her to become the sport of the Radical Party in England." ["Hear, hear!"] In saying that, he was not working to gain the cheers of hon. Members opposite; but still he would say that nothing could be a greater misfortune than such a fate. ["Hear, hear!"] He had the courage of his convictions; and, although he believed the Repeal of the Union would be a great misfortune, he should prefer the Repeal of the Union itself to leaving Ireland to be "bally-ragged" and "chucked" backwards and forwards between the two great Parties in England. In regard to this question, he had been alarmed more than he could express at the tendency he saw to make Ireland the sport of English Parties; the greatest offenders in this respect were not the Members of the Whig Party, nor of the Liberal Party, nor of the Conservative Party, nor of the Party opposite (the Home Rulers); but they were the English Radical Party who sat below the Gangway. It was not that Irish politics had so much interest for the Radical Party as that they were a means to ulterior operations; and, therefore, he expressed his individual opinions irrespective of the good opinion of the Radical Party in England—great as was his respect for its Members—with which he invariably acted on religious and educational questions. Respecting another point, he said last year that he was no great believer in the sanctity of leases. The justification of the Bill of last year was that there was said to be rack-renting; but what proof had there been that there was less under leases than under annual rents? He had never been able to see that there was anything in a lease which necessarily took it out of the purview of the law. Of 10 farms five might be let on lease and five not; they might be intermixed; and they were to say to the leaseholder, because he was supposed to be in a better position than his neighbour before the passing of the Act, that that was to be an argument for putting him afterwards in a presumably worse position. It was natural that that should cause dissatisfaction among leaseholders, and that they should complain of having been dealt with differently from others; and he thought they should be placed on an equal footing with them. He did not see any great reason for objecting to something being done with regard to improvements; but all these questions were thrashed out last year ad nauseam, and he asked hon. Members opposite, whether they really thought Her Majesty's Government would be justified within six months in re-opening all these questions? ["Yes, yes!"] He must say he did not. He was bound to say that he could not see at all how the whole of this complicated question was going to be thrown again on the floor of the House, and still more so in regard to that other question, on which he frankly acknowledged he differed from hon. Gentlemen opposite. The Improvement Clauses had, he thought, been dismissed last year in a manner which satisfied those Gentlemen. Since then Mr. Parnell—he mentioned the hon. Member by name as he was not allowed to take part in this debate—had spoken on this subject, and had used the phrase "prairie value." [Cries of "John Bright!"] He understood the phrase was used by Mr. Parnell in reply to the right hon. Gentleman, and not disowned, as a fair description of what the hon. Member proposed. There was in the clauses of the Bill a translation of "prairie value;" for if its Clauses 4 to 8 were passed, "prairie value" would be an accurate description of the worth of land to the landlords. Now that, as it seemed to him, was the very proposition that had been said by the Prime Minister to contain the doctrine of public plunder. ["No, no!"] If hon. Members opposite could show that he had given an unfair description of those clauses, let them do so, and he would at once withdraw what he had said; but it certainly was his opinion that those clauses, drawn as they were with great ability and great clearness, were deliberately intended to compass that object at which the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster had hinted when he used the words "prairie value." The hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy), in his most ingenious speech, would have led the House to believe that all these clauses aimed at was to put right a little matter touched upon in the decision in the case of "Adams v. Dunseath;" but in truth their effect would be far greater. It was true that the last sub-section of the 5th clause did touch the point mentioned by him in the case of "Adams v. Dunseath"—namely, the decision that the time of enjoyment of improvements was, in certain cases, to be taken into consideration against the tenant in ascertaining his rent. If that sub-section had stood alone, he was quite willing to grant that there would have been a good deal to be said on both sides, because it was at least open to argument whether a tenant holding at a low rent, for, say, five years, had by that low rent been compensated for his improvements? But, taking Clauses 4 and 5 together, he would ask anybody who had read the Bill whether it did not go much beyond this? If it had merely been confined to this point, it would not have been necessary to go beyond the last sub-section of Clause 5. Then, again, they had Clause 4 offering a definition of improvements; and by the 1st and 2nd sub-sections of Clause 5, the presumption in regard to improvements was entirely altered. They had a provision in regard to the rent of a holding during a statutory term, which was undoubtedly intended to make the doctrine in Clause 5 still clearer; and, lastly, they had the declaration respecting title by occupancy, in which it was said to be practically the same thing as occupancy by title. All these clauses, taken together—and they must be taken together—would leave the landlord the happy possessor of something rather less than the "prairie value" of his land; and the House, if it made this change at all, ought, at least, to do so with its eyes open. Do not let them believe they were merely remedying a little injustice done by the decision in the case of "Adams v. Dunseath." He (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) had no wish to discuss that case; but he wished to enter his protest against the course taken by the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) in bringing individual cases before the House. Why did the Prime Minister object to the Committee of Inquiry by the House of Lords? Was it not because the Sub-Commissioners were to be examined in regard to their judicial decisions? But, at least, those persons would have had an opportunity of answering on any of the facts mentioned. What the hon. Member for Wexford did was, without Notice to anybody—to come down to the House, bring up cases, give figures and facts, and then assert that there had been gross injustice, that millions of property had been confiscated, without the persons whom he implicated having an opportunity to reply to him.

MR. HEALY: I did so because the Prime Minister, in consequence of a previous Question put by me on the subject, said that he would watch the operation of the law, and would go into specific cases. That was a direct inducement to me to notice this case.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, he did not know what justification the hon. Member might have had; but it was a most inconvenient course. If that sort of thing was to be continued for the benefit and enlightenment of the Prime Minister, it did not seem to him that Public Business would make any progress that Session. He had no wish, however, to follow the hon. Member's example, except to say this—that he hoped the House would reserve its judgment in regard to the various allegations against the Sub-Commissioners. In so far as the Bill raised the question of the conduct of the Sub-Commissioners, the best answer was that given by the Government, that they must take time to see how the Sub-Commissions worked. Having heard a great number of violent attacks made both by the landlords and the extreme portion of the tenants against these Sub-Commissioners, he was glad to express his own opinion that he believed they had done their best to fulfil honestly a very difficult task; and even if they had, but without evil intention, done injustice, he recollected one thing that was clear—namely, that it was the first duty of a Member of Parliament to refrain from questioning judicial decisions. Those gentlemen whose names had been of late so often brought forward in that House and "elsewhere" ought, until they had been shown to be wrong, to have the presumption of every doubt in their favour. In any case, if their decisions were wrong, they could be carried by appeal before the Head Court. He must now say he was sorry for having trespassed at such length on the attention of the House; but he felt that upon that Irish Land Question he occupied a disagreeable position. He must say this, although he should be showing himself a peculiar person, that he had very little sympathy indeed either with the views of Her Majesty's Government upon the Irish Land Question, or with the views of a large number of his Radical Friends; and if he were to express his own reason for having limited sympathy with their views or positions, he should tell them, speaking with perfect frankness, that it was because he believed there was, in regard to this question of Ireland, a very great want of knowledge amongst a great number of Members of that House; and, although he felt that the Government had had a most difficult task, and had done their best to perform it—although nothing would induce him to join in the clamour that had been raised against his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland—and although he felt that the Government had acted most wisely in simply accepting that portion of the Bill which related to arrears, and stating that they would not allow all these tenure questions to be re-opened, yet, he equally firmly believed what he said last Session, that the problem of Irish government was getting more and more difficult, because they had removed all those props and supports one by one on which the whole theory of Irish government rested, and last year they broke the last and most important of them—the power and influence of the landlords. Without entering upon matters of controversy in regard to the Irish landlords, what he did wish to insist upon, and what he did with the utmost respect urge upon the Government was, that they must realize, or else facts stronger than they would wish would make them realize, that the problem of Irish government was now entering upon a totally new phase, that they must form some distinct plan of policy as to what they intended in Ireland, and what their views were. At all events, they could not go on drifting. His theory was that the Government in regard to Ireland was not, perhaps, altogether a united Cabinet, and that for that reason they were to a certain extent inclined to drift. The patriotism of all Parties alike was necessary and ought to be united in trying to find some solution of this Irish Land Question, which lay at the root of all government. He felt convinced, however, that that solution would not be found by shutting their eyes to obvious facts and plain warnings. That was his contention in regard to the point which he urged just now, when he said that he utterly differed from the Radical Party, because he heard them say every day that they were for the most drastic legislation against Irish landlords—[“No, no!”]—and at the same time they were strongly opposed to the repeal of the Union. There was a certain amount of difficulty in reconciling these different opinions. In thanking them for the attention with which they had listened to him, he could only say that they ought to realize the gravity of the situation, and not to suppose that they could settle the question by calling out “No, no!” whenever an independent Member, perhaps of peculiar views, called attention to inconvenient facts in the House of Commons.

MR. SEXTON said, the noble Lord opposite (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice), who had just addressed the House with remarkable ability, had described himself as a peculiar person. He (Mr. Sexton) could only say, in answer to it, that he must confess to a wish that there were more peculiar persons of his type in the House of Commons, for, whatever might constitute the peculiarity of the noble Lord, he was, at any rate, a thoughtful politician, and spoke not particularly under the influence of sentiment, but rather approached the type of a cold and logical doctrinaire. When such a Member expressed himself on that particular question of the political state of Ireland in so manly and straightforward a manner as that which distinguished the noble Lord's utterances that evening, he (Mr. Sexton) felt they had fallen in with a remarkable sign of the times, and in the utterances of the noble Lord they (the Irish Members) saw the herald of the coming time when they should no longer trouble the House of Commons with Irish questions. He (Mr. Sexton) hoped his hon. Friend the Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) would never have to encounter a more severe charge than that made against him by the noble Lord. Because, what was the objection made by the noble Lord when he spoke against his hon. Friend? It was that he had brought forward specific cases of grievance. His (Mr. Sexton's) experience of the House of Commons was not long; but it was long enough to satisfy him—and he would take the liberty of reminding the noble Lord upon the point—that the ordinary charge brought against Irish Members was that they indulged too much in general complaints of grievances, and devoted themselves too little to exact and specific facts. He was sure the noble Lord, on consideration, would see, if his hon. Friend had committed a fault at all, that it was, at all events, a venial fault, and one into which he had been led by the accusations so frequently made against Irish Members. He (Mr. Sexton) took what was, perhaps, the most remarkable feature of that speech, the declaration of the noble Lord that he would prefer to see the Repeal of the Union granted than that Ireland should always be "shuttlecocked" between the great Parties of the State as the most creditable utterance of an English Member in that House within recent years; and he took his stand beside the noble Lord in thinking, that of all the Parties which formed the component elements of that House, the Radical Party had shown itself least moved by permanent political principle, and most by Party requirements, and mere considerations of the convenience and comfort of the moment. He must confess that, in one respect, the speech of the Prime Minister was to him an agreeable surprise, and it was especially so, when he considered it, not from a practical, but from a sentimental point of view. He felt that the satisfaction with which that speech was received would be derived infinitely more from the tone of the right hon. Gentleman's language than from its substance. The Irish Members had been so often made the target for his denunciation and scorn, attempts had been so often made to stigmatize them as persons who favoured, if they did not actually promote, outrage and crime, that it was a mental luxury to find the most eminent authority in the House deeming them once more within the pale and brotherhood of human nature. They (the Irish Members) were always ready to recognize and to reciprocate even a small admission which, like that, need not be regarded as any special compliment. On the part of the Irish people and the Irish Members he claimed for them that it was not in their nature, and it was not their desire, to be violent or troublesome, or even uncivil, unless on desperate provocation. Therefore, he should endeavour to follow the initiative set in the first instance by the hon. Member for New Ross (Mr. Redmond), and followed by the Prime Minister, as regarded the tone of the remarks he should make use of; but, in the first place, he was bound to note that they were discussing the Bill in the absence of its principal promoter. They owed that Bill, which, upon the admission of the Government, was drawn with so much care, so much judgment, and so much moderation, considering all the circumstances of the case, to the initiative of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell). They owed it to the manliness and nobility of spirit which had led that hon. Gentleman, forgetting in his prison cell the personal sense of injury and all feeling of resentment, to submit from that cell, where he was suffering unjustly the penalties inflicted under a coercive law, to the judgment of the House that most moderate and reasonable proposal. He and the Party of which he was the accredited, honoured, and recognized Leader, had been charged with a desire to perpetuate disorder in Ireland; one of the most grievous, and, at the same time, most baseless charges ever made against any Party, and more particularly theirs. But, as his hon. Friend the Member for New Ross had said, that Bill was their reply. No speaker on the Treasury Bench presumed to describe it as anything but just, and, considering the circumstances of their position, a moderate Bill; and when he said that that Bill had proceeded from the hon. Member for the City of Cork, whose presence in the House would be no injury or loss to it, and would be a great gain to the public interest, he offered a most conclusive vindication of his Party against any charge which had hitherto, or might be hereafter, made coupling that Party with the perpetuation of disorder in their country. The hon. Member for the City of Cork, presenting that Bill by the hands of his Colleagues, conveyed to the Members of that House a request, amounting to a command, to say nothing which would interfere with the application of remedial legislation, or even exasperate the present situation in Ireland. The Prime Minister had avowed that his object was to narrow the field of the debate; but in one respect, so far from narrowing the field, he widened it by volunteering information on a subject which they did not introduce, and on which they did not feel any need of information. The right hon. Gentleman said that one of the elements of the Irish case was the preservation of law and order, and that, upon an early day, the Government intended to offer further proposals. Their (the Irish Members') experience of the Government during its two years of Office, and the inferences that they had drawn from that experience, had not led them to think that the Government would be slack in the preservation of law and order. They felt that the Government would be always up to the level of the occasion, if they did not exceed it; and, therefore, they would have been content if the Prime Minister had actually narrowed the debate, and had not offered them information of which they had no need. The main aspect of the Premier's speech, however, lay in his declaration that that Bill largely opened the Lease and Tenure Clauses of the Act of last year, and in his further dictum that the Tenure Clauses were not to be disturbed. If he could feel that that declaration sprang out of a sense in the Premier's mind that the Tenure Clauses had proved ineffective for their purpose, or out of a sense that any system of dual proprietorship of the soil in a country where the landlord and tenant classes had not one social or political feeling in common, and where no ties of affection had distinguished them in the past, if he could feel that the Premier's refusal to disturb these Tenure Clauses arose from his sense of impossibility of having any dual proprietorship in the soil in Ireland, he would be content with the refusal. Further, if he thought that the Premier forebore to deal with the Tenure Clauses because he felt that the Land Question could only be settled by a peasant proprietary, he could have regarded the right hon. Gentleman's refusal as adequate and wise; but there was little doubt the Premier's unwillingness to deal with the subject arose rather from a parental affection for his legislative offspring—arose rather from the hope, which, even in his mind, must now be almost a despairing hope, that the Tenure Clauses might eventually be made to work. He (Mr. Sexton) could understand the unwillingness of the Prime Minister thus early to interfere with the work of his own hand; and he would be unworthy of the position of a public Representative, if he did not make allowance for that part of human nature which in a Statesman led him to approach too late the reformation of his own work. But he (Mr. Sexton) denied the sanctity of any Act of Parliament. The proper moment for amending an Act of Parliament was the moment it was proved to be ineffective; and the earlier they proceeded to the work of necessary reformation, the more effectually did they fulfil their legislative duty, and the better would it be for the public interest. As to the Tenure Clauses, how stood the case with regard to leases? He had no sympathy, to say nothing of patience, with the most unmeaning superstition which made hon. Members cling to the theory of freedom of contract in Ireland. No such freedom existed. The noble Lord opposite (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice), with a frankness which he (Mr. Sexton) could not too much admire, admitted that the pressure of rack-renting was probably as severe on the holders of leases as on the tenants from year to year, and obviously must be so. It was notorious that leases which, in England, were considered as some concession, were, in Ireland, engines for extracting money from the tenants in the shape of fines, and for imposing the most onerous conditions. If it were the landlord's interest or whim to rack-rent his tenants from year to year, why should he forbear to do so with those on whom he had imposed leases? In short, they were ingenious engines of oppression. The House had interfered to save the tenant from year to year, because his contract was purely verbal; but what equitable difference could there be in the eyes of a reforming Legislature between injustice perpetrated under a parole agreement—an agreement by word of mouth—and injustice perpetrated in ink and sanctioned by sealing wax? In 99 cases out of every 100, the free-will of the leaseholder had not been exercised to safeguard his rights. He found from the Parliamentary Return just issued, that only 1,400 leaseholders applied to the Land Court to have their leases voided. On a moderate assumption, there were 80,000 leaseholders who did not come within the operation of the Land Act, and of the 1,400 who applied, only 72 had their leases broken. Yet the Government and the House were deluding themselves with the fond idea that they could hope for tranquillity in Ireland, while they left 80,000 leaseholders to be, as the noble Lord aptly expressed it, centres of disaffection throughout the country. Any man who considered the question calmly and dispassionately must see that it was idle and futile to hope for any permanent good from any settlement of the Land Question which left 80,000 leaseholders to feed upon their sense of wrong. He further held that on the question of improvements, their claim to reform the Land Act was already amply established. The case of "Adams v. Dunseath" was plainly overturned and destroyed by the natural effect and interpretation of the Healy Clause. The noble Lord appeared to attach a strange interpretation to the expression "prairie value" of land. Now, that expression did not mean the value of waste land or land commonly known as prairie; it was the value of land when in a state of pasture, which included lands in various degrees of fertility. Their claim was that whatever was added after the land had passed from the landlord to the tenant belonged to the tenant, and that no length of time during which he had been enjoying his own improvements could ever entitle the landlord to have the property in those improvements transferred to himself. By the judgment in "Adams v. Dunseath," however, it was declared that the length of time during which a tenant had been enjoying his improvements might operate to destroy his right of property in them, and, if the landlord had forbore to exact an increased rent, that fact might be counted in his favour. As a matter of fact, however, it would be safe to assume that landlords in Ireland had generally exacted as much rent as they could conveniently get. Then, as regarded the question of a peasant proprietary and the Purchase Clauses, the right hon. Gentleman, in dealing with the subject, evaded a most important part of the Land Question, because he said a Motion would presently be offered from the other side of the House. Instead of saying that, however, he had better have made a declaration on the subject that day. It seemed to him (Mr. Sexton) that a game of "hide-and-seek" was being played by the two great Parties in the House. The Ministerialists and the Opposition Party were competitors in their plagiarism of the Land League policy. They had both assented already to the 1st article of the Land League policy, and they were both now trembling on the verge of a plunge into the 2nd article; but the Prime Minister, before he committed himself to any statement upon the subject of the establishment of a national purchase scheme for the tenants of Ireland, was anxious to hear what could be said by the right hon. Gentleman on the Front Opposition Bench (Mr. W. H. Smith). He (Mr. Sexton) would have thought that a Statesman of the right hon. Gentleman's sure and long-proven power of initiative, and being at the head of a great majority in the House, would have scorned to wait till he had heard what his opponents had to say; but that he would have come down to the House, and, recognizing that the purchase system must be the ultimate solution of this Land Question, would be prepared to anticipate his opponents, and instead of waiting for an opportunity to "dish" them after they had declared their views, would have had the frankness to declare at once what he himself intended to do. To show the urgency of the "purchase" scheme, he need only refer to a Parliamentary Return lately issued, as being one out of several grounds upon which it might be pressed. According to that Paper, 76,000 applications had been made to the Court; 4,000 cases only had been dealt with, and he challenged contradiction when he said that the Courts, as an almost universal rule, kept above the level of Griffith's valuation. Moreover, since the speech of the Prime Minister, two months ago, in which he said that the largest reductions would be made in the cases first heard, this significant result occurred, that the reductions had become more meagre and less adequate to the necessities of the case than they were before. Griffith's valuation included all the improvements made by the tenant up to 30 years ago; and he (Mr. Sexton) need not say more to convince the House that by the ruling of the Sub-Commissioners in fixing these judicial rents, the improvements of the tenants were now being confiscated, the judicial rents which tenants were being called upon to pay being rents fixed upon their own improvements. Would any Member of the House say that such a settlement could permanently pacify Ireland? The noble Lord opposite (Lord Edmond Fitz-maurice) said that if the Healy Clause and the doctrine of improvements were pushed to their logical conclusion, the landlords would not be left anything worth having. He (Mr. Sexton) did not feel constrained to contest in any great degree the contention of the noble Lord; but if the improvements effected by the tenants were of such a character that to allow the tenants to assume property in those improvements would be to reduce the landlord's interest to nothing, surely this was proved—that the continuance of a dual proprietorship in Ireland was impossible; it proved that the position of the landlord was untenable; it proved that if morality was to be courageously applied to his position, he must starve; and, therefore, that the only logical escape from the difficulty was that the system of dual proprietorship should cease, and that the landlords must be paid off, or find themselves in a condition of beggary. He would pass to another very singular fact. He had said that 4,000 cases had been heard by the Sub-Commissioners; and how many had been appealed against? One thousand four hundred had been appealed against, and of those 1,400 appeals the Court of Appeal had decided 195. But, what was a singular fact with regard to these 195 decisions? An undeniable fact was this—the Chief Commissioners, in their judgments, had kept so close to the figures of the official valuers, as to adopt them almost entirely. On what principle did the official valuers proceed? They proceeded on the principle of ascertaining the present fair letting value of the farms; and the consequence was that there had been, in the Court of Appeal, a complete confiscation of the occupancy right of the tenant, and of his entire property in his improvements. Bad as the decisions of the Sub-Commissioners had been, they were good and liberal compared with the final decisions of the Court of Appeal. It was absurd to think that rents fixed on those principles could satisfy the farmers of Ireland. The facts he had submitted showed the urgent necessity for the adoption of the "purchase" scheme, and the abolition of the system of dual proprietary. The only question on which the Premier gave them a positive answer was upon the question of arrears; but he (Mr. Sexton) confessed that in the right hon. Gentleman's promise he saw little cause for congratulating his country. No language that he could use could convey to the House his sense of the importance of the terrible question of arrears. There were 500,000 tenants in Ireland who had not applied to the Land Courts at all, and of the number who had applied 10,000 had not their cases heard, and years must elapse before they could have them heard. What was happening in Ireland in the meantime? One hundred thousand tenants were in arrear, and they were being evicted, or intimidated, under threat of eviction, from seeking the protection of the Land Courts. He knew, indeed, of numerous cases in which tenants who had gone into the Court had since been coerced to withdraw from it under a threat of that kind. This was a proof that the withdrawals of which the Prime Minister had made so much had thus, in many cases, been negotiated under duress. The furious and shameful riot and carnival of eviction never had such free way in Ireland as at the present moment. The saddest document he ever saw was the last Return of Evictions for the quarter ending 31st March. It showed that even the fell licence of last year had been exceeded. It showed that in three months 7,000 persons had been turned out on the highway. Of those, 4,000 had been denied even the poor privilege of caretakers; and now the chosen lieutenants of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland were beginning to develop their new policy, by refusing to allow the Land League to spend the funds at its disposal in providing these poor people shelter in the shape of huts. To what were they to be condemned? To wander over the country, to drift into the lanes and slums of the adjoining towns, to have no hope and no heart, to be given up to the counsels of wretchedness and despair, and to end their days in misery and starvation. How much time was to elapse before the right hon. Gentleman would perfect his policy? Delay in settling this question would tend to an increase of crime in Ireland, and he warned the Government to waste no time on this question, for every day was acting against the interests of peace and order in Ireland. He wished he could think the promise of the right hon. Gentleman was something more than words.

It was so carefully hedged around, it was such a marvel of dipôme, it was so judiciously guarded by plausible conditions and by subtle references to future development and contingencies, that he, seeing, on the one hand, that miracle of phrase and the marvel of judicious and careful statesmanship, and on the other the terrible fact of the eviction of thousands of families, together with their state of despair, and the hunting policy pursued by the magistrates of the right hon. Gentleman, greatly feared that the policy which he contemplated, depending upon so many contingencies and taking so many months for its completion, would not run as fast as the evils which must inevitably follow from the conduct of the landlords of Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman must be satisfied that Irish opinion was in favour of a settlement of the question of arrears by a compulsory plan. No other plan would settle it. He (Mr. Sexton) told the House frankly, with regard to those arrears, which never had any foundation in morality, and which the poor tenants who were liable for them expected would have been wiped out by the Land Act of last year, that to expect those poor creatures, already overloaded, to consent quietly to pay them in yearly instalments in addition to their judicial rents, was more than human nature could expect. The arrears must be settled by a gift, if settled at all. If there was any moral to be drawn from the action of the landlords of Ireland in anything that had hitherto occurred in connection with the question, it was that any law depending upon voluntary action on their part would be a dead letter. There must be compulsion, or there would be no practical effect. He did not think the evicted tenants would feel that that promise made to-day by the Prime Minister afforded any reason for their hoping anything would come of it. The right hon. Gentleman had touched upon so many conditions that he might retreat from his promise without much difficulty, for, in the words of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, six omnibuses could drive through the passage which he had left for escape. He hoped, however, the Government would apply themselves to this terribly grave question of arrears. Upon the whole, he was obliged to say that, although the Government complimented the hon. Members of the Irish Party upon the moderation of their Bill, and on the judgment which had distinguished the manner in which they submitted it to the House, he was afraid that was all they had guaranteed to them as their reward. It was said that virtue had its own reward; and certainly the Irish Party could only console themselves with that reflection, because any external reward in the speech of the Premier he had sought and failed to find.

Mr. Sexton

MR. SHAW said, he did not agree with the hon. Member who had just spoken (Mr. Sexton) in the very hopeless conclusions which he had drawn from the speech of the Prime Minister. He believed the Prime Minister meant what he said when he spoke of the question of arrears as one demanding their immediate attention. Of course, his language was guarded—and very naturally so, because he (Mr. Shaw) supposed it was possible the right hon. Gentleman had heard the speeches of several of the Irish Members on the subject, and he rather thought no two of them had agreed on the subject. ["Oh, oh!"] Very likely the Prime Minister had several proposals on the subject before him. He (Mr. Shaw) wished to say that he also heartily agreed in the expressions already used as to the moderation of the Bill, considering the names of the Gentlemen who were inserted on the back of it, and their position and antecedents. He did not approve of some things in the Bill; but he would announce, without hesitation, his intention of supporting it if it went to a division. It touched the most important points in the Land Act of last year which required amendment. He entirely agreed with the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Sexton) in his view of the urgency of this question of arrears. It was, to his mind, at the very foundation of the possibility of the settling of this Land Question, and not only was it at the very foundation of the settling of that question, but at the very foundation of the settlement of the social state of the country. Reference had been made to circulars; but he thought, as a rule, crime could not be traced to them. He thought, as a general rule, crime in Ireland was to be traced to local causes, and those local causes, in nine cases out of ten arose from eviction, which the people thought and believed in their hearts to be cruel and unjust. Therefore, if the House in its wisdom could in any way stop these evictions, many of which had been cruel, he believed it would go an immense way to stop the crime in the country. With regard to arrears, he did not care to express his views until the Government proposal was before them. His own opinion was that very likely they might be able to make some mixture of the two principles. They might be able to put such inducement before the landlords that there would be no difficulty whatever. In settling the question of arrears, he trusted the Government would take the landlords into consideration, as he was quite sure that in many respects there was no class of men, except the poor unfortunate evicted tenants in the country, deserving of more sympathy than many of the landlords in Ireland. These arrears seemed to the landlords the best possible hold they had over the tenants in order to enable them to get anything like a fair settlement; and they could not expect them all at once to throw over the arrears. In fact, they must induce them, by liberal means, to come in and settle this question. He hoped they would, to some extent, put money in their pockets. The question of purchase was also an important one. He was quite sure no one would derive more advantage and relief from the purchase of their estates than many of the landlords of Ireland themselves. Many of them, he believed, were in a most distressed condition. They were men of the worthiest character, men with large families, not brought up to industry in any way, or who had now nothing but misery and want staring them in the face. He was not one of those who said that landlords should be banished. He believed there always would be landlords in Ireland, notwithstanding the sentences they had earned from the hon. Gentlemen opposite. He believed the people of Ireland would eventually be the best judges themselves as to whether they should be tenants or purchasers. He would give them every facility for the two things, and they might trust to their own shrewdness to determine what they considered best for themselves. He did not see why the Irish Party—by which he meant not alone the hon. Members opposite, but the Conservative, Whig, and rational Home Rule Members from Ireland—could not take up this question and other questions that were really demanding settlement, and produce some feasible plan among themselves, and not place themselves in the hands of English Parties, who would deal with them for their own purposes. They could settle the three great points—the question of arrears, of purchase, and of leases. He did not profess to understand the legal question; but there were many hon. Members who would do so. Then there was another important point. When acting on the Bessborough Commission, he (Mr. Shaw) never found a single farmer anywhere in Ireland—either North, South, East, or West—who put forward the principle that the landlord was not to get anything from the increased value of the land; they all stated that was what was called the unearned increment—he did not know whether they understood it—of the land belonged fairly to the landlord. He believed, however, it was entirely against the spirit of the Land Act to give the landlords the greatest part of the improvements of the land, and if the decision about which so much had been said upset that principle—he did not know whether it was against its letter; but, no doubt, the legal Gentlemen connected with the Government would be able to give their attention to the matter as quickly as possible, and endeavour to remedy it. He, however, believed the landlords of Ireland would not demand the major part of the improvements effected by the tenants. But, leaving that aside, there were the three great points which could be settled by the Irish Members together, and they ought to meet together and settle these things. He would here take an opportunity of referring to another matter, entirely of a personal character. He thought it was only right to say that the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Macfarlane) had said that he (Mr. Shaw) had complained because the Chief Secretary for Ireland had not consulted him on Irish questions. He might practically say that he never complained of anything of the kind. On the Land Question, and on Bills of a similar character, the right hon. Gentleman had often consulted him; and he had never hesitated, whether consulted or not, to let him know his own opinion on such matters. But he must say that both the right hon. Gentleman and the Prime Minister always received his views with the greatest kindness and consideration.

MR. MACFARLANE said, that he said that he understood that both the hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power) had complained of not having been consulted on the subject. He begged to withdraw the statement.

MR. SHAW said, that was with reference to another question concerning Ireland, upon which the Government had never consulted him, because they had a very shrewd notion of the kind of advice he would give them, and that it would be unpalatable. He had always been opposed to the policy of repression in Ireland, which he believed to be entirely unnecessary, and an incentive to the evils existing in that country. The sooner the Government returned to common sense in that direction the better would it be for the peace of the country; and, until they did so, they would never arrive at the results which they desired.

MR. GIBSON said, that the debate of that day had naturally been looked forward to with considerable interest and anxiety, not only from the intrinsic importance of the Bill introduced by the hon. Member for New Ross (Mr. Redmond), but also because it was distinctly and ostentatiously put forward that the Prime Minister would make an important communication to the country and the House as to the methods of government to be pursued in Ireland as regarded the landed institutions of the country. In consequence of that expectation, the House at 12 o'clock presented an unwonted appearance in respect of the number of hon. Members present. The general expectation to which he referred was arrived at largely from the Prime Minister's own language used in that House on more than one occasion within the last 10 days. The right hon. Gentleman had referred to that day as the period when he would give an explanation, and make matters plain as regarded the intentions of the Government; and other Cabinet Ministers had also, in "another place," lately made clear statements that they would not at present go into the matters under discussion, because these matters were to be dealt with fully that day by the Prime Minister. In these circumstances, therefore, when he (Mr. Gibson) came to the House, he, in common among other persons, felt much interest and anxiety as to the probable nature of the communication to be made. He was bound to say that he thought they might have a statement clear and distinct as to the policy to be pursued in the administration of the country. They also expected some clear statement as to what was to be done with reference to the land topics referred to that afternoon. But, while he recognized to the full the extremely conciliatory feeling and courteous manner in which the Prime Minister had addressed the House, he could not but remark that his statements were indefinite and vague; that they were not distinct; and that the right hon. Gentleman had not availed himself of the opportunity which had fallen to him to make a clear and comprehensive statement about many of the matters upon which public attention had been directed. The right hon. Gentleman had postponed everything to a more convenient season, which all knew, on the highest authority, meant a time which might never come at all. Law and order was a question of extreme urgency and importance, and certainly things occurred from day to day, and from hour to hour, which did not allay the anxiety felt on that point; and yet the Prime Minister had put those questions by for discussion on an occasion which he did not promise should be given, and which was an unknown quantity which he did not define, and then the right hon. Gentleman proceeded to state, not his own, but four important points which had been raised in the interesting speech of the Member for New Ross. Having mentioned those points, the right hon. Gentleman had touched on three of them, not giving any final opinion, but postponing them for consideration in the future. As to the last point—the fourth—that which dealt with the arrears, he (Mr. Gibson), had certainly expected that the right hon. Gentleman had reserved it till the end, for the very purpose of making some definite and distinct statement. On the contrary, when the right hon. Gentleman had come to deal with the question of arrears, putting it into plain English, all he had said was to ask different parts of the House, different Members of the House, to furnish the Government with their views, or, to use his own words, to furnish the Government "light and aid" on the subject. The topics presented for the Prime Minister's consideration were some of the most important and interesting that could well be imagined. They were not new topics. They were not novel, for they had been presented and thrashed out in every variety of form for two months past. In these circumstances, the House and the country, he thought, had a right to expect some intimation of opinion from the Government. First take the Purchase Clauses of the Bill before the House. That question had been raised in the most distinct form. He (Mr. Gibson) expressed no opinion upon the precise and distinct form in which the question was dealt with in the two clauses which the Prime Minister had stated were carefully and well-drawn clauses. The proposals embodied in those clauses were argued temperately and with much force by the hon. Member who introduced the Bill. But the Prime Minister had not given a single vestige of intimation of what his opinion was on these clauses. All the right hon. Gentleman had done was to admit, with some reserve of caution, what everybody thought was notorious, that the present clauses did not work at all. An admission of the kind, although interesting and showing advance in the right hon. Gentleman's mind, contributed nothing towards the solution of the matter. The Prime Minister had said it was an allowable subject to discuss, and a matter requiring consideration, and added that he would say nothing more, as he did not desire to prejudice the Motion of his right hon. Friend the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith). He (Mr. Gibson) ventured to say that the right hon. Gentleman's words erred somewhat on the side of caution; but caution might wander sometimes near the confines of cowardice, and he thought when the Prime Minister was brought face to face with an important public question in a Bill, on a day which he had deliberately himself selected as the occasion on which to make a statement, although he might have reserved the discussion on the details, it would have been reasonable that he should have said something which would show the working of his mind. He wished to make his acknowledgments to the hon.

Mr. Shaw

Member for New Ross for the friendly references he had made to Irish landlords, which, knowing the hon. Member's political attitude, he was glad to welcome. The hon. Member had said, what was a notorious fact, that there were thousands of landlords who were treading on the confines of ruin; and he hoped that whatever changes might take place under the Purchase Clauses, the landlords of Ireland would not, as a class, leave the country. His (Mr. Gibson's) belief was—and he had stated it before, both in the House and out of it—that if increased facilities were given under the Purchase Clauses in the Bill before them, and if they were made to work fairly, instead of remaining a dead letter, like those under the Land Act, the landlords, as a rule, would sell their tenants a portion of their estates, and in many cases would retain their mansions and home farms and live in the country. Those topics the Prime Minister had passed by in a manner which he (Mr. Gibson) would not criticize, although he regretted that the right hon. Gentleman had not said either less or more. As regarded Ireland, that was not the time for a man to use vague and doubtful language, that could be interpreted in a variety of ways, according to the hopes and fears of those who heard and read. It was a time to say either "Aye" or "No" to proposals submitted for consideration. It was not only kind to the people to do so, but it was the best and wisest policy, if you meant to do anything at all. All the Prime Minister had really in substance said was—"I cannot assent to the proposals of the Bill, and I will not give it a second reading. On the other hand, I am not prepared to say that there is not something to be said on the subject of leases;" or, as he had said on the 24th of March—"There is considerable reason for some amendment of the law in respect of leases." He would admit, the right hon. Gentleman said more on the 24th of March than he said to-day; but, at the same time, he ventured to suggest whether it would not have been wiser, under all the circumstances, to have said something more or something less? As it was, just enough had been said to create excitement and agitation which would probably be difficult to allay, without, at the same time, giving any satisfaction. Then there was the question of what was known as Healy's Clause, which the Prime Minister had spoken of as of great, but not overwhelming, importance. He (Mr. Gibson) would not go into the history of that clause, though it was a curious one. It was, however, idle to say that that clause, or any construction put upon it, could be at variance with the original intentions of the beneficent framers of the Bill, for it formed no part of their original scheme—it was never dreamt of until the Bill had nearly left the House, and then it was handed in in manuscript by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the then Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Law) at the last moment. He would only say this much—that hon. Members below the Gangway, who had criticized Healy's Clause and the decision upon it in the case of "Adams v. Dunseath" had not presented the question with their usual accuracy, and anyone would see that the importance of what was done in this particular case on the subject had been ridiculously exaggerated. What had been done by six Judges to one was obvious common sense and fair play, and it was this—in the Act of 1870 there was a clause which said that in a tenancy from year to year in existence before 1870, the Court, in awarding compensation for improvements, would be at liberty to consider the time the tenant had enjoyed the benefit of improving the land he held, and the benefits that had been conferred upon him by his landlord. There was also a provision in the Act of 1881 which said that the two Acts in regard to this matter should be read together. The obvious consequence was that the definition of improvements in the Act of 1870 governed that of 1881, introducing the qualifications he had referred to in the earlier definition for the purposes of the Act of 1881. Now, all that the decision of the Court of Appeal did in that matter was to hold that that particular class of tenancies should be subject, if the Court thought proper, to the just and moderate qualification which he had just mentioned. He wished to contrast, without going into details, the way in which the Prime Minister dealt with suggestions made on the part of landlords with the way in which he dealt with suggestions on behalf of tenants. It had been mentioned, over and over again, that the decisions of the Land Courts had been at variance with the express undertakings of Ministers in that House as to what would be the effect of the working of the Act. What had the landlords been told when they represented the case to the Government? They were told that Ministers had only given their impressions of what the result of the Act would be; but that they had not guaranteed what the result of judicial considerations might be. They said they had no control in the matter. That was the way in which landlords were dealt with. But when it was suggested to the right hon. Gentleman, on the part of the tenants, that the decrees, not of the Commissioners, but of the highest Court in Ireland, were contrary to the intentions of the framers of the Act, the Prime Minister said at once that the decision was contrary to those intentions, and that it would be necessary carefully to watch the decisions in order to decide whether the Government would do anything in the matter. He (Mr. Gibson) thought, considering the circumstances, that was a matter calling for observation and criticism. He passed it by, however; but he would say that when the Prime Minister had censured others so strongly for presuming to suggest that an inquiry might be made in certain circumstances into the judicial working of the Act, it was rather a strong measure for himself to use language that, he confessed, if it did not amount to a reflection, at all events threw a doubt upon the highest Court in Ireland as to a judicial determination it had come to. It was more than that. There was something dangerous in the ambiguity of the Prime Minister's answer, when he said that he would observe the construction which would be put upon that decision by the final Court of Appeal in Ireland. Did not what he said suggest that the interpretation of the Court was a false one, and, if false, should be amended? and did it not suggest to the Assistant Commissioners to put no construction at all on it—the Assistant Commissioners, he would remind the House, being gentlemen appointed only for a year, who were not called upon to give reasons for their decisions. They had only to hold their tongues to do pretty much what they liked. That line of observation on the right hon. Gentleman's part was calculated to lead to complications and confusion in Ireland.

Mr. Gibson

It led the farmers to believe that they would get more by holding out; it led agitators to believe that they had only to use terrorism in order to get what they were agitating for. As he had said before, on this question the right hon. Gentleman had said too much or too little. The Court of Appeal should be treated either as the final Court of Appeal, or the Government should promptly bring in an amending Bill. When a decision was given by the highest Court in Ireland, the Prime Minister was bound to bow before the decision in silent assent; or, if he thought that the decision called for observation, it must not only be an observation, but should fructify in legislation. It ill became a Minister of the Crown to throw doubt upon the administration of the law, unless he was prepared at once to amend it. The Prime Minister had said he would reserve the question of arrears. He thought that the shadow of the right hon. Gentleman's speech had influenced all who had spoken, including his hon. Friend the Member for Cork County (Mr. Shaw). There was the same call for "light and leading" in the hon. Gentleman's oracular utterances. Everyone felt that it was a question of vast importance. He thought the word generally used on the subject was "supreme urgency;" and, bearing in mind that the Prime Minister had promised to consider the question during the Easter Recess, and that, in consequence of that promise, the hon. Member for Tyrone (Mr. T. A. Dickson) had put down his Question for Monday, and that then that hon. Member was told that Wednesday was the day when the Prime Minister was going to make a statement, he was bound to say that nothing could be more admirable than the courtesy and demeanour of the Prime Minister, who had waited for "light and leading," instead of giving the House something which might be criticized. What had the Prime Minister said of the question to be settled? Only something in the nature of a platitude—"It demanded our practical consideration." Of course it did. Then "the Government would legislate upon the matter at an early date, if the House would tell them how." The Prime Minister then had laid down three conditions which ought to be fulfilled by all right-minded legislators who approached the question.

First, they were to be impartial. He (Mr. Gibson) hoped they were all impartial. He could only speak for himself. It was to be in accordance with the opinion of the Irish people. He could not speak for the Irish nation, which was rather like the letter x, which stood for an unknown quantity. Then, all dealing on the matter should be effectual. That was like telling them an Act of Parliament should be an Act of Parliament. Then, all action in the matter would have to be either voluntary or compulsory. That might be true enough; but it all depended upon the terms of the compulsory legislation. If he was to be compelled to accept good terms, he was the man for compulsory legislation. But if the terms were bad, he ought to be allowed some choice in the matter as to whether he would accept them or not. When the right hon. Gentleman said—what was perfectly true—that this Bill was drawn upon the compulsory system, would it not be reasonable, when the creditor had given time to his debtor, that he should have some voice in the matter? Would it, on the other hand, be reasonable to expect a creditor to voluntarily cancel part of his debt? At all events, he should like the right hon. Gentleman, when he had made up his mind on the matter, to give the House some reason why the voluntary element should not, in some shape or form, enter into the arrangement. It might well be that, bearing in mind that while some of the arrears had accumulated during three, or four, or five years, while others had arisen during only one or two years, there was some scope for the voluntary element in some cases, while the compulsory element might possibly, to some extent, be applied in others. Everything, however, would depend upon the nature of the plans which the Government intended to present to the House. He had been thinking a great deal over the right hon. Gentleman's speech; and when he said that the Bill being drawn upon compulsory lines, the grant under it would take the form of a gift instead of a loan, as a gift was peculiar to the compulsory system, he (Mr. Gibson) altogether failed to understand what there was in a gift which was inconsistent with the voluntary element. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman, when he came to speak on the question, would enlighten them on the point. Then, with regard to the sources whence the grants were to come, the Prime Minister did not say that he was pleased: but he said that he was not surprised that it should be proposed that the grants should come from the Surplus of the Irish Church. That, however, was a serious consideration, for it must be borne in mind that the Church Surplus could not last for ever, and that, to use an expression of the Prime Minister, it was within measurable distance of its end. He (Mr. Gibson) found, on examination, that the assets of the Irish Church Fund now amounted to from £1,800,000 to £2,000,000; and it was a serious thing, bearing in mind the many claims of a more enduring character that might be made upon the not very large residue of that fund, to appropriate a very large part of it to what the Prime Minister himself had termed a temporary purpose. In his opinion that surplus should be applied to something more durable and more calculated to insure the lasting prosperity of the country. Turning to the general question, he wished to point out that the main difficulty of dealing with the Land Question in Ireland was the block of litigation in the Land Courts; and if the compulsory system were put into force with regard to arrears, the amount of that litigation would be enormously increased, for they would have in every case what might be a separate lawsuit, and as many lawsuits as cases. If they told the landlord he must submit to the cancelling of a certain percentage of the arrears as bad debts, they could not possibly prevent a landlord, when brought under the compulsory element, from going into Court with the view of showing that the defaulting tenant was perfectly able to pay the whole of the arrears. The result would therefore be that for so many cases of arrears there would be so many fresh lawsuits, in which the tribunal would have to be satisfied of the tenant's incompetency to pay the arrears. He did not say that it was so in every case; but there were a vast number of cases in which the tenant could pay if he would, or in which he would pay if he were allowed to do so, although there were others, of course, in which he, unfortunately, could not pay, whatever his desire on the point might be. It was a very important element, therefore, for the House to consider that, in agreeing to these proposals, they might be sowing the seeds of a vast variety of complicated and very serious lawsuits. With regard to the proposed tribunal, he regretted, as he had said before, that no plan with regard to it had yet been submitted to the House by the Prime Minister. He was of opinion that it was the duty of Her Majesty's Government to submit a plan to the House in reference to it. It was a matter with which no one but the Government could deal; it was not possible for a private Member, nor for any series of private Members, to deal with it. He was, therefore, strictly within his right when he said that the Government were bound to submit a plan to the House with regard to this tribunal. When that plan was submitted to the House, it ought to be fairly and moderately considered on its own merits. Looking at the proposals as a whole, there was one danger to which he wished to draw the attention of the House. It was the serious and terrible danger of demoralizing the Irish tenants by teaching those who had been honest and brave, and had paid their rents, that they had needlessly sacrificed themselves, and those who had been dishonest and cowardly that they had been gainers by their dishonesty and their cowardliness. The other clauses of the Bill he did not intend to allude to—not out of want of respect to the authors of the Bill, but because that had already been efficiently done by the noble Lord the Member for Calne (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice), and also because he had preferred to deal with the important questions referred to by the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister. It must, of course, be a matter of grave disappointment and regret to the Prime Minister to find that this discussion was taking place, and that the House should be making a searching criticism into the working of every part of the Land Act only five or six months after it had become law. That such should be the case could not be pleasant to the right hon. Gentleman, and was no cause for congratulation. The Prime Minister, in asking the House to pass the Land Bill, had stated that it could only be justified by the special circumstances of the case. He (Mr. Gibson) thought, however, that there was more truth in the observation that had been made with regard to that Act, that the only excuse for it would be its success; and that excuse was certainly not forthcoming. The noble Lord the Member for Calne (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice), in his very interesting speech, had warned Her Majesty's Government against the danger of drifting; and he (Mr. Gibson) could only repeat that warning. At some time or other the Government would have to speak plainly and distinctly, instead of postponing these questions for consideration on future days, which might be next week or many days off. How to deal with the Irish crisis was absolutely the question of the day. He ventured to think that no Government could deal with that question which did not use plain and distinct language. He believed that if the Government were actuated by a steady purpose and by a resolute courage—if they were prepared to carry out that purpose through evil report and through good report, if they were not dismayed by unpopularity nor disheartened by ingratitude—and if they applied themselves to restore law and order, that, when they had succeeded in restoring law and order, they might then hope to see also restored in Ireland peace, contentment, and, after a time, loyalty.

Mr. Gibson

COLONEL COLTHURST said, he wished most especially to say a word or two on the subject of leases. As far as arrears were concerned, he had every confidence in the statements of the Prime Minister; but he could not help wishing the right hon. Gentleman to have expressed himself more positively on the subject of leases. He did not expect him to have promised to deal with them that Session; but he was in hopes that the right hon. Gentleman would have admitted more frankly and positively that there was a question to be dealt with. In his (Colonel Colthurst's) view it was the next most important question to arrears in connection with the Land Act, and he hoped the Government would make up their mind as to the necessity of taking it up. It was most especially important, as far as regarded the county he represented (Cork), where, out of 43,000 tenants, there were 19,000 leaseholders; while, in the whole of Munster, they were in similar proportion. One man out of every two in County Cork considered himself injured, and that he was not receiving the benefits of the Land Act. A very large number of these leaseholders, no doubt, paid higher rents than they would as tenants. This he could only account for by the intense desire that existed on the part of the occupiers in Ireland to get security upon any terms against a continual increase of rent; and he believed that many of the men who were now complaining were not in any way forced to take leases. On the contrary, they themselves offered to pay fines, and pressed the landlords to grant them leases. He could not agree with the clauses proposed by his hon. Friend (Mr. Redmond), for he did not believe that the leaseholders wished to retain their leases, and at the same time to have their rents revised. They would be perfectly satisfied to go into Court and prove that the rent was excessive; and, if they succeeded in their proof, to be made present tenants. As far as he understood the wishes of the farmers in the South of Ireland, this was what they desired. He hoped the Prime Minister and Her Majesty's Government would consider this question, feeling satisfied it was a far more important one than that involved in the decision of "Adams v. Dunseath." It was second only in importance to the question of improvements, and until it was settled it was impossible for the Land Act to work satisfactorily.

MR. T. A. DICKSON said, he was unwilling to allow the Bill to be read a second time without, on his own behalf and on behalf of some other Members from Ulster, expressing his opinions regarding it. If the Bill went to a division, they would all vote for its second reading. They believed its proposals, speaking generally, were just, moderate, and fair; and they believed also that if the Land Act was to work smoothly and satisfactorily, it must be amended on the lines laid down in the Bill. He could well understand the reluctance of the Government to re-open the question so soon after the passage of their Act; but it should be remembered that the same arguments were applied to the Land Act of 1870, although its defects were pointed out soon after it passed. The result of not re-modelling the Act, as soon as its defects became apparent, was seen in the agitation of 1879 and 1880, which culminated in the Land Act of 1881. He had intended to refer to the block in the Land Courts and other subjects; but time was running short and would not permit. As regarded the subject of arrears, to which, therefore, he would confine himself, he had had a Question on the Paper for five weeks; and seeing that the House appeared to be agreed that it was a matter of vital importance, when the Prime Minister made a statement on that subject, he and other hon. Members from Ulster hoped it would have been more explicit and satisfactory than it was. So far as he was aware, they had derived very little information from the statement which the right hon. Gentleman had made that day, and had no adequate idea as to how or when he proposed to deal with the subject. The Arrears Clauses of the Act had hopelessly failed, because the landlord and tenant were compelled to go jointly to the Court to obtain the loan; and because another most unfair provision was that the landlord was bound to become security for the loan. The result was, according to the last Return, that only £1,000 of arrears had been applied for on behalf of 128 tenants, and only £500 had been granted. The average rent in those cases was £8, and they had been settled by the payment of 10s. in the £1. There was no use talking about the state of the country, and the Government could not expect that peace would be restored to Ireland so long as during the last three months you could have 1,300 families evicted, representing about 7,000 persons. The evicted man was an enemy, an angry and a dangerous man, not only dangerous in himself, but more especially so in the members of his family, who might not be so easily restrained. They were told that these evictions did not really take place as represented, that the tenants were generally restored as caretakers. No doubt they were; but, as a magistrate, knowing what went on in Petty Sessions, he (Mr. T. A. Dickson) could say that their tenure was only temporary, for in a few weeks or months they were again put out under a Petty Sessions decree. He saw in an Irish paper, a few days ago, particulars of 34 evictions recently carried out on the Marquess of Sligo's property. Their average rent was £6 10s.; the average arrears less than two years, total amount of arrears due being only £220; and yet, for want of that sum, and through the Arrears Clauses not operating, 192 persons were cast out. He had a letter from an Ulster tenant which put the whole difficulty concisely and pithily. The tenant, on behalf of himself and others, wrote—

“The landlords are turning many out; but we got our fair rents fixed on December 8th. My valuation was £9 10s.; my old rent £22 10s.; my new rent £12 10s.; but all this was no good. The landlord got writs, and evicted us all on January 4th. We got a form from Dublin for the arrears; but the landlord would not sign his name. We put our interest in the farms up for sale; but no one would buy, as the landlord told them not to buy until the time for redemption had passed, and the landlord then bought himself. What are we to do? We are to be thrown out on the 4th January, after having paid rack rents for years. We do not want to wrong the landlord; but we pray you to ask the Members of Parliament to get us time to pay the arrears.”

There was another great evil, which was that, though a tenant might have a fair rent fixed, he still had the arrears hanging over his head. The fact of the arrears kept hundreds and thousands from applying to the Land Courts. The tenant could not apply with the burden of arrears hanging over his head. If he did he was threatened with a writ, and he knew that eviction would follow. He believed that the extent of the arrears were vastly exaggerated. There were 200,000 tenants in Ireland of £4 valuation and under, and 200,000 more between £4 and £10 valuation. The average valuation of 400,000 tenants was £5, and the average rent £7. In the 128 applications for relief under the Arrears Clauses, the average rent was £8, and the average arrears a year and a-half. He had no hesitation in saying that £1,500,000, or even less, would settle the whole question of arrears in Ireland. He thought it was the duty of the Government to devise at once a practical plan for dealing with arrears. He differed with that portion of the Bill which proposed the settlement of the arrears in the shape of a gift to the tenant. Nothing could be more immoral or more demoralizing. What would the Bill do for the tenant who paid his rent last week? What would it do for the honest, struggling, thrifty tenant who, up to the present time, had paid every 1s. of his rent, and was not in arrears? The very man with whom he sympathized! It was impossible to deal with the question in the way of a gift. This

Mr. T. A. Dickson

Bill proposed that the Land Commissioners should ascertain the amount of arrears due by the tenant, and thereupon decide as to his capacity to pay; but look at the enormous amount of work that that would put on those gentlemen. It would make them a tribunal to try the insolvency and the honesty of every tenant who applied to them. He was opposed to the proposal, because he believed it would be impracticable and impossible. He was willing to do anything to relieve the tenants from the arrears now hanging over their heads; and if the Government would bring forward a broad and just measure that would deal liberally with the question, he was certain they would receive the support of all sides of the House. It would do more to solve the great difficulty that now existed, and restore peace to the country by increasing public confidence, than any other plan which had been brought before them.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Justin M'Carthy.)

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I do not propose to oppose the adjournment of the debate; but I hope it will be understood by the House that it does not mean adjourning for further consideration the very important and practical subject brought before us. I am especially alluding to the question of arrears. I agree with my hon. Friend who has just spoken (Mr. T. A. Dickson) that it is possible that the amount of arrears may be, to some extent, exaggerated; but there is no question that it is a very urgent matter; and I must also say its urgency is not diminished, but increased, by being brought before the House. And though the Prime Minister made no definite statement as to when he would be able to take the matter in hand, hon. Members must not suppose that the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) was right in assuming that we did not mean to take it in hand; but I think all hon. Members must be aware that, in the present state of Public Business, it is difficult to name an exact day for the plan which it will be our duty to submit. But we do intend to bring forward what we consider to be a solution of the question as soon as we can with any consistent regard to other matters before the House. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson), in his interesting and, I may say, rather amusing speech, found a little fault with us that we did not disclose our plan to-day. It is not very often the custom—I do not know that it was the custom of the right hon. and learned Gentleman's Colleagues to state the Government proposal in a discussion on another Bill. He also seemed to think we were to blame for wishing to obtain the opinion of Gentlemen connected with Ireland; but we have often been told that we did not sufficiently seek to obtain their views. The right hon. and learned Gentleman was determined, so far as he was concerned, at any rate, not to give us much of suggestion as to what he thought on the matter. I do not think that the House generally, or the country, will blame us for trying to take the opportunity of this debate to-day to ascertain how this question is looked upon from different sections of the House. If I may compare so important a matter with what has happened in regard to my own position, I would remind the House that I have been sometimes found fault with because I have consulted the Irish Members, and again I have been blamed for not having consulted them. In the same way, we have to-day been blamed for asking the opinion of the House of Commons, whereas we have often been blamed for not having done so. I must admit that what has happened to-day has been very helpful in the consideration of the question. I think we have clearly ascertained that this matter of arrears is one that may be approached without any very strong Party feeling, not merely between the two great Parties, but between the Government and the two sections of the Opposition. Moreover, it is a question that may be approached without creating any angry feelings between different classes in Ireland, because it concerns the landlord quite as much as the tenant. All this is a very satisfactory gain to have got from the discussion. May I go a little further, and say that the whole tone of this debate is hopeful, as I consider, for the government of Ireland? Not merely the mode in which the subject has been brought forward, but the way in which it has been treated, makes me hope that the difficulties which beset the Government and this Parliament, and beset the country, and rather especially beset myself, may diminish if all Irish questions be approached and debated in the reasonable manner in which this question has been debated. Perhaps I may be allowed, before I sit down, to correct one or two misapprehensions with regard to the figures relating to the decisions of the Land Court. The block in the Land Court is, no doubt, considerable; but hon. Members must not suppose that the Business is not proceeding with more rapidity than they seem to be aware of. I shall put on the Table of the House to-day a Return which shows that, instead of the number of cases disposed of being nearly 4,000, as the hon. Member for Sligo alleges, there are 8,600 disposed of in the Land Commission Court, and 1,784 by the County Court Judges. Thus, there are more than 10,000 cases disposed of, and what is of importance is this—that the rate at which they are being disposed of is increasing month by month, and very considerably. There were disposed of in January 1,681, in February 2,416, and in March more than 3,000. I also believe that the appeals will be heard much quicker than hon. Gentlemen imagine. One chief reason why appeals have not hitherto been heard has been that the Land Commissioners waited for the result of the very important appeal to which so much allusion has been made to-day. I do not mean to say it will not be some time before all the cases are disposed of; but the increase in the rapidity with which they are being dealt with is likely to continue, and the number of cases settled by the intervention of the Land Court, without actual litigation, will grow larger every day. I am glad to take this opportunity of stating that the Land Commissioners are issuing an Order, which I hope will be generally known throughout Ireland, for it will tend to considerably increase the speedy settlement of the cases. They have come to the conclusion to let it be known throughout all parts of Ireland that if the landlord and tenant are willing to take the decision of a valuator sent down from Dublin, and to make that the ground upon which the judicial rent shall be fixed, they will send down such valuers. This would enable the judicial rent to be obtained without taking up time and expense in litigation. They hope, and I have the hope, that that will still further promote the rapidity of business. With regard to the Motion for Adjournment, I will merely say again that if hon. Members are able to bring it forward again, I will be very glad to take part in the discussion, which I hope may prove as useful as on the present occasion; but in consenting to the adjournment, the Government do not mean that we feel it is not our duty to take up ourselves, as soon as we possibly can, this question of arrears, and submit our views to the House.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, he was very glad that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland had assented to the adjournment of the debate; but he regretted that he had not given any pledge on the part of the Government providing a day for a future discussion. Everyone must admit that not a particle of the time of the House had been wasted on this occasion; and he (Mr. O'Connor Power) could only say, for himself, that while he was disposed to criticize some of the details, he should certainly seize the opportunity of voting for the second reading. He would respectfully appeal to the right hon. Gentleman and the Government to fix a day for the resumption of the debate, especially as the appeal of the Prime Minister for a declaration of Irish opinion had been effectually answered. They had had such a declaration, and upon that, he thought, they might hope that, when the Government next took up the question, they would be able to make a definite announcement on every important point.

MR. BIGGAR said, that, before the adjournment was agreed to, he should like to suggest that it would be desirable for the Government to state that, pending the bringing forward again of this question of arrears, they would cease to give special assistance in cases of eviction. If they continued to give special assistance by police and soldiers in the evictions of tenants who were unable to pay their arrears, the public in Ireland would doubt their bona fides in the matter. On the other hand, if they gave that assurance on that point there would be great satisfaction in Ireland. Without such an assurance he did not think the Irish people would have the slightest confidence in the action of the Government.

MR. O'DONNELL said, that as the debate was to be adjourned, and as the Government had not offered any particular day for its resumption, it might, after all, turn out well that no certain day had been fixed; for he trusted the result would be that Irish Members on both sides, without distinction of Party, would utilize the time between now and the renewal of the debate by taking council together, and following the Scotch precedent—sinking all questions of Party and try and put together a body of practical proposals that could be presented to the Government representative of the united opinion of Ireland. He believed that such a proposition would be supported by the public opinion of England, and that it was not hostile to the wishes of Her Majesty's Government. The Prime Minister invited every kind of assistance in the solution of this most difficult problem; and he trusted that every Irish Member, whether advanced Home Ruler or less advanced Home Ruler, Conservative or Liberal, Member for Ulster or Member for Munster, would take the suggestion to heart during the next few days, and present an example of the Irish nation united on the most important question that had ever come before the House of Commons.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, that, for his part, he had the greatest desire that the counsels of the Irish Members should be united, so as to produce an impression on the Government on behalf of the Irish tenant; and nothing should be wanting on his part to respond to the hon. Member for Dungarvan's (Mr. O'Donnell's) appeal, especially as that appeal pointed to the payment of rent, while it was the advice to pay no rent that had been one of the causes of the difference between that side and this. [Cries of "Oh!"] He believed they were at one on the question of arrears, and on most of the points dealt with in the Bill, although not entirely. But as to utilizing the opportunity of the next few days in a practical spirit, he thought the hon. Gentleman and his Friends would find none more eager and zealous to aid in the solution of the question than the Members who represented the old principles which were defined by the late Mr. Butt.

MR. GORST said, he had no desire to interfere with the unity of the Irish Members; but if the solution of the question of arrears was to be in its payment by British taxpayers, some of the Representatives of the English constituencies would have something to say on the subject.

COLONEL NOLAN said, he agreed that it would be a good thing if the Representatives of the different sections of the Irish Party would combine in order to place their views upon the subject of arrears before the Government. In the case of its being fulfilled, he hoped that the Government would give the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon), and the hon. Member for Roscommon (Mr. O'Kelly) the opportunity of joining in the debate.

Question put, and agreed to.

Debate adjourned till To-morrow.

BANKRUPTCY BILL.—[BILL 37.]

(Mr. Dixon-Hartland, Mr. Gorst, Sir Edmund Lechmere.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. DIXON-HARTLAND, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, he was perfectly willing that it should be referred to the Select Committee to which the other Bills relating to the Bankruptcy Law had been committed. He would move the second reading.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Dixon-Hartland.)

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, that he should offer no opposition to the second reading of the measure, as, with a few alterations, to most of which he saw no objection, it was in principle a copy of the Government measure of last Session.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

House adjourned at ten minutes before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, 27th April, 1882.

MINUTES.]—Sat First in Parliament—The Lord Hopetoun, after the death of his father.
 PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading—Army Alternative Punishment (68), negatived.
Third Reading—Metropolitan Commons Supplemental* (38); Army (Annual) (66), and passed.

ARMY ANNUAL BILL.—(No. 66.)

(The Earl of Morley.)

THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3^a."
 —(The Earl of Morley.)

THE EARL OF LONGFORD said, he wished, before the Bill was disposed of, to be allowed to express a hope as to whether a better system of distribution of Army prize money—if ever such an occurrence should again take place—could not be instituted by the authorities at the War Office. He might point out that certain Army prize money had been in dispute for something like 20 years, and he hoped that his noble Friend would give attention to the subject.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 3^a accordingly, and passed.

ARMY (ALTERNATIVE PUNISHMENT)

BILL.—(No. 68.)

(The Lord Denman.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD DENMAN, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, its object was to enable those soldiers who had become liable to imprisonment, if asked to say that they would rather submit to being flogged, that they should have the option. It was known to their Lordships that at Petty Sessions defendants had the choice of being tried summarily, or being sent to the Quarter Sessions for trial there. The convicted soldier would have an option, as was the case where a fine was imposed, with the alternative of imprisonment, notwithstanding the words "other than flogging" in Clause 4 of the Army Act, 1881. The Bill would enable the administrators of the Act of 1882 to sentence any convicted soldier to a punishment according to rules made by the Secretary of State for War, coupled with the choice, instead of imprisonment or hard labour, of the punishment of more or fewer lashes, according to the gravity of his offence and the sentence passed upon him, such lashes, in every respect, to be in accordance with his act, and never exceeding 25 lashes. When he was at Eton he was promised £50 a-year from his father for every year in which he should escape flogging; but though he was seven years there, and during half of the last year, from being in the sixth form, no longer liable to be flogged, yet he never escaped corporal punishment for a whole year. He (Lord Denman) did not consider this punishment a disgrace to school boys; but he recollected, with disgust, seeing a soldier for theft receive 300 lashes in Windsor, in 1823, and afterwards saw the same man in the ranks of the Grenadier Guards, with his coat turned, as the completion of his sentence. For his own part, when he was a boy he would sooner have endured the pain of the extraction of a double tooth than the agony of a flogging. He believed the reduction of the amount of corporal punishment to be most salutary, and that if this Bill became law it would have a beneficial effect. He had received little encouragement; but if the Bill were read a second time he would appoint the Committee for Monday next.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
 —(The Lord Denman.)

THE EARL OF MORLEY said, that, on the part of the Government, he could not assent to the second reading of the Bill. He would remind their Lordships that the question of the abolition of flogging in the Army was fully discussed recently, both in their Lordships' House and in "another place," and he could not consent to the re-opening of the controversy. If the Bill were passed, it would be attended with great inconvenience, and he hoped the House would not entertain the proposal of the noble Lord.

On question, resolved in the negative.

House adjourned at a quarter past Four o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 27th April, 1882.

MINUTES.]—NEW MEMBER SWORN—Edward James Stanley, esquire, for Somerset County (Western Division).

PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—First Reading—Tramways Provisional Orders * [141]; Pier and Harbour Provisional Orders * [142]; Documentary Evidence * [143].

Second Reading—Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) [21].

Select Committee—Civil Imprisonment (Scotland) * [19], nominated.

Committee—Report—Commonable Rights [23]; Judgments (Inferior Courts) [44]; Places of Worship Sites [97].

Considered as amended—Roads Provisional Order (Edinburgh) * [139].

QUESTIONS.

PRISONS (IRELAND)—LIMERICK GAOL—PUTTING UNTRIED PRISONERS TO WORK.

MR. O'SULLIVAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is true that the Governor of the County of Limerick Prison is in the habit of compelling prisoners to work who are simply returned for trial (as instanced in the case of the twelve prisoners returned for trial from Bruff in November last); and, if so, if such is done with the sanction of the Prisons Board, or on the individual authority of the Governor of the Prison?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, he would answer the Question in the absence of his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland, which was due to urgent business. It was not a fact that untried prisoners in the County Limerick Prison were compelled to work.

MR. O'SULLIVAN said, he would call the special attention of the right hon. and learned Gentleman to certain cases.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, that if the hon. Member would supply him with instances he would have an inquiry made; but he thought the hon. Member would find he was mistaken.

THE NATIONAL DEFENCES—CHATHAM DOCKYARD.

MR. W. H. JAMES asked the Secretary of State for War, If the report in the "Times" of April 17th is correct, that an immense fort for the protection of Chatham Dockyard, the garrison, &c. is to be commenced forthwith on the main road between Chatham and Maidstone; and, whether, in addition to this fort and another already under construction at Birstal near Rochester, several others are to be constructed; and, if he will state what are the grounds of these special military defensive propositions?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, in reply to my hon. Friend, I have to state that the Royal Defence Commission, in 1860, recommended the expenditure of £500,000 on the works required for the eastern land defence of Chatham. In 1872 these works were settled, and were to consist of a fort and its accessories at Birstall, another at Horstead, and a third on Darland Hill. It was also then decided that these works should be constructed by convict labour, at a reduced expense to the War Department of £200,000, and the Home Department erected a convict prison for this purpose. The Birstall works are in progress, the main fort being two-thirds completed; Horstead is just commenced, at an expense of £45,000; but nothing has been done beyond the acquisition of the necessary land at Darland Hill. As to the ground for these defensive works, I can only refer my hon. Friend to the Report of the Royal Commission.

COLONEL STANLEY asked if some of the fortifications were not being built by convict labour?

MR. CHILDERS replied, that they were all being built by convict labour.

MR. W. H. JAMES said, that he would take the earliest available opportunity of moving a reduction of the Vote relating to those fortifications.

WESTERN AUSTRALIA—FREE EMIGRATION.

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE (for Sir JAMES LAWRENCE) asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, At what period of the year 1869 the Government came to the decision that no obligation rested on the Imperial Government to send out free emigrants to Western Australia; if he is aware that on 5th July 1869, Mr. Monsell, then Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, stated in the House of Commons that the Government had undertaken to send out a free emigrant for every convict received by that Colony, and that although the Legislative Council of Western Australia were of opinion that the number of free emigrants still to be sent out at the expense of this Country to exceed 3,000, he considered only about 1,800 to be due; and, if he will have any objection to the production of Copies of all Correspondence upon the subject with the Governor of Western Australia?

MR. COURTNEY: I find that Lord Emly did not speak of the undertaking to send out free emigrants as absolute—it was subject to certain conditions; and the 1,800 probably due to the Colony were to be sent out only if these conditions were fulfilled. An inquiry, to which Lord Emly referred, was made by a despatch of the 26th of July, 1869, and the result was adverse to the existence of the necessary conditions, and the undertaking became inoperative. Much of the Correspondence on the subject is of a confidential character, which could not conveniently be produced.

RUSSIA—PERSECUTION OF THE JEWS.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he has received any confirmation from Her Majesty's Consuls in Russia of the outrages, which are stated by the Russian papers to have been committed during the present month, upon the Jews in that Country, and especially of the statement that at Balta 15,000 persons have been rendered homeless, forty seriously wounded, a large number of women and girls violated, and infants thrown into the river; whether he will lay upon the Table any Reports that may have been received from Her Majesty's Ambassador and the Consuls in Russia on the subject; whether he has seen a suggestion, made in a leading German paper, that it is the duty of Europe to send a collective note to St. Petersburg, demanding that Russia shall discharge the common obligations of justice and humanity towards the Jews; and, whether, inasmuch as the course hitherto pursued by Her Majesty's Government with regard to the outrages in Russia has failed to bring about a cessation of these outrages, any steps will now be taken with a view to carrying out the suggestion referred to?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, the British Vice Consul at Odessa, who has visited Balta since the outbreak, reports that one Jew was killed and many badly wounded; that there were three alleged cases of violation of women, of which one was undoubtedly true; that no children were killed, and that the value of the property destroyed was about 1,000,000 roubles. At the time of his visit the authorities were energetically endeavouring to ascertain who were the guilty persons. The Vice-Consul's full Report has not yet been received; but when it arrives there will be no objection to laying it before Parliament, with other despatches on the subject. I have not seen the article in a German paper referred to by the hon. Member, and no such suggestion has been made by Germany or any other Power.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked whether the reports published in the Russian papers did not give the number of persons rendered homeless at 15,000, and that a large number of women had been outraged?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I can only state I have not seen the Russian newspapers, and I can only go by the Vice Consul's preliminary Report. A fuller Report is coming home. The Vice Consul did not say that 40 persons were seriously wounded. His words were—"One killed, many badly wounded;" and then the exact words which I have quoted with reference to the outrage on women.

CUSTOMS—PENALTIES FOR SMUGGLING.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If it is correct that where sailors have been convicted with smuggling the owners of the vessels in which the smuggling has been conducted are liable to penalties in addition to those inflicted on the sailors; and, if it is the case, that even where the owners have been admitted by Her Majesty's Customs to be entirely free from complicity in the acts of the sailors they have not been fined?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: Sir, the law provides that any vessel with prohibited goods shall be forfeited.

Mr. Alderman W. Lawrence

But this is seldom strictly enforced. In cases where the offender is a person in authority, either the ship is detained, or a deposit of money is required, where the detention of the ship would cause inconvenience to the trade or the public. On release of the ship or repayment of the deposit a fine is generally imposed, with the view of causing owners and masters to take due precaution, not merely that there shall be no complicity, but that every effort shall be used for the prevention of concealments on board vessels.

GIBRALTAR (RELIGIOUS DISSENSIONS)—DR. CANILLA.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, If he will give a return of the names of the persons arrested, committed, and sentenced at Gibraltar for the events which accompanied the installation of Dr. Canilla as Vicar Apostolic, together with the charges made against them and the terms of their sentences, and of any representations made by inhabitants of Gibraltar on the subject; whether the Governor of Gibraltar has refused to acknowledge the existence of the Junta of Lay Elders of the Roman Catholic Community, though that body has been recognised since the possession of Gibraltar by this country, and has been confirmed by a decree of the Privy Council, and whether he has, in consequence, transferred to Dr. Canilla, or to any other person, the custody of the Roman Catholic temporalities hitherto administered by the Junta; and, further, whether Her Majesty's Government will take any steps, and, if so, what steps, to restore to the Roman Catholic Community of Gibraltar the tranquillity which has been recently so much disturbed?

COLONEL COLTHURST asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, with reference to the Question of the honourable Member for Portsmouth, Whether his attention has been called to the opinion of the Attorney General for Gibraltar to this effect:—1. That the appointment of a Junta or Board on the 12th August last was invalid; 2. That the Junta nominated in 1863, since when no lay members have been elected, did not possess any right to the Church of St. Mary or adjacent buildings; 3. That the draft ordinance of 1876 transfers the churches not to bodies or Junta but to trustees (five in number) comprising the Vicar Apostolic and Vicar General; and, whether it would be possible for Her Majesty's Government to give effect to such opinion?

MR. COURTNEY: Yes, Sir; the Return will be given. I am not aware that the Governor has refused to acknowledge the existence of the Junta, or that he has transferred to Dr. Canilla or any other person the custody of any temporalities hitherto administered by the Junta. I believe some question has been raised as to the legality of a recent election to the Junta; and, indeed, it appears in the Papers presented that the Attorney General has expressed an opinion that that election was invalid, as stated in the Question of my hon. and gallant Friend; but with reference to his further Questions and the Question of the hon. Member for Portsmouth, I would repeat what I have said on a former occasion—that it is not in the power of the Governor to divest the Junta of any legal right. If the custody or administration of anything has been taken from them to which they are entitled, they can assert their claims in the Law Courts, as was done 40 years ago. Tranquillity has now remained for some time undisturbed.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—MILFORD POST OFFICE.

MR. LEAMY asked the Postmaster General, Whether the office of Postmaster at Milford, county Cork, was recently held by Mr. Mathew Murphy, millowner and shopkeeper, at present imprisoned under the Coercion Act, and that since his arrest, which occurred about six months ago, and up to the 29th of last month, the office has been under the charge of his sister, Miss Murphy; whether, on the 29th of last month, Miss Murphy was informed that she could not be allowed to continue to conduct the office, as she was not a householder, and that since that date there has been no post office at Milford; whether Miss Murphy conducted the post office to the satisfaction of the authorities; whether the real reason for refusing to allow her to continue to conduct it is the imprisonment of her brother on suspicion; and, whether he approves of the course taken by the local postal authorities in the matter?

MR. FAWCETT: Sir, in reply to the hon. Member, I have to state that Miss Murphy cannot be appointed to the post office at Milford because she does not fulfil the necessary condition of being a householder. The reason why the office has been closed is that no one who is eligible is willing to take it. If Miss Murphy can qualify herself by becoming a householder, I shall be willing to appoint her, and to continue her in the office, so long as she conducts the office properly.

ARMY—STAFF APPOINTMENTS.

COLONEL ALEXANDER asked the Secretary of State for War, If he can state why Officers who have not passed the final Staff College Examination are appointed to the Staff contrary to the Queen's Regulations and to the detriment of those who have qualified in every respect?

MR. CHILDERS: The hon. and gallant Gentleman's Question contains two assumptions—first, that officers have been appointed to the Staff contrary to the Queen's Regulations; and, secondly, that those Regulations require that officers appointed to the Staff should have gone through the Staff College. In this he is mistaken, as, by the Regulations, an officer may be appointed to the general Staff of the Army if he be "of proved ability on the Staff in the field." I know of no officer on the general Staff of the Army below the rank of lieutenant colonel who does not fulfil these conditions. The Regulation does not apply to officers of higher rank.

COLONEL ALEXANDER gave Notice that he would take an early opportunity of calling attention to a recent violation of the rules governing the appointment of officers to the Staff of the Army.

NAVY—THE SHIPBUILDING PROGRAMME.

CAPTAIN PRICE asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether the ship-building programme, which he has asked the House of Commons to sanction, is sufficient to provide, at the completion of that programme, an armoured fleet fully equal in numbers and fighting strength to those of any two European Powers, or superior in these respects to any single Power?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, the essential feature of a shipbuilding programme is the number of tons to be built in a given year, and it cannot be said that any one year or another will provide a fleet of a certain size as is indicated in the hon. Gentleman's Question. For three years past the amount of tonnage built has been increasing steadily, and the Admiralty would not hesitate to increase it still further, if it appeared to them necessary, in order to maintain the supremacy of Great Britain at sea. As to the relative strength of our own and foreign Fleets, I put forward the view of the Government last week in a speech of an hour, and the hon. Member criticized it, if I recollect right, at about the same length. There are so many considerations, which must all be taken into account, that I could not undertake to repeat what I then said within the limits of an Answer.

ROYAL PASSENGERS—THE "ALBERT VICTOR" CHANNEL STEAMER.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, Whether the public will not be charged £40, in the usual manner, for the conveyance of the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh from Boulogne to Folkestone on the 18th in the "Albert Victor;" and, whether, in view of the consequent neglect by Railway Companies of the comfort and safety of the public, he will consider whether this system of payment for special packets for the conveyance of distinguished persons should be more cautiously adopted?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: Sir, the orders for special packets for distinguished persons are given by the Admiralty; but I have no reason to doubt that the usual payment will be made in the case referred to by my hon. Friend. The system now in force was adopted some years ago as a more convenient one than that of providing a ship of the Royal Navy; and, as far as I am aware, no complaints have arisen with respect to it until the late unfortunate mishap. I will communicate with the Board of Trade and Admiralty as to the necessity for making any alteration in its details for the protection of the public.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE FINANCIAL STATEMENT—THE REVENUE.

MR. W. H. SMITH (for Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOKE) asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury for some explanation of the two following items in the comparative statement of the Estimate of Revenue for 1882-3, and of the Receipts in 1881-2:—Estimate for 1882-3, Stamps (exclusive of Fee, &c. Stamps), £11,145,000; Exchequer Receipt in 1881-2, £11,385,000. Estimate for 1882-3, Miscellaneous (inclusive of Fee, &c. Stamps), £4,235,000; Exchequer Receipt in 1881-2, £5,011,020?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: Sir, two changes have been made this year in the method of stating the Revenue. First, receipts realized by the Army and Navy Departments, which before this year were paid into the Exchequer, will this year be applied, as shown in the Estimates, under fixed regulation, in diminution of the Votes of those Departments. This measure, of course, diminishes the amount of Miscellaneous Receipts to be paid into the Exchequer. Secondly, the Chancellor of the Exchequer presents the Revenue in two parts—1, produce of taxes; 2, receipts, not taxes, properly so-called. Fees levied in Courts of Law and other Departments form part of the receipts of the year. Formerly these fees were received in cash; but, for sake of convenience, they are now, for the most part, collected by means of stamps. The Treasury does not consider these fees as taxes in the ordinary sense of the word, and proposes, therefore, to bring them to account henceforth as Miscellaneous Revenue, so that the Account, laid before Parliament, may show distinctly the two kinds of Revenue. The first measure diminishes the amount of Miscellaneous Receipts to be paid into the Exchequer. The second increases that head of Revenue, diminishing the Stamp Revenue by a corresponding amount.

POLICE (SCOTLAND) — DISTURBANCES IN THE ISLAND OF SKYE.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Lord Advocate, Is it true the police sent from Glasgow to Skye were supplied with revolvers; and, if so, under what Statute are civil officers at liberty to carry arms?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): No, Sir; the police sent from Glasgow to Skye were not supplied with revolvers. They had no weapons other than their ordinary bâtons.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—PRISONERS DETAINED UNDER THE ACT—P. AND W. M'QUINLAN.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the cases of Patrick M'Quinlan and William M'Quinlan his brother, now confined in Limerick Prison on suspicion of being accessory to an attack upon a dwelling-house, have been recently under his notice; whether he is aware that both men have characterised the charge as false; whether a Mr. Brosnan, arrested on the same charge and at the same time, was discharged after four months' detention, whereas these young men have been in prison for twelve months; whether he is aware that the younger, Patrick, had recently returned from college, and was about to present himself for his examinations; whether application was made in January for permission for him to go up for examination, and whether any reply was sent to that application, and whether he will now be permitted to present himself; and, whether he has any special reason for detaining these boys?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): Sir, the cases of the two M'Quinlans were reconsidered on Friday last, and the decision arrived at was that they could not be released at present. They may have characterized the charge as a false one; but that did not necessarily make it so. As to Mr. Brosnan, he was discharged last August on a sufficient undertaking. Patrick M'Quinlan applied last January for permission to go up for a Civil Service examination, but was informed that His Excellency was not able to accede to his request. There are sufficient reasons, in the opinion of the Government, for the detention of these two persons at present.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—TREATMENT OF PRISONERS UNDER THE ACT—ARMAGH GAOL.

MR. REDMOND asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to a Letter in the "Freeman's Journal," of April 22nd, signed by Mr. Nicholas H. Devine, recently a suspect in Armagh Gaol; whether it is a fact, as stated in that Letter, that Mr. Devine, when suffering from an attack of inflammation of the lungs, was removed from the ordinary cell which he inhabited to one fifteen feet by thirteen; that in this cell three other suspects were confined with him for eighteen out of every twenty-four hours; that the cell contained four beds and the furniture necessary for four men, and was used for sleeping and dining in; and, whether better provision will be made for hospital patients in Armagh Gaol?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): Sir, the Chief Secretary for Ireland has seen the letter referred to in this Question. The statement in that letter about Mr. Devine's illness in Armagh Prison is quite incorrect. He never suffered from inflammation of the lungs while in detention under the Protection Act. The remaining portions of this Question were, I am informed, fully answered on the 20th of March in reply to the hon. Member, and I have only to add that there is ample hospital accommodation in Armagh Prison.

MR. REDMOND said, that portion of his Question which had not been answered before he would like to have answered now, with reference to Mr. Devine being confined for this time in a cell of these dimensions.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, he would inquire.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—ARRESTS IN CO. TIPPERARY.

MR. REDMOND asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that about six months ago five men were arrested under the Coercion Act in the neighbourhood of Cashel, county Tipperary, all charged with the same offence; whether four of these men have been released, the only one remaining in custody being Mr. Michael Ryan Wall, at present in Naas Gaol; and, whether he will now order his release?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): Four of these men have been released. Mr. Ryan, his sobriquet being, I believe,

Mr. Redmond

Wall, is still in detention; but his case is now under His Excellency's consideration.

IRISH FISHERIES—FRENCH FISHING VESSELS.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Reports have been made of violation by French fishing vessels of the three-mile limit on the coasts of Clare and Kerry and in the estuary of the Shannon; whether any and what steps are to be taken to secure the observance of the Law; and, whether the Irish Government will consult with the Admiralty, with a view of obtaining the presence of a gunboat, as suggested by Reports of the Irish Fisheries Commission, to protect the rights of Irish and British fishermen on the Irish coast?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): This Question relates to the action of French fishing vessels on the Irish coast. The Inspectors of Irish Fisheries have drawn the attention of the Government to alleged violations by these French fishing vessels of the provisions of the Fisheries Convention, and the Irish Law Officers will be consulted in the matter.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked, whether it was not the fact that during two successive years, when the Estimates were discussed, the attention of the Government was called to this very question?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, he did not know. He understood it turned upon the construction of an Article of the Convention.

EVICTIONS (IRELAND)—LONGFORD WORKHOUSE.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is the fact that on Wednesday the 12th instant a large number of persons applied for relief at the Longford Workhouse, stating that they had been evicted from the estate of Lord Granard; whether the spokesman of the applicants was a young man named Fury, who had been imprisoned as a suspect, and was but lately released; whether Fury stated that his father, one of the evicted, was eighty years of age, and complained that they were all in great distress; whether Fury has since been re-arrested; and, whether he can state the reasons for his re-arrest?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): Sir, it is the fact, as stated in the Question of the hon. Member, that a number of persons on the 12th instant applied at Longford Poor House for relief, stating they had been evicted from their farms on Lord Granard's estate; and their spokesman was a man named Fury, who had not been arrested under the Protection Act, but had been committed for trial for firing into a dwelling-house. He stated that his father was 80 years old and in great distress. The relieving officer visited these persons, and found half of them not destitute, and those whom he considered destitute refused relief in the poor-house. I am informed that these tenants owed from three to four years' rent, and that an offer was made to stop the ejectments on payment of one year's rent and costs. Fury had two holdings; on one, I am informed, four years', and on the other five and a-half years' rent was due. On the 17th of this month James Fury was arrested under the Protection Act on suspicion of posting threatening notices.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—ENNISKILLEN GAOL—MR. J. P. QUINN.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he is aware that Mr. J. P. Quinn, suspect, confined in Enniskillen Gaol, who has been allowed the use of a well-lighted room in the hospital, in order that he may carry on certain work in which he is engaged, has been refused permission to receive his visitors in his room, although such permission is given under similar circumstances in Kilmainham; whether he will order the prohibition to be withdrawn; or, if not, whether he will state the reason for his refusal; and, whether he will state the reason for Mr. Quinn's removal from Kilmainham to Enniskillen Prison?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): Sir, Mr. Quinn was allowed to use a room for writing in; but there is no reason why an exception should be made in his case as to visits. The inquiry is inaccurate in suggesting that there is any prohibition to be withdrawn; there is no prohibition; these are the ordinary rules for the government of the prison, and these must be observed. The hon. Member will see that, on grounds which have been stated formerly to the House, I cannot give the reason which influenced the Government in removing Mr. Quinn to Enniskillen.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—PRISONERS DETAINED UNDER THE ACT—MR. P. ARNOLD.

MR. EDWARD SHEIL asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he will consider the case of Mr. Patrick Arnold, of Gormanston, in the county of Meath, who has been confined in Armagh since January 2nd last; whether Mr. F. Tullam, his neighbour, who was arrested in December 1881, has not been released; and, whether, under the circumstances, he will direct that Mr. Arnold be released from prison?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): Sir, Mr. Tullam has been released, and Mr. Arnold's case is at present under His Excellency's consideration.

PEACE PRESERVATION (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—ARMS LICENCES.

MR. EDWARD SHEIL asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is true that Mr. William Gogarty, of Clondalkin, has been refused a licence to carry arms; whether the licence was refused on the ground that he had been a member of the Land League; whether Mr. Gogarty did produce a certificate signed by two justices of the peace, as required by the Arms Act; and, whether under the circumstances Captain Keogh, R.M. was justified in refusing a licence?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): Sir, the facts are not quite accurately stated in the Question of the hon. Member. Mr. Gogarty brought an informal certificate to the licensing officer, who requested him to bring a proper one, which he never did. Under these circumstances, the Resident Magistrate, who was the licensing officer, was justified in not granting him an arms licence.

MR. EDWARD SHEIL: Would the right hon. and learned Gentleman state where the informality was?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, he was not able to tell exactly; but the Arms Act required certain specified requirements to be complied with, and in case any of them were omitted the licence should be refused.

PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS—
RIVERS CONSERVANCY AND FLOODS
PREVENTION BILL.

SIR BALDWIN LEIGHTON asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether it is the intention of the Government to proceed with the Rivers Conservancy and Prevention of Floods Bill on Friday; and, if not, whether it could be arranged that it should not be again put on the Paper without some serious intention of proceeding with it, seeing the inconvenience caused to the large number of Members interested in it by such a course?

MR. HIBBERT, in reply, said, that the Rivers Conservancy Bill had been put down, not for Friday next, but for Friday, the 5th of May; but, in consequence of a Motion which stood for that day, he thought it very improbable that the Bill would be brought forward on that occasion. He entirely sympathized with the view of the hon. Baronet as to the inconvenience caused to Members by putting down a Bill for a day on which it could not possibly be brought on; and he trusted that his right hon. Friend at the head of the Local Government Board would put down the Bill for a future day when it could be considered.

EJECTMENTS (IRELAND)—THE RETURNS—THE CIVIL BILL COURTS.

MR. GIBSON desired to ask the Attorney General for Ireland a Question of which he had given him Private Notice. In a Return of Ejectments in Ireland issued that morning, it had been shown in the case of the Superior Courts how many Orders of Ejectment had been issued, and how many had been carried out. But in the case of the other Courts only the Orders issued had been shown; but not whether they had been carried out. He would like to know whether his right hon. and learned Friend could see his way to amend the Return, or to issue a Supplementary Return, showing in how many cases these Orders of the Civil Bill Courts had been carried into effect?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, he understood that the form in which the Orders of the Civil Bill Courts were carried out was introduced by the late Government, and had been persisted in up to the present time. But if it were practicable he would endeavour to supply what his right hon. and learned Friend asked for, as the request was exceedingly reasonable. It was desirable, of course, to show what proceedings in the Inferior Courts had ripened into eviction, as well as those in the Superior Courts.

SOUTH AFRICA—ZULULAND.

MR. R. N. FOWLER asked, Whether the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies could give the House any information as to the statement in The Daily News as to the serious condition of affairs in Zululand?

MR. COURTNEY: Sir, I have seen the statement in The Daily News, dated the 25th, and to-day I have received a telegram from Sir Henry Bulwer, dated the 26th—one day later—in which he merely refers incidentally to a demonstration at Natal by the ex-King's brother. Evidently he does not attribute to it the importance which one would attach to The Daily News telegram.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PRO-PERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—PRI-SONERS DETAINED UNDER THE ACT
—MR. T. RYAN.

MR. HEALY asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether Mr. Thomas Ryan, of Two Mile Borris, County Tipperary, is still detained in Clonmel Gaol, while Mr. Fanning, in the same locality, arrested at the same time and on the same charge, has been released; and, what reason there is for Mr. Ryan's continued detention?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): Sir, Mr. Fanning was released on the ground of ill-health. He was attacked by fever and removed to the hospital. As soon as the doctor certified that he was fit to travel, His Excellency ordered his release. His Excellency has reconsidered Mr. Ryan's case, but cannot see his way to order his release at present,

THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—
TELEGRAMS TO CORONERS.

MR. HEALY asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether, when cases of suspicious deaths occur, the police are in the habit of sending telegrams for the Irish coroners free of charge; and, if not, whether the police will be instructed so to do?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): Sir, the only telegrams which the Constabulary are authorized to send free are those which relate to the Constabulary Service. No case has been made out to the Government for extending this to telegrams for Irish coroners.

STATE OF IRELAND—THE POLICE AT CAPPOQUIN.

MR. HEALY asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to a statement in a Waterford paper that, on the occasion of the rejoicings for the release of Mr. Parnell at Cappoquin, the police interfered, and the head constable drew a dagger and held it up before the people; whether, on the Rev. Mr. Casey cautioning him, the head constable said that the clergyman was inciting the people to attack him; whether the Rev. gentleman reported the circumstances to the sub-inspector, and what has been the result of the inquiry; whether daggers, such as that alleged to have been displayed by the constable, have been served out to the Irish Police Force; if not, whether the Government approve of the display of this weapon by the constable, when his regulation sword was available; whether, if the statements are denied, the Government will grant an inquiry thereinto; and, whether, on the evening in question, a sub-constable was stationed at the door of the house of Mr. Michael Fitzgerald, general merchant, thereby deterring many people from entering his shop on business; and what justification there is for such a proceeding?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): Sir, I am informed that the account of this transaction, which has been furnished to the hon. Member, is exaggerated. The constable, on the occasion referred to in the Question, seeing an explosive alight near a dwelling in the main street in the town of Cappoquin, went to put it out with a sword-cane which he had in his hand. While doing so the cane became detached from the sword; but the constable at once replaced it. The Rev. Mr. Casey then came up, and remonstrated with the constable for extinguishing the fire, and told him he was exciting the people. The constable respectfully replied that it was his duty to put out the fire, and if there was excitement it was due to the interference of the rev. gentleman. Next day the rev. gentleman called on the Sub-Inspector, and complained to him of the constable. The Sub-Inspector, in reply, told him that he thought the constable had only done his duty, but that he would inquire into it. He did so, and found no further step called for. Of course, no daggers are served out to the police, nor was any dagger displayed on the occasion referred to. No sub or other constable was placed at Mr. Fitzgerald's door, nor was anyone deterred from entering his shop on business.

MR. HEALY: I beg leave to ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman whether sword-canes have been served out to the police; and whether the Government approve of their use, since ordinary swords have been placed at the disposal of the police?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): No sword-canes have been served out; and I should think that they are very much a more harmless weapon than the ordinary swords.

MOTION.

PARLIAMENT—GLOUCESTER WRIT.

RESOLUTION.

MR. LEWIS rose to move—

"That Mr. Speaker do issue his Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown to make out a new Writ for the Election of a Member to serve in this present Parliament for the City of Gloucester, in the room of Thomas Robinson, esquire, whose Election has been declared to be void."

MR. LABOUCHERE: Sir, I rise to Order. On a previous occasion I had it in my mind to move a new Writ for the borough of Northampton. When I communicated that intention to the authorities of the House, with the view of putting on the Paper a Motion to that effect, I was informed that if I did so my Motion would not have precedence of the Orders of the Day. I observe that the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Lewis) has put on the Paper a Motion of which he gave Notice, that he intends to move for a new Writ for Gloucester. I would ask you, Sir, whether, in the circumstances, that Motion has precedence over the Orders of the Day?

MR. SPEAKER: The Motion of the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Lewis) is in pursuance of a Resolution of the House, passed on the 10th of February last, declaring—

“That in all cases where the Seat of a Member has been declared void on the ground of Bribery, no Motion for the issue of a new Writ shall be made without two days' previous Notice with the Votes, and that such Notice be considered before Orders of the Day and Notices of Motions.”—[3 Hansard, cclxvi. 470.]

MR. LEWIS said, he begged to thank the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) for another effort to teach the House its business. The hon. Member had more to do with election proceedings in that House than any other hon. Member during the present Session; and he should have thought the hon. Member was aware that this Sessional Order had been passed in order that the House might not be taken by surprise in the issue of Writs for vacancies occasioned by corrupt practices. In introducing that Motion he should be able to convince the House, he thought, that it involved a great Constitutional question; and he apprehended that upon no light ground, and in no indirect manner, would the House allow the rights and privileges of electors to be interfered with largely or destroyed, but would take care to deal with them in a regular and legal manner. At the present time no fewer than eight constituencies and 14 Members were affected by the extraordinary conduct of Her Majesty's Government. The election for the borough of Gloucester took place more than two years ago. In the summer of 1880 an Election Petition was duly tried, and under it Mr. Robinson, one of the Members, was unseated. Before the expiry of the Session of 1880 the Attorney General, in pursuance of the Report of the Election Judge, moved for a Commission of Inquiry. That took place in the autumn and winter of 1880. The Report was presented as long ago as March, 1881. He apprehended that it was the duty of the House to take care that there was no undue delay in the matter. Instead of that, what course had been pursued? From March until August no step was taken. Late in the Session, in August, a Bill was introduced to prevent the issue of the Writ in any of these boroughs until eight days after the commencement of the present Session. After this Session commenced, two or three weeks were allowed to elapse before any notice was taken of the incriminated boroughs. It was not until several Questions had been put to Ministers that the Bill was produced. He then gave Notice with reference to the second reading of the Bill. The question, he thought, deserved the close attention of the two Ministers against whom charges had been made in connection with the Cities of Chester and Oxford affected by that Bill. It was reasonable to expect that every expedition would be used with respect to this Bill. One would have thought that the two Cabinet Ministers would have desired to take the earliest opportunity of showing how unmerited were the charges that were made against them. But that was not the course pursued by the Government. When he put a Question on this subject to the noble Marquess, the answer he gave was that he cared nothing for the suggestion made as to the conduct of his Colleagues; but he admitted that the question, affecting the constituencies, was a very serious one. That took place a week ago. What was the conduct of the Government next day? Instead of proceeding with the Disfranchisement Bill, they put down the Parliamentary Election Expenses Bill—a Bill of a kindred, but general character—and entirely overlooked and evaded the question at issue in the other Bill. He thought there must be some reason in the background for this course. Turning to the question raised by this Motion, what were the precedents with reference to matters of this kind? He would quote the cases of Beverley and Bridgwater. Three months after the Report of the Commission was presented a Bill for the disfranchisement of the boroughs was presented to the House, and on the 6th of May it was read a third time. This was very different from the course which the Government was now pursuing with regard to Gloucester. He maintained that anyone who had read the whole of the Commissioners' Reports could have come to no other conclusion than that a very grave case had been made out for two responsible Ministers of the Crown to answer. [The ATTORNEY GENERAL dissented.] The Attorney General shook his head; but let him bring forward the Disfranchisement Bill, and then they would discover the truth of his allegations. What he wanted was an opportunity of showing what had been the conduct of the President of the Local Government Board.

Mr. Labouchere

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) rose to Order. He wished to know whether the hon. Member's language was relevant to the Motion that a new Writ be issued for Gloucester; whether, in fact, he could go into matters in no way connected with that City or its Representatives, and make charges against persons who had no connection with it?

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member ought to confine himself to matters relating to the Gloucester Election.

MR. LEWIS said, he was not surprised that upon that occasion, as upon every other, the hon. and learned Gentleman should attempt to evade the issue which he had raised. [Cries of "Order!" "Withdraw!"]

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is not attending to my directions.

MR. LEWIS said, his point was that the City of Gloucester was at the mercy of the Government, and that its rights were likely to be seriously jeopardized and infringed. His chief object, however, in bringing forward his Motion was to guard against the possibility of its being said later on that the delay of the Government in dealing with the constituency had not been made the subject of protest. He would only further point out that of the 5,381 electors of the City of Gloucester, only one-third were at all involved in the Report of the Election Commissioners. He begged to move that a new Writ be issued for the City of Gloucester.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That Mr. Speaker do issue his Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown to make out a new Writ for the Election of a Member to serve in this present Parliament for the City of Gloucester, in the room of Thomas Robinson, esquire, whose Election has been declared to be void."—(Mr. Lewis.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that the hon. Member did not appear to seriously propose the issue of the Writ; but there were many Members in the House who had a strong interest in the City of Gloucester, and he had no wish to anticipate the discussion which must arise. He would, therefore, only remind the House that the Commissioners had reported that corrupt practices extensively prevailed; and it was, therefore, impossible to consent to the issue of the Writ. There must be a discussion of the matter, and it was most unfair if he made any statement which could not be discussed in detail. He did not think there were many hon. Members who would wish to see a new Writ for Gloucester immediately issued. The hon. Member for Londonderry, as he understood, wished to press the Motion as a Censure on the Government for not having hurried the Disfranchisement Bill forward. The Motion before the House was, however, a very indirect mode by which to accomplish that object. The Report of the Commissioners was not in the hands of the Government until the month of April last year. The Government had to consider carefully what should be their action in the matter; and it was not till a comparatively late period of last Session that they had so shaped their policy as to present it to the House. At that time, however, a communication from the Front Opposition Bench was made asking that the Bill should not be discussed at the end of the Session in an empty House. He did feel that every matter in the Bill should be very carefully discussed, and, in consequence, the Bill was not introduced. All he could say was that there would be full opportunity given for the discussion of the Bill; and he was sure the Prime Minister would take care that no attempt should be made to pass the Bill in the absence of Members who might wish to discuss it. Before sitting down, he desired to say a few words about the charges which the hon. Member had brought against the Home Secretary and the President of the Local Government Board.

MR. LEWIS: I rise to Order, Sir. At the instance of the Attorney General, you prevented me proceeding one step in the direction in which the hon. and learned Gentleman is now proceeding. I beg to ask if he is in Order?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) wished to refer only to a matter to which the hon. Member had been allowed to refer—namely, the reasons adduced by the hon. Member for the delay in the production of the Bill. According to the hon. Member, the delay was accounted for by a desire on the part of the Government to evade unpleasant charges. Nobody had brought any charges against his right hon. Friends except the hon. Member. There were no charges against them in the Report of the Royal Commission; and because the hon. Member chose to imagine certain charges, were they going to dislocate the Business of the House? He wished, however, that the hon. Member had made his charges in the presence of his right hon. Friends, instead of choosing a day when they were absent to state to the public that grave charges were brought against them in those Reports.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, he was of opinion that the hon. Member for Londonderry was, to a certain extent, justified in the course which he had taken, since the Government had unquestionably been guilty of undue delay in formulating in a Bill their proposals for the treatment of the boroughs against which charges were made. Now, however, that a Bill had been introduced, it would not be reasonable to ask the House to issue a new Writ for any one of the boroughs to which the measure would apply. At the proper time he hoped to be able to prove that the best way to deal with the case of Gloucester would be by examination before a Select Committee. He would only say with regard to what had fallen from the Attorney General that, as he himself admitted that Her Majesty's Government decided last year that it was not right to proceed with a Bill of this nature in the closing week of the Session, they would take care not to proceed with a similar Bill at a similar time of the Session this year. It was not the wish of anybody affected by this Bill, as far as Gloucester was concerned, that it should be defeated by delay. What they asked was that the Bill should be fairly discussed, and that a judicial decision should be arrived at with regard to it. He would be very glad if the Government would name a very early day for the second reading, and then assent to his Motion for a reference of the Bill to a Select Committee, not for delay, but purely for investigation, and a decision on the subject could be thus taken before the conclusion of the present Session.

MR. THOMAS COLLINS said, he thought the Bill dealing with these seven boroughs dealt with them too leniently, rather than too severely. It would be well, in his opinion, that before discussing the Corrupt Practices Bill in Committee, the Government should propose the second reading of the Bill dealing with these seven boroughs. If they did not, they would be liable at any time to have Motions brought forward for the issue of Writs for these boroughs. He hoped that before long Gloucester would be wiped out as a constituency.

MR. MONK said, the Report of the Judges had been in the hands of the Government for upwards of a year; and, therefore, it was only reasonable that Members should ask the Government to take some steps with regard to the measure affecting these boroughs. He had not had any communication with the hon. Member for Londonderry with regard to the Motion he had brought forward. He felt certain that the Motion was merely a peg on which to hang a speech with regard to the conduct of Her Majesty's Government. He had not complained of the course pursued hitherto by Her Majesty's Government; but if this Bill, which his constituents were anxious to have considered, were further delayed, he thought they would have a right to complain very much. All they asked was that Gloucester should be put in the same category as Oxford and Chester. He had a decided opinion that when the Bill was brought on he would be able to make out a good case for the constituency he represented. He hoped the Government, before the end of this week, would give an assurance that no further delay should take place in moving the second reading of the Bill.

BARON DE FERRIERES said, he could assure the House that it was generally felt in the country that Gloucester had been very unfairly treated in this matter; and he trusted that the question would be disposed of on its merits at the very earliest opportunity.

MR. LEWIS, in reply, said, the Attorney General, no doubt, thought that, in accordance with the practice of his master, he should throw contempt upon the suggestions he (Mr. Lewis) had made. He understood the hon. and learned Gentleman complained that he selected a day for making an attack on his right hon. Colleagues when they would be absent. He gave Notice of this Motion a week ago. He had not the least notion that any Members of the Government would be absent; and, at the present moment, he was wholly unable to explain the absence of the Home Secretary, or of the President of the Local Government Board. He read his Notice in the hearing of the Government two or three weeks ago. After the words of the Attorney General, he had no option but that of taking an opportunity for vindicating himself on Thursday next, and showing ground for what he had done. He had, by this discussion, gained one of the objects of his Motion, and he begged leave to withdraw it. ["No, no!"]

Question put, and negatived.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

—:0:—

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS (CORRUPT AND ILLEGAL PRACTICES) BILL.—[BILL 21.]

(Mr. Attorney General, Secretary Sir William Harcourt, Mr. Chamberlain, Sir Charles W. Dilke, Mr. Solicitor General.)

SECOND READING. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

[THIRD NIGHT.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [24th April], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

And which Amendment was,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "considering no corruption has been proved to exist in the larger town constituencies, or in any county constituency, it is inexpedient to adopt such uniform restrictions and punishments as will render the fair conduct of an election in a great constituency perilous and penal,"—(Mr. Robert Fowler,)

—instead thereof.

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

MR. CALLAN said, that when, on Tuesday last, he addressed a few observations to the House, the time was so limited that he could not condense his observations within it. There were only a few minutes intervening between the time at which he rose and the hour at which the House by its Rules adjourned the Sitting—10 minutes to 7 o'clock. He had no wish whatever to delay the passing of the Corrupt Practices Prevention Bill. On the contrary, as an Irish Member, against whom these practices militated, it was his wish and his interest, in common with those with whom he usually acted, to promote any fair and well-considered measure for the prevention of corrupt practices. Now, his justification for so prolonging the discussion would, he was confident, be proved this evening by the number of Members who were anxious to address the House, and by the adverse opinions which had been formed since their attention had been directed to this ill-drawn, ill-considered, crotchety, and ill-advised Bill. Before he entered into the merits of the Bill, he thought it right to direct attention to a matter somewhat personal to himself. At one time he thought it was almost due to the House as well as to himself that he should bring it forward as a matter of Privilege. It would be in the recollection of the House that upon a Vote in Supply exception was taken by the Irish Members to what he then alleged to be a corrupt practice on the part of the Government with respect to certain Scotch newspapers, more especially as regarded one newspaper, the proprietor of which had a seat in this House. His remarks were unpleasant, and he had no doubt they were unpleasant in a peculiar sense to a Scotchman, because it interfered with his pocket as the owner of a newspaper, and he had had his reward. But he (Mr. Callan) had had his reward. He found the next day an article, to which he should presently direct attention, in The North British Daily Mail, which was owned by the hon. Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron), not as a sleeping partner, but as an active proprietor, who wrote, inspired, and suggested the articles which appeared in that paper, and who was lately a very active agent in proclaiming in its columns that the attempted assassination of the Queen was due to an Irishman. It was owned by a Scotchman who could have availed himself of the privileges of a Member to make his complaint if any other Member had acted in a manner unworthy of his position. It might be well to recall the circumstance that last Monday night he crossed the floor of the House and went to the Attorney General on the Treasury Bench, which he did not like to approach, because one was there nearer to corruption the nearer he approached it. He asked if the Attorney General would consent to the adjournment of the debate if he moved it, and he was met at once by the reply—"No; I will go on with this Bill to-night." A Member of the Fourth Party moved the adjournment of the debate, and, after some discussion, that was acceded to. The next day there was a debate on the Budget, and at an unexpectedly late period of the day the discussion of this Bill was resumed. At a quarter to 7 o'clock he rose, as he said, to exercise his right to speak upon this Bill. He certainly was not accessible to the blandishments of the Home Secretary, who made the appeal to the Alderman the Member for the City of London to withdraw his Amendment. Now, this Scotch newspaper, The North British Daily Mail, wrote of him—

[Third Night.]

"At a quarter to seven, in response to an appeal from Sir R. Assheton Cross, Mr. Alderman Fowler withdrew his Amendment to the measure, and the question of second reading was about to be determined when Mr. Callan intervened and, actuated by a spirit of malicious mischief——"

He had a right to his opinion, and he would not quarrel with him for that; but he made a substantive charge, for he added—

"And a deliberate design to obstruct the Public Business of the country, wilfully talked out the Bill."

He (Mr. Callan) had never made a Motion or seconded one in that House of an obstructive kind, and in that he had disagreed with many of his Friends with whom he usually acted. Having said this much, he should treat this charge with the contempt he treated all that emanated from ill-conditioned Scotchmen. Turning to the Bill before the House, the most remarkable feature of it was that, while it enlarged all the penalties, it contained nothing limiting the character of agencies, which was a question of the utmost importance. When the Attorney General was drafting this Bill he ought to have borne in mind the principles laid down by Baron Dowse in deciding an Election Petition in which he (Mr. Callan) was interested. In his decision the learned Judge held him

(Mr. Callan) scatheless. He said he came out of the trial in an honourable and straightforward manner, and with clean hands—observations which were altogether absent from the decision of Mr. Justice Groves in deciding a Petition in which the Attorney General himself was the respondent. In Baron Dowse's judgment, which was a very able one, he distinctly laid down that there was a difference between illegal treating and treating openly and corruptly. At the trial of the Drogheda Election Petition, in 1869, Mr. Justice Keogh, who was a notorious Election Judge, declared Mr. Benjamin Whitworth to have been guilty of corrupt practices under the Act, and he was disqualified for sitting for Drogheda from that cause. Mr. Whitworth swore that he had not been guilty of any illegal practice, and that, on the occasion in which the learned Judge held he was guilty of undue influence, he merely acted with the view of preventing persons being intimidated. The hon. Member for Drogheda was a Gentleman who would not be guilty of illegal practices; but if it had not been possible at the time of his election to review the decision of the single Election Judge, the decision of Mr. Justice Keogh against him would, under this Bill, have prevented Mr. Whitworth from ever sitting for Drogheda. Turning to the case of the present Member for Tyrone, he noticed that that Gentleman (Mr. Dickson) was elected for Dungannon at the last General Election, and was unseated under circumstances of great unfairness. A friend of his induced a bibulous voter living in Belfast to take a journey to Scotland, and agreed to pay his expenses, including his whiskey bill. Under the term of agency this circumstance was brought up against the hon. Member, and he was held to have been guilty of a corrupt practice, and compelled to pay the whole cost of the proceedings. If the present Bill were to become law, the result would be that he would be forever disqualified from sitting for that borough. Was such a provision fair or considerate? The Attorney General had introduced another unfair and absurd provision with respect to the hiring of rooms for the use of candidates. According to the Bill, if he (Mr. Callan), during an election, endeavoured to obtain the most convenient house in the borough, knowing that the Returning Officer would be likely also to seek it as a polling booth, he would be guilty of corrupt practice. This was certainly giving a monopoly of convenience to the Returning Officers. The effect of it would be this. If he, knowing the county Louth thoroughly, endeavoured to obtain the most convenient rooms in every large town for his committee-rooms, as he most assuredly would do, he would be guilty of illegal practices, because the Returning Officer might also desire to obtain the most convenient rooms for polling booths; and, according to the 13th section, a person guilty of illegal practices would be incapable of ever again seeking the representation of that borough or county. Accordingly, for seeking his own convenience, he might be rendered incapable of ever sitting for Louth. Surely the Attorney General for England could never have read this absurd clause, although his name was on the back of the Bill.

Mr. Callan

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he was unwilling to interrupt the hon. Member; but he requested him to read that section accurately. He would see his assumption was not correct.

MR. CALLAN: Very well; take for granted that it was so. Still he argued that, under this Bill, if he, in the village of Louth, which contained only a few houses, took the most convenient lodging during an election—and he always did take the most convenient lodgings—he would be debarred from ever again sitting for the county Louth. Was not this a ridiculous offence visited with an outrageous penalty? He would caution hon. Gentlemen against ever giving up a county for a borough constituency. He did so on one occasion, and it certainly was a most unwise proceeding, for all small boroughs were corrupt. He sat for a small borough from 1868 till 1870; but he had no hesitation in saying that that small borough was hopelessly corrupt; and, though he managed to retain his seat for that borough in 1874, he was defeated in 1880 by corruption of the basest kind. In 1875, the House appointed a Select Committee to inquire into the operation of the Corrupt Practices Election Act of 1854 and the various other Acts on the subject. That Committee consisted of men of great eminence, among those being Mr. Cubitt,

Mr. Gibson, since then Attorney General for Ireland; Mr. Herschell (now Sir Farrer Herschell), Mr. C. E. Lewis, Mr. Lowe, who had since gone up to those high regions where the "weary are at rest;" Mr. Rodwell, Mr. Spencer Walpole, and others. Having sat from the 18th of March to the 28th of May, the Committee reported; and they recommended that every Election Petition which alleged corrupt practices against the sitting Member or his agent should be tried by a tribunal consisting of two Judges of the Superior Courts, and that no Member should be unseated, nor should any person be declared guilty of corrupt practices, except under a joint decision of the Judges. In 1879, effect was given to the Report of that Committee. Sir John Holker, then Attorney General, said that a Select Committee had recommended that the tribunal for trying Election Petitions should be composed of two Judges; that he was himself of opinion that a tribunal of three Judges would be more satisfactory; but there was not a sufficient judicial staff to admit of the latter arrangement. The House, after debate, agreed without a division to change the law, and two Judges were appointed for trying those cases. He now asked whether any representation had been made by the English Judges intimating to the Attorney General that it was desirable to revert to the practice of trying those cases before a single Judge? Unless some safeguard were introduced into this Bill in Committee—if, indeed, the measure ever reached that stage—it would be a Bill to intimidate candidates from coming forward at elections, and to disqualify those who ventured to come forward. An eminent Judge who had tried Election Petitions during the last two years in Ireland said that the Legislature had wisely provided that there should be two Judges sitting together for the trial of all those cases, and that, speaking for himself, it did give great assistance to Judges to be associated together in dealing with those most serious and difficult cases. That was the opinion of an impartial authority; and he challenged the Attorney General to produce the opinion of one single Judge justifying that proposal, which, he thought, was deliberately framed for the purpose of rendering still more unsafe the position of Irish

[Third Night.]

Members, who were dependent on voluntary effort, and who were not returned, like many English Members, through the exertions of paid agents or by the influence of the Caucus. As to the 8th clause, which prohibited the engagement of committee-rooms at public-houses, he would say that in his county there were 10 polling stations, and at six of them you could not get a room of adequate size, except at a public-house; therefore, the effect of the clause would be to preclude a candidate having a committee-room at all. Perhaps it might be suggested that huts might be erected; but then Mr. Clifford Lloyd might be sent down to prevent that being done. Unless Ireland were excluded from the Bill, he was sure it would not be passed this Session, not even if the clôture were carried. The suggestion that the object of the Bill was to reduce the expense of elections was contradicted, so far as the Attorney General was concerned, by his conduct in 1875 in regard to the Parliamentary Elections Returning Officers' Bill. In compliance with the request of Members of the House, the word "Ireland" was cut out of that Bill—he believed in deference to Irish Members; but in the month of August, when the Irish Members were away, a friend of his, who was now dead, re-introduced the word "Ireland" in Committee, for the express purpose, by extending that Bill to Ireland, of preventing poor men from standing for Irish constituencies.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he objected to so gross an imputation being made without any evidence.

MR. CALLAN maintained, however, that it was true, and said that in the course of the debate on the Bill of 1875 the present Postmaster General declared that it would increase the costs of Returning Officers by 100 per cent. As an illustration of how the Bill would operate in the matter of agency, he would mention an incident in his own experience. During his election a young man volunteered to act as one of his agents, and he appointed him to attend at the Ardee polling booth on a Friday morning. On the previous Monday this young man gave a friend a glass of whiskey, and their conversation having turned on the then approaching election, this was cited at the Petition trial as a case of treating. The person, however, in reply to Mr. Baron Dowse, who asked if that glass of whiskey induced him to vote for Mr. Callan, replied—"No amount of whiskey would induce me to vote against Philip Callan." Yet under this Bill this act of the agent would have unseated the Member, and disqualified him from sitting again for the constituency. There was no one in favour of the Bill; he could not believe that even the Attorney General was, except on the assumption that he intended never to present himself to an English constituency again. It was an ill-considered and crochety measure; and unless it were greatly amended, or Ireland were excluded from its operations, it would be opposed in every shape and form.

DR. CAMERON said, he rose to answer some very unwarrantable remarks made in regard to himself. The hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Callan) commenced his speech by stating that, some time ago, in a discussion in Committee of Supply, he had taken exception to what he then alleged to be corrupt practices on the part of the Government with respect to certain newspapers, more especially with regard to one Scotch newspaper, the proprietor of which had a seat in that House. The hon. Member went on to say—

"His remarks were unpleasant, and he had no doubt they were unpleasant in a peculiar way to a Scotchman, because they interfered with his pocket as the proprietor of a newspaper."

The hon. Member continued—

"The North British Daily Mail was owned by the hon. Member for Glasgow, its active proprietor, who wrote, inspired, and suggested what appeared in it, and who was one of the active agents in inserting in the columns of that newspaper that the attempted assassination of the Queen was by an Irishman."

The hon. Member went on to say that he had had his reward, and had accused him (Dr. Cameron) of having in revenge written an account of a scene the other night, attributing to him misconduct in having maliciously moved the adjournment of the debate. Now, he (Dr. Cameron) was almost ashamed to trouble the House about the matter. He could not pretend to be particularly indignant at it; but it might be that his skin was abnormally thick. It did not affect him much; but when he found charges of corruption made against him repeatedly—

MR. CALLAN: I beg pardon. I made no charge of corruption against the hon. Member. I charged the Government with having unfairly given advertisements to Scotch newspapers, no doubt for purposes of corruption.

Mr. Callan

DR. CAMERON, continuing, said, that the hon. Member remarked that that touched him (Dr. Cameron) in his pocket, and that it was peculiarly unpleasant to him as a Scotchman. He did not feel troubled about these things. His skin might be abnormally thick. He did not rise even now to protect himself, although he was quite aware that if a sufficient amount of dirt was thrown a certain amount would stick; but what he wanted to do was to soothe the feelings of the hon. Member for Louth, who was of remarkably fragile honour.

MR. HEALY: I rise to Order, and to ask whether it is in Order or Parliamentary for one hon. Member to say of another that he is of "remarkably fragile honour?"

MR. SPEAKER: An expression of that kind is certainly not Parliamentary, and I call on the hon. Member to withdraw it. I did not interpose during the observations made by the hon. Member for Louth upon this personal matter, because he wished to make a personal observation to the House; but I think I ought to have said to the hon. Member, as I now desire to say to the hon. Member for Glasgow, that while the House was very indulgent with regard to personal explanations, they should be limited as much as possible.

DR. CAMERON said, that in using the expression he certainly had not used the proper word. He withdrew the expression, and he thought "tender" would have been the better word. The whole of the hon. Member's charge against him from beginning to end was a farrago of nonsense. He was not responsible for the composition and distribution of those bills in which M'Lean, the assassin, was represented as an Irishman. He had not given a second thought to the charge of corruption levelled against himself, for he did not imagine that anybody believed it. He had even forgotten that the hon. Member for Louth was the Member who had made it. He knew nothing of the statement of which the hon. Member complained, until that Member had read it to the House; and had the same statement been made concerning himself, it would not have ruffled him in the slightest degree. The hon. Member knew something of journalism. He had had something to do with it, and he must know that in the case of every journal the work was done by many different hands, and that to attribute this or that to any one individual was preposterous. It certainly would have been the last thing that would have occurred to him to attempt to annoy the hon. Member in such a way as he had suggested; and he rose to appease the hon. Member, who, when he was irritated, had to resort to such disagreeable courses as made him a very terrible foe. On one occasion his tender honour had been touched by something said by the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry), and he had endeavoured to intimidate him by threatening language in the Lobby of the House. On another occasion an unfortunate reporter, who had somehow wounded his susceptibilities, had been obliged to seek protection in the public Courts. He had no desire to provoke so terrible a wrath, and he begged to assure the hon. Gentleman if he had given offence he did not mean it. He certainly had not offended him in the way he had pointed out to the House. He had nothing whatever to do with the matter. He thought the accusation too absurd to obtain credence. He perfectly forgave the hon. Member, in the heat of the moment, for having used the language against himself; but he would appeal to him now that he was calm—he would appeal, if he might use the expression, from "Philip drunk to Philip sober"—to withdraw the charges he had made against him.

MR. THOMAS COLLINS said, he regretted that the Government had not introduced this Bill into the House at an earlier period of the Session, so that it might have been sent to a Select Committee of experts skilled in the law of elections. He believed that it was the general wish of hon. Members in all parts of the House that a Bill dealing with corrupt practices and limiting the expenditure at elections should be passed. There was no body of men who were so interested in the reduction of expenditure at elections as hon. Members. While that was the general feeling on both sides of the House, they should be careful not to legislate in advance of public opinion. If a series of Draconian regulations were passed against which the opinion of the community revolted, more harm than good would be done in the suppression of corrupt practices. This Bill involved few principles for discussion on a second reading, but contained many matters of detail fit to be discussed in Committee. Still, there were certain questions, rather of principle than of detail, to which he wished to refer. The payment of travelling expenses to voters was a matter which required to be discussed in the House. He did not think that any alteration in the law making the payment of such expenses illegal would affect the practice. The friends of candidates would place their carriages at the disposal of voters, and the only result would be that less expense would be occasioned to the candidate. That, however, would be a great improvement. He thought that the 3rd clause of the Bill, by which a candidate once found guilty of corrupt practices was not allowed to sit for 10 years, was very harsh. That clause was, he thought, very much in advance of public opinion. If legislation went beyond what was legitimately demanded by public opinion, the result would be that the law would be discredited, and juries would refuse to convict. In his opinion the principle of the clause was right; but the disqualification ought not to extend beyond seven years. It would be much better that the House, before going into Committee, should have a general knowledge of the scope of the Bill before they proceeded to consider it in detail. Therefore, he suggested the desirability of sending the Bill to a Committee of experts. Then, again, he strongly objected to Clause 16, as to the nomination by the candidate of an election agent. Why should a candidate be put to that expense? During his own election he had himself selected his own clerks and his own committee-rooms, and any other candidate might do the same. He hoped to see the day when every candidate would do without an agent altogether. These were, no doubt, all questions for Committee, and were details which must be dealt with before the Bill could become law. Then, as to the number of Judges, he thought one would be quite sufficient. The Judges had acted more strictly of late years, and he had hopes an Election Petition would soon be altogether unnecessary. The Bill bristled with difficulties, and, at all events, ought not to pass through the House, except concurrently with some measure dealing with the peccant boroughs. If it should be passed in its present shape he anticipated that it would ultimately either have to be repealed, or become a dead letter through juries refusing to convict, and public opinion considering that it went beyond the necessities of the case.

\ Third Night. \

MR. RYLANDS said, he was clearly of opinion that the Bill demanded on the part of the House the most serious consideration, and that, moreover, without reference to Party; and, therefore, he could not complain of the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Callan) having moved the adjournment of the debate. He thought the House was agreed on two points—first, that the present state of things was unsatisfactory, and, therefore, the Attorney General was justified in introducing this measure; and, secondly, that the Bill, however well-intentioned it might be, erred on the side of extreme stringency, and that, if passed in its present form, it would be likely to defeat its object, and give rise to new evils that possibly might be as objectionable in a public point of view as those which were deplored at the present moment. The pitfalls were so many, and the penalties so severe, that men of honour would be deterred from risking their character by becoming candidates, or becoming the agents of candidates. Indeed, one highly influential gentleman, well known in the political world, had already told him that if the Bill passed in its present form he should tell the agent in his borough that he should never stand again. That man, perhaps, was too nervous; but no one wished to expose himself to the risk of degradation in the eyes of his fellow-countrymen. If these severe regulations were carried, and if honourable men refused to stand, there would still be plenty of candidates to be found among men who had no fear of consequences. This objection applied with still greater force to the case of agents. Good men would not become agents at all at such a risk, and the result would be the introduction of a lower class of men altogether. It might be well worth while for a party to corrupt an agent, and so to get rid of a local candidate; but to do that would be to punish the victimized employer in the most cruel manner. There were, however, such people as carpet-bag politicians, who would come forward in sufficient numbers, and for whom no penalties would have any terror. Thus the Bill would infallibly lower the character both of candidates and of agents. Then, as to the proposed maximum to be spent at elections, what was easier than to evade the provisions of the Bill by subscribing money to local clubs, whose officials would work gratis, or to Joint Stock Companies, who would undertake the management of elections? The hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Lewis), for instance, might conceivably be at the head of such a combination, and would be sure to make it a great success; and they on the Liberal side of the House would certainly try to do the same. However, speaking seriously, such a course would be a dishonourable evasion of the Bill, though, as the penalties of the Bill were so severe, the offenders would most likely have the sympathy of the public. Again, he need hardly say that the different size of boroughs made it quite absurd to fix a rigid maximum scale. He desired, of course, to keep down expenditure, and would support any Bill that would have that effect; but he could not vote for particular provisions which were sure to be evaded. The cost of elections was to be cut down by all means; but how could the Attorney General prevent the expense incurred by candidates in nursing constituencies? Soon after the General Election of 1874 he heard in the course of conversation that a friend of his had lost his seat by not sufficiently nursing his constituency. At Bridport it was a matter of common belief that the constituency determined to eject its late Member for that very reason; and he was told that the present Representative of that borough was not nursing it either, and that, unless he took a very different view of his duties, the House was likely to lose his services after the next Dissolution. If a Member for a middle-sized town did not support excellent institutions, moral and religious, or refused to subscribe to cricket and other clubs, he would certainly lose his seat. What he would urge upon the Government was to have larger constituencies, in order to check this strain upon the pockets of candidates; and if they had larger constituencies, and a re-distribution of seats, it would strike a fatal blow at bribery and corruption. He believed the spread of education would also do something, and that it would be of the greatest possible advantage to require from a Member that the return he should make of his expenses was an absolutely true statement. He was in favour of election inquiries being carried on by two Judges. To go back to one Judge would be a retrograde step. He should vote for the second reading of the Bill, because he was willing to aid the Government in checking expenditure. At the same time, he was glad to hear that the Attorney General was willing to listen to suggestions as to its amendment, in certain respects, in Committee.

MR. ONSLOW said, he cordially agreed with most of the remarks which had been made by his hon. Friend who had just spoken. A speech more damaging to the Bill had not been made by any hon. Member. He was glad that the House generally was agreed that some Bill should be passed to meet the great evil of corruption, for anything more scandalous than the recent disclosures could not be conceived. His hon. Friend the Member for Burnley thought that the remedy was to be found by enlarging the constituencies. He doubted that very much. He believed that County Members spent infinitely more pro rata than those who represented boroughs, and that if the country was parcelled out into large constituencies, a greater amount would be expended in nursing them—he did not say corruptly—than was done at present. Moreover, if constituencies were enlarged, the same class of voters would still be liable to corruption, as no one would dream of disfranchising the voters, even though a particular borough might become absorbed in some general scheme. There was no foundation for the charge of obstructing the Bill. Since he had obtained a seat in the House, there was no measure introduced which deserved more careful consideration. That the Prime Minister should throw down such a Bill on the Table was no reason why they should accept it without discussion. As it was a measure which touched everyone who in future should try to represent a constituency, it was imperative on Members to indicate on the second reading their reasons for objecting to certain of its provisions. The feeling was almost universal that something must be done. The minds of all men had been startled by the disclosures which had been made with regard to certain boroughs. Every right-minded man must come to the conclusion that the Government of the day would not be doing its duty if it did not try to remedy the evils then brought to light; and, he believed, both political Parties were anxious that something should be done to wipe out this great blot upon our electoral system. One great good in the Bill was that it would make candidates look after their agents. He believed that a great deal of corruption had been owing to the candidate not making better inquiries as to what his agent was doing, and also many candidates were often careless about their own personal expenses during the election. Therefore, any Bill which threw a greater onus on the candidate would be useful. But Clause 4, if passed in its present shape, was so stringent that it could never be carried out. Who was an agent? Not merely the particular person employed for the purpose, but any committee-man. At the time of a General Election, not only gentlemen well known in the borough, but working men wished to be put on the committee. They thought it an honour; and was an honourable man determined to carry on the election purely to lose his seat and to have his character blasted for life by the foolish act of one of these persons? They might have one of these committee-men turn traitor, and for £500, or even for £5 or £10, do something which would ruin the reputation of a candidate for ever. He did not believe that corrupt practices took place so much in public-houses as in other places. By the 8th clause of this Bill, candidates were prohibited from holding committee meetings in these houses. If this Bill passed as it now stood, it would be illegal for anyone to hold a committee meeting in Westminster Palace Hotel, or at any Provincial hotel of local reputation; but it would be almost impossible to get any other meeting place in many localities. Why deal with the publicans in a way different from that in which they dealt with any other portion of the community? If they were to allow no more committee meetings in public-houses, why should they permit them to be held in eating-houses. It was well known that beer was not the only article of corruption. He knew that chops, beef-steaks, and groceries of all kinds had been used to corrupt people and get their votes. It was very hard upon the publican, in places where there was no other house to meet in, to make it illegal for committees to be held in his house. He could not understand the principle on which the personal expenses of a candidate were limited to £20. In 1874 the elections in boroughs were over in some places in a week or 10 days. In 1880 the borough elections were not over for nearly a month. But under this Bill the personal expenses of a candidate would be limited to £20, no matter for how long the contest lasted. It was quite evident that such a rule as this would be evaded; in fact, it would be utterly absurd. He also objected to the proposal that the documents should be kept open for inspection for 12 months after the election. That, he believed, would only tend to heartburnings and local ill-feeling; but, irrespective of bribery and treating by voters of a particular locality, there was abundant proof, from the evidence taken before the Commissioners, that the worst cases of corruption were in those localities to which strangers were sent to what was called "assist" at elections, and most of those emissaries were sent by the so-called Birmingham League; and he regretted to observe that there was no provision for putting an end to organizations of that character. If the Conservative Party employed such an agency as that, he should feel and speak just as strongly against it. He thought it was a grossly immoral Association. It had been used—or, at all events, gentlemen connected with that Association had been sent down—purely for the purpose of corrupting boroughs in different localities. ["Oh!"] Hon. Gentlemen said "Oh!" but he asked them if they had read the Evidence in the Oxford Election Petition, or the Evesham Petition? He said there was nothing in this Bill which would stop that Caucus system, either on the one side or the other; and if they did not put some clause in the Bill to prevent outsiders going down to corrupt constituencies he could only say this—that if it were done on the one side they were sure to have a retaliatory measure on the other. God forbid that the Conservative Party should ever follow the lead of the Birmingham Caucus; but he believed if the policy of that Caucus was not stopped most effectually, there would be a counter-agitation got up upon the Conservative side, which he should be very sorry to see. They did not think it wrong in Birmingham on the day of the election, or during the election, to provide those whom they considered their workers with refreshments. He thought that was one of the dodges, if he might so call it, of the Birmingham Caucus. If the Conservatives did that, notice would soon be taken of it. He hoped the Attorney General would see his way to put a stop to the corrupt practices of this Birmingham Association. It was said that if some such Bill as this were passed they would have more working men in Parliament. It was impossible that working-men candidates could spend much money. But the money was spent. These gentlemen had large subscriptions made for them. They did not know how that money went. There could be no doubt that a great deal of their subscriptions were spent in an improper manner; and how was it possible for a working man, without any knowledge how his election had been financially conducted, to sign the form of declaration in the Schedule to this Bill? He contended that candidates should be surrounded by conditions which would exonerate them from such enormous penalties as this Bill put upon them. He hoped the Attorney General would see the way to make a practical provision of his Bill, that two Judges should be necessary for the trial of Election Petitions, and that they should never again hear of Election Petitions being tried by only one Judge. There was a great deal of good in the Bill, but there was also an enormous amount of harm. He trusted when it came into Committee, the House would give its best attention to a subject which had created a great deal of feeling in the country; and he hoped that the Bill would be dealt with altogether apart from the feelings of Party.

[Third Night.]

MR. MORGAN LLOYD said, substantially, he approved of the Bill, though he did not think it went far enough in some respects. It did not embody principles that ought to be embodied in a Bill of that kind. It contained numerous provisions against bribery and treating, and what were called illegal practices; but with regard to undue influence, it scarcely contained any provision at all. Undue influence was almost as dangerous as bribery and treating. The Ballot Act was passed with the view of preventing not only bribery and treating, but undue influence also. So far as voting was concerned, it provided a perfect remedy for the voter, because it prevented anyone from knowing for whom he had voted. But it contained no provision against an evil, which, since it was passed, had been felt very much in small constituencies, and probably in many large constituencies of this country; he referred to the practice of canvassing from house to house, a practice which seemed to be contrary to the principle of the Ballot Act. An elector had a right to give his vote, without being subjected to visits from candidates, or his employer and paid agents of the candidate to himself or to his wife, or any other person who might have influence over him, for the purpose of getting a promise that his vote would be given for a particular candidate. This practice had led to an enormous amount of untruthfulness and lying and false promises over the country. Hence they found that each candidate had promises of more than the majority of voters. The Bill would make paid canvassing illegal; but on the ground of public morality it was absolutely necessary it should go further, and make it illegal for a candidate to ask for votes. If that were done we should have an assurance that the principle of the Ballot Act would be carried out. It seemed to him that the true principle of representation was that a constituency should be enlightened, that every elector should be aware of what the question before the country was at the time, that he should know something of the merits of the different candidates, and, that being attained, he should then be at liberty to make his choice. That was not to be done by canvassing, by holding committee meetings, or by men going about amongst the electors; but it was to be done by public meetings, by the public Press, and the issue of circulars. The abolition of canvassing would also lead to the reduction of the number of agents. It would thus also prevent the practice of men coming forward and professing to act as a candidate's agents who were really emissaries from the enemy's camp. The unpaid agents of the great central associations would be deprived of their influence when none but the regularly engaged and paid agent was recognized. In that way none but the legitimate methods of influencing the electors by public meetings and printed circulars would be resorted to, and the choice of the constituency would be a fair and rational choice.

[Third Night.]

MR. EDWARD SHEIL said, that while he could not join in the great praise which had been bestowed upon the Bill, he was unable to join in the indiscriminate abuse which had been cast upon it by its opponents. It seemed to him that the Bill contained a great deal of good and a great deal of bad. Clause 4 was objected to because of its stringency; but if they wanted to put an end to corruption it could only be done by stringent and Draconic laws. It would be found that if principals were rendered liable for the acts of their agents and punished for those acts, they would inquire with much greater minuteness into their expenses than had hitherto been the practice with elected Members. So far as Ireland was concerned, he thought the portion of this Bill relating to corrupt practices was really immaterial. Since the General Election in 1880 corrupt practices had not been proved in a single instance in Ireland; and, therefore, that portion of the Bill concerned English Members only. But other portions of the Bill concerned Ireland very closely. The portion of the Bill which referred to election expenses would, he had no doubt, be received very cordially throughout Ireland, because it tended to diminish the expenses of elections. Any Bill having that object in view would be received with pleasure in Ireland, because it was a notorious fact that at present many able and eloquent young Irishmen were prevented from entering Parliament and furthering the cause of their country because of the great expense of an election. But he wished that the maximum scale of the expenses of Returning Officers could be made a sliding scale. The scale provided might be suitable for England, but it was too high for Ireland, where the constituencies were much smaller; one of the boroughs only had 306 electors. Unless that scale were altered, that portion of the Bill would meet with strenuous opposition in Ireland. There would also be a strong objection entertained in his country to the trial of Election Petitions by one Judge only. After the General Election in 1874 there was a feeling of discontent throughout the country and in the House on the subject of the trial of Election Petitions. In 1875 a Committee was appointed to inquire into the question, and among the witnesses examined were Lords Justices Bramwell, Keating, and Hawkins, and Sergeant Ballantine, all of whom gave evidence in favour of trial by more than one Judge. From Ireland Chief Justice Morris gave strong evidence in favour of more than one Judge, and the Irish Members of the Committee were unanimously of the same opinion. The right hon. and learned Gentleman who was then Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Gibson) felt so strongly on the subject that he actually drafted a Report in favour of three Judges, but finally did not press it before the Committee. The present Bill provided only for one Judge. He confessed that if he were an English Member he should as soon have his case tried before one Judge as before two; but in Ireland he should have a very strong objection to one Judge, because appointments to the Bench in that country were very different from those in England. In Ireland they were simply political appointments, and Parliament was regarded as an indispensable stepping-stone to promotion. It was impossible that Judges so appointed should be free from Party bias and from Party feelings. Indeed, it was a notorious fact that some Judges in Ireland had proved themselves to be very strong partizans. Therefore the safeguard with respect to Election Petitions in Ireland would be the appointment of more than one Judge to try them; and in Committee, if it should be suggested, as he hoped it would, that three Judges should be appointed, he would strongly support the proposal.

MR. GREGORY said, he was opposed to that provision in the Bill which prohibited travelling expenses to persons coming very long distances for the purpose of exercising the franchise. There were a large number of gentlemen possessing property in the counties who lived considerable distances from the polling booths, who would probably not come at all if they were compelled to come at their own expense. Many of those persons were small proprietors, who would exercise their right to vote without undue influence; but under this Bill they would be obliged to travel a long distance at their own expense, which it was very unlikely they would do. He thought if facilities were to be given for this purpose to voters in boroughs by means of ballot papers the principle should be extended to counties. He might be told that if that were done it would afford an opportunity for the creating of faggot votes; but he contended that that might easily be prevented by confining the ballot paper to persons who were well known to have been on the register for some time. He trusted that some provision of this kind would be adopted, because the Bill, in its present shape, would work injustice upon a very respectable and worthy class of voters. To come to the clauses of the Bill, it appeared to him that Clauses 4 and 6 should be considered together, both imposing penalties—one for corrupt, the other for illegal practices, and the main question was the liability of a candidate for his agents. He regretted very much that the Election Judges had gone to the extent they had in the construction of agency. They had, in fact, for the purposes of elections, reversed or abrogated the old principles of English law, which required direct evidence of agency, and laid down distinctly that a principal was not liable for acts done by his agent which were illegal, or beyond the scope of his authority. Not only did the Judges hold that a candidate was liable for all the acts of his agent, whether authorized by him or not, but they held acts of the most trivial character to be evidence of agency. But the matter did not end there; for it was held that an agent might appoint sub-agents, and that a candidate was liable for their acts also, in direct contravention of the old principle—“Delegatus non potest delegare.” This being the state of the law as laid down by the Judges, any extension of the penalties of it required very careful consideration now it was proposed. It should not be forgotten that the penalty was nothing less than the disqualification of the candidate from sitting for the particular constituency for the rest of his natural life. Why, this was absolutely ostracizing and casting a stigma upon him for ever. An agent might easily involve a man in this disgrace, a penalty which, he thought, could not possibly be maintained by the promoters of the Bill. He begged now to advert to the portion of the Bill providing for the trial of election cases. Under the old system, any person accused of illegal practices at an election was entitled to have the assistance of counsel or a solicitor, for the purpose of defending him; but by the words of the Bill this protection was taken away, and, in lieu of being so heard, he was to have the opportunity of making a statement. But let them look at the danger to a man, under such circumstances, being suddenly and unexpectedly called upon to make a statement before such a tribunal. There was every probability that he might let slip some unguarded or injudicious statement rendering him liable to punishment. Under the old law, so far from being placed in such a position, he had abundant opportunity of considering how he was to frame his case, and could employ, if need be, that agency and assistance in his defence which was open to the meanest defendant in this country—namely, that of counsel, or of some thoroughly competent and properly qualified legal adviser. All this was taken away in the present Bill. He earnestly hoped that the Attorney General would be induced to give way and restore this safeguard, which existed in the old law. Again, as framed at present, the Bill permitted persons to make the most dangerous statements against others, who had no opportunity of examining or cross-examining them; and who, too, might be accused of some illegal act and placed upon their trial. Machinery was put in motion, by the 32nd clause, which he could not help thinking would have a most dangerous tendency. They should remember, too, that the tribunal to deal with all these matters was to be a solitary Judge. It was undoubtedly true that there was the option given to persons indicted for corrupt practices to elect to be tried by a jury; but that did not apply to illegal practices. Those who were deemed liable by the Public Prosecutor to be charged with illegal practices might be brought before a single Judge, without a jury, and their case summarily dealt with. It appeared to him that there was great danger in much of this as leading in the direction of the French system of interrogation. On the whole, the Bill, he thought, would have a tendency to considerably mitigate the heavy expenses of elections. So far as his experience went, the great expense of an election lay in the employment of canvassers, the conveyance of voters, and the cost of printing and advertising, matters which were all dealt with by the Bill. With respect to the general question of corruption and bribery, whether they could suppress it altogether was a very difficult subject with which to deal. It must largely depend upon local circumstances, upon the disposition of the people, and the habits of the electoral body. In his opinion, the franchise had been carried too far, and the consequence was that, in legislating on such a subject, they had to deal with a mass of people who did not at all regard it in the light in which it was intended; people to whom the political principles involved had no object or interest whatever. All they thought about was what they could get by their exercise of the franchise. Deal with the subject as they might, he did not believe that, having got into this stratification, they could effectually eradicate corruption and bribery. Candidates and agents might be rendered liable by the Bill; but the corruption of many of the lower classes was a totally different thing, and they must not forget that by such measures as were proposed they might deter and exclude gentlemen of high repute and character from undertaking to have any connection with an election. He ventured to say that no man of position and professional standing would venture to incur the risk to which he would be exposed in the conduct of an election if this Bill became law. He trusted that the Bill would be carefully considered and revised in Committee, and that the points which he had drawn attention to would be duly weighed and discussed.

MR. DAWSON said, he objected to the Bill on the point of details as affecting England, and objected to it in toto as applied to Ireland. With regard to details, he quite agreed with the last speaker that it would exclude from that House every man who had a respect for himself and his political reputation, while it would crowd the arena of politics with men of the very lowest political calibre. He was astonished that a

Bill containing such penal consequences should be brought forward by a Liberal Government. He feared very much it showed that there was amongst them a very low estimate of the political character of the country. He could not affirm from any experience of his that it was necessary to bring in such a Bill as this was. There was no definition of agency given in it; there was no limitation of agency; no one was safe in this transaction. It was quite possible, under a Bill like this, for a dinner party, or any similar assembly of honourable men, to be regarded as treating, if it was proved that some of those present, without any malice, happened to express approbation of a particular candidate. He did not exaggerate when he said that a case of the kind was possible, because the trial of the Bradford Election Petition disclosed this—that voters who agreed among themselves that the present Chief Secretary for Ireland ought to be supported said among themselves that they would go into a neighbouring public-house and discuss the matter over a glass of beer. They were all his friends. If that was done under this Bill the right hon. Gentleman would be deprived of his seat, and that House would be deprived of one of the greatest ornaments it contained. ["Oh!"] It would be deprived, at all events, of distinguished Ministers. In former Bills on this subject, the word corrupt was the governing word which leavened the whole subject, and Judges quoted that word over and over again—in fact, it was the whole gravamen of the matter. What was the reason for having the word "corruption" out of the Bill? No doubt any man guilty of corrupt practices thoroughly deserved to be punished; but if that word were omitted, the most innocent might be overtaken by punishment. Baron Dowse, in his judgment at the trial of the Louth Petition, said that a man's guilt entirely depended upon the wilful intention of the person committing the act in question—intention must be proved; and people must not be entrapped and punished for acts they did not intend. There was another point of which Members from Ireland had cause bitterly to complain—the reversion to the one Judge system. They knew what they had suffered from one Judge in Ireland at an Election Petition. It would have been impossible for the law to have been so travestied as it was in the notorious "Galway Judgment" if another Judge had been sitting with the Judge that tried the Petition. They knew that so great was the opposition to having one Judge trying Petitions that the law was changed in that respect; and Judge Harrison, in his Charge in the Louth Petition, said he was not more pleased with any feature in the case than with having associated with him a learned Colleague, who could corroborate what he said, and give him the benefit of a joint judgment. Now, however, a return to the former system was proposed; and he assured the House that, small as was the respect often paid to judicial decisions, it would be infinitely less if that decision were the work of one Judge. He could not understand such a measure coming from a Liberal Government — from a Government of progress. The Government seemed to have adopted a course of retrogression. The present Government, instead of being a Government of progress, seemed to have abandoned their natural policy, and to have gone upon a system of retrogression, which would bring them back from the path of liberty, he feared, into the paths of tyranny and oppression. As he had said, he objected to this Bill as affecting England upon the details to which he referred; but he objected to it in toto as unnecessary for Ireland. The raison d'être of this Bill was that in five or six towns in England they had done what they should not have done; but in Ireland there was no occasion whatever for such censure as the Bill would impose. Candidates in Ireland had been accused of being actuated by the basest motives in pursuing their political career, but hardly ever of bribery. He had often observed at the end of beneficial and remedial enactments the phrase "this Act shall not apply to Ireland." He looked in vain for it on the present occasion. Ireland could not spare those measures of liberty and justice which were denied to her; but she could spare the present measure, which was altogether unnecessary for the country.

Mr. Gregory

BARON DE FERRIERES said, that the chief difficulty lay in dealing with canvassers. They always were the most zealous of the persons engaged in electioneering work. And it was almost always through them that acts of bribery were committed. They went from house to house, and it was upon these visits that hints were given about the rent being in arrear, and this or that wanted, and then the bribery took place. The honorarium of the agent also did not seem to be alluded to in the Bill. If these matters were not already provided for, he thought that some Amendment should be introduced dealing with them.

SIR GABRIEL GOLDNEY said, he was reluctant to join in the chorus of disapproval which had greeted the Bill; but he could only imagine that the Attorney General had been unable, on account of his professional labours, to attend to the Bill himself, and had left it to a draftsman in consequence. He had read many Bills in his life, but he had never been so frightened by one before, because it was impossible for anyone who had any respect for freedom of action to concur in its provisions. The penalty of anyone who, under its 1st clause, was found guilty of unduly influencing a voter, was exclusion from the representation of the borough for ever, from Parliament for 10 years, and a fine of £500. The Bill seemed to be drawn with the idea that every candidate and every election agent was to be looked upon as a criminal, or as a man who was purposely endeavouring to counteract the law, and to do something that was to be regarded as an offence. The Bill said that no person should be engaged to act as an agent, a clerk, a messenger, or to render service in any capacity whatever, except one, for which payment was authorized by the Schedule, and that the person engaging or employing him should be guilty of an illegal practice. It was almost impossible that any man having the least self-respect, or holding any position in the Legal Profession, would accept the post of election agent if that Bill, or any Bill like it, became law, so as to subject himself to the penalties to which it made him liable. If such a man accepted the appointment of agent for a sum, say, of about £100, he would run the most serious risks. For example, if he failed, through no wilfulness or corrupt intent, but from the ignorance or negligence, perhaps, of a clerk to render an account within a specified period, he became by the Bill guilty of an illegal practice, and an illegal practice was turned by another section into a corrupt practice, which would render him liable to two years' imprisonment, with or without hard labour, and a penalty of £500.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) explained that, in the case supposed by the hon. Member, the person would not be liable to the penalties that attached to a corrupt practice, but only to those attached to an illegal practice, which were much lighter.

SIR GABRIEL GOLDNEY said, that, if that was really so intended, it ought to be made clearer in the Bill when they got into Committee. As the measure was drawn at present, he repeated that it would be extremely difficult to get any man of position to act as election agent—a result that would be exceedingly unfortunate, not only for candidates, but for the general community. But that evil might possibly be averted if material alterations were made in the Bill before it became law.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE said, he would support the Bill; but he objected to the clause reducing the Election Petition Judges to one, and hoped the Bill would be altered in that respect.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, that no one who had read that Bill carefully could fail to see that it was as important a measure as could be brought forward in the interests of that House and of the constituencies. The hon. and learned Attorney General had had a very difficult task to perform, because if they could judge by the position taken up on that question by the country, the public mind was not ripe at present for a measure as strong as this one. [A laugh.] An hon. Member below the Gangway laughed at that statement; but if the hon. Member had read the papers, and had seen the comments that were made on the imprisonment of certain gentlemen for acts of bribery and corruption, he would have perceived that the country sympathized to a certain extent with them in regard to the punishment which was inflicted on them. That was also shown by the Petitions which had been sent in on their behalf, and by the recommendations which had been made for mercy towards them. If these men had been treated with more leniency a stronger case might more easily have been made out in favour of a strong measure like that proposed. He was one who felt, and strongly felt, that something ought to be done to stop bribery and corruption,

Sir Gabriel Goldney

but it must be done quietly, tentatively, and carefully, so that penalties might not be inflicted upon men who might not deserve them. No one would venture to get up and say that the Attorney General had not done his best with regard to the prevention of crime in connection with elections, and in introducing his Bill he had said that it was open to amendment—and, as he (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) understood, to serious amendment—in some of its provisions. That showed that the hon. and learned Gentleman felt that the Bill was a very stringent one, and knew that the Bill would be open to mitigation of the penalties it was purposed to inflict upon those who might infringe the law. When proper Amendments were proposed in Committee, with a view to the mitigation of the stringent penalties contained in this Bill, he was sure the hon. and learned Gentleman would be the first to consider them fairly, and, if necessary, adopt them, so that the penalties might be mitigated. He hoped the Bill would go to a second reading, when they would doubtless hear from his hon. and learned Friend, or from the learned Solicitor General, that some modifications would be introduced into the Bill. He had looked most carefully over the Bill; but he could not see one word that would prevent men being sent down to disturb and debauch a constituency, a thing which hon. Members knew was done in the last Election. That was a question which he hoped would be considered before the Bill went to a second reading. Then there was a matter which had already been dealt with by the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Lewis)—special expenditure. For instance, if persons were sent down to disturb and debauch a constituency, a candidate who spent large sums of money in resisting them might, under this Bill, be found guilty of corrupt practices. If the penalties in this Bill were to remain it would be exceedingly difficult to get a proper candidate to stand for a constituency. There should be some guarantee that the candidate who sinned unwittingly should find relief under the Bill. Another point was with respect to the prohibition against using public-houses as committee-rooms. This might be right in boroughs, but if enforced in counties there would be the greatest difficulty in finding committee-rooms at all. On the general question of corrupt practices, he had to observe that there had been more corruption under the Ballot than before. Men took money from one side and voted for the other, or perhaps took money from both sides. That, he thought, was most un-English. As to the question of one Judge, he could not conceive why this was inserted in the Bill, except that the Attorney General feared there would be so many cases under this Bill that there would not be sufficient Judges to try them. If that was the case an appeal ought to be given. If there was an appeal from the Election Judge to the Supreme Court of Judicature public opinion would be satisfied, and he believed there would be less difficulty in passing the Bill.

MR. GORST said, he desired to address to the House some observations upon the principle of the Bill. Though the Bill had met with a cordial reception, there had been a good deal of criticism, in the midst of which the principle of the Bill had been lost sight of. The principle was a novel one, for it was that corrupt practices were to be stopped by limiting the expenditure of candidates. He was not sanguine of the ultimate success of any Bill to put down corrupt practices. Experience tended to show that it would be very efficient at first, but that eventually people would find their way round it, and it would thus become inoperative. He thought it probable that, at least, for some time to come, the method of attempting to suppress corruption by putting a compulsory limit upon the expenditure of the candidates would be very effective. Much had been said upon the subject of necessary expenditure at elections; but it was a mere matter of detail. If the Attorney General's scale was not sufficiently liberal, that was a matter that could be altered when the Bill went into Committee. But the ideas that many people had as to what was necessary expenditure were simply extravagant. All that was really required was that the constituencies should have the means of amply being informed, or informing themselves, of the character, qualifications, and political views of the candidates. That was really all that was necessary to enable the constituents to exercise the franchise. Many items that usually came under the head of election expenses were not wanted at all. Take the case of the posters. What could be more ridiculous than posters announcing, for instance, "Rogers for East Somerset," when everyone knew already that Rogers was standing for East Somerset? It no doubt put a great deal of money into circulation; but it was not necessary to the conduct of the election. Then there were the ridiculous cartoons. At Birmingham, for instance, where an election was conducted as purely as anywhere, a great deal of money was spent in the last election in ridiculous pictures of Colonel Burnaby flogging a soldier. Surely that was not necessary to enable the electors to exercise their franchise. Then, again, every elector was in the habit of receiving large numbers of cards in various colours telling him for whom he should vote and the number of his vote on the Register. Then there were the bands of music. No one could say they were necessary. Then the variety of colours used in coloured fires and in adorning the committee-rooms, the carriages of the candidates, and the vehicles for conducting electors to the poll. Then the enormous number of clerks and messengers that were engaged. In most of the boroughs of this country any candidate who refused to engage the number of rooms usually engaged, or who refused to retain the number of clerks and messengers usually employed, would have a very poor chance. If the Schedule of the Attorney General were adopted elections would be conducted with much more propriety; and every candidate would find that the expenditure allowed by the Bill was sufficient to enable him to bring his character, his antecedents, and his opinions before the electors. The Bill would be of no use whatever if the Maximum Schedule were omitted. He did not know whether it was too high or too low; but he was inclined to think it was quite high enough. He wished to point out one or two matters in which he thought that expenditure would ultimately creep in, unless some provision was made. He understood that the Attorney General was prepared to bring in a corresponding Bill with regard to municipal elections; but unless that were done this Bill would be of little use. If that were not done, the result would be that the expenditure at present lavished on Parliamentary elections would be spent at municipal elections. Another matter was with respect to the expenditure incurred for what was called organization or registration. A great deal of money was spent in organization at a time when there was no immediate prospect of an election. In process of time, if that system were not checked, the expenditure would grow to most alarming proportions. Then, some provision was required in the Bill to prevent expenditure at elections by persons outside the candidate, and not immediately connected with him. He did not wish to join in any abuse of the Caucus, for he rather admired the Caucus, and it might be that there was something like it on his own side. But the Caucus clearly ought not to be allowed to spend money at elections outside the candidates. It ought to be laid down in the Bill that any third person, or any body of persons outside each candidate in elections, who should spend money among the electors, should be liable to severe punishment. While expressing his strong approval of the principle of the Bill, and his readiness to give the Attorney General his most hearty support in carrying it through the House, he must state his opinion that provision ought to be made for the enforcement of the law. Many of our laws were excellent; but the provisions for their enforcement were generally extremely feeble. In order to induce people to obey the law, severe penalties were not required, but penalties which were certain and speedy. Instead of accumulating heavy punishment, they should make punishment more certain and speedy. It was now notorious that out of 10,000 corrupt practices committed, perhaps only one was ever punished. The reason why public opinion was agitated by the punishment inflicted upon the Macclesfield and Sandwich bribers was rather due to the belief that, though the punishment was deserved, there were thousands of people in the different boroughs of the country who deserved the punishment quite as much. There could be no doubt that the Electoral Law was violated at present in the most public and barefaced manner. Bands of music and colours, which were illegal, were freely made use of, and no effort was made to stop them. It ought to be made the duty of some public official responsible to the central authority to take means to bring to justice all infringers of the law. His own idea was that the Returning Officers were the proper persons to be intrusted with the power and the duty of prosecuting all persons offending against the Electoral Law. If that power were given to Returning Officers they would be able to bring persons whom they found to be committing offences against the Election Law immediately before a justice or a police magistrate. A small punishment inflicted at once would, he believed, have more effect in checking improper practices than the uncertain and long-delayed liability to heavier punishment. A candidate might now be aware that the opposite side were treating extensively; but he could not prevent it without losing his chance of election. If he could inform the Returning Officer, and that functionary could at once prosecute the offenders, an end would be put to a great many corrupt practices, and they would have a much better chance of securing pure elections.

[Third Night]

Mr. Gorst

MR. BULWER said, that a satisfactory incident in the discussion had been the unanimity with which hon. Members on all sides of the House had expressed their determination to put down corruption. He could not, however, help thinking that if the 600 and odd Members of the House had resolutely set their faces against corruption before they got into the House this legislation would not have been necessary. With reference to placards, he quite agreed with the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) that they were hardly necessary; but he could not concur with him in the opinion that they did no good to the Party which employed them. He might mention, for example, that when he last stood for Ipswich a strong prejudice was created against him by a disgusting placard issued by his political opponent representing him (Mr. Bulwer) as standing by to superintend the flogging of a soldier. And, in connection with this placard, ladies, said to be his opponent's friends, visited the wives of the electors, and exhorted them not to let their husbands vote for "Colonel" Bulwer, who could order the flesh to be torn off a soldier's back. He was not aware, until he heard the hon. and learned Member for Chatham, that these vile productions emanated from Birmingham. They must keep in mind that this was a strictly penal Act, with provisions so stringent that many candidates would be unwittingly caught within them. Some of the consequences of very venial offences were absurdly severe, and seemed to point to insufficient consideration and care in framing the Bill. One clause provided that all the personal expenses of a candidate beyond £20 should be paid through his agent; and he presumed that any sums for personal expenses beyond £20 would have to be deducted from the £250 which was fixed as the limit of the general expenses.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) wished to explain that there was no limit at all to a candidate's personal expenses. The object of the clause was simply to insure that his personal expenses beyond the limit of £20 should appear in the accounts.

MR. BULWER said, if that were so, he had no further criticism at present to make on the clause. There were many other clauses open to the strongest objection; but, although this was not a convenient opportunity for detailed criticism, he could not pass over the section which provided that a gentleman who lost his seat in consequence of an illegal act done by some person, of whom he knew nothing, and whom, perhaps, he might never have seen, should be disqualified from representing the constituency for 10 years; the proposal was so monstrous and so outrageous to public opinion that he trusted the House would never agree to it. Then he was averse from having these matters decided by a single Judge. He objected to single Judges on all occasions when they were to be judges of facts as well as of law. It was desirable that two minds, at least, should be addressed to the many complicated questions which arose in these cases; and he believed that any individual Judge would prefer to be associated with another, so that all the responsibility should not devolve on the shoulders of one man. While agreeing entirely in its principle, and being earnest in his desire to put down corruption, as so much depended upon the means adopted to achieve that result, he would not say whether he should vote for the Bill or not. He had not heard much said in favour of it; and if he entertained the sentiments, which the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) had expressed with such force, he should vote against the Bill.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS said, he desired to set the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Cambridgeshire (Mr. Bulwer) right on a matter of fact, relating to the placard which represented a soldier being flogged; he would be glad to learn that there was enough talent in his former constituency to produce it there, and that it was imported into Birmingham from Ipswich. The hon. and learned Gentleman was beaten, as he stated, by an importation from Birmingham; but it was not in the form of a placard. Some of the electors of Ipswich were also of an imaginative turn of mind; and their imagination misled them when the hon. and learned Gentleman told them, with innocent intentions, that he (Mr. Collings) had gone there to fight a pure election, adding that Brummagem nickel was not equal to current coin.

MR. BULWER could assure the hon. Member that he told his late constituents—and they well understood what he meant—that, in speaking of “Brummagem nickel,” he was alluding to the hon. Member's political principles.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS said, no doubt the hon. and learned Gentleman did so at a later date. But the people of Ipswich either preferred the Brummagem nickel, or they had a different standard for current coin. However, the placard did not come from Birmingham.

MR. ONSLOW: In my borough it did come from Birmingham.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS said, that might be so, for Birmingham did a large export trade, and a great many boroughs looked to Birmingham for aid, just as others looked for help to the headquarters of the Conservative Caucus in Westminster; the main difference between the two Caucuses being that it was an absolute condition with one that it should have the people at its back. [“Question!”]

MR. SPEAKER called the hon. Member to Order, and to the Question before the House.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS, in continuation, said, he desired to express his approval of the principle of the Bill, which would have the effect of stimulating legitimate political activity, and of improving political morality. This would result particularly from fixing a maximum of expenditure, because it was the idea of unlimited expenditure which led to illegitimate expenditure. During the last few years every speaker on the subject had declared that some stringent provisions were necessary; and now the application of a test to their professions would determine whether they treated the matter as one to be talked about only, or whether they were now ready to give legal effect to the opinions they had expressed.

SIR HARDINGE GIFFARD said, he believed that this was a matter on which both sides ought to speak with perfect impartiality, for the principle of the Bill, limitation of expense, was most important to both sides, and neither side could with justice reproach the other. Those who were mainly responsible for the lavish expenditure which grew into corruption had no politics whatever. Any one who, like himself and his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General, had been extensively engaged in inquiries, whether before Committees or Judges, must have come to the conclusion that in a great number of places there had grown up a class of persons whose trade and business were to extract money from candidates on both sides, and that it was the idlest pretence that they were actuated by any political motives at all. They might desire to get a candidate in as a triumph of their trade; but if he were unseated on Petition, and the Petition involved more expense, so much the better. If that did not result in a Commission, which he admitted they did not like, but only in another election, it was simply a repetition of the means by which money was obtained from candidates, one candidate being played off against another. It was often suggested that the expenditure incurred by one side ought also to be allowed on the other; and so a very considerable outlay, that was not originally contemplated, and would otherwise have been absolutely refused, was ultimately sanctioned. In this way various forms of corruption had become customary in a great number of boroughs, and there were even counties that had caught the infection. As things were, there was something like an auction of boroughs; and even if the return of a particular candidate was certain, if the contest was conducted on purely political grounds, a struggle was frequently promoted in the interest of those who most profited by it. He regarded the attempt of the Attorney General to impose a limit on election expenses as a most valuable experiment. The Maximum Schedule had, perhaps, been conceived in a somewhat too restricted spirit; but he did not understand his hon. and learned Friend to insist on the exact figures, or to be unwilling to consider the desirability of changes in Committee. If the fixing of this maximum was the principle of the Bill, he could only say he approved it, and believed that it would be a great boon both to electors and candidates throughout the country. With respect, however, to some of the other clauses of the Bill, there seemed to be a confusion between illegal and corrupt expenditure. Nothing was more distinct than the old Electoral Code, under which corruption made a candidate liable to electoral penalties, while that which was illegal subjected the offender to punishment, but did not affect his seat. As it appeared to him, the Bill did not recognize the fact that the one was a question of civil disability and the other of moral delinquency. And as for the guilty candidate himself, he thought it bad policy to visit him so heavily as to make him an object of sympathy, to say nothing of those candidates whom the Bill would punish severely in spite of their innocence. Even as the law now stood, the candidate, as his hon. and learned Friend must often have felt, was frequently the person who had the best right to complain; for a man with every desire to do right might win an election by a great majority, and be unseated in consequence of the conduct of a corrupt agent. In his opinion, the present law, as far as such a candidate was concerned, was quite sufficiently severe. The impolicy of the proposed change was manifest, seeing that an honest candidate could not possibly do more than he now did to secure purity of election. But what, then, was the object of increasing the penalties? In the 4th and following clauses of the Bill, a man who had lost his seat through the corrupt conduct of his agent might never again contest that constituency. A newly-elected Member in such an unfortunate position could not, of course, be allowed to retain his seat, for he would be enjoying the benefit of the corrupt practices of his agent; but surely it would be a sufficient penalty if his disqualification were for a certain definite period, and not, as the Bill proposed, for life. As for the machinery of the Bill, as far as it was provided in the 32nd and following clauses, it was a departure from the principle affirmed by the House, that not two Judges, as at present, but one Judge, should try Election Petitions. As no one had ever complained of the existing arrangement, the plan was all the more remarkable. Without going into each part of the case, he might say that the general feeling of those who had watched the decisions of the Election Judges was that the alteration of the law had brought about the better protection of the interests of the litigants. To have two Judges would remove one of the objections entertained by the late Chief Justice of England to the trial of Election Petitions by the Judges. A Judge might have taken a decided part in politics; and, for the sake of the Judicial Bench itself, it was most important that the trial of an Election Petition should have the benefit of two minds. He believed, however, that the Attorney General would not be indisposed to accept an Amendment on this point. There was another provision which he regarded with the greatest possible apprehension; and that was that the Judge might, upon the trial of the Petition, become a Criminal Judge, and, without the intervention of a jury, proceed to try a criminal case. Such a provision was extremely objectionable in itself, and introduced a new element into our jurisprudence. It was most important, no doubt, that electoral offences should be punished at once; and he might, in passing, give an example of the serious injury which arose from the non-execution of one part of the Electoral Law. It was enacted, under penalties, that no person employed in certain capacities for hire should vote at an election. That provision had been constantly and persistently violated. Both the Attorney General and himself had been present when man after man came up, and, with the utmost effrontery, admitted that he had voted when he was a clerk or messenger of a candidate, or something of the kind, and he did not think that in one case punishment had been inflicted. That had led to serious mischief in the administration of the Electoral Law. When such an offence was allowed to go unpunished the line between it and direct bribery became extremely indistinct; and nothing tended more to debauch the whole tone and spirit of an election than the fact that, in spite of the known condition of the law, nobody had enforced it against those who had persistently disobeyed it. There was this additional reason why the punishment should be inflicted at once, that if time was allowed to go by there was very often a general consent on the part of the constituency that a veil should be drawn over what had been done and nothing more heard about it. But then the machinery provided by the Bill seemed open to grave objection. And here he would observe that the Bill did not seem to have been very carefully drawn. There ought to be some provision for a written record of a specific charge against a person placed upon his trial. But if the Attorney General would accept the suggestion that there should be two Judges, and that it should be competent for them, if they thought it necessary, to summon a jury, and that the defendant should not have it in his power to say how he should be tried, he thought it would be a great improvement on what was now proposed. But he would submit that there was no necessity for any increase of penalties against men who had committed no moral delinquency. If that was agreed to, and if, with some alteration of the machinery by which the law was to be enforced, there was a widening of the Schedule so that the maximum of expenses should be considered, not simply with reference to population, but to local circumstances and geographical position, this Bill might become the germ of a most valuable contribution to the law, and might prevent elections from being what they had been very lately in this country—simply an opportunity for a set of persons who had no politics whatever to extract money from the pockets of the candidates on both sides.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he could not feel that the evening had been wasted, owing to the valuable speech which they had just heard, and also to the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst). And yet he could not help saying that there had been a great repetition of points which had been brought forward in the first debate, and also too much dwelling on matters which were better suited for Committee. Since the Attorney General had spoken, however, there had been one or two speeches in which larger principles had been dealt with. In the discussion on Tuesday, and in that which was now proceeding, almost all the speakers on both sides, and belonging to the three Parties, had admitted the necessity of some stringent legislation on the subject of corrupt practices at elections. It might be assumed that that was the general, if not the universal, opinion of the House. There was one exception in the speech which was delivered on Tuesday by the hon. Member for Hertford (Mr. A. J. Balfour). That hon. Member went so far as to say that bribery and treating affected only a small fraction of the voters in any constituency. That was a strange assertion to make in the face of the startling fact which had been brought out before the Election Judges, that nearly the whole of some constituencies had been bribed—for instance, at Sandwich, where two-thirds of all the electors who voted had been proved before a Commission to have been bribed. The hon. Member for Hertford and the hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Onslow) had been united in saying that what they called corruption by the Caucus—by which the hon. Member for Guildford had said he meant certain Liberal organizations—was much worse than the ordinary forms of corruption. The latter hon. Member had referred to recent proceedings at Oxford. He was amazed to hear the hon. Members speak of that subject. He would not deal with it at any length. He agreed with the right hon. Baronet the Member for Mid Kent (Sir William Hart Dyke) that there was no use in dealing with the question in a Party spirit; but he would refer the hon. Member to pages No. 10, 11, and 12 in the proceedings of the Oxford Commission, which proved an expenditure of between £3,000 and £4,000, which came from the central Conservative organization. He hoped they would hear nothing further in connection with the City of Oxford. He was somewhat astonished to hear such statements from the hon. Members for Guildford and Hertford; because the organization, which was so ably presided over by the hon. and learned Member for Chatham, had branches both at Guildford and Hertford. He would not speak further on that subject, but join heartily in the expressions of hope on the part of the hon. and learned Member for Launceston (Sir Hardinge Giffard), the right hon. Member for Mid Kent, and the late Home Secretary, that they might discuss those questions without reference to Party considerations. He thought much that had been said that evening might have been reserved for debates in Committee. The penalties were said to be too severe. No doubt seven or eight Members had spoken of the penalties as too severe, yet he would point out that the warm friends of the Bill—the debate on which had been unexpectedly prolonged—had preferred to sit still rather than lengthen the debate; and he had no doubt 16 or more Members might have spoken in an opposite sense. The hon. Members for Hertford, Mid Kent, Knaresborough, Launceston, and Burnley had dwelt chiefly on the clause disqualifying for life the candidate who had been guilty of corrupt practices. But it could not be denied that candidates, in some cases, were considered to have earned the gratitude of constituencies, which were glad to return them afterwards. That was a question for Committee; and it might possibly be considered, as had been suggested, that seven years, or two Parliaments, might be a long enough period of disqualification. But only within the last day or two he had heard a Conservative Member complain of the lavish expenditure of a candidate of his own Party in a neighbouring borough as tending to make his own expenses heavier. There was necessity for great care in that matter. The worthy Alderman the Member for the City of London, whom he saw on the Front Opposition Bench—[cheers] —well, it was a right, though not often claimed, of the Members for the City of London to sit on the Front Bench—had spoken of the expenses in the Schedule as too low for the case of large constituencies. He was himself, like other Members of the Government, a Member for a large constituency, and he thought that the expenses there allowed were too high rather than too low; and the hon. and learned Member for Chatham, in his admirable speech, for which he begged to tender the hon. and learned Gentleman his thanks, had concurred with him in that opinion. He could not but think that the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton) spoke from a county point of view rather than from any regard for large boroughs. When they went into Committee he would be prepared to consider the representations put forward by Representatives of counties as to the necessary expenses of conducting county elections. It might be possible to make some small further allowance for what borough Members might call weak county human nature. There was next the suggestion of a drumhead court martial for the immediate trial of offenders. He thought there was a great deal in it, and he hoped it would be considered in Committee. The hon. and learned Member who had just addressed the House had made a proposal for the immediate trial of offenders before a local jury. The great difficulty would be to obtain an impartial local jury. As to the question of two Judges or one Judge, that was a point on which they were open to argument and conviction. They must not overlook the strain on the judicial strength of the country. As regarded Ireland, he had always felt that the situation rendered it necessary that they should have two Judges there. Whether they should have in England two Judges or one Judge, with the right of appeal, was a matter to be discussed. The hon. Member for Knaresborough (Mr. T. Collins), regarded this Bill as one which should be sent to a Committee of experts. Why, every Member of that House was an expert—not, he was glad to say, in the subject of corrupt practices, but in election procedure. No doubt that was why this debate had been protracted to a considerable extent. The hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) had also spoken. He should not refer to him as his hon. and learned Friend, though that had been done. He had heard him referred to as the hon. and gallant Member. Well, that only showed how great was the energy and the enterprize of his hon. Friend. The speech of his hon. Friend was certainly hostile to the Bill. The point raised, however, by his hon. and learned Friend—[A laugh—] threw no light whatever on the subject. He had, he found, made the slip which he intended to avoid. He hoped that the House would now draw the discussion to an end. Many of the arguments advanced would have to be repeated in Committee. He appealed to the House to allow the Bill to be now read a second time.

[Third Night.]

MR. BIGGAR said, he thought it only fair that Irish Members should offer their opinions upon this Bill, more especially as one of the most objectionable parts of the Bill was one which specially affected Ireland. He did not himself follow in the footsteps of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Louth (Mr. Callan), as giving an undecided opposition to the Bill now before the House. He himself was thoroughly convinced that it was of the very utmost importance for all the interests of these countries that elections should, as far as possible, be pure, and that elections should be carried on at as small an expense as possible. The present system of electioneering affairs he held to be of a highly objectionable nature. He was of opinion that the Schedule of this Bill fixed the maximum rate too low for the expenses of elections. The Bill contained no provision against a very objectionable form of corruption—namely, that of pecuniary aid to working men's clubs or other similar bodies. That system of corruption, he thought, was far more reprehensible than open bribery during an election, because open bribery might be detected, as it could be watched. It had been suggested that a way to diminish bribery would be to enlarge small constituencies. He thought the least objectionable plan would be to have a large number of small constituencies, and a number of large constituencies, so that the former might be within the reach of men of moderate means, and the latter within the reach of men of large means. He was glad to see some provision made against the number of messengers employed at elections. A schoolmaster had told him that on the eve of an election all his boys disappeared. He met one of them, and was informed that the lad had been engaged as a messenger by one of the candidates at a salary of 10s. a-day. He concurred also in the remarks made by the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) with respect to house-to-house canvassing. The worst feature of that system was the employment of hired men, volunteer canvassing being, in his opinion, legitimate; but it was perfectly impossible that the elections of an extensive county could be managed by one agent. One agent could not traverse the whole space; the proper method of dealing with the question would be to make the number of messengers allowable proportionate to the size of the constituency. Nor was the proposed method of dealing with a candidate's personal expenses satisfactory. It would enable car owners, for example, to send in their bills and charge what they pleased, the only alternative left for the candidate being either to pay or dispute the bill, which would often be unpleasant. If, however, it was made penal to furnish an extortionate account, tradesmen who now attempted to extort money from candidates would hesitate risking the whole of their debt. He quite agreed with the provisions of the Bill which prevented the sale of intoxicating liquors during the hours of polling. On the whole, he thought the Bill was entitled to the support of everyone desirous of electoral purity; but many Amendments would have to be made in Committee.

[Third Night.]

MR. HEALY said, he was not altogether able to agree with his hon. Friend the Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) that the Bill was an admirable one. He had listened to the speech of the hon. Baronet the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir Charles W. Dilke) in the hope of finding some justification for the application of the measure to Ireland; but he had waited in vain, and, so far, no case had been made out why the Bill should be applied to Ireland. After the last General Election there were only four Election Petitions in reference to Irish constituencies, and in only one of them was the successful candidate unseated—namely, in the Election for Dungannon, in which the return of the present Member for Tyrone (Mr. T. A. Dickson) was declared to be void. Why, therefore, the Bill, large and comprehensive as it was, should be made to apply to Ireland, he confessed he was unable to understand. There was no one in the House who was more in favour than he was of limiting the expenses which candidates had to pay; but he was of opinion that a Bill of this kind should not precede, but should follow a Reform Bill. It was after a Reform Bill, when there would be new constituencies, that a Bill of this kind would become necessary; and it would be far better, instead of introducing a Bill of 60 clauses, like this, to substitute a short

Bill of one page and one clause, throwing the entire expense of the election upon the constituents themselves. He thought a good many of the Members of the House would desire that the cost of a General Election should be paid by the constituents. Of course, he could understand the reason why the constituents did not like to pay the legal expenses of their Representatives; but he saw no reason why, if they desired to continue to return Representatives, they should not be made to pay the legal expenses. It therefore appeared to him to be an extraordinary thing that, instead of bringing in a Bill of that character, the Government should desire to carry the House through the mazes of some 60 clauses of the Bill. Personally, he should not be touched by the Bill, because the expense of his election when he was returned only amounted to £20; and if a General Election were to occur immediately he did not think he need care about the cost. He was quite sure that it would be equally limited, and if it were much more he could not pay it; and, what was still more to the point, he would not. Upon this ground he was opposed to a Bill of this kind, because it was, in his opinion, a needless and a harmful expedient which he viewed with alarm. In regard to the question of two Judges, he was glad to find that the mind of the Government was open upon the subject. The Irish Judges were not over-worked; on the contrary, they were much under-worked and very much over-paid. At present they had nothing to do but to go all over Ireland haranguing the people in regard to their duty upon the preservation of law and order. If they had any real work to do they would give up these academic harangues, and address themselves to the business they were intended for—namely, the trying of prisoners. Therefore, he was glad to hear that there was likely to be two Judges instead of one. That would not even be a complete safeguard. The entire Judicature of Ireland, so far as the popular Party was concerned, was unsuitable to them. There was not a single Judge upon the Bench in their favour. Up to a recent period they had one learned Judge—Mr. Justice O'Brien—but he was now unfortunately no more, and there was not a single Judge whom he would trust upon an Election Petition involving heated political differences. When Mr. Justice O'Brien—who died a few months ago—was upon the Bench, he was a Judge of the old school, and he administered justice according to the abstract principles of justice; but, at the present moment, there was not a single Judge in Ireland whom, in the matter of an Election Petition, he would trust, if their political prejudices were strongly enlisted on either side. The only reason he could see in favour of two Judges was that if both of them were of opposite politics and Party partizans, the view of one would counteract that of the other. If the Liberal Ministry was in power, it was desirable that there should be a Tory Judge, and if there was a Tory Ministry in power, then there ought to be a Liberal Judge. Care should always be taken that when two Judges were appointed to try an Election Petition in Ireland they were, at least, of opposite politics. He had no trust whatever in the impartiality of Irish Judges in political matters, and the sooner the House made up its mind to understand that question the better. They were men who at an election, probably through bribery they had practised, had got a seat in the House of Commons, and they were pitchforked on to the Bench when they had served the purposes of the Government of the day. In Ireland there was nothing of the noble example occasionally set in England of appointing a Member of the Opposition to a seat on the Bench. He was obliged to admire the spirit which had induced the Prime Minister to appoint Sir John Holker—the late Member for Preston—to a Judgeship. It showed the total absence of Party feeling; and what he wanted to know was, why they could not do the same in Ireland? Unhappily, they never saw anything of the kind there; and why he approved of having two Judges appointed to try Election Petitions instead of one was, that he saw some slight additional safeguard in the matter. This was a Bill to prevent undue and corrupt influence; but it seemed an extraordinary thing that, on the eve of the second reading of a Bill to prevent corrupt practices, the Government should have created half-a-dozen Baronets for Party purposes. On Thursday they were discussing the second reading of the Bill; and on Tuesday or Wednesday he had read that a number of Members, who were only known to fame as combatants who had conducted very severe and expensive election contests, had been created Baronets. He made no imputation upon the Government, or upon the hon. Baronets themselves; he only said that the Government might have reserved the new creations until the Bill had been read a second time. He thought such a course would have been more simple, because, on an occasion of this kind, the House was apt to draw inferences; and when he came to consider the claims of these Gentlemen to the dignity conferred upon them, he felt almost inclined—using the expression applied to the Claimant—to put them in the same category as that “unfortunate nobleman.” When Gentlemen with such claims were appointed Baronets, Her Majesty’s Government must not complain if the House felt inclined to be a little inquisitive as to the services they had rendered to entitle them to the dignity. He therefore repeated that it would have been better and more simple for the Government to have reserved these high distinctions until the Corrupt Practices Bill had passed through the House. There was another matter to which he wished to refer—namely, the question of penalties. The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir Charles W. Dilke) had stated that upon that point, as well as regarded the Election Judges, there was no disposition to apply too hardly the question of penalties. In Ireland what they had to fear, so far as their constituents were concerned, was that there might be a strained interpretation by partizan Judges of what was called undue influence. He desired that there might be a clear definition of the phrase “undue influence.” For instance, a popular candidate in Ireland generally marched into a town and out of it accompanied by a band and banners. Perhaps there was a little disturbance, and a few windows got broken. He did not think that was an unusual event even in England. Occasionally a head got broken; and it would be a very hard thing indeed if, when such things occurred in the heat of an election, they were to hold the candidate liable for the injury done on the score of undue influence. What might happen if it were left to an Election Judge, or to two Election Judges, appointed under the Bill, unless a strict definition of the meaning of that phrase were supplied, was that the successful candidate might be deprived of his seat, even when the broken glass and broken heads were supplied by his opponents. The Judges would be asked to inspect the broken glass and the broken heads; they would at once cry out "undue influence," and unseat the Member. He (Mr. Healy) thought that would be a very strange interpretation of the Bill, and one which no Irish Member could consent to support without considerable criticism. He also objected to the proposal to prohibit the candidate who was alleged to be guilty of undue influence from sitting for the constituency. As the Bill stood, a candidate found guilty of a breach of any of the provisions of the Bill would be prohibited from sitting in the House of Commons for 10 years. Let him be prohibited from sitting for the constituency among whom it was established that undue influence had prevailed for 10 years; but it was far too severe a penalty to say that he could not sit for any other constituency at all. Why should anything that happened in Yorkshire prevent a man from sitting for Wexford? Why should a man, simply because he was alleged to be guilty of undue influence in one quarter of the globe, be prevented from sitting for a constituency in another? He had no objection to prohibit him sitting in the House of Commons for the same constituency; but he confessed that he was unable to see the justice of placing him under a general disability, because a few panes of glass had been broken by some boys he had never seen, and of whom he knew nothing. This was a Bill which laid down that all expenses in excess of a maximum should be illegal expenses, and an illegal practice. No doubt, the introduction of that clause, so far as England was concerned, would be hailed with satisfaction. But he would suggest that, if all expenditure in excess of the maximum was to be considered an illegal practice, the first thing that ought to be done would be to disestablish and disendow the Reform Club and the Carlton Club, which were the rings that interfered so greatly in these matters. He was told that if a man wanted to fight a constituency on the Tory side, he had only to go to the Carlton Club, where he would get a handsome cheque; and, if he desired to contest a constituency on the Liberal side, it was only necessary for him to go to the Reform Club. [A laugh.] If his allegations were unfounded, it was only his virgin innocence that induced him to make them. At all events, statements of this kind were currently made; and, therefore, instead of bringing in Section 9 of the Bill, which declared that all expenditure in excess of the maximum should be considered an illegal practice, they could bring in a clause declaring that, whereas the Carlton and Reform Clubs were reported to the House to have encouraged the dissemination of corruption hitherto, they should be in future disestablished. Then there was the question of throwing upon counties the expenses. Section 33 declared that power was to be given to the Election Court to order payment by the county or borough of the costs of the Election Petition in certain cases. His knowledge of elections was so slight that he was unable to say how the English counties or boroughs were to be made to pay the election expenses, which were to be thrown upon them by the Judge; but, so far as Ireland was concerned, he was not aware of the existence of any other machinery than the Grand Juries for providing them. Therefore, in the case of Ireland, he strongly objected to any such mode of procedure. As it was well known that the Grand Jury system in Ireland was thoroughly abnormal, he warned the Government that if they intended to make Grand Juries the means of enforcing payment of the expenses, they must look out, when they went into Committee with the Bill, for a discussion upon the Grand Jury system. The Government were themselves pledged to re-model and revise that system; nevertheless, at a time when they admitted that the machinery was inadequate or rotten, they introduced a clause in the Bill which threw heavy expenses on the counties, and empowered Grand Juries to mulct the taxpayers to meet them. He was, therefore, not prepared to consent to the Bill in its present form; and he contended that, as far as Ireland was concerned, no case had been made out for the Bill. He was with the Government in any attempt they might make to cut down election expenses; but Ireland was, so to speak, virgin soil, and Members were in that country frequently returned to Parliament free of cost. He was himself practically returned free of cost, and the expenses of his hon. Friends were exceedingly moderate. His argument was that Irish constituencies found that there was a great lack of suitable candidates to represent them in Parliament, and they were only too happy to pay the expenses of such candidates when they were found. For instance, on the opposite Benches he saw several hon. Members who would never again serve in Parliament as Representatives of their present constituencies. He referred, of course, to a class of Members who were known as nominal Home Rulers; and at a General Election it might happen that a number of candidates were required to oust these Gentlemen from their seats. In that case the constituencies would be only too willing to pay the expenses of the new candidates, in order to bring about that result. Therefore it seemed to him extraordinary that the Government should be eager to carry out their plan, seeing that the constituencies were quite willing to pay the expenses of suitable candidates. Of course, he considered the Bill only so far as Ireland was concerned. With regard to England, it was well known that the smaller English borough constituencies were notoriously corrupt. ["No!"] Hon. Gentlemen said "No!" but that was alleged; and if they were not corrupt, he would ask why the present Bill was introduced? It was impossible for him to regard the Bill as anything less than an indictment of many Members of the House; and he considered that they were called upon to plead guilty or not guilty to the indictment brought against them in this country. For his own part, he pleaded "Not Guilty;" and he objected to the introduction of a Bill which, however necessary it might be in England, was nothing but a slur upon the people of Ireland, and almost an insult upon Members representing Irish constituencies. The fact was the Irish Members had no money to throw away, and the Bill seemed to proceed on the needless and erroneous assumption that they were possessed of the wealth of Croesus. He objected that the Bill was unnecessary, and that it ought not to be brought in for Ireland. With regard to canvassing, he thought provision ought to be made in the Bill for putting down that practice. Many persons, especially in boroughs, expected that candidates would call upon them. In former days—although the custom, it seemed, had been since done away with—he believed the candidates were required to kiss the babies. However that might be, he repudiated the necessity for the Bill in relation to Ireland, which was an electorally pure country, whose people, as he had before pointed out, were simply anxious to find men who would serve them properly in Parliament.

[Third Night.]

Mr. Healy

MR. R. N. FOWLER said, he rose, in pursuance of the intimation he had given on Tuesday, to ask leave of the House to withdraw his Amendment, upon the ground that later consideration led him to believe that the question raised by it could be better dealt with when the Bill went into Committee.

Question put, and agreed to.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS asked whether the Government would be able to name any particular time when the Bill would be taken in Committee? The learned Attorney General had met the objections raised to many portions of the Bill in an extremely fair and candid spirit; and it was probable that, having listened to all that had taken place in the debate, some points might have occurred to him on which he might be inclined, on the part of the Government, to make certain alterations in Committee. If that were so, he ventured to suggest that those alterations should be put upon the Paper as soon as possible, in order to avoid similar Amendments being put down by hon. Members, and thereby shorten the discussions in Committee.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, that Notice of the Committee stage of the Bill would be given as soon as possible. He would endeavour to keep in mind the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman opposite; but he thought the more convenient course would be for hon. Members to give Notice of their Amendments, and he would then endeavour to say whether they could be accepted, either in conversation with hon. Members, or by statement in the House.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he thought it would be an advantage if the Government would put down the Schedule suggested by them.

[Third Night.]

MR. HEALY said, he hoped the Schedule would be laid upon the Table of the House next Monday.

QUESTIONS.

PARLIAMENT — ARRANGEMENT OF PUBLIC BUSINESS.

MR. R. N. FOWLER asked what Business would be taken on Monday next?

MR. CHILDERS said, on that day the debate on Procedure would be resumed.

MR. HEALY asked if the Arklow Harbour Bill would come within the "Half-past 12 o'clock" Rule?

MR. SPEAKER: The Bill, being essentially of a monetary character, it is excepted from the operation of the Standing Order relating to Opposed Business.

MR. R. N. FOWLER asked if Notice would be given of the next stage of the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, that, although it appeared to him unnecessary, Notice would be given of the Bill.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

COMMONABLE RIGHTS BILL.—[BILL 23.]

(Mr. Cheetham, Mr. Bryce, Mr. Buxton.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2 (Application of compensation money for common lands).

MR. CHEETHAM moved to insert, after sub-section (1), the following sub-sections:—

"(2.) Any land so purchased as aforesaid for use as common land shall be conveyed to and vest in trustees upon trusts for the persons interested, such trustees to be appointed, and such trusts, and the powers and duties of the trustees, and provisions for the appointment of new trustees from time to time to be declared and provided by an order under the seal of the Inclosure Commissioners, pursuant to resolutions to be passed at a special meeting of the persons interested, convened by the said Commissioners by such majorities as aforesaid, and copies of such order shall be deposited and kept in like manner as copies of an award are by 'The Inclosure Act, 1845,' directed to be deposited and kept."

"(3.) Every appointment of a new trustee or of new trustees, in pursuance of this Act, shall be subject to confirmation by the Inclosure Commissioners under their seal, and upon such confirmation the land shall vest in the remaining and the newly-appointed trustees without any conveyance."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. CHEETHAM moved to leave out sub-section (3).

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 3 agreed to.

MR. CHEETHAM moved to insert the following Clause after Clause 3:—

(Provision for cases where money paid by way of compensation has already been applied in the manner authorised by this Act.)

"In any case where money paid by way of compensation as aforesaid has, before the passing of this Act, been applied in any one or more of the ways authorised by this Act, a resolution may be passed, at any meeting of the persons interested, called by the Inclosure Commissioners in manner provided by this Act, by such majorities as aforesaid approving of such application, and such application shall, upon the allowance of such resolution by the Inclosure Commissioners under their seal, be deemed to have been lawfully made under the provisions of this Act; and the committee or other persons by whom such money has been so applied shall thereupon be discharged from all liability in respect of such money so applied. And the provisions in this Act contained with respect to the declaration of trusts, and the powers and duties of trustees, and the appointment of new trustees, from time to time, shall apply in every case in which such money has, before the passing of this Act, been laid out in the purchase of land."

Clause agreed to, and added to the Bill.

Remaining clauses agreed to.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH moved the following Clause:—

(Exception of the New Forest.)

"This Act shall not extend to the New Forest."

MR. BRYCE hoped the hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill would assent to the insertion of the clause.

MR. CHEETHAM assented.

Clause agreed to, and added to the Bill.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

JUDGMENTS (INFERIOR COURTS) BILL.—[BILL 44.]

(Mr. Monk, Mr. Norwood, Mr. Anderson, Mr. Corry, Mr. Reid, Mr. Serjeant Simon.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 25th April.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2 (Interpretation of Terms).

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) moved, in page 2, line 27, at end, to add—

"The expression 'person' shall include any party or parties to a cause in any inferior court in England, Scotland, or Ireland; the expression 'plaintiff' shall include pursuer, complainer, or any person at whose instance any action or proceeding in an inferior court is instituted, and the expression 'defendant' shall include defender, respondent, or other person against whom any such action or proceeding is directed; the expression 'action' shall mean the action or other proceeding in which any judgment was pronounced, and the expression 'summons' shall mean the summons or other initial writ in such action."

Amendment agreed to; words added.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 3 and 4 agreed to.

Clause 5 (Jurisdiction over registered judgments limited to execution).

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) moved, in page 2, line 28, after "shall," to insert "in so far as relates to execution under this Act."

Amendment agreed to; words inserted.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) moved, in page 2, line 32, to leave out "but in so far only as relates to execution under this Act."

Amendment agreed to; words left out.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 5 to 7, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 8 (Rules).

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) moved, in page 3, line 7, after "Ireland," to add—

"Provided, That the said rules and regulations shall not extend the jurisdiction of any inferior court, unless to the effect specified in section seven of this Act."

Amendment agreed to; words added.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) moved, after Clause 6, to insert the following Clauses:—

"This Act shall not apply to any judgment pronounced by any inferior court in England against any person domiciled in Scotland or Ireland, unless the cause of action shall have arisen, or the obligation to which the judgment relates ought to have been fulfilled, within the district of such inferior court, and the summons was served upon the defendant personally within the said district, nor to any judgment pronounced by any inferior court in Scotland against any person domiciled in England or Ireland, unless the cause of action shall have arisen, or the obligation to which the judgment relates ought to have been fulfilled, within the district of such inferior court, and the summons was served upon the defendant personally within the said district, nor to any judgment pronounced by any inferior court in Ireland against any person domiciled in England or Scotland, unless the cause of action shall have arisen, or the obligation to which the judgment relates ought to have been fulfilled, within the district of such inferior court, and the summons was served upon the defendant personally within the said district.

"Provided, That it shall be competent to any person against whom any judgment to which this Act does not apply, as aforesaid, is sought to be enforced by registration in the register of an inferior court in England or Ireland, to apply for and obtain from one of the superior courts of England or Ireland, a prohibition or injunction against the enforcement of such judgment, and of any execution thereupon; and that it shall be competent to any person against whom any judgment to which this Act does not apply, as aforesaid, it sought to be enforced by registration in the register of an inferior court in Scotland, to apply for and obtain from the Bill Chamber or Court of Session in Scotland, suspension or suspension and interdict of or against the enforcement of such judgment and any diligence thereon, and in any such proceeding as aforesaid the unsuccessful party may be found liable in costs."

MR. WARTON thought it would be well if the phrase "unless the cause of action shall have arisen" were to read "unless the whole cause of action, &c." He need not remind his legal Friends that there were many different opinions in the Courts as to what constituted a cause of action.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, he would assent to the insertion of the word.

Amendment to proposed Amendment agreed to.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, he supposed the hon. and learned Member would propose to introduce the same word throughout the clause?

MR. WARTON: Certainly.

Further Amendments made.

Clauses, as amended, agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

PLACES OF WORSHIP SITES BILL.

(Mr. Summers, Mr. Richard, Mr. William McArthur, Mr. Alderman Cotton.)

[BILL 97.] COMMITTEE.

[Progress 25th April.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

New Clause—

"A corporation or municipal body shall not make any such grant without the consent in writing of the Secretary of State for the Home Department, where such consent is now required by any existing Act of Parliament,"—
(Mr. Whitley.)

—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the said Clause be now read a second time."

MR. HIBBERT moved, as an Amendment, that the words "Home Secretary" should be omitted in order to insert "the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury."

Amendment to proposed new Clause agreed to.

Clause, as amended, read a second time, and added to the Bill.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Monday next.

MOTIONS.

TRAMWAYS PROVISIONAL ORDERS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. ASHLEY, Bill to confirm certain Provisional Orders made by the Board of Trade under "The Tramways Act, 1870," relating to Aldershot and Farnborough Tramways Amendment, Birkdale and Southport Tramways (Use of Mechanical Power), Bristol Tramways (Extensions), Burnley and District Tramways Extension, Leamington and Warwick Tramways, Manchester Carriage and Tramways Company, North Staffordshire Tramways, and Oldham Borough Tramways (Extensions), ordered to be brought in by Mr. ASHLEY and Mr. CHAMBERLAIN.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 141.]

PIER AND HARBOUR PROVISIONAL ORDERS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. ASHLEY, Bill to confirm certain Provisional Orders made by the Board of Trade under "The General Pier and Harbour Act, 1861," relating to Bridlington, Broadstairs, Carnlough, Holywood, Johnshaven, Kettletoft, Penmaenmawr, Plymouth, Seabrook, Southend, Stonehaven, Weymouth, and Worthing (West), ordered to be brought in by Mr. ASHLEY and Mr. CHAMBERLAIN.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 142.]

DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE BILL.

On Motion of Mr. JOHN HOLMES, Bill to amend "The Documentary Act, 1868," and other enactments relating to the evidence of documents by means of copies printed by the Government Printers, ordered to be brought in by Mr. JOHN HOLMES and Lord FREDERICK CAVENTISH.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 143.]

CIVIL IMPRISONMENT (SCOTLAND)
BILL.

Ordered, That the Select Committee on Civil Imprisonment (Scotland) Bill do consist of Seventeen Members:—The Committee was accordingly nominated of,—The Lord Advocate, Mr. BUCHANAN, Mr. RAMSAY, Mr. ANDREW GRANT, Mr. ARMITSTRAD, Mr. MACKINTOSH, Mr. WINTER, Mr. EARP, Dr. CAMERON, Mr. COCHRANE-PATRICK, Sir HERBERT MAXWELL, Colonel ALEXANDER, Mr. ORR EWING, Admiral Sir JOHN HAY, Mr. JAMES CAMPBELL, Mr. COMPTON LAWRENCE, and Mr. SYMAN:—Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Five to be the quorum.

House adjourned at One o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, 28th April, 1892.

MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEE.—First Report —Land Law (Ireland).

PUBLIC BILLS.—Royal Assent.—General Police and Improvement (Scotland) [45 Vict. c. 6]; Army (Annual) [45 Vict. c. 7]; Drainage (Ireland) Provisional Order [45 Vict. c. 8]; Metropolitan Commons Supplemental [45 Vict. c. 11].

EGYPT—ASSAB.—QUESTION.

EARL DE LA WARR said, he wished to put a Question to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, of which he had given him private Notice. He desired to know, Whether the noble Earl had any information to communicate to the House with regard to the truth of a Reuter's telegram declaring that Sir Augustus Paget, Her Majesty's Minister at Rome, had signed a protocol assenting to the fortification of Assab by the Italians?

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, there is now a very laudable competition to afford the public early information. The only inconvenience is that the information is not always of a perfectly accurate character. The report to which the noble Earl has alluded is absolutely without foundation.

EVICTIONS (IRELAND)—THE RETURN,
TO DECEMBER 31, 1881.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD MONTEAGLE OF BRANDON asked the Lord Privy Seal, Whether, in the return of evictions for the year ending 31st December 1881, the number of families and persons stated to have been re-admitted as tenants was not confined to those cases where the persons evicted were re-admitted at the time of the eviction; if so, whether a supplementary return could be furnished showing the number of those evicted during the first three quarters of the year 1881 who were re-admitted as tenants before the 31st of March 1882? He said that the Returns recently presented were ambiguous in not distinguishing the number of tenants who were reinstated at the time of the eviction and those who were reinstated before the six months had expired during which they had the right of redemption. The number of those reinstated as tenants appeared to be very small, whereas the number of those who went back as caretakers was comparatively large. He wished to know whether the Return which had been issued included those who had taken advantage of the equity of redemption they possessed and been re-admitted within six months, or whether it did not? If it did not, he desired to know whether there was any objection to a supplementary return up to the 31st of March last being issued which would include such cases?

LORD CARLINGFORD, in reply, said, he found on inquiry that the Return included all cases where the tenant had been re-admitted up to the date when the report of the eviction had been made to head-quarters in Dublin. But he believed that in point of fact the Return was confined to those cases where persons evicted had been re-admitted at the time of the eviction, and therefore he had no objection to a supplementary Return being made as the noble Lord desired.

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE said, he agreed with the noble Lord

(Lord Monteagle of Brandon) that these Returns were most ambiguous, and he took that opportunity to refer to the unfair and injurious statements with regard to evictions which appeared in the newspapers from time to time. A noble Lord, a friend of his, saw in the papers that he had evicted 60 tenants, whereas he had only evicted one, though he might have had a number of under tenants not known to the landlord, and whom he had no idea of evicting. Tenants in many cases would not pay their rents unless they were evicted, or proceedings for the purpose of eviction were commenced against them. They were, in fact, afraid to pay their rents; and yet he saw the Prime Minister expressing sympathy with those who had induced them not to do so, and the tenants were now in this condition—that they knew not what further changes would be made in the law, and unless they were very honest men they would refrain from paying their rents. He would like to see Returns made of ejectments in the City of London for the same period of time as in Ireland. Unless there were a law that tenants should not pay their rent there must be evictions, whether the property they rented belonged to landlords or to the Government. The right hon. Gentleman had said he was going to put down crime; but they had had crime constantly increasing in Ireland during the whole time the present Government had been in Office; and, with the exception of the Coercion Act, which had not succeeded in repressing crime, and a remedial measure which had also been unsuccessful, nothing further had been done, and there were no indications of what the Government were going to do. Unless, however, something more were not done in regard to the Land League crime would increase, and go on increasing, until the Government were determined to enforce law and order. No man could say what would be the result either in this country or Ireland if the present state of things continued. The country and the Press had expected that some definite declaration of policy would be made on Wednesday last; but instead of that they had only a sort of sympathizing speech with a Gentleman who had brought forward a Bill, the object of which was further spoliation of the landlord.

ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES) — THE EASTER VOLUNTEER REVIEW.

OBSERVATIONS.

VISCOUNT BURY said, he rose to call the attention of the Under Secretary of State for War to the report of a recent answer given by him in that House respecting the eligibility of Volunteer officers to brigade commands. He took that course because he thought the report of the noble Lord's answer did not accurately represent the principle on which the selections were in former years made, or, indeed, the principle on which they were made now. The matter was one so important to the Volunteer Service generally that no apology was needed for calling attention to it. His object was to obtain an authoritative declaration from the noble Lord as to the policy of the War Office in this particular. The custom for over 20 years had been that Volunteer officers in the senior ranks, who were duly qualified by proper acquaintance with their duties, should be eligible for brigade commands on field days, such as that held at Portsmouth on Easter Monday. As a matter of fact, numbers of such officers were not only eligible, but had actually held such commands. The noble Lord was reported to have said, in answer to a Question of his noble Friend (Lord Campbell) which had reference to the Portsmouth Review, that the principle of the appointments was that officers commanding regimental districts were appointed to the command of brigades with two exceptions; and that owing to the absence of Regular officers the commands had been bestowed upon two distinguished Volunteer officers—namely, Lord Bury and Lord Ranelagh. Now, he wished to ask the noble Earl the Under Secretary for War whether there had been any new decision, and whether Volunteer officers were no longer eligible for brigade commands; and whether he was not incorrectly reported on the occasion referred to? He quite admitted that, under ordinary circumstances, when a Regular officer had under him three or four Volunteer regiments which were affiliated to his command and naturally followed his brigade, he would be appointed as the brigadier; but where such was not the case he had always understood that a Volunteer officer, properly qualified, was eligible to receive the command. He hoped that, considering the importance of the subject to Volunteer officers generally, the answer of the noble Lord would be of a satisfactory nature.

LORD TRURO said, he thought he expressed the feelings of Volunteer officers generally when he said they were much indebted to the noble Viscount for asking this Question; and the noble Viscount, having held Office at the War Office, knew what the custom had been in regard to these appointments. In his opinion, the noble Lord the Under Secretary for War, in the reply he had given the other night, had shown a dexterity which highly qualified him for official life—a dexterity which most effectually concealed the intentions of the authorities in reference to this matter. The Volunteer Force was a peculiar one, and was the outcome of patriotic feeling; and the Volunteer officers who gave their time and their money freely in its support depended for their reward on being allowed to exercise the commands which their position and experience entitled them to hold on occasions like the Portsmouth Review. He did not remember that anything had ever been done by Volunteer officers which could be complained of—they had always properly discharged their duties. He had never seen such glaring mistakes—mistakes which had been censured on the field—as those which had been made by the Regular brigadier. On the last occasion at Portsmouth, he had seen no less than two brigades, commanded by Regular officers, for a period of one hour remain under an enfilading fire; and one of the most distinguished Generals in the Service had made the remark thereon, that there would not have been a man left alive, if either of the brigades had been in actual service. No Volunteer brigadier had ever committed such a gross and apparent blunder. It was neither just to the Volunteer officers nor expedient that they should be excluded from commands. In order to prevent Volunteer officers from commanding brigades on that occasion, the brigades which were under Regular officers were made to consist of no fewer than six regiments, instead of three. He did not wish to say anything discourteous of Regular officers. He was speaking simply as a member of the Volunteer Service, in which he took deep interest. He contended that it was inexpedient to pursue the course which had been followed by the War Office, and he could not understand their policy. Was it intended to displace Volunteer officers altogether, and to prevent them from holding the positions they had always held? Although he had held a high position in the Volunteer Force for 20 years, he had not commanded a brigade at Portsmouth; and he regretted that that occasion should have been taken to offer to him something in the nature of an affront.

THE EARL OF MORLEY said, he was extremely obliged to the noble and gallant Viscount opposite for giving him an opportunity of correcting any misapprehension that might have arisen with regard to the answer he had given to the noble and gallant Lord below the Gangway a few days ago. His words as repeated might have given a somewhat incorrect impression of what he had intended to convey. It was, however, quite impossible for him to pass over the speech of the noble Lord behind him (Lord Truro) in silence. The noble Lord took advantage of his position in Parliament to criticize the manoeuvres at Portsmouth, which had been conducted by Regular officers of the highest rank, he himself having been serving as an officer under them. Such conduct was subversive of all military discipline. He declined to go into a comparison between brigadiers appointed from the Regular and Auxiliary Forces, and he declined to enter upon any criticisms as to the manner in which these officers had performed their duties. On such matters this House was not in a position to pronounce an opinion; they were most properly left to His Royal Highness the Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief and to the military authorities at headquarters. But he must protest against such a speech as that just delivered by the noble Lord. He must say that the course taken by the noble Lord was singularly inopportune at a time when every attempt was being made to knit the Regular and the Auxiliary Forces more closely together. In answering a Question put to him by the noble Lord behind him a few days ago, he did not intend to convey, nor did he think that his words conveyed, the impression that Volunteer officers would in future never be selected for the command of brigades. There was no new decision come to by the War Office, and no intention to issue any order which would disqualify Volunteer officers from holding commands of brigades when opportunities occurred for them to have such commands. The general rule in force as regarded the selection of brigadiers was practically the same for the Volunteers as for the Regular Army—namely, that brigades, whether composed of Volunteers or Regular troops, should, on the occasion of important Reviews, be commanded by the colonels having charge of the regimental districts to which the troops constituting these brigades belonged. There were often occasions in which there were a greater number of brigades than colonels who were thus qualified to command them; and in those cases, as he had already remarked, there would be no disqualification of Volunteer officers who were recommended for efficiency in drill by the general officers commanding the districts in which the regiments were localized; and he felt sure that His Royal Highness Commanding-in-Chief would in the future, as in the past, be ready to give every opportunity to Volunteer officers to command brigades. He thought that this would satisfactorily answer the Question of the noble Lord.

VISCOUNT BURY said, he thought the answer of his noble Friend perfectly satisfactory; but he wished to say with regard to the remarks of the noble Lord opposite (Lord Truro) that he did not think the noble Lord was really to be considered as speaking in the name of the Volunteer Force. He had listened to those remarks with great regret, and felt sure that his criticisms on officers who were in high command on a recent occasion as well as on other occasions were such as would not have been made by many members of the Volunteer Force. He must apologize for making these remarks on the speech of his noble Friend, but he felt compelled on behalf of the Reserve Forces to do so.

LORD TRURO desired to say a word in explanation. When he made the remarks to which exception had been taken, he pointed out that he made them on the authority of a general officer of distinction, who was present on the occasion in question, and not simply as his own observation. He really did not know what there was to complain of in regard to such criticisms. The noble Earl was surprised at his taking that opportunity of bringing the matter before their Lordships. When were the Volunteers to make their grievances known? ["Order, order!"] When officers made such remarks out-of-doors they were called insubordinate—["Order, order!"]—and the only place where they could make them was in Parliament. He felt that he was entitled to give expression in the House to what he believed to be the feeling of the great body of his fellow-Volunteers. ["Order, order!"] He, as a public man, was entitled to do that, and also entitled to make their grievances known to the authorities.

LORD CHELMSFORD said, that the real question was not whether the senior commanders of Volunteer regiments were efficient as commanders of brigades, but how far their removal on parade and field days from the regiment in order to give them command of brigades would affect the rank and file of the regiment. The Volunteers did not, as a rule, come out more than once a week, and they were not accustomed to be drilled by the second in command. When, therefore, the commanding officer was removed, in order to give him a brigadier's command, the regiment was placed at a very serious disadvantage. This was felt even with Regular troops, who had more frequent opportunities of drill than the Volunteers; and a Line regiment never drilled so steadily when its commanding officer happened to be absent and the next senior took command. It would be a serious disadvantage if any rule were laid down that the senior Volunteer officers in command of Volunteer regiments should be entitled to claim as a matter of right the privilege of commanding brigades on the occasion of field days. He thought it would be far better if they were left in command of their own regiments, and that officers of the Regular Army accustomed to command brigades should be intrusted with that duty.

CLAIMS OF PEERAGE, &c.

The Earl of Milltown, the Lord Kintore, and the Lord Oxenford added to the Select Committee in the place of the Marquess of Abercorn, the Earl of Mansfield, and the Lord O'Hagan.

House adjourned at a quarter past Five o'clock, to Monday next, Eleven o'clock.

Lord Truro

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, 28th April, 1882.

MINUTES.] — PRIVATE BILL (by Order) — Second Reading—Central Metropolitan Railway, put off.
PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading—Commons Regulation Provisional Orders* [117]; Patents for Inventions (No. 2) [104].
Committee—Municipal Corporations (re-comm.)
[113], deferred.
Considered as amended—Commonable Rights*
[23].

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

CENTRAL METROPOLITAN RAILWAY BILL (by Order).

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Dodds.)

MR. W. H. SMITH: I rise to oppose the second reading of this Bill; and I do not take that course from any desire to interpose an obstacle in the way of the construction of any railway that would be of public utility in connecting the North and the South of this Metropolis, but I oppose this Bill in the interests of my constituents, because it proposes to deal with their property in a way which is not authorized by the Land Clauses Consolidation Act. By that Act, Parliament has thought fit to lay down certain regulations in regard to the taking of private property for the execution of works of this kind; and by setting aside the provisions of that Act, my constituents will be affected by this Bill, most of them belonging to the humble and industrious classes, but at present thriving men, and they will be compelled to appear before a Committee of the House of Commons, at a cost that may probably be ruinous to them, in order to protect interests which, as a general principle, Parliament has thought it right to lay down shall be protected by the State. I have also another objection to this Bill, and it is that it appears to be promoted by persons who can only desire to obtain these powers in order to sell them again. The reference to capital contained in the Bill states that—

"The capital of the Company shall be the capital of a limited Company at the time of the passing of this Act," such limited Company being a Limited Liability Company, which the Bill proposes to extinguish, and to re-adopt for the purposes of this Bill. The capital of the Limited Liability Company consists, at the present moment, of 70 shares of £10 each, and there is no security whatever that any other capital will be raised, and no evidence that capital necessary for the construction of the work, if sanctioned by Parliament, will be forthcoming. Hon. Gentlemen who are acquainted with the way in which Companies of this kind are worked, are well aware that the provisions contained in this Bill give no practical and real evidence of the bond fides of the undertaking. The promoters are persons who can have no interest in constructing the railway; but, on the contrary, their interest is only to obtain power from Parliament to construct it. Having obtained that power, they will then go to one of the Railway Companies, who will become interested, and say—"If you do not purchase these powers, or give us a contract to make this railway, we will go to somebody else, and so expose you to the danger of competition, or to a disagreeable interference with your business." Now, I think it is neither right nor fitting that Parliament should give to speculative promoters powers which can be used, and which, I venture to think, are intended to be used, in that way. In the present Bill there is no substantial Board of Directors provided, whose names would be a guarantee of the good faith of the Company, and of their bond fide intention to carry out the undertaking. If there were a substantial Company and Board of Directors, there would still be reasons for opposing the granting of powers of this description. But in this case there is nothing of the kind, and the Bill involves a very grave and serious interference with private rights—private rights that are necessary to the existence of my constituents, because, if the scheme is to be carried out as it is now proposed, it would stop up and close various important thoroughfares while the works are being constructed, such thoroughfares being essentially necessary for the traffic of the Metropolis. I, therefore, think that the House ought to hesitate before it consents to grant such powers as those which are now sought. The promoters, by a statement contained in a document which has been circulated this morning, give notice that it is their intention to abandon Railway No. 1, and also what they call a "Temporary Railway."

Message to attend the Lords Commissioners;—

The House went;—and being returned;—

Mr. SPEAKER reported the Royal Assent to several Bills.

CENTRAL METROPOLITAN RAILWAY BILL (by Order).

Question again proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Dodds.)

MR. W. H. SMITH: I was remarking, Sir, when I was interrupted, that the promoters of this measure have already informed the House that a portion of the Bill has been withdrawn; and I only wish to make one remark with regard to the portion which has been withdrawn, and that is, that it is now rendered inevitable that every yard of earth taken from the proposed tunnel which is to be constructed from Charing Cross to King's Cross should be carted through the whole of the district, to the undoubted injury of the property situated in that part of the Metropolis, and to the great inconvenience of the residents. It is asserted by the promoters that there would be very little interference with the streets. Hon. Members, however, who are acquainted with the construction of works of this character, in London, must be well aware that it is utterly impossible for the promoters, however good their intentions may be, to construct a double line of railway under the public roads without shutting up the streets and interrupting the traffic of the entire district in which their operations are carried out. In this instance the effect of such a proceeding would be absolutely disastrous to the unfortunate traders, who are most of them small traders carrying on their business in the streets which come within the line of these works. I have been speaking so far on behalf of my own constituents, and I will leave my hon. Friends who represent Finsbury to state their view of the case, so far as the interests of their constituents are concerned. I will only point out that the inhabitants of the district generally are without any remedy whatever, unless they can appear before the Committee; and, I venture to say, it is wrong to compel, at great cost, the attendance of individual traders before a Committee of the House of Commons, in order that they may defend their interests against a measure of this kind, unless it can be shown that the measure is one of absolute and paramount necessity in the interests of the public generally. I think that that cannot be shown in this case; but there is every reason to believe that this is a mere speculative measure, got up solely for private interests, in order to obtain a profit hereafter by forcing some other Railway Company to purchase the right of carrying out the works. That being the case, I trust that the House will not consent to read the Bill a second time; and I beg now to move that the Bill be read a second time on this day six months.

MR. WHITBREAD seconded the Amendment. He said that his attention had been drawn to the Bill in connection with some of the property through which it was proposed that the railway should pass. If it had been a mere interference with the rights of property he should certainly not have resisted the second reading of the Bill; but on looking into the Bill, it appeared to him that it contained several most unusual provisions which might well make the House pause before consenting to read the measure a second time. In the first place, the object of the Bill was set out, in a circular which had been issued by the promoters, as one that was to bring the Great Northern and Midland Railways into communication with the South-Eastern Railway in the centre of London; but there was not a single word in regard to these other railways in the Bill itself, nor was there any indication in the deposited plans that any arrangement was made for communicating either with the Great Northern or the Midland Railway. The Bill was, therefore, of a most misleading character; and it was hardly just to the House that language of this sort should be used, unless the Bill really proposed to carry out the arrangement indicated. The next point was also of an extraordinary nature. The Bill proposed that the Company established under it should undertake the liabilities and responsibility of a Limited Liability Company, whereas the character of the responsibility and the nature of the agreement were not specified or set out in the Bill. He did not think that Parliament would, for one moment, consent to a Company becoming responsible for any number of secret treaties which might have been entered into by a Limited Liability Company, without the nature of the agreement being fully set out in the Bill. He did not wish to waste the time of the House; but he should like to mention one or two other points in regard to the Bill which were of considerable importance. It was proposed to construct this railway under several most important thoroughfares, and the inconvenience to the public while the streets in question were blocked would be very great; but, besides that, the Bill suspended that portion of the Land Clauses Consolidation Act which provided that when a railway took part of a house for its own purposes, it should be compelled to take the whole. The House would easily understand that, by passing up the centre of the road, the promoters might think they were going to acquire the land almost for nothing, and then if they were to suspend the Land Clauses Consolidation Act, they might imagine that they would not be called upon to pay compensation for the house property they interfered with. That was a very serious point for the consideration of the House, and it was one of the reasons why he opposed the Bill. Then again, with regard to the acquisition of land, there were five separate points within the limits of deviation under the Bill in which the plans showed that it was proposed to widen certain streets; but in the Bill itself there was no provision, so far as he could see, to guarantee that that intention would be carried out. There was no provision whatever to enable the Company to carry out any proposal of the kind; and he held, therefore, that it was not expedient to sanction a quasi-promise for widening the streets, when the Bill contained no provision to compel the Company to fulfil such promise. The Bill altogether was of a most misleading character; and, although he was aware of the desirability of making communications between the Railways serving the North and the South of

Mr. W. H. Smith

London, the present Bill had in it such objectionable features that he hoped the House would refuse to read it a second time.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. W. H. Smith.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. SHERIDAN said, the Bill authorized the construction of a short and simple line, which he should have supposed would commend itself to everyone. He believed that the proposed line would be made for such a price that it would be the cheapest line that had ever been made in this country, for its length. As he had said, it was a very short and simple line, and he could not understand the opposition which was raised to it. He certainly could not understand the motives which induced the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith) to move the rejection of the Bill. The line proposed to start from King's Cross and the Midland Railway, and to go down to Charing Cross. It was not a new scheme, because the House had, on two previous occasions, sanctioned a similar proposal. The first proposal of the kind that was sanctioned was, however, so associated with the construction of new streets, that it was found impossible to carry it out, and it was, therefore, abandoned; but now the streets were arranged for differently. The Board of Works were to make the new streets, and that objection disappeared. The proposed line could be made for a very small sum of money; and the communications which it was proposed to make between other railway property would be very easy and simple. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. W. H. Smith) said that the Bill contained no promise that this communication would be effected. He (Mr. Sheridan) could only say that the evidence disclosed this fact—that subways would be made both in regard to the Midland and Great Northern Railways; and it would be for the Midland and Great Northern Railway Companies to complete the communication with this little line, if they were desirous of having communication from the North of the Metropolis to Charing Cross. The line was a little more ambitious at first than it was at the present moment. It was originally intended to carry it from St. Martin's down Parliament Street, so that hon. Members might go from the Houses of Parliament to the North of London, instead of experiencing the delay and inconvenience now occasioned by the necessity of travelling in cabs; but the Government thought that the proposal to carry the line down Parliament Street was one which they could not sanction, and that part of the scheme had consequently been abandoned. The right hon. Gentleman opposite said that persons ought not to be allowed to make these railways as a matter of speculation. He (Mr. Sheridan) had no doubt that the right hon. Gentleman and many other hon. Members of that House had embarked in railway speculations of the same kind, and why the right hon. Gentleman should condemn a proposal to make this particular line, he (Mr. Sheridan) was at a loss to conceive, especially when a proposition of the same kind had been strongly recommended by the Parliamentary Committee which sat in that House in 1861. In that year the London and North-Western Railway Company submitted a scheme for opening up a communication with Charing Cross. The House would, therefore, see that this was no new plan. That scheme was not carried out on account of the difficulties it involved in widening the streets and constructing new ones; but, in 1863, a Select Committee of the House of Commons made a special Report, stating that any future railway communication with the lines now in existence should be made by an independent Company, and should not, as the right hon. Gentleman suggested, proceed from Companies already established. Parliament had not, therefore, authorized the Midland or Great Northern Railway Company to construct a line; but it had specially recommended that the proposal should come from independent persons. He (Mr. Sheridan) thought the Report of the Committee in 1863 was a complete answer, in that respect, to the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman. The fourth recommendation of the Committee of 1863 was that a new communication should be made between these very lines, and that it should be made by an independent Company in the nature of an underground railway. Therefore, if there was anything at all in the Report of a Committee of that House, and if they were to pay any attention whatever to the recommendations of the hon. Gentlemen whom they appointed upon Committees, surely a Report of that kind was worthy of the attention of the House. The right hon. Member for Westminster said that his constituents—"the butcher, the baker, and the candlestick maker"—did not like the proposal; but he (Mr. Sheridan) should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman how many of his constituents had petitioned against the Bill? He (Mr. Sheridan) believed that none of them had done so, although there had been some Petitions praying to be heard before the Committee, which was certainly the proper tribunal to dispose of the application. Any persons who chose to oppose the Bill in Committee could be represented and defended by counsel, and would be able to call witnesses in support of their case. It was utterly impossible for the House to deal with a question of this importance in an ad captandum and hurried manner. He might add that the right hon. Gentleman had not truly and fairly stated the case, because, while none of the constituents of the right hon. Gentleman had petitioned against the Bill, there were 218 of them who had petitioned in its favour. The right hon. Gentleman had not mentioned that fact. He (Mr. Sheridan) thought the right hon. Gentleman ought, at least, to state his case impartially, and if he mentioned the points which told against the Bill, he ought also to mention those which told in its favour. The right hon. Gentleman was supposed to be acting in the interests of the public. This was a line which was submitted to the House in the public interests, and it was not confined entirely to Westminster, but extended to Marylebone and St. Pancras, and other parts of the Metropolis—which, however, supported the Bill. He thought the right hon. Gentleman ought to have told the House fairly that many persons connected with the Metropolis were in favour of the measure. He (Mr. Sheridan) was, therefore, justified in complaining of the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, on the ground that it was misleading to the House, and founded on assertions which were the reverse of truth. ["Oh, oh!"] He begged to repeat that they were the reverse of truth. [Cries of "Oh!" and "Withdraw!"]

MR. W. H. SMITH asked if it was within the Rules of Parliamentary debate to say that any statement made by an hon. Member was the reverse of truth?

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member (Mr. Sheridan) must be aware that a statement of that kind is altogether irregular.

MR. SHERIDAN said, he would withdraw the observation, and say that, at all events, the statement of the right hon. Gentleman was inaccurate, and that it was the reverse of correct. The right hon. Gentleman said that there were no Directors, whereas the Chairman of the Company (Lord Bateman) was at that moment in the Lobby assisting the promoters. The right hon. Gentleman had deliberately assured the House that there were no directors; but that the promoters of the Bill were some unknown persons without a Board at all. He repeated, that Lord Bateman, the Chairman, was in the Lobby at that moment, doing the best in his power to support the second reading of the Bill. He (Mr. Sheridan) thought he was justified, under these circumstances, in saying that the right hon. Gentleman's statement was the reverse of correct. Other statements made by the right hon. Gentleman were equally inaccurate. The right hon. Gentleman said that his constituents opposed the Bill; but he did not give the House any evidence in support of his assertion, and there was not a single Petition in opposition. On the contrary, all the Petitions went the other way. The right hon. Gentleman said, further, that the line was not wanted; whereas there was strong evidence that it was wanted. The right hon. Gentleman said that the line should be made by established Railway Companies; but Parliament had already declared that it should not be made by established Railway Companies. The question really was this—the House had determined, in its wisdom, that the questions involved in such Bills should be referred to and reported upon by a Select Committee upstairs. Did the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster mean to suggest that there should now be a departure from that principle, and that the merits of such proposals should in future be discussed in the House itself? Was it in future to be laid down that every proposal for the construction of a new railway was to be considered in the House, and disposed of after 10 minutes' discussion? Was it to be laid down that in future all questions of this nature were to be absolutely prevented from going before a Committee? If the right hon. Gentleman meant that all proposals for the construction of new railways were to be discussed in the House on the second reading, he (Mr. Sheridan) would be prepared to meet the right hon. Gentleman, and, in future, to oppose the second reading of every Bill which contained power to construct a railway. Was that the view of the right hon. Gentleman? If not, what was his view? The House had declared that a Committee was the proper tribunal for the discussion of these matters. Was it a proper tribunal or not? If it was, why interfere to prevent this Bill from being properly considered and properly discussed by a Committee? If they were not to have a Committee upon it, then the sooner it was decided that all these second readings should be opposed, the better; and he, for one, would do what the right hon. Gentleman did now—namely, oppose the second reading of every Railway Bill when it came before the House. Perhaps, in these days of economy, the right hon. Gentleman considered that the best way of economizing the time of the House was to decide these questions on the second reading. But, until such a determination was arrived at by the House, he could only urge the House to allow this Bill, as one dealing with a question of great public interest, to be considered by a Committee in the ordinary way.

Mr. Sheridan

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR: I hope the House, in coming to a decision upon the second reading of this Bill, will separate the merits of the subject-matter of the Bill from any defects in the Bill itself. The subject-matter of the Bill has been frequently before the House. It was before a Select Committee in 1861, and an Act, giving power to construct railway communication between the South and North of London, was passed in 1863-4. Therefore, it has already been determined by the House that communication between the North and South of London is a subject that well deserves its attention, and one that ought to be supported. But the question now is whether the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. W. H. Smith) has a fair right to oppose the second reading, and so prevent the Bill being sent to a Committee in the ordinary way? There are some peculiarities in the Bill which deserve attention. It is almost the invariable practice in Bills of this kind to disclose various points. In the first place, it is the practice to disclose the names of the promoters of the Bill, and their names are usually mentioned in the Bill itself. There is no such mention of them in the present Bill. It is also an invariable practice to state what is the capital which is required for carrying out the purposes of the Bill; and this is clearly of great importance, because it ought to be known to those whose interests are affected that the capital provided is sufficient for the purposes contemplated. Clause 20 of this Bill says, that the capital is to be the capital of the syndicate mentioned in the seventh section who have formed the Limited Liability Company. But that capital is not disclosed in the present Bill. It can only be inferred what it is, because the sum of £40,000 is deposited, and, therefore, in all probability, the capital is £800,000. It is not, however, stated in the Bill. These are certain peculiarities in the Bill which prevents me from commending it to the House, and I cannot advise the House, under the circumstances, to send the Bill to a Committee. If the House do not accept the Bill at this moment, that would not prevent the promoters from coming here again in a proper way on a future occasion, and submitting a Bill in the regular form required for these purposes. Personally, I do not intend to support the second reading.

MR. W. M. TORRENS wished to corroborate what the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith) had stated. The Bill proposed to carry a railway through a very important part of the Metropolis which was thickly crowded with dwelling-houses. It was quite true that his constituents had not petitioned against the second reading of the Bill, for they were content to leave their rights to be protected in conjunction with those of the general public. Everybody was agreed that it was desirable to have a subway formed from the North to the Centre of London; and if there was any personal feeling in the House upon the matter, the inconvenience felt from the want of such a means of communication would be calculated to induce the House to support any reasonable proposition for making it. But the case now before the House was this. At the time it was proposed to construct this line, in a district very much congested with population, there was a Committee sitting upstairs to inquire into the best means of dealing with the question of overcrowding; and yet it was proposed to construct this line and to stop up the traffic in very important thoroughfares, and to displace a considerable amount of the population without making any provision whatever for the persons displaced, or for the sanitary interests of the people who inhabited the districts affected. In order to reduce the cost it was actually proposed to exempt the project from the condition required by the Land Clauses Act—that when the underground story of a house was taken for the purposes of any public enterprize or improvement, compensation should be given for the whole of the tenement; which was only equitable as regarded private property, and wise as affecting the health of the community. He objected to the Bill entirely upon that ground; and the fact relied on by his hon. Friend (Mr. Sheridan), that the inhabitants of Finsbury and Westminster had not petitioned against the Bill, was one reason why the House, upon public grounds—and upon public grounds alone—should disregard personal motives and interests, and should hesitate very much before it sanctioned a speculative scheme so crude and inconsiderate as that now submitted to them.

MR. SHERIDAN wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chairman of Committees (Mr. Lyon Playfair), whether the amount required by Parliament—namely, £40,000 had not been deposited by the promoters?

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR said, he had already mentioned that a deposit to that extent had been made.

Question put, and negatived.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Second Reading put off for six months.

Mr. W. M. Torrens

QUESTIONS.

IRELAND—ABOLITION OF THE VICE REGAL OFFICE.

MR. HENEAGE gave Notice that, on an early date, he would call attention to the present system of Administrative Government in Ireland, and move—

“That, on political, as well as administrative and economical grounds, it is desirable that the Viceregal Court and its surroundings be abolished, and that the office of Secretary of State for Ireland, with a Parliamentary Under Secretary, be legally constituted in lieu thereof.”

MR. R. POWER rose on a point of Order. He had a Bill with the very same object for the 17th May, and he wished to know if the hon. Member was entitled to take this action?

MR. SPEAKER said, that it was a matter entirely for the determination of the House whether it would have before it the two Bills on the same subject. If the House thought proper, it could so determine.

MR. T. A. DICKSON said, that the hon. Member for Great Grimsby had just anticipated him by the Notice he had given. He (Mr. T. A. Dickson) had a similar Resolution ready for some weeks past on the same subject as the one the hon. Member had given Notice of, and, therefore, he would cordially support him.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—THE SUB-COMMISSIONERS—MR. HEADECH.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Mr. J. A. Headech, who has been appointed Sub-Commissioner for Antrim and Derry, is the same Mr. J. A. Headech whose Tipperary tenants have recently applied to the Land Court at Borrisokane?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that he was the same gentleman. Eleven cases were listed. In four of the instances he was owner of the lands, and in seven he was only trustee. He (Mr. W. E. Forster) wished to take that opportunity of referring the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) and others to reports that appeared in the Tipperary papers regarding the proceedings before the Sub-Commissioners. On reading them he thought the hon. Member would admit they did not bear out his recent assertion that Mr. Headech was on bad terms with his tenants, who, on the contrary, spoke highly of him, and confirmed the impression that he was a very fit person to be appointed Sub-Commissioner.

PRISONS (ENGLAND) ACT—GAOL DIETARY.

MR. R. N. FOWLER asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, in view of the verdict at a recent inquest at Chester, on a discharged prisoner, that his death had been accelerated by his dietary in gaol, the prison authorities intend to modify the lowest scale, "No. 1," of local prison dietary, at least in the cases of prisoners working at hard labour at the same time?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Sir, I have no reason to believe that the dietary was in fault. That dietary was settled by an order given by my Predecessor, and founded on a careful Report of a Select Committee. In this particular case the misfortune arose from an error and neglect on the part of the medical officer, and the matter is being made the subject of a searching and careful inquiry.

LAW AND POLICE—CRIMES OF VIOLENCE.

MR. R. N. FOWLER asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If, considering the great number of burglaries, the perpetrators of which escape arrest, and of violent assaults by gangs of roughs and armed criminals, especially in the Metropolis and its suburbs, the Government will take measures to materially increase the efficiency of the police and to enforce the Law against the carrying of arms by unauthorised persons?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Sir, I cannot accept the view taken by the hon. Member that the Metropolitan Police are insufficient for the preservation of order and the protection of life and property. We all know that crime will exist, and that the police may from time to time make errors; and that there may be deficiencies may also be admitted. I am, however, bound to say that I believe there is no great town in the world in which order is better preserved or life and property better secured than in London, with the least amount of restraint on the liberty of the subject. I am not aware that there is a failure to enforce the law against the carrying of arms by unauthorized persons. I do not, however, know that I have any power to prevent the carrying of arms, except under the Licensing Act.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—PRISONERS DETAINED UNDER THE ACT—MR. JOHN M'CARTHY AND OTHERS.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is the fact that Mr. John McNamara has applied for his release on parole from Limerick Prison for the purpose of collecting his debts without getting any reply; and, whether three other men arrested from the same district (Tulla, county Clare) and on a similar charge have been released unconditionally?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that Mr. John McNamara had already been released by order of the Executive.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been lately called to the case of Mr. John M'Carthy, of Longford County, detained until recently as a suspect in Armagh Gaol, and now removed to Kilmainham; whether Mr. M'Carthy is now in bad health, and under medical care; and, whether, under these circumstances, he will advise the release of Mr. M'Carthy from prison?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that on the 26th instant the medical officer at Kilmainham had examined Mr. John M'Carthy, and certified that although he was suffering from irregular action of the heart, his life was not in danger, nor was it likely to become so by further imprisonment.

MR. REDMOND asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he can see his way to order the rules respecting visits to suspects to be reasonably modified in the case of wives visiting their husbands; whether it is necessary for the safe custody of such prisoners that visits from their wives should take place in the ordinary visiting cell in which the prisoner and his visitor are locked in separate cages some feet apart; and, whether the time might not safely be extended beyond fifteen minutes?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I am obliged to say that it is a fact, Sir, that on several occasions persons detained under the Protection Act have taken advantage of visits to send out of the gaols what we consider improper communications to the Press and otherwise. Therefore, we have been obliged to enforce much more strictness than we otherwise would have wished. The duration of a visit will always be extended on proper representations being made to the Governor.

MR. REDMOND: The right hon. Gentleman has scarcely answered my Question, which was with reference to the visits of wives to their husbands.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I should be very sorry in any way to interfere with communications between wives and their husbands who are in prison under this Act; but we are obliged to carry out the prison rules.

MR. HEALY: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he could not put parties on their parole not to pass out anything improperly?

[No reply.]

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Mr. C. J. O'Sullivan, Poor Law Guardian of Malestreet, county Cork, was arrested on the 17th of December last, under the Coercion Act, on a charge of intimidation, and continues still in custody on suspicion of that offence; whether, in the month of August preceding his arrest, Mr. O'Sullivan was asked by the local sub-inspector of constabulary if he had paid his rent, and whether again, at 10.30 p.m. on the night of 26th November, the same official called him up out of bed and asked him the same question; whether his arrest, three weeks after the second of these visits, had any connection with the inquiries as to his rent made by the sub-inspector; whether, on the 20th of February last, Mr. O'Sullivan applied for a parole of a week or ten days to attend an arbitration between his landlord and himself as to the acreage and boundary of his farm (involving a difference of £210), whether the ground of the application was verified by a letter inclosed from the Rev.

A. O'Reordan, C.O. of Mr. O'Sullivan's parish, and whether this, and a second application, further verified and supported by the Rev. Mr. O'Reordan, were refused, although Mr. O'Reordan testified that Mr. O'Sullivan's presence was "absolutely indispensable for the settlement of his case;" whether Mr. O'Sullivan's health, which was good at the time of his arrest, had since so far declined, through prison life, and been injured by ill-treatment on the part of the prison doctor at Clonmel, that he is affected with hip disease, and cannot walk without the help of a stick; and, whether the Executive mean to keep Mr. O'Sullivan in custody any longer?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I have not heard that; but I know he was suffering from sciatica, and has been transferred from Clonmel to Kilmainham for change of air. I will make further inquiry as to the state of his health. Mr. O'Sullivan was arrested on the 17th December last on the charge of being suspected of having incited persons not to pay rent. The Sub-Inspector of Constabulary informs me he has no recollection of having ever asked Mr. O'Sullivan if he had paid his rent, the fact being notorious throughout the district that he had not paid it. It was stated that he had not paid any for three years. The visit to Mr. O'Sullivan's house on the night of the 26th November had no connection with the subject of rent, and Mr. O'Sullivan's arrest had no connection with his not having paid his rent. He had applied on the 20th of February last for a parole of a week or 10 days to attend an arbitration between his landlord and himself regarding his farm. Inquiry was made on the subject, and it was found on application to the landlord that no arbitration was taken. Subsequently an inquiry was received from a priest—Rev. A. O'Reardon—and the Sub-Inspector was directed to see the rev. gentleman on the subject, and also the landlord. The Sub-Inspector arranged to see the Rev. Mr. O'Reardon on the 29th February; but the rev. gentleman was not able to come forward to keep his appointment. The Sub-Inspector wrote arranging for an interview later on, but received no reply from the rev. gentleman.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware that Mr.

Mr. Redmond

John Kavanagh, now detained in Kilmainham Prison under the Coercion Act, has been nearly a year in custody, and that two other persons arrested in the same district, on the same day and upon the same charge, were liberated nearly seven months ago; whether any grave cause existed for this disparity of treatment; and, whether the Executive will now order the release of Mr. Kavanagh?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, the arrest in this case was made on May 11, 1881, on reasonable suspicion of shooting at with intent to murder, and he could not order Mr. Kavanagh's release at present without serious danger.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether a period of six months' detention in the case of Messrs. Gregory and Murphy, and John Byrne of Wexford, confined in Kilmainham Gaol, expired on the 22nd instant; whether Mr. O'Dempsey, who was arrested on the same charge, from the same neighbourhood, has since been released; and, whether he can advise the release of the other two prisoners?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, these cases had been considered, and he would order the release of both these persons.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Mr. Bernard McHugh, arrested under the Coercion Act fourteen months ago on suspicion of intimidating certain persons to compel to give up their farms, is still confined in Kilmainham Gaol; whether he is aware that it is alleged on the prisoner's behalf that there was no such intimidation in his neighbourhood at the time, and that his arrest is attributable to police persecution; whether Mr. McHugh is the same person who was arrested and kept in solitary confinement for a year and a half on the information of an informer named Clarke, whose evidence was discredited by the jury who acquitted McHugh; whether the fact of the first charge having been made against him has anything to do with his continued incarceration; and, if he will state how many prisoners are now confined under the Coercion Act for as long a time as Mr. McHugh?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, Mr. M'Hugh was arrested on the 10th

March. He was not in Kilmainham now, but in another prison. He was not aware of the allegation mentioned in the second paragraph of the Question; but he had certainly seen a letter of Mr. M'Hugh's, written from Kilmainham, advising in strong terms the non-payment of rent. M'Hugh was formerly arrested in connection with the murder of Mr. Young, the magistrate; but, being acquitted, that had nothing to do with his present incarceration. Two other persons also arrested on the 10th March in the same locality were still in prison, and he could not release him.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is the fact that Miss O'Connor, Miss M'Cormack, Miss Reynolds, Miss Kirk, Mrs. Moore, Father Feehan, Captain Dugmore, Mr. Abraham, and others, detained under the statute of Edward the Third, are kept in solitary confinement for twenty-two hours out of the twenty-four, and are deprived of the rights of association and other privileges allowed to suspects; and, whether he will take steps, in the case of prisoners detained in future under the law of Edward the Third, to put them on the same footing as prisoners arrested under the Coercion Act; and, if he cannot do this, whether he will order their discharge and detain them under the Coercion Act for the period of their sentences?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, the prisoners named must be dealt with according to the prison rules applying to persons who have been committed in default of finding bail. That is a matter over which the Chief Secretary has no control. ["Oh, oh!"] Parliament framed the rules, and I see no reason for altering them. I can only state in addition, that on giving bail those prisoners will all be released.

MR. HEALY: Are we to understand it is a fact that these prisoners—ladies, a priest, and Captain Dugmore—are kept 22 hours in solitary confinement out of every 24, because they refused to give bail under this obsolete Statute?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: There are certain rules to be complied with which will require to be altered by the sanction of Parliament if they are to be changed. They were adopted by this House after considerable discussion, and I cannot alter them. The gentlemen and ladies in whom the hon. Member is interested can at once obtain their release by producing bail.

MR. HEALY: I beg to give Notice that I shall move, on an early day, that in the opinion of this House it is not contemplated that 22 hours' solitary confinement should be inflicted out of every 24.

MR. O'DONNELL: I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman on this subject, If he is aware that these ladies and gentlemen who are kept in prison in default of finding bail only refuse because they considered that finding bail would be an admission of their guilt, they denying that they had committed any offence? ["Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member has not put a Question.

MR. O'DONNELL: I assure you that it was an exact Question.

[No reply.]

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—DEATH IN NAAS WORKHOUSE.

MR. W. J. CORBET asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he caused inquiry to be made relative to the death of William Rooney in Naas Workhouse, as he promised; and, if so, what was the result?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he had inquired into the matter by writing to the Local Government Board, and, from their answer, he did not consider that any blame was to be attached to the relieving officer. An Inspector of the Local Government Board had examined the case narrowly, and his and the other evidence was such as to induce the Coronor who presided at the inquest, which lasted two days, to sum up as follows:—

"I suppose you will find a verdict in accordance with the medical evidence, and that you will agree with me that no blame is to be attached to the relieving officer."

STATE OF IRELAND—COUNTY WICKLOW.

MR. W. J. CORBET asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he can state the total number of persons arrested in the county Wicklow and imprisoned under the Coercion Act; whether all the suspects belonging to the county Wicklow but two (Hely and Dowling) have been released; whether the county has been almost entirely free from crime and outrage for the last two years, and is so still; and, whether he will order the release of these men?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, there were five. Three of these have been released. Inquiry is now being made into Dowling's case. Hely's case was considered on the 18th instant, and I cannot order his release. It is true the number of crimes committed in the county has not been many; but notices have been extensively posted recommending and encouraging "Boycotting."

FRIENDLY SOCIETIES—THE QUINQUENNIAL RETURNS—REPORT OF THE REGISTRAR.

MR. W. H. JAMES asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If his attention has been called to the statement in the Report of the Registrar of Friendly Societies, in which he states, in reference to the quinquennial Returns of sickness and mortality, that,

"If the present Returns supply adequate data, the Chief Registrar is advised by the Actuary to the office that the purpose for which the quinquennial Returns of sickness and mortality were devised, viz. the collection of statistics on which to base Tables for the use of Friendly Societies, will have been, in his judgment, fulfilled; that the obligation to furnish this information has been a heavy burden on Societies, the continuance of which can only be justified by its necessity;"

and, how soon the Registrar will be able to give the information with respect to these data mentioned in his Report, and what has been the approximate public cost involved in their preparation?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: Sir, I learn that it will not be possible to say whether the data supplied by the Returns of 1880 are or are not sufficient until they have been tabulated, which work will, I believe, occupy some time. When that has been done, the Chief Registrar proposes to report to the Treasury on the subject. As regards the cost, it is estimated that the collection of the data supplied by the present Return has cost the public about £50 up to the present, paid from the Vote for the Office. I cannot say how much it has cost the Societies.

FISHERIES—TRAWLING—LEGISLATION.

MR. SYKES asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the Government propose during the present Session to introduce a Bill to regulate every kind of close in shore sea trawling, and to prevent undersized fish being exhibited for sale?

Mr. W. E. Forster

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, the Government had no idea of legislating on the subject referred to during the present Session.

POST OFFICE ANNUITIES—LEGISLATION.

MR. H. G. ALLEN asked the Postmaster General, Whether he will introduce, during the present Session, a Bill to facilitate the grant of small annuities and life policies, such as the Select Committee in their Report recommended should be passed without delay?

MR. FAWCETT: Sir, in reply to my hon. Friend, I have to state that, immediately the Report of the Committee appointed to inquire into the subject of Post Office Annuities and Insurance was laid on the Table, instructions were given to prepare a Bill embodying the recommendations of the Committee. This Bill is nearly ready, and I hope to introduce it in the course of a few days.

CENTRAL ASIA—RUSSIAN ADVANCE.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If it is true, as reported in a Bombay paper of 7th April, and copied into the "Homeward Mail" of 25th April, that a Russian force has left Samarcand, and was 50 miles on the high road to Balkh at the date of the report; and, whether the Russian Frontier is being pushed forward to Saracks, in the South of the Turkoman Country, a distance of only 150 miles from Herat?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, we have no information as to any Russian march southwards from Samarcand; but the Russian Frontier near Shahr-i-Sabz is itself some 30 or 40 miles on the road to Balkh, so that the hon. Baronet's Question is not very clear, because for 30 or 40 miles south they would be within Russian territory. As to Sarakhs, I have nothing to add to the reply which I made on the 3rd of March.

THE IRISH LAND COMMISSION—THE GALWAY SUB-COMMISSIONERS.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland,

Whether it is the fact that while Mr. Rice, a tenant farmer, was removed from his district in county Cork, where he acted as Sub-Commissioner, Mr. J. J. O'Shaughnessy, a landlord, of Ballinasloe, is acting in the district with which he is connected, in county Galway, and in the very parish where he attends service; and, whether Messrs. Reeves and O'Keefe, previously associated with Mr. Rice, who also hold land in Cork, still adjudicate in that county; and, if so, why Mr. Rice was removed to Mayo?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, the hon. Member must have put the Question under a misapprehension of the facts.

MR. CALLAN asked whether Mr. Rice was not connected with the county Roscommon?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he might be. He was not prepared to answer that.

MR. HEALY: I am much obliged to the right hon. Gentleman for his answer; but would he have any objection to state the districts in which all the Sub-Commissioners operate? We have no means of ascertaining except from the Dublin newspapers.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: The hon. Member will find them advertised in The Gazette.

MR. HEALY: No person ever sees The Gazette.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the Sub-Commissioners were changed from time to time. A Return would be laid on the Table.

EVICTIONS (IRELAND)—EVICTED LABOURERS AT RHODE, KING'S COUNTY.

MR. MOLLOY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it be true that on Monday the 24th instant at Rhode, in the King's County, the erection of huts to shelter poor labourers evicted by David Kerr was prevented by force under the orders of the resident magistrate; if it be true that these evicted labourers were thus left without any shelter, and without any means of subsistence, and under what law or by what authority the resident magistrate acted; and if he will take all necessary steps to prevent all further opposition to the erection of these huts, and against a repetition of such action; whether on the above occasion a most respectable farmer named O'Brien was taken into custody by order of the resident magistrate, and then and there sentenced to a fortnight's imprisonment with hard labour for questioning the right of the magistrate to prevent the erection of the above huts; and, if he will order his immediate release?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he had only that morning seen the report that the erection of huts to shelter poor labourers evicted in King's County had been prevented by force, by order of the Resident Magistrate. He would make inquiries, and answer the hon. Gentleman's Question in the course of a few days.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—MAJOR TRAILL, R.M.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the resident magistrate at Claremorris is the Captain, now honorary Major, Robert Gayer Traill, of the 1st Battalion, 19th Foot, whose conduct was the subject of a Court of Inquiry when that Battalion was last at Sheffield; whether the General Commanding the Brigade at Aldershot was directed by the Field Marshal Commanding in Chief to administer a rebuke to Captain Traill in the presence of his Staff and the whole of the officers of his Battalion; whether the Colonel Commanding the Battalion requested to be relieved of Captain Traill's services; and, whether it was in consequence of the special quarterly report ordered to be made on Captain Traill's conduct that that officer was informed that the Commander in Chief would not promote him to his Majority, and Captain Traill consequently retired when he was senior Captain of his regiment?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that Major Traill, whose appointment to a resident magistracy in Ireland was dated the 20th of March, 1880, was the same officer who had served in the 1st Battalion of the 19th Foot; but his conduct in the Army had never been the subject of a regimental Court of Inquiry. It was, however, the fact that Major (then Captain) Traill had been reprimanded in the presence of his brother officers, as stated in the second paragraph of the hon. Member's Question, and that his commanding officer had, in consequence, represented the desirability of his removal from the battalion. Captain Traill had not been refused promotion to his majority, the fact being that no majority was vacant at the period mentioned in the Question, and his retirement from the Army was voluntary; and he received a pension, with the honorary rank of major, on being appointed Resident Magistrate.

MR. O'DONNELL: Since these facts have come to the right hon. Gentleman's knowledge, does he intend to retain the services of this reprimanded officer?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, this officer was appointed by the late Government, and I have no doubt they had all those matters under consideration. I think the House will agree with me that when the gentleman has been some time appointed it would be an act of great harshness, if not of injustice, to re-open the matter and dismiss him.

PRIVATE HYBRID BILLS—THE FORTH BRIDGE RAILWAY BILL.

MR. ANDERSON asked the President of the Board of Trade, If it be not the fact that, in the case of the hybrid Committee on the Tay Bridge, the Board of Trade asked and got power to appear by Counsel, Agents, and Witnesses, in order that the public interest, irrespective of opposing Petitioners, might be protected; and, whether he intends to take the same step in the case of the Forth Bridge; and, if not, in what way the safety of the public, and of the navigation of vessels seeking shelter at St. Margaret's Hope, are to be watched over?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: Sir, it is a fact that, in the case of the Hybrid Committee on the Tay Bridge, the Board of Trade asked for and obtained the power of appearing by counsel, agents, and witnesses, before the Committee, in order that the public interests, irrespective of opposing Petitioners, might be protected. But in the present case of the Forth Bridge, in so far as the proposed structure of the Bridge is concerned, the Board of Trade do not think it necessary to appear before the Committee, as the inspecting officers of the Board of Trade were in frequent communication with the engineer intrusted with the construction of the Bridge, and they made certain stipulations for the safety of the public, which were at once accepted. Neither do the Board of Trade think it necessary to appear before the Committee with regard to the question of the navigation of vessels going to the anchorage above the site of the Bridge. In the spans of this Bridge, of which there are two, there will be 500 feet of 150 feet of headway, and 930 feet of 125 feet of headway at high water, and at low water 850 feet of 150 feet of headway, and 1,100 feet of 125 feet of headway. Under these circumstances, the proposal has been well considered by the nautical advisers of the Board of Trade; and they see no objection, in the interests of the public, to the Bridge as it is now designed.

Mr. Molloy

CARRIAGE ROADS (METROPOLIS).

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether his attention has been drawn to the great superiority manifested in the construction of the macadamized roadway on the Thames Embankment, which is under the management and control of the Metropolitan Board of Works, to the construction of all other macadamized streets and roads in the Metropolis; and, whether he would consider whether it would be for the public advantage, both as to construction and repairs, if all Metropolitan highways were placed under the management and control of the Metropolitan Board of Works?

MR. DODSON, in reply, said, he believed that many of the macadamized roads in the Metropolis were in a far less satisfactory condition than was desirable; but he had no means to determine, by a comparative examination of them all, which was the best. The second part of the hon. Baronet's Question involved large questions of municipal government, which could not be entertained without much consideration.

ENDOWED SCHOOLS ACTS—THE CHARITY COMMISSION.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether it is his intention to introduce a Bill for the purpose of renewing or modifying the powers now exercised by the Charity Commissioners under the Endowed Schools Act of 1869, and of subsequent Acts, which will expire at the close of the present year?

MR. MUNDELLA, in reply, said, that it would be necessary, in consequence of the expiry that year of the Endowed Schools Commission, to introduce a measure this Session, which was at this moment under the consideration of the Government.

THE LADIES' LAND LEAGUE—IMPRISONMENT OF MISS KIRK.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, a few days since, Miss Anne Kirk, of Dublin, a lady who had gone to Tulla, County Clare, for the purpose of providing shelter and food for the families of evicted tenants, was arrested by order of Mr. Clifford Lloyd, R.M. and sentenced by him to three months' imprisonment, which she is now enduring in Limerick Gaol; whether the case was heard in private; and, if so, why, and upon what charge, and upon what evidence, the lady was convicted; whether he has observed the following passages in the published Letter of the 22nd instant, from the Rev. Michael O'Donovan, C.C. of Tulla, to the Member for Sligo:—

"When the Chief Secretary visited the priests here, I asked him if it were legal for me to assist the lady (Miss Kirk), who had just arrived from Dublin for the sole purpose of erecting huts for the evicted tenants, and giving them temporary relief. Here are Mr. Forster's words: 'It is perfectly legal, and nothing could be more legal, than for man to assist man; and, so long as the lady confined herself to these duties, she should not be molested.' I then promised the Chief Secretary that I would act as a special policeman, and see that this lady did not in any way incite the people to pay no rent. I now assert that this lady did not, either directly or indirectly, interfere in anything outside what Mr. Forster had declared to be 'perfectly legal,' and that she always declined to answer any question outside the building of the huts and the distribution of a little charity. Miss Kirk is now in Limerick Gaol for acting 'legally.' . . . Intimidation and outrage in this district have ceased. By Miss Kirk and myself telling these people that, if any outrage or intimidation took place, we would immediately break off all connection with them, we brought about a condition which the vast police force, and military force too, had failed to effect;"

and, whether, in view of this testimony, he will either order the release of Miss Kirk, or direct an independent and public inquiry to be held into the cause of her detention?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, I think it is very likely that the words quoted are substantially and literally correct, and I am quite prepared to abide by them at this time. They were these—that it was not illegal for man to assist man; and then I proceeded to say, what may have been somewhat of a bull, that so long as the lady confined herself to these duties she would not be arrested. I abide by that. This lady has been bound over to good behaviour.

MR. SEXTON: No, no; not bound over—imprisoned.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: She was bound over, and on refusing to give bail was sent to prison.

MR. SEXTON: No, no; not bound over.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: That was a matter the magistrate did on his own responsibility, believing there was sufficient reason to show that she was not engaged in a work of charity, but in intimidation. ["Oh, oh!"] There has been much intimidation of that kind, and I want the House and hon. Members to understand that my position is very different with regard to action taken under the ordinary law from what it is under the Protection Act. It devolves upon the Lord Lieutenant—upon either or both of us—to decide who shall be arrested or imprisoned under the Protection Act. When action is taken by a magistrate, it is done on his own responsibility; and it would be a most serious matter to suppose that I, as representing the Executive, have power to interfere with the action of the magistrates. I may inform hon. Members that Mr. Lloyd tells me—and I have no reason to doubt him—that he has sufficient warrant for what he did; but the hon. Member (Mr. Sexton) is perfectly well aware that, at the instance of the aggrieved persons, his action can be reviewed by the Court of Queen's Bench, as the acts of other magistrates have been reviewed by superior Judges who are not members of the Executive.

STATE OF IRELAND—THE MAGISTRACY—MR. CLIFFORD LLOYD.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is true that Mr. Wilfred Lloyd, R.M. Miltown Malbay, county Clare (brother to Mr. Clifford Lloyd, R.M.) recently refused to accept bails in a case before him on the ground that the parties tendering bail had not paid their rents (said rents being more than double the Government valuation of the holdings); whether Mr. Clifford Lloyd, R.M. lately telegraphed to the constable in charge of the police station at Carregholt, county Clare, ordering him to send in the names of eight or ten of the principal tenants on the property of Major McDonnell, so that he might have them arrested if they did not pay their rents; whether the brothers Lloyd are authorized by the Executive to make the non-payment of rent a reason for refusing bail, or for arrest and imprisonment; and, if they are not so authorized, what notice will be taken of their conduct; and, whether Mr. Clifford Lloyd, or any other magistrate, is supplied with signed blank warrants under the Coercion Act, to be filled up at his pleasure?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that Mr. Clifford Lloyd informed him that, on several occasions, he had accepted bail from persons who had not paid their rent. He asked the question when he was inquiring as to their solvency; but the fact that they had not paid their rents would not of itself prevent him accepting the person's bail. As for the second paragraph of the Question, Mr. Clifford Lloyd had sent no such telegram. With regard to the third part of the Question, the Chief Secretary had no power to interfere with the judicial discretion of the magistrates. With regard to the last part of the Question, he wished to state emphatically that no more false notion could possibly prevail than the idea that magistrates were supplied with signed blank warrants under the Coercion Act. No such warrants had ever been issued, either by the Lord Lieutenant or by himself, without full examination.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MR. WILLIAM ABRAHAM.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is true that, on Monday last, Mr. William Abraham, of Limerick, Chairman of the Limerick Board of Guardians, was arrested by order of Mr. Clifford Lloyd, R.M., and sentenced by that magistrate to six months' imprisonment on a charge of having held or attended a Land League meeting at Tulla; whether the fact is that Mr. Abraham was requested by a friend of his, Mrs. Burke, a Dublin lady, who desired to ascertain the condition of the evicted tenants at Tulla, to accompany her to that place, as she did not know anyone there; whether the "meeting" charged against Mr. Abraham by Mr. Clifford Lloyd was simply a visit paid by Mrs. Burke, accompanied by Mr. Abraham, to two of the parish clergy in the sacristy of the Church; and, whether the Government will order the release of Mr. Abraham, or permit the sentence inflicted to run its course?

Mr. W. E. Forster

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, Mr. Abraham was ordered to enter into security for his good behaviour, and refused to do so. The Government would not interfere with the discretion exercised by magistrates. He had no reason to think that the facts were as stated in the second and third paragraphs of the Question. The object of the meeting was, he believed, to carry out the "no rent" organization.

MR. SEXTON asked if the right hon. Gentleman was aware that Mr. Lloyd was now holding Star Chamber Courts, sitting in private, and even refusing all applications for adjournment?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I am not aware of it. Perhaps the hon. Member will ask a definite Question in regard to a particular case.

MR. O'SHEA asked whether it was not the fact that the district of Tulla was now in a better condition than it was when Mr. Clifford Lloyd went there?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that was the case; and he believed it was mainly owing to the action of Mr. Lloyd.

MR. HEALY gave Notice that he would on Monday ask the right hon. Gentleman, whether several murders had not been committed in Mr. Lloyd's district since he had taken charge of it, while there was no murder in the corresponding period before he went there; also, whether outrages generally had not increased in that district since his appointment?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I hope the hon. Member will put that Question in detail, and I hope the House will not form any judgment in the meantime on this Question.

LAW AND POLICE—THE RIOTS AT CAMBORNE, CORNWALL.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department,

What steps he has taken, if any, with reference to the conduct of the magistrates and police during the rioting at Camborne?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, he must say, what he had often said in the House, that he was not responsible for, nor had he any authority over, the magistrates or the police. When magistrates asked his advice he gave it as well as he could. By the Constitution of this country, those who were in the Commission of the Peace had control over the police, and they were not under the orders or direction of the Executive Government. He thought that ought to be clearly understood, because he saw Questions founded on the notion that the magistrates and the police throughout the country were subordinate to, and under the direction of, the Secretary of State. That was not so. The Secretary of State was ever willing, when an occasion arose, to give them such advice as he could; but they acted upon their own responsibility, and upon their own responsibility only.

MR. O'DONNELL said, advice did not seem to have been given. ["Oh!"] He would conclude with a Motion—

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. Member for Dungarvan must be aware that he could not enter upon a debate on this matter.

MR. O'DONNELL then gave Notice that he would ask a further Question on the subject on Monday, and especially he would ask the Home Secretary, whether it had not been brought to his notice that the Irish population in Camborne were left entirely without the protection of the law through the misconduct of the magistrates and the police of that district?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he thought he could answer that at once. He did not believe, from such information as he had, that that was the case. There had been disgraceful riots, which there was considerable difficulty in quelling; but the information he had was that the magistrates and police had made every effort to put down these riots; that at present they had succeeded, and that the population of all nationalities was now protected.

MR. O'DONNELL said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman had not sufficiently answered the Question, and he would repeat it on Monday.

LANDLORD AND TENANT (SCOTLAND)
—EVICTIONS IN THE ISLAND OF SKYE.

MR. MACFARLANE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If his attention has been called to the state of feeling existing amongst the Crofters in the Island of Skye; and, if he proposes to ascertain, by the appointment of a Commission, or by any other means, the condition and grievances of the Crofters in that Island, the other Western Islands, and the Orkney and Shetland groups?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, this is a Question of a serious nature, and I do not feel that I could answer it advantageously in the form of a reply to a Question. I think that a Notice has been given upon the subject, in which it will be raised in more convenient form; and the Government will, before that Notice comes on, carefully consider the whole matter, and give Parliament the view we take.

MR. MACFARLANE asked whether there was a Notice on the Paper on the subject?

MR. GLADSTONE: Yes.

Subsequently—

MR. DICK-PEDDIE asked the Prime Minister, Whether, considering the importance of the question, and the state of matters in Skye, and considering the very great difficulty which private Members had for bringing matters under debate, the Government would afford any facilities for bringing on that question?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, if it were in my power to add to the manufactures of this country, I would, in the first place, add the manufacture of time. Unfortunately, it is not in my power. While I fully admit, and much regret, the difficulty of private Members, yet I do not think any impartial man will say the difficulties of the Government are less with respect to time than those of private Members. I heartily wish I could give any such assistance; but it is not in my power.

MR. MACFARLANE said, with reference to the Prime Minister's answer, that the Motion on the subject which stood on the Paper had no day fixed for its discussion. As the Government professed to attach so much importance to the question, might he ask if it were necessary for them to wait until the question had been discussed in the House before taking steps to deal with it?

MR. GLADSTONE: I am not prepared to enter upon the question at the present moment.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE FINANCIAL STATEMENT—THE CARRIAGE DUTIES.

SIR BALDWIN LEIGHTON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he can give some particulars as to Establishment Charges for Post Office Department stated in Budget speech at £200,000, and whether that is for new works and buildings, or for repairs and maintenance; if he can state generally in what form the relief for roads, estimated at £250,000, would be proposed to be paid; whether it would be collected and dispensed locally or generally; and, whether the new Tax would affect the carts and carriages of brewers, bakers, and builders beyond the six shillings increase on two-wheeled vehicles?

MR. SCHREIBER asked, From what source the auxiliary letter carriers of the United Kingdom were to derive their long-expected increase of pay?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. GLADSTONE): The Question put by the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Schreiber) ought to be addressed to the Postmaster General. In answer to the first Question, I have to say that, in stating the increase in the Postal Service for the present year, I was comparing the Estimates for the present year with the Exchequer issues of last year; and that is, in point of fact, the only mode in which, at the time the Financial Statement is made, a comparison can be instituted. The Exchequer issues are not identical with the private accounts; but the comparison with the private account cannot be given for some little time to come. With regard to the other questions associated with this, I could not enter at present upon a discussion of the mode in which it is proposed to grant relief for high roads. Indeed, I am not yet in prospective possession of the funds absolutely necessary for the purpose; but that will be done on the present occasion by the President of the Local Government Board. With regard to the carts and carriages of brewers, bakers, and builders, there is to be no charge with respect to them. There is no change intended, I may say, in the law of exemption. We do not think that a measure of this kind, which is necessarily impartial, and in some respects judicial, affords an appropriate opportunity for raising the various and rather difficult questions that are connected with the exemption of particular vehicles from taxes.

SIR BALDWIN LEIGHTON asked in what form it was proposed to levy the tax?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GLADSTONE) said, that would connect itself with the Vote, which he could not possibly propose until he had Ways and Means in prospect by which the charge could be made.

MR. PENNINGTON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, by the proposal to increase the Duties on private carriages, it is intended to include carriages let on hire to private persons for short times or special purposes, or at funerals or weddings?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GLADSTONE), in reply, said, he thought he had already answered the Question. He did not propose, nor did he think it possible, to make a general law of exemption on this occasion.

MR. BIRKBECK asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, taking into consideration that tenant farmers are the largest contributors towards the cost of maintaining roads, he will exempt them, under his Budget proposals, from increased taxation for vehicles?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GLADSTONE), in reply, said, he had no intention of proposing any new exemption on behalf of tenant farmers.

EVICCTIONS (IRELAND)—ARREARS.

MR. BIGGAR asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the Government are prepared, pending the introduction of their measure regarding arrears, to discourage evictions in Ireland by withdrawing all support to assist landlords in executing eviction decrees?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, without entering into the very important subject of evictions in Ireland, to which the hon. Gentleman refers, I must frankly own that I think that the measure which he suggests and indicates, that the Government shall discourage evictions by withdrawing support to assist landlords in them, is a matter beyond the discretion of the Executive Government. It is our public duty to assist the execution of the law, not always taking into view our own opinion of the reasonableness of what may be intended, and we have no title to adopt the measure which the hon. Member suggests.

NORTHAMPTON BOROUGH.

MR. FIRTH asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, having regard to the important constitutional issues involved, he will afford facilities for the discussion of a Motion on behalf of the electors of Northampton, that they be heard at the Bar of the House in accordance with the prayer of their Petition recently presented to the House?

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, he could not say that he thought the present state of the Business of the House left it in the power of the Government, with a due regard to the calls of other subjects which were immediately coming before the House, to facilitate the discussion of a Motion with regard to the representation of Northampton.

COUNTY GOVERNMENT BILL—LOCAL OPTION.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON asked the First Lord of the Treasury, with reference to the announcement in his Budget speech that the County Government Bill will not be proceeded with at present, Whether the Government contemplate the introduction of any other legislation during the present Session for giving effect to the Resolution which this House has already twice passed in favour of giving localities control over the Liquor Traffic "by some efficient measure of Local Option?"

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, it was certainly quite true that they had contemplated action on the subject of County Boards, which would indirectly, but materially, bear upon the question in which his hon. Friend was greatly interested—namely, Local Option; but, being compelled reluctantly to abandon the County Boards Bill for the present year, he did not believe the Government had any means of making any proposal during the present Session on the subject of Local Option.

GENERAL PRISONS (IRELAND) ACT—CONVEYANCE OF PRISONERS.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether his attention has been called to the fact that, under the Prisons Act, 1877, English counties are relieved from the charge for the conveyance of certain prisoners, whereas, under the General Prisons (Ireland) Act, Irish counties are still liable for a similar charge; and, if so, whether the Government will introduce a Bill to establish equality in the Law, in respect of this charge, between England and Ireland?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I thought that I had stated, in the Financial Statement of the year, that the heavy charge which has now come upon the Treasury for the conveyance of prisoners had come upon the Treasury in consequence of a sheer error, and contrary to the intention, not only of the late Government, but contrary to the intention of Parliament. I cannot, therefore, look upon that charge, with which we are now dealing for the most part retrospectively, as establishing a principle from which arguments can be drawn for the extension of the area to other parts of the United Kingdom. The Government have not yet had an opportunity of considering the course which it will be their duty to take in relation to the state of things which exists under the English Prisons Act in that particular.

In reply to a further Question by the hon. Member,

MR. GLADSTONE said: I am quite prepared to say that I have done nothing, and said nothing, and arrived at no conclusion in my own mind, favourable to the creation of any new inequality between England and Ireland in regard to Public Expenditure.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MEMBERS OF THIS HOUSE DETAINED UNDER THE ACT.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN: I beg to ask the Prime Minister, in view of recent circumstances and recent declarations of the Government, Whether he does not think the time has come when he will release the three honourable Members of this House who have been in jail in Ireland for several months?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I think the House will feel, and I believe the hon. Member himself will feel, that it will be hardly possible for me to enter upon any statement, either of our opinions or of our intentions with regard to a matter of so much importance, and a matter so intimately connected with other circumstances in Ireland, perhaps still more important, in reply to an inquiry. We can only do it, I think, upon an occasion when there should be a perfect liberty of free statement and argument upon what we might say, or what we might not say—that is to say, in a regular debate. We have an opportunity of that kind in immediate prospect. I cannot at present enter upon the subject; but on Tuesday next my right hon. Friend near me (Mr. W. E. Forster) will be prepared to enter upon it fully.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—TUESDAY SITTINGS.

MR. MACFARLANE asked the Prime Minister when it was intended to take the second reading of the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill?

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, that he hoped the second reading would be taken early next week. It would not, however, be taken on Monday or Tuesday.

MR. R. N. FOWLER asked, whether there would be a Morning Sitting on Tuesday next?

MR. GLADSTONE said, that he thought the announcement that was made by his noble Friend (the Marquess of Hartington) in his absence had been sufficiently explicit—namely, that it was the intention of the Government to ask for consecutive Morning Sitzings on Tuesdays.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Sir, I think it would be convenient if the House were better informed as to what is to happen on Tuesdays. The right hon. Gentleman has, in rather a remarkable manner, abstained from entering into a subject of high importance, the policy of the Government in regard to the maintenance of law and order in Ireland, and abstained even from answering a Question connected with it, because, as I understand, there will be an opportunity afforded on Tuesday for a full debate on that subject. I am not quite sure that I am aware of what opportunity the right hon. Gentleman refers to, unless it be the Notice of Motion given by my right hon. and gallant Friend the Member for the Wigton Burghs (Sir John Hay). If there is to be an important statement made on the part of the Government—and its importance can hardly be exaggerated—on the occasion of such a Motion, I wish to know whether we are to understand that it is to be put off till 9 o'clock, and, if so, what Business it is proposed to take at the Morning Sitting?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, we propose to take the question of Procedure continuously next week. As to the debate which may arise on Tuesday evening, if the House should be pleased to allow us to go on, I am not aware that it is likely to require to be a debate of great length and detail, although it may be difficult to say now what debate does not require to be pursued at great length and detail. But, so far as I can judge, I think there will be no inconvenience to the House in taking the discussion which has been referred to at the Evening Sitting. What I said, however, was that it was desirable that an answer to the Question put by my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle (Mr. Joseph Cowen) should be given in a regular debate, when hon. Members would have an opportunity, if they wished, of commenting upon it.

MR. CHAPLIN asked whether they were to understand that the Procedure debate would be taken continuously every Government night next week? Would the second reading of the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill be taken if the Procedure debate was not concluded?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, we propose to take it on Monday, and at the Morning Sitting on Tuesday. The Customs and Inland Revenue Bill will not be taken on Monday or Tuesday next. We hope to be able to state by Tuesday whether that Bill will be taken on Thursday or not.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN said, that, in view of the important announcement which they were led to expect on Tuesday, he hoped the Prime Minister would reconsider his decision with respect to the Morning Sitting for Tuesday; and, in order to give the right hon. Gentleman an opportunity of doing so, he would ask him on Monday, Whether it would not be desirable to allow the Morning Sitting for Tuesday to lapse, so that they might have a full discussion on so important a question as the condition of Ireland?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, we have had debates on the condition of Ireland to the extent of nearly half, or more than half, the present Session; and, although this may be an important matter, it must be remembered that every matter of importance does not necessarily require a long and detailed discussion. In the view of the Government, there will be ample time for the discussion on Tuesday evening; and the other pressing subjects before us make it our duty, unless we wish the country to believe that we are paltering with them, to ask the House to give us Morning Sittings.

ENGLAND AND FRANCE—THE CHANNEL TUNNEL SCHEME.

MR. O'SHEA asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether he has seen a statement in the "St. James's Gazette" of this evening, to the effect that, notwithstanding the order of the Board of Trade, the "promoters of the Channel Tunnel scheme are pressing forward the work;" and, whether the right hon. Gentleman will take steps to enforce compliance with his own order?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: In answer to the Question of my hon. and gallant Friend, I have to say that I have not seen the newspaper this evening to which he refers, and I think that the statement which he says is contained in it must be incorrect. At all events, I gave the most explicit directions to the South Eastern Railway Company that the works were not to be allowed to proceed below the level of low water; and if that instruction has been disregarded I shall certainly take steps to see that it is properly observed.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

£1 BANK NOTES.—RESOLUTION.

MR. W. FOWLER, in rising to move—

"That, in the opinion of this House, the prohibition of the issue of bank notes of £1 each in England and Wales is unreasonable and ought to be removed, and that all needful steps should be forthwith taken to authorise the issue of such notes," said, that it was a long time since they had had a discussion on the currency of this country. He was glad that was so, because it showed that we were in a much better condition than we had been many years ago. At the same time, it was a very remarkable fact that the conditions of the currency in the Three Kingdoms were so different, and had remained so for so many years. He believed that Sir Robert Peel's legislation on that subject was wise legislation, and he was not the least disposed to break it down in any way. Bank notes in this country were not the machinery by which the great business of the country was conducted. They were merely used in the minor work of trade, and for the common convenience of mankind in the ordinary details of life. Anyone who knew anything of business was aware that business was conducted, not by bank notes, but by credit. Deposits had increased enormously, whereas circulation had practically not increased at all. In 36 issuing banks the deposits had increased from 100 in 1844 to 350 in 1874; while the proportion of circulation to deposits was, in 1844, 17 per cent, and in 1874 only 4 per cent. He would now refer to one or two points in the history of this question. The House was aware that £1 notes were, and had been for many years, in circulation in Scotland and Ireland, though successive Prime Ministers, in 1826 and 1844, had desired to do away with them. But the feeling in their favour was so strong, that the Prime Ministers had to give up the idea, and accordingly they were retained in Scotland and Ireland, though they were abandoned in England. On reference to the debates of the year 1826, when £1 notes were abolished in England, it would be found that the main reason given for their abolition was the panic of 1825, which, it was said, was caused by bank notes of small amount being in circulation. But Lord Liverpool combated this view, for, in writing to the Bank of England on the 13th of January, 1826, he said this—

“Though a recurrence to a gold circulation might be productive of some good, it would by no means go to the root of the evil. We have abundant proof of this in the events which took place in 1793, when a convulsion occurred more extensive than that which we have recently experienced. Nearly 100 country banks stopped payment, and Parliament granted an issue of Exchequer Bills, yet in 1793 there were no £1 or £2 notes in circulation in England. We have a further proof in the experience of Scotland, which has escaped all the convulsions which have occurred in the Money Market of England for the last 35 years, though Scotland, during the whole of that time, has had a circulation of £1 notes. The issue of small notes, though it be an aggravation, cannot, therefore, be the sole or even the main cause of the evil in England.”

The fact was that the main cause of the panic of 1825 was the enormous amount of speculation that then prevailed. Then, after the notes were abolished, there was another panic in 1837, and again in 1844, and there had been several more since, although during the whole period there were no £1 notes. The truth was that panics arose from great causes, such as excessive speculation and increase of prices, and not from comparatively small causes, such as the circulation of notes. If he was correct in his view, the Abolition Act of 1826 was passed under an entirely erroneous impression. Lord Liverpool was unable to carry out his project of abolishing the £1 notes in Scotland and Ireland, on account of the great attachment those countries felt towards them, an attachment as strong now as it was then. It might be asked—why raise this question at all; things were going on very well? That was, no doubt, a fair question; but he had recently, while travelling on the other side of the Atlantic, noticed the great convenience that was found in these small notes. In Scotland and Ireland they were found to be a great convenience to the poorer classes. Though the richer classes, with large balances at their bankers, and the power to draw cheques to any amount, might not feel any necessity for them, still, in dealing with this question, they must consider the humbler classes as well as those of the upper ranks. Postal notes and orders, although a convenience for the transmission of money, cost a commission for each order, and that consideration was a somewhat serious one to the working man. In Scotland, in Ireland, on the Continent of Europe, and in America, these small notes were found to be a great convenience to poor people. It was notorious that in Scotland and Ireland the people were determined to keep them. He had been informed on good authority that the best way to bring about Home Rule in those countries would be by abolishing the £1 notes. Then it was a great convenience to be able to send small sums by post in this way without charge. Also, these notes were a great convenience in the small actions of trade, such as in paying. He would not propose to circulate the whole issue on credit; but a certain amount might be issued on securities and a certain amount on bullion, as was done with regard to English notes by Robert Peel in 1844. What was the circulation of bullion at the present time? In 1835 Sir Robert Peel said that there were from 30,000,000 to 40,000,000 in circulation; in more modern times it was said to amount to from 100,000,000 to 150,000,000. His impression was that there must be, at least, 100,000,000 in circulation. Therefore, we might circulate a large amount on securities and balance on bullion, as at present by the Act of 1844. He wished to refer to the character of the present circulation. The state of the coinage in this country was very unsatisfactory. Every other coin was light. In Ireland the people would not take sovereigns, but, on presenting them at the bank, they were so often charged for light coin, notes being preferred because of the depreciation of the sovereign. If small notes were put in circulation, it would become necessary to recoin the whole of the sovereigns and half-sovereigns. This matter was one of considerable importance, and ought not to be lost sight of. Various objections were raised to the proposal, the most attractive of which was the forgery question. In the latter part of the century bank notes were wretchedly engraved, a great many forgeries occurred, and many unfortunate people lost their lives. But bank notes are now engraved in so superior a manner that forgeries seldom occurred. He believed that, at the present moment, forgery of any importance had not occurred on any of the Scotch or Irish notes in respect of notes issued for the last 20 or 30 years. A similar state of things also prevailed in America, where there was also a circulation of small notes. When at Washington, he was furnished to him showing that in the year ending June 1881 there were eight times as many notes of the value of £10 forged as of notes of £1. This showed that, at the present time, the skill and labour required to forge small notes was so great that it did not pay to counterfeit notes of small value. One case that occurred in Scotland was told that it took a man six months to produce and circulate six £1-notes.

In his opinion, they had passed that period when the forgery of bank notes was a serious question. Formerly, the punishment for the crime was so severe that people were unwilling to prosecute, and forgery was much more frequent than it had since become. The Judicial Statistics for 1880 showed that in that year no persons were committed for the forgery of bank notes in England and Wales. In Ireland there were eight cases, but in Scotland none. The figures with respect to Mint offences were very different, and proved that more than 2,000 persons were punished for the offences of coining, of having in possession implements of coining, and of uttering false coin. Another objection which he knew some hon. Members entertained to his proposal was the liability to the occurrence of panics. It was said that the holders of £1 notes would be more liable to panics than the holders of notes of larger amount. On that point he would quote the opinion of Mr. Tooke, who said that the only instance of a panic within the century with respect to Bank of England notes occurred in 1832, and that partook of the ridiculous, and was only remarkable for the use made of it by the partizans of a particular currency theory. The Glasgow Bank failure six years ago, affecting, as it did, a very poor population, and occurring under circumstances of fraud, was calculated to cause panic. That, however, did not happen, and the circulation of Scotch bank notes was in no way affected. He did not think that the liability to panics was as great now as it used to be. It had also been urged that they would lose bullion by the issue of small notes. In 1826 Mr. Huskisson said that notes and bullion could not exist together; but experience had not shown that to be true. He did not propose to issue the notes upon nothing; he considered that, for the most part, they should be issued upon bullion. The effect of the issue of small notes would be that the bullion would be kept in one place, instead of being scattered over the Kingdom. It was a mistake to suppose that the banks kept their reserves in gold; they only kept sufficient gold for their usual requirements. Gold would be much safer and much more available if held as a security against notes than if it were scattered over the country. It by no means followed that because there was a circulation of small notes there was no gold in a country. Although there was a large circulation of notes of various values in the United States, it was estimated by the Director of their Mint in November, 1881, that there were 112,000,000 sterling of gold and 36,000,000 sterling of silver in the country. It had been alleged that a £1 note issue would be costly; but it would not be so in reality, if we could save the interest on a large amount of bullion. Indeed, the saving on the bullion would pay all the expense of the circulation, and a good deal more. Moreover, the issue of £1-notes would prevent the wear and tear of our sovereigns, which at present amounted to a very considerable sum. It had been estimated that the restoration of our existing coinage would cost nearly £1,000,000. He calculated that the cost of the £1 note issue, as now existing, varied from 5s. to £1 per cent per annum. He had heard it suggested that the adoption of £1 notes would cause a great deal of trouble to bankers. Well, the Scotch and the Irish bankers were very happy to have that trouble as long as they had likewise the convenience for themselves and their customers. Then it had been said that the extension of banking facilities was less important now than it was formerly. There were, however, some figures on this point, which showed that, after all, the use of notes was a very important consideration even now. The amount of notes issued in Scotland and in Ireland was still very large, and there had been a very material increase in it. The circulation in Scotland had, between 1844 and 1874, increased 95 per cent; while in Ireland, owing to famine and loss of population, the increase had been 14 per cent during the same period. It would probably be said that some of the experience of the Continental States went rather in the other direction. It was a curious thing that in France the lower denomination was not that which was most in circulation; but the condition of France was so totally different from our own that we could not compare the two countries. Again, it was true that Germany had adopted something like our system in not issuing very small notes; but he did not see why we should follow Germany either in her politics or in her finance. He had endeavoured to show that the abolition of £1 notes was accomplished under a false impression as to the facts. He desired to impress on the House the truth that the great panic of 1825, on which all the burden was placed, was not occasioned by any issue of notes whatever, although it was aggravated, no doubt, by the conduct of both the Bank of England and the country banks. That panic was caused by enormous speculations and gigantic commercial operations of every conceivable degree of folly. As we had abolished the issue of £1 notes on unfair and ridiculous grounds, it was only right that we should reconsider the matter. It might be said it was impossible to prove that there was any public demand for the change in this country. He did not assert that there was; but he thought it was well worthy of the consideration of the House whether that which was so extremely convenient to Scotland and Ireland would not confer a boon on our own people, without doing them any conceivable harm. He had heard it suggested that there was one point about the bullion question which ought to be borne in mind—namely, that there would be more danger of gold being attacked in case of disaster if it were in one place than if it were scattered over the whole community. They ought not, however, for this purpose to consider what might happen once in a century, and to legislate with a view to an improbable contingency. He feared this was an abstract question, and, therefore, not an exciting one. But he must repeat his belief that no comparatively small change in the ordinary affairs of life would confer more real benefit on the humbler classes of the community than providing them with a well-secured currency of small denominations. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

MR. EWART, in seconding the Resolution, said, he heartily approved of it as an Irishman who had all his life been accustomed to £1 notes, and had seen the advantages of that system. He thought it seemed unreasonable that Ireland should have the advantage of the £1 note, while it was prohibited in England. One pound notes were merely promises to pay £1 in gold, and they were perfectly safe as £5 notes. In Ireland they found paper much more convenient for use than gold. Of course, as the fear of forgery; but, as by the hon. Member, it was known to exist in Ireland, and a great deal more afraid of it than they were of forged money. He believed that no people who used paper would ever revert to gold. He might instance Ireland and the United States of America and the Colonies, where paper money was more popular than gold. The £1 notes had, no doubt, been obtained from the fear of inflation; but as they were convertible into gold, there was, in his mind, no danger of inflation, provided a sufficient reserve of gold was held. It might be feared that if paper money were adopted, it would lead to something further. Well, but that no chimera of that sort would prevent the House from adopting a measure considered would be a most desirable measure.

Amendment proposed,

to cut out from the word "That" to the Question, in order to add the words "in opinion of this House, the prohibition of bank notes of £1 each in England and Wales is unreasonable and ought to be removed, and that all needful steps should be taken to authorise the issue of £1 notes,"—(Mr. William Fowler,) and thereon.

Second motion proposed, "That the words 'to be left out stand part of the Bill' be added."

JOHN LUBBOCK, who had notice of an Amendment, which, he was unable to move, to the

It is undesirable to remove the restriction on the circulation of £1 notes (if at all) without a careful inquiry into the effect which the issue of such notes would have on the general currency of the Country, and into the conditions under which such notes should be issued."

One would deny the importance of the subject brought before them that day by his hon. Friend the Member for Westbury (Mr. W. Fowler), whose knowledge of the subject and great experience enabled him to express views he entertained with great weight and effect. Generally, on such subjects, it was his good fortune to be able to co-operate with his hon.

but, on the present occasion, he found it difficult to express the hope that the House would pause before it assented to the Motion which the hon. Member advocated. The subject of £1 notes was no new question in this country. They had a long trial, and eventually were abandoned with general consent. The main arguments against them were three in number—first, the desirability of keeping up a large stock of gold in the country; secondly, that the £1 notes were more liable to be suddenly presented for payment during panics than notes of higher denomination; and, thirdly, they were found to lead to a very large amount of forgery. The result of the experience acquired at the commencement of the century was that almost all the highest authorities on the subject had unhesitatingly declared themselves against the issue of notes for smaller sums than £5. He might quote, for instance, the strongly-expressed opinion of Huskisson, Canning, Lord Lansdowne, the Duke of Wellington, Goulburn, Herries, Sir Robert Peel, Mr. Norman, Lord Overstone, John Stuart Mill, and, among more recent authorities, Mr. Weguelin, Mr. Kirkman Hodgson, Mr. Grenfell, the present Governor of the Bank; and Mr. Palgrave, the Editor of The Economist. He believed the very general opinion of the City at present was also decidedly opposed to the issue of £1 notes. There were Gentlemen in the House—for instance, the hon. Baronet the Member for West Worcestershire (Sir Edmund Lechmere)—who could speak more authoritatively for the country banks than he could; but he was naturally brought into contact with a considerable number of country bankers in all parts of England, and he believed that the very great majority were of the same opinion. The gold circulation had been regarded by the highest authorities as a reserve upon which they could fall back, if necessary, in case of adverse exchanges. Doubtless, the great extent to which what were called International Stocks were now held in this country weakened, to a certain extent, this argument. Still, it could not be omitted from consideration, and before it was summarily dismissed they ought to obtain the careful opinions of those most qualified to judge on the question. Again, it could not be denied that if we should, unfortunately, become involved in any great war with a first-rate Power, the gold circulation would be a source of much financial strength. During the Franco-German War the French found the practical advantage of this. By issuing small notes to replace the metallic circulation, they were able, with only a slight disturbance of values and at a very moderate cost, to obtain immense funds. But for this resource, they would either have had to borrow at very high rates or to purchase on credit, which would have been even more ruinous. He sincerely hoped that we should never have occasion to adopt a similar course; but the power of doing so must be taken into consideration when they were considering the respective advantages and disadvantages of a circulation of small notes. Again, the deposits in the Savings Banks amounted to nearly £80,000,000, and were steadily increasing. Against this immense liability the Government, according to the last Returns, held less than £500,000 of reserve, a reserve which, to a banker, naturally seemed, to say the least of it, extremely meagre. No doubt, however, successive Chancellors of the Exchequer had tolerated this state of things, partly on account of the exceptionally realizable character of the securities held on account of the trustees, and partly, also, because of the latent reserve existing in our gold circulation—a reserve which, although, of course, it would only be used as a last resource, and in case of absolute necessity, was still of great importance. Nor did he quite understand why his hon. Friend should stop at £1 notes. There were some considerations which afforded even stronger arguments for smaller notes than for those of £1. The half-sovereign was, in proportion, a more expensive coin than the sovereign. The wear and tear were more rapid. Again, our silver circulation, as everyone knew, consisted only of tokens, which did not, like the gold, constitute any solid national reserve. And, so far, the advantages of introducing a circulation of notes for 10s. and 1s. would be even greater in proportion. But even his hon. Friend did not propose to go so far as that. He would not occupy the time of the House by dwelling on the second consideration—namely, the liability of £1 notes to be presented for payment under panic. It would be sufficient to say that all practical authorities were agreed upon that point. It was possible that the spread of education—the greater amount of knowledge on such subjects possessed at present by the bulk of our countrymen might have removed this danger; and he quite believed that it had had much effect in that direction. Still, the consideration was not one which could be entirely ignored. Mr. Henry Burgess, Secretary to the County Bankers' Association, before the House of Commons' Committee of 1832, said that—

“Nine out of 10 of the country bankers are decidedly opposed to the issue of small notes under £5. They have found from experience that all great demands upon the banks have commenced through the demand for small notes.”

As to the profit which would be derived from the issue of £1 notes, he was not disposed to rate it so high as it had been estimated. Much, of course, would depend on the conditions under which the notes were issued, and especially whether such notes, when once paid, were to be re-issued or not. He would not discuss the question whether they should be issued by country banks or the Bank of England, though, if the subject were to come to a practical issue, that would be a question which would demand most serious consideration. He would assume that the notes were not to be re-issued, and he would shortly state to the House a calculation made by the late Governor of the Bank of England on that basis. That gentleman assumed that £21,000,000 of notes would be issued, and that one-third would be retained in gold as a security. That would leave £14,000,000 to be invested in Government securities, which would give £400,000 in interest. The present cost of a note was 1·26 of a penny; but on the manufacture of so large a number the cost might, no doubt, be reduced. He took it, therefore, at 7-8ths of a penny, and £21,000,000, then, would cost £76,600; and, assuming each note to live about three months, they must multiply this by four for a year. This would give £300,000, to which must be added the cost of prosecutions for forgeries and various minor expenses. The balance would be less than £100,000; certainly not more than enough to compensate the issuing bank or banks for their trouble. The Government, therefore, would gain but little in interest; and, if at all, would save little more than the wear and tear of the gold coins. It seemed evident, therefore, that if the notes were to be issued on this basis the pecuniary advantage would be comparatively small. Of course, if the notes were to be re-issued the cost would be less; but to this there were other objections. If, on the other hand, the notes were issued against gold the profit, of course, would vanish altogether. He now came to the question of forgeries. In the year 1820, though the circulation of £1 notes was less than £7,000,000, there were over 400 prosecutions for forgery, at a cost of £53,000, the great majority of these being forgeries of £1 notes. From 1816 to 1820, the last five years during which £1 notes were issued, no less than 131,000 forged notes were presented to the Bank of England, being at the rate of over 25,000 a-year; while at present, with our much larger population and vastly greater commerce, the average number was only 20. Moreover, out of these 131,000 forged notes, no less than 127,000 were notes of £1, and only 400 were over £5. It was a remarkable fact that, though £1 notes had been out of circulation for more than half-a-century, the majority of forged notes brought into the Bank were still £1 notes. From 1869 to 1874, the last year for which they had any return, the total number of forged notes presented was £369. Of these, 36 were for sums above £5; 88 were £5 notes; and 245 were notes for less than £5. It was sometimes said that the improvements in engraving had practically done away with the risk of forgery. He did not wish to undervalue the security afforded by skilful engraving. It was, no doubt, considerable. But practical experience showed that the number of forgeries at the beginning of the century was not mainly ascribable to any roughness in the engraving, for in that case it would have applied to £5 notes, as well as to those for £1. Nay, the temptation being greater, it might even have been anticipated that £5 notes would have been the more frequently forged. But far from that, as he had shown, the overwhelming preponderance of forged notes were for £1. That proved that the real determining condition was not the facility of counterfeiting, but the opportunity for issuing without immediate risk of detection. The life of a note—that was to say, the length of time it remained in circulation—was inversely as the amount; and, consequently, the smaller the note the less the risk of detection. He was told, however, that there was little or no forgery in Scotland or Ireland; and, no doubt, £1 notes were popular in the Sister Kingdoms—though the late Member for Waterford (Mr. Delahunty) did regard them as the source of all the trouble of Ireland, from the creation of the world down to the creation of the Land League. But the whole banking and economical conditions of Scotland and Ireland were unlike those of England. In Scotland, for instance, these notes remained in circulation for a very short time—mainly because, as all the banks enjoyed the privilege of issue, none of them used the notes of any other bank as till money. Hence anyone who issued a forged note knew that the forgery would be detected in a very few days, which acted in two ways. Firstly, the chance of punishment was greatly increased; and, secondly, the opportunity for issuing any considerable number of forged notes, and, consequently, the temptation to do so was greatly diminished. We had tried £1 notes in this country, and they were abandoned with general consent. No doubt, since that date many years had elapsed, and circumstances had greatly changed. It was possible that the objections then felt might now no longer exist; it was possible that the advantages might now be greater. He did not say that his hon. Friend might not make out a case for a Committee or Commission of Inquiry; but when he called upon the House, without inquiry and without consultation, to decide off-hand that the prohibition of £1 notes was unreasonable, and that steps should be forthwith taken to authorize the issue of such notes, he (Sir John Lubbock) believed that he represented the general opinion of the mercantile and banking community in expressing a hope that the House would not be carried away by the persuasive eloquence of his hon. Friend.

MR. GLADSTONE: The House, I think, will not be surprised when I say that the Government is not prepared to consent to put aside the Motion for your leaving the Chair, Sir, in order to adopt the Amendment, as the decision of the House, and it will be a sufficient reason against such a course, if I found myself entirely upon one word in the Motion—the formidable word “forthwith.” I cannot conceive for the Government, in existing circumstances, a more formidable word, for undoubtedly it was found in 1844 that to deal with the currency of this country—and by no means to deal with the whole of the questions that may be raised—was an affair that required to be the main subject of legislation for a year, and was found quite sufficient to occupy a very great deal of the time of Parliament, certainly shutting out the consideration of any great measure during the same Session. Under those circumstances, my hon. Friend will judge that the Government must be either unduly sanguine or unusually unscrupulous, if it were prepared, by adopting this Resolution, to deal “forthwith” with the question which, I admit, is not of itself necessarily involving the whole question of currency, but which would be found, practically, to require that the whole question of currency should be considered. This question of currency is one of that long list of arrears which ought to be considered legitimately and positively as such. The House is probably aware that the old practice of Parliament, both with regard to the East India Charter and with regard to the Bank Charter, was to consider them once in 10 or 20 years—I think once in 20 years as regards the East India Charter, and once in 10 years as regards the Bank Charter—and I recollect very well that Mr. Goulburn, reflecting on the matter, was of opinion, when the Act of 1844 was framed, that it was an inconvenience to have the House tied down absolutely to consider the matter decennially, because there might be exigencies of a particular order which might make a short postponement rather convenient and desirable. Consequently, the Act of 1844 was enacted, not to remain in force for 10 years, but during the pleasure of Parliament, distinctly indicating, by its own phraseology, that the subject was one that ought periodically to be brought under review. And I do not entertain the smallest doubt that Sir Robert Peel, who was himself a great master on the subject of the currency, himself regarded the Act of 1844 not as a passing measure, but as a measure that laid a firm and strong foundation upon which a superstructure was to be raised, which the Act of 1844 imperfectly and partially supplied. I believe that both Sir Robert Peel and Mr. Goulburn would have been immensely astonished if anyone could, by the gift of prophecy, have announced to them as a fact that, 38 years after the Act of 1844, nothing would have been done in prosecution of the views with which that Act was introduced to lead onwards the system of the currency of this country to what may be called its perfection. That admission I make to my hon. Friend, accompanying it with the hope, which is more sincere than sanguine, that the vigorous labours on the Parliamentary Benches may, in a certain time, bring about a state of things so propitious that this great question may be dealt with for the benefit of the country. Having made that concession, Sir, I must make a further concession to my hon. Friend who has just sat down. I think it clear, looking to the importance and complexity of the issues involved, that no important change ought to be introduced into our system without a previous Parliamentary inquiry. The last Committee sat, I think, with the hope that legislation might take place which has not taken place; but, undoubtedly, that Committee grew also out of the circumstances connected with the commercial crisis; and my hon. Friend has observed, with great satisfaction, and, I think, with great justice, that the administration of the Bank of England—the enlightened administration of the Bank of England—appears, in a great degree, to have solved the practical question connected with these disturbances of the currency which marked the years 1847, 1857, and 1866, and which were so irregular, both in principle and in practice, that they might well be described as intolerable. As long as those crises occurred, at periods of eight or ten years, they themselves proved an irresistible argument for the review of the Currency Laws. As matters now stand, it may be said that the argument has lost a great deal of its force, because we may state that the days of those crises will have passed by, and that, from administration and early anticipation of difficulties on the part of the governing influences of the Bank of England, may prevent their return. While I quite admit that, on other grounds, there are reasons why this matter should come under the view of Parliament, I imagine there can be no doubt among us that the three great conditions of a good currency are these—

Mr. Gladstone

its safety, its convenience, and its cheapness. I must say, for my part, I would give a fourth condition to a perfect currency, which is that the profit of that currency ought to be the profit of the nation. But with regard to our system as it exists—and I think we have only yet got a very partial acknowledgment of the principle that the profit of issue belongs to the State—we have to look at the qualities of safety, convenience, and cheapness. As regards safety, no doubt, the question would be raised whether metallic currency or paper currency in small notes is the more liable to forgery; but my hon. Friend the Mover of the Amendment will at once see that we are not in a condition in this House to determine a question of this kind without a very close and careful inquiry. The question of how to deal with light gold is also an important and difficult one. As to the position of the gold coinage—which the country will have to face—I own that I am one of those who think that it is a fair and proper matter for inquiry, whether the country ought to make a charge, not in the nature of seigniorage, not in the nature of an artificial value attached to a commodity as an exercise of the Prerogative, even as we do in silver and in copper, but whether the country ought to make a charge for the labour of manufacture, by which it certifies in a particular form its value to the gold in circulation. Undoubtedly, the effect of our present system is that everybody melts gold at his convenience, and wastes to an enormous extent the costly labour we have bestowed upon it. I believe that a very proper subject for consideration. As I see the Leader of the Opposition (Sir Stafford Northcote) in his place, I may say I was very sanguine in the hope that he might have felt himself strong enough in the time of the late Government to have attempted to deal with this whole question. I felt that the position of affairs was favourable; for I am quite certain that, as regards all those who now sit on this side of the House, they would have been found in very general concurrence with the right hon. Gentleman in his views on monetary questions, and I believe he would have had their most cordial and faithful support. I had a stronger reason for entertaining that wish, and it is, that I believe there is no person, either in the House or in the country, who more thoroughly comprehends that question than the right hon. Baronet, or who would have been more likely to lead the discussion of it to a favourable issue. I will enter briefly into one or two of the points which have been raised. I do not think the Mover of the Motion open to any just exception that there is no public demand for a change, because this is one of the questions as to which we cannot expect that there should be what is called a popular demand. After the War, and in 1834, the raising of questions of this kind was undoubtedly due to the few—and the number was a very small one, only, in fact, a fraction even of the educated classes—who took an interest in those questions. I would, indeed, say that there is no subject which interested a smaller number of persons, considering its importance. I will go one step further, and say that among the many sound arguments which contributed to the establishment of our metallic circulation, there was one argument that was less sound than the rest, and that was the notion that for whatever monetary crisis might occur, the possession of a metallic currency for ordinary cash transactions constituted an element of security, and afforded an available reserve. I do not now enter into the case of a great war. I can well conceive that in the case of a great war, Parliament, legislating for the purpose, might avail itself of the existence of a vast body of gold in circulation in the country for temporary purposes, which it might have in view, in the extreme exigency of the case, and might in that way, on that particular occasion, supply itself with a large quantity of gold by legislation, perhaps more easily than if it had not a very large metallic circulation to deal with. But, undoubtedly, as far as my recollection goes, there was a belief that upon every occasion of monetary pressure such as we used constantly to be subjected to in the case of bad harvests—although, happily, the vast extension of the freedom of our trade has rendered these occasions of pressure comparatively insensible—that even upon these occasions we were better able to encounter them by having a large metallic circulation. I believe that was an entire fallacy, because, in point of fact, that large metallic currency is hard at work in the daily business of life conducting the cash transactions absolutely essential to the operations of civil society, and so far, I believe, the argument is not well-founded. I hope I shall not shock anyone when I say I see no fundamental unsoundness in the main intention and demand of my hon. Friend. We have already applied to a certain number of notes over £1 the principle that it is wise, to a certain extent, to economize the monetary circulation by the issue of such notes, provided we take care to keep that issue of notes within the limits of demand which we know the necessary purposes of the country will always make, so that there can be no possibility that those notes should become superfluous. If that be so, I own, although I believe in quarters of very high metallic doctrine there was a notion that something heretical lurked in the very idea of the £1 note, yet I must say I do not see why that principle, cautiously applied, should not apply to £1 notes which applies to notes of higher denomination, provided it may be found that convenience would be attained, as well as some degree of economy. With regard to that question, my hon. Friend the Member for the University of London (Sir John Lubbock) has suggested that it would necessitate a modification of the practice of banking. I am the last person to propose that the practice of banking should be changed by the Executive. If it were so changed, it should only be after full Parliamentary Inquiry. I will only add, in conclusion, that I hope the present discussion will do good in tending to turn the mind of those who are not in the habit of thinking on this question of currency to consider it; and I entertain not a very sanguine hope for myself, but a hope certainly for younger Members of this House, that they may have the happy duty of developing and applying the principles of the Act of 1844, in the way of giving it full effect, and to fulfil with still greater efficiency and equal safety the great purpose for which a currency is established.

MR. GOSCHEN said, that, although his right hon. Friend had stated that the Motion could not be accepted by the House, it might, nevertheless, not be superfluous that a few remarks should be made on the topics which had been raised in the debate. His right hon. Friend had alluded to the fact that the Bank Act had been allowed to remain without change. It was a most fortunate circumstance for the country that that Act had not been revised on the various occasions when revision had been called for. For if a revision directed at certain minor points had been granted, it might have led to a revision of vital provisions of the Act. He thought he could discern, through his right hon. Friend's speech, that there were certain points in that Act which he would like to have changed. He thought his right hon. Friend was led in that direction by the desire to secure some profit to the State. In that respect he could entirely sympathize with his right hon. Friend. The profits of issue he would himself wish to see secured to the public. But he would impress upon the House that what had been desired by others on many occasions was to introduce relaxations into the Act, which the experience of years had shown not to be necessary. He thought there was no greater proof of the wisdom of Sir Robert Peel than that he had secured to this country a currency which, with all its drawbacks, had through most trying times and difficult crises proved to be a great success. His hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge (Mr. W. Fowler) had introduced some dangerous proposals in a very seductive form. He admitted what had been said by his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that the proposals of his hon. Friend were not by any means so dangerous in his hands as they might be in other hands. His hon. Friend had stated in his opening that he was a Bullionist. But here was a Bullionist proposing in that House to diminish the amount of bullion. His hon. Friend the Member for the University of London (Sir John Lubbock) had already called attention to this point. These £1 notes were, in part only, to be issued upon the security of bullion; and it had been admitted by the Head of the Government—and, indeed, it had been admitted by his hon. Friend—that the result of the proposal would be to diminish the amount of gold in the country. His right hon. Friend had naturally, as Chancellor of the Exchequer, looked to the amount of profit which might possibly be derived from these notes. But he himself confessed to being one of the straitlaced school of economists, and no desire for profit would induce him to lessen the extent to which our currency rested upon gold. His hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge had told the House the stupendous amount of transactions carried on by banks without any reserve of gold at all. But, notwithstanding that, it could not be understood too clearly that the whole of the vast transactions of this country rested ultimately in gold. The Bank of England was bound to find gold for its notes, and bankers were bound to find gold for their deposits. Every promise to pay was, in fact, a contract to deliver gold. The commerce of the country was conducted on that basis. His hon. Friend had called attention to the fact of the small reserves of gold existing in the country as compared with its enormous liabilities. But did not this increase the importance of avoiding any diminution of the stock of gold in the country? This decrease of that stock was a matter of the highest moment. It was well known how, in times both of external and internal pressure, gold flowed from a thousand channels into the coffers of the Bank of England, strengthening its reserve. The strain put upon gold was greater than it was before Germany had adopted a gold coinage. Gold, silver, and notes had, if he might use the phrase, been partners together, conducting jointly the business of the circulation of the world. Silver had now been thrust out of the partnership, and heavier responsibilities now rested upon gold. Hence it was more than ever important to look to a sufficiency of gold in the country. That was a matter in which they could not proceed too carefully and anxiously. His hon. Friend had referred to the motives which induced him to make his proposal. He, on the other hand, had brought forward some considerations which made him think that very strong arguments would be required to induce the House to introduce a change which would diminish the gold circulation in the country. Were those arguments strong? He admitted there were some arguments, and that some of the objections against the proposal had been successfully dealt with by his hon. Friend, especially those which related to forgeries. Nor did he base his own objections on the score of expense, but upon principles affecting the general currency of the country. As regarded the advantages which the proposals would bring about, they were alleged to be mainly in favour of the humbler classes. He thought his hon. Friend would not contend that they would bring any advantage to the richer classes. He agreed with his hon. Friend the Member for the University of London that it had not been sufficiently elaborated how the humbler classes would gain. They were told that Scotland, Ireland, and America had notes of £1 in value. It had always been a matter of notoriety that the population of Scotland had clung to their £1 notes with great tenacity; but that proved nothing as regarded other countries. Custom seemed to play a most important part in all questions of the use of different forms of money. It was urged that the transmission of small sums would be facilitated by the existence of £1 notes, and that the commissions on Post Office Orders would be saved. It might be convenient to have these notes for those purposes; but would the working classes prefer to be paid in them rather than in sovereigns? He believed it would be as hard to convince an English mechanic that the £1 note was better than a sovereign as it would be to convince a Scotchman that the sovereign was better than a £1 note. He did not feel disposed to legislate in order to make an experiment of that kind. His hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge had alluded to Germany, where the smaller notes had been abolished with a view to the introduction of gold currency, and he made an appeal to the patriotism of the House, saying that we ought not to follow Germany, either in her politics or in her financial transactions. The observation was an ungracious one, for, in point of fact, Germany had in this matter been following us. Germany had believed that in abolishing her smaller notes she had been adopting the soundest and most admitted English principles. With regard to America, the circumstances of that country were at present quite abnormal. His hon. Friend had stated the fact that an immense amount of gold had been accumulated there in order to prove that the stock of gold might increase, notwithstanding the circumstance of bank notes being issued. But his hon. Friend did not remind the House that it was the resumption of specie payments which obliged America to collect so large an amount of gold. We had not yet seen how America would settle down permanently. The resumption of specie payments, and the importance America showed she attached to a large stock of bullion, ought, in his judgment, rather to be put on the other side of the argument. His hon. Friend thought the humbler classes would receive considerable benefit from the ease with which £1 notes could be transmitted by post. In all other respects it appeared to him that gold coin was more convenient for the humbler classes than bank notes. The experience of many travellers was the reverse of that of his hon. Friend, and went to show that notes were more liable to be lost than gold; that they were less "get-at-able," and in many ways less convenient than the English sovereign. It was argued that £1 notes might be transmitted through the post in preference to Post Office Orders; but it should be remembered that if it were necessary to send odd amounts, the £1 notes would not be available. Consequently, the advantage to the humbler classes would be very slight indeed. In his judgment the arguments in favour of the proposal had been shown to be exceedingly weak. On the other hand, he had endeavoured to establish that there were strong arguments against any measure which would diminish the aggregate amount of bullion in the country, and that even the coin in the pockets of the people was an ultimate reserve which it was most important to maintain. Looking at all the circumstances, he could not vote with his hon. Friend, though he entirely acquitted him of any desire to weaken our currency system, because he knew it had few firmer supporters than himself.

Mr. Gladstone

MR. LAING said, that in discussing a question of this nature it was above all things necessary to have a clear idea of the issues which were placed before them. He did not desire to repeat the arguments the House had already heard. The question of the £1 notes might either be a very large or a very small question. Unless they could multiply the bank notes and make money for the time cheaper, so as to increase the wages of the working classes, he was afraid a great portion of those benefits to the working classes that had been pointed out would disappear. In the case of Scotland there was, no doubt, a great attachment to the notes, arising not so much from the fact that it was a piece of paper instead of a piece of gold, but very much on account of the operation of issuing £1 notes giving the banks a profit which enabled them to multiply the number of banks and provide additional banking facilities all over the country. As a Scotch Member, he should say there was no doubt that the people of Scotland were most firmly attached to the £1 note; and he thought they would encounter very serious opposition from Scotland if they attempted to abandon the system. Scotland being, as it were, a separate portion of the Kingdom, it had been possible to continue the advantages of the £1 note to that country without interfering materially with those general monetary rules that regulated the money market in London and the national relations with other countries. If the question were merely between £1 certificates as against the sovereign it would be a small question, and he thought argument would resolve itself into the question whether the loss of issuing the £1 notes would be less than the loss by the wear and tear of the coins that were in circulation. If the question were limited to the possibility of forgery it might be a fair question of investigation for any Government or Select Committee. The question of providing security against panics was one of the largest that could be raised, as that was a question which involved the whole currency system of this country, which was based exclusively on the metallic basis. That was a question on which he might say a great deal; but after the speech of his right hon. Friend it would be unnecessary for him to detain the House upon it. He concurred entirely with the remarks that the right hon. Gentleman had brought forward as to the importance of not tampering in any way with the great principles of the Act of 1844. Looking to the future, it could be denied that, seeing the wants of the nation for gold were constantly growing, that population was increasing and commerce was spreading, whilst the quantity of gold was apparently diminishing by natural causes, it was, of course, a possible question of the future whether the quantity of gold in the world might not be found insufficient for the wants of the community. When that became the case, some means might be devised to meet the difficulty; but, in the meantime, when they had a system that was working extremely well, and which was improving in its working every year, he could not imagine why they should desire at the present moment to depart from it. Many years ago there was a series of panics, and the Government were obliged to interfere and authorize deviations from the Act of 1844 in order to prevent the Bank of England from stopping payment, and to save the City of London from a great crisis. That was done by raising the rate of interest. Periodically panics had occurred which were milder and milder each time; and within the last few years they had many instances in which a slight rise in the rate of interest by the Bank of England, taken in time, had been sufficient to secure confidence and prevent anything of the nature of a crisis. They could not have a better instance than what occurred in the present year. A great financial crisis had occurred in Paris; an immense amount of over-speculation collapsed that suddenly sent a mass of international stock to the market, and it was thought it would extend to this country; but the Bank of England raised its rate of interest by successive steps up to 6 per cent, on which gold gradually flowed in from all parts of the world, and within a very short time without any perceptible disturbance or panic the Bank bullion accumulated, and the reserve rose to a point at which the whole apprehension of evil was dissipated, and they again found themselves in possession of easy money. It would be unwise, he thought, as London was becoming the central money market of the world, if they tampered with the existing system; and on those grounds he should feel bound to vote against the Motion.

MR. ANDERSON said, he desired to thank the Prime Minister for three clear principles he had stated to the House. One was that the profit of a paper circulation ought to belong to the State; the next was that they were not bound to wait for a change of this kind until there was an apparent public demand for it; and the third one was that the currency in the pockets of the people was in no sense a reserve currency of any value for any other purpose. That last he considered to be the most valuable point that had been stated in the debate. He had himself endeavoured to expose the fallacy of the contrary position in the House on several occasions, and he was pleased to see it stated so clearly by the Prime Minister. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen) endeavoured to controvert that; but he considered his argument was entirely fallacious. The right hon. Gentleman said that a reserve of golden currency in the pockets of the people acted as a reserve, and could be got out of them by means of a high interest. He denied that entirely. It might have been the case in old times when private individuals hoarded large quantities of gold; but now-a-days private individuals did not do that, they merely retained sufficient for their daily wants; therefore, no temptation of high interest would bring that out. The Prime Minister said in the event of a crisis, such as a war, legislation would be necessary to bring the reserve out of the pockets of the people, and that would be a forced paper currency, as that was the only way by which they could bring the gold coins used by the people for their daily wants in use as a national reserve. No advocate of the £1 note currency had ever desired to see a forced currency. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ripon said it would be as difficult to persuade the mechanics of England to take a £1 note in place of a sovereign as it would be to induce a Scotchman to take a sovereign in place of a £1 note. He would never wish to persuade the English mechanics to do anything of the kind; neither would he seek to force or persuade them; all he desired was to give them the option of taking it if they chose. Let them have which they liked best. The English mechanics were too enlightened not to do the same thing that every other civilized nation had done—namely, to take the symbolic in place of the actual currency. The symbolic was the scientific currency. The other was the barbarous system of mere barter. The paper note was a symbol, and was, therefore, the more scientific and more modern form of currency, and was sure to be taken when the people had the option of taking it. But what the State was bound to do was to take care the paper currency was in every respect thoroughly sound and secure, and that could be done perfectly well by legislation. He agreed with almost all his hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge (Mr. W. Fowler) had said. The only objection he had to him was that last year, when he introduced a Bill to confer the inestimable boon of paper currency on England, the hon. Member opposed it; and his hon. Friend the Member for the University of London (Sir John Lubbock) also opposed it, and in his speech to-night in opposition he endeavoured to frighten the House with a large array of great authorities. It might be a deficiency in his character, but he confessed he had not got the reverence for antique authorities that the hon. Baronet displayed. Upon any other question the hon. Baronet would be the first to say they were better able to judge for themselves than any of these antique authorities; and, as far as he was concerned, he said they had the experience of these authorities as well as their own, and there would be no advantage in living in modern days if they were not able to use the experience of those who had gone before to add to it, and to benefit from it. The advantage of having a paper currency was so great that he did not think it required any argument at all; but he admitted that, before making so great a change as that proposed, it might be well to have the advantage of some inquiry before the House. If the hon. Member had proposed an inquiry of that kind, he would have got a great deal of support for his proposal. He could not, therefore, recommend the hon. Gentleman to divide the House; but if he did he would support him.

MR. MAGNIAC said, his hon. Friend had laid himself open to the charge of raising expectations without any definite prospect of fulfilling them. There were some very novel theories current about property. They had before them a scheme for dealing with property in a way in which they had never dealt with it before to his knowledge. But, whether it was held that the State ought to adopt a system of expropriation or not, compensating the owners of property for what was taken from them, he hoped that the House would set it face firmly against any attempt to manufacture money for meeting any schemes of that kind. The hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) had told them he had no great faith in the antique authorities cited by the hon. Baronet the Member for the University of London. But, surely, the Governor of the Bank of England and other distinguished men now living, whose names he had mentioned, were not antique authorities.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present.

MR. MAGNIAC, resuming, said, that the system of the Banks Act of 1844 had come triumphantly out of whatever examination it had been subjected to, and he did not think that it had been proved to be unfit for the present time. As far as his own knowledge and experience went, he had never heard that it was contended in any quarter unconnected with the Scotch banks that £1 notes would be of benefit to the commercial classes of this country. In his opinion, it was a question not of theory, but of practice, and one for the people to decide for themselves; and although there might be a demand prevailing in Ireland or in Scotland for those small notes, that of itself was no reason why England should follow the example of those countries. He deprecated the use of small notes to be used for transmission through the post as an incentive to crime, which the institution of postal notes had been expressly created to obviate. The Prime Minister had laid it down, without qualification, that a metallic reserve in the hands of a nation was no reserve and of no use. He entirely, but respectfully, differed from so high an authority. What more ample disproof of that assertion could possibly be given than the case of France after the German War? The French Government, by a very wise arrangement, placed their Stocks at the command of every class of the community in such sums that the smallest peasant was able to buy into those securities, and they were paid for in gold—£180,000,000 going in that way into the French Treasury. In conclusion, there ought to be no alteration made in our system of currency which was not well considered and investigated by a competent Committee; and he earnestly hoped that nothing would be done which would tend to shake the confidence of the world in the English bank note.

Mr. Anderson

MR. BUXTON said, he could not but think that it would be greatly for the convenience of the people that £1 notes should be issued. In Scotland and Ireland £1 notes were not only regarded with satisfaction, but were preferred to gold. In England they would also be found useful, more especially for the transmission of small sums of money from one part of the country to another. That was shown by the demand for the Postal Orders now issued, though it was an argument against the Motion that Postal Orders were not used as currency after their issue. One great advantage would be a reduction in the heavy loss now incurred by bankers through light gold. He spoke feelingly on this subject, for, as a banker, he was one of the small body of men in the country who bore the whole loss through light gold.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. BUXTON said, he believed great profit would result to the country through the issue of these notes. No doubt, there were drawbacks to the proposition by reason of the danger of forgery and the diminution of the bullion reserve of the country. With respect to the diminution of the bullion reserve, he believed that that was a very serious objection to the proposal. The stock of gold was none too much, and a very small drain upon it might cause serious inconvenience at any moment. He should have preferred to vote for the Amendment of the hon. Member for the University of London (Sir John Lubbock), affirming the undesirability of removing the restrictions on the issue of £1 notes without careful inquiry as to the effects of the change, had it been possible to do so. As that Amendment could not be moved, he feared that he must vote against the Resolution.

MR. WARTON said, he thought that the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen) was the only consolation that could be derived from the debate, as it showed that the English mind was not yet willing to yield to the fallacies that had been so lightly brought forward. He objected to the Motion, because no Act of Parliament could make a piece of paper of any value.

MR. WILLIAMSON concurred very much with the way in which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen) had dealt with the question. At the same time, there might be some value in the proposal that £1 notes should be issued in England. If, however, they were to be issued, it must be made clear that they could only be issued by the Bank of England, and that there should be a deposit of bullion for each note issued. In that case there would certainly be an advantage to the community. It would be easier to carry in one's pocket a small bundle of notes than 20 or 30 sovereigns, and there would be a great saving in the deterioration of the coinage which at present took place by friction. If the hon. Member had limited himself to inquiry, and had omitted the word "forthwith," he should have been inclined to support the proposal; but as the matter stood he could not do so, because it was evidently the hon. Member's idea to economize the metallic currency, and that, he believed, would be a thing fraught with the utmost danger. Considering the vast extent of our commerce, the enormous amount of the transactions that took place, and the very small amount of bullion in this country used for the liquidation of our international indebtedness, the proposal, as it stood, could not but be dangerous if it were adopted. If, however, the hon. Member introduced a Resolution for an inquiry into this subject, and at the same time let the House clearly understand that he so guarded his proposals as to make the issue of £1 notes to be solely by the Bank of England, and expressly and only on the deposit of coin or of bullion, then he (Mr. Williamson) should most cordially support it, because he believed it would be one of great public advantage.

MR. W. FOWLER said, he would never advise an unsecured issue of £1 notes. As a very interesting debate had taken place, if the House would allow him, he would withdraw his Motion. ["No, no!"]

Question put, and agreed to.

Main Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

SLAVERY—THE SLAVE TRADE IN ASIA AND AFRICA.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. LABOUCHERE, who had given Notice to move—

“That, in the opinion of this House, it is improper for any British official to lend his sanction to, or to aid directly or indirectly in, retaining any person in or consigning any person to slavery,” said, that when he placed his Resolution on the Paper he had in his mind to call attention to the action of the Foreign Office and of the Consuls of Turkey and Egypt in regard to slavery in these countries rather than to any other subject; but, on looking into the matter, it seemed to him that this country was hardly in a position to make any complaints to any Foreign Government on the slavery which took place within their territories until it had entirely removed from its own the stigma of permitting slavery to exist. It had been the traditional policy of this country to put an end to slavery everywhere; but he was sorry to say that of late years it had fallen away from that traditional policy, for he found that slavery existed in many parts of the British Dominions. A Blue Book that had recently been presented to the House, treating of Slavery in Hong Kong, revealed a state of things which it was perfectly monstrous to allow to exist under the English flag. On the Gold Coast certain protected States became, after the Ashantee War, British Colonies. One was the British Colony of the Gold Coast, and the other was the Colony of Lagos. After the assumption of Sovereignty, a Proclamation was issued in the former, putting an end to what was called debt slavery; but he was credibly informed that no such Proclamation was issued in Lagos, and at the present moment there was a considerable amount of that debt slavery existing within that Colony. Then, with respect to the protected Malay States, not one word was said in the Blue Books presented of late years as regarded the slavery which they knew existed there. But there appeared in The Times of March 25 a letter from Sir Benson Maxwell, who had long been Chief Justice in these protected States, in which he stated that—have two kinds of slaves, the ordinary menial creature, and the debtor slave. There is no good reason why slavery in any form should be tolerated in our Malay possessions.”

“We govern as absolutely—nay, more absolutely—than any Crown Colony. The Malays

After that letter had appeared in The Times, a Question was put to the Under Secretary for the Colonies respecting it, and the hon. Gentleman then said that the Colonial Office was about to call the attention of the Governors of these Colonies to debtor slavery. He (Mr. Labouchere) hoped that had been done, and that they should speedily hear that not only debtor slavery, but all slavery, had ceased in these Colonies. Again, in North Borneo, which was now a State affiliated to the British Empire, provisional regulations had just been laid down respecting slaves. One was to the effect that all slaves absconding would be for the present returned to their masters, unless they could purchase their freedom, or showed that they had been cruelly treated. He hoped the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs would take these regulations into his serious consideration. The state of things existing in Hong Kong was a disgrace to this country; the Free Trade, which was said to account for its progress, included free trade in slaves; indeed, the place was literally an entrepôt for slavery in the East. The statements showing this were made by Chief Justice Smale and other authorities, and they were quite sufficient to justify us in demanding that the system should be put an end to at once. It might be inferred that Chief Justice Smale had done his best to induce the Attorney General of the Colony to institute prosecutions, and the Attorney General appeared to have held that there was no use in doing so in the present state of the law. But the law in Hong Kong was precisely the same as it was in this Metropolis; that was the effect of Ordinances passed in 1843 and 1845. A Report had been made to Chief Justice Smale by Mr. Francis, a barrister, who said that relatively there was little or no family life in Hong Kong among the Chinese, and, therefore, no legitimate demand for either adopted male children or for female domestic servitude; that from three-fourths to five-sixths of the Chinese women in Hong Kong were prostitutes or lived directly by prostitution; that the bulk of these prostitutes were slaves bought and trained up at considerable expense for the purpose; owned there, at Canton, or Macao; prostituted for the sole profit of their owners; redeemable only by purchase, and rarely able to purchase their freedom; that every Chinese woman who was not in the actual practice of prostitution engaged, if she could get the means, in buying and rearing girls for the work; that Singapore, Australia, and San Francisco were supplied from Hong Kong with prostitutes, kept women, and concubines; that the profits of this trade were so great and the demand so strong that Chinese men and women were daily tempted into a career of open crime as kidnappers of women and children to supply the demand, not sufficiently supplied by the breeders; that there was a veritable slave class, and a genuine slave trade carried on in Hong Kong, and that on a very large scale indeed; that the prosecutions under the local Ordinances only touched the fringe of this garment of crime—only the abuses that had grown out of this tolerated slavery and slave trade; and that until this slave holding and slave dealing were entirely suppressed, the grosser abuses arising out of them and incidental to them—kidnapping of women and children—could never be put an end to. Girls of 13 or 14 were brought from Canton or elsewhere, and delivered according to bargain, and as a regular matter of business, for large sums of money, which went to their owners, and frequently, it would appear, to their own parents. Their regular earnings went to the same gaolers, and the unfortunate creatures were subjects of speculation to regular traders residing beyond our jurisdiction. There were from 18,000 to 20,000 prostitutes in Hong Kong, and from 4,000 to 5,000 respectable Chinese women. Mr. Francis said—

Mr. Labouchere

“When some of the girls are sent away on account of age, new ones are got from Canton. There are about eight or ten changes a year (among 20 girls); they remove into other Chinese brothels or go back to Canton. No woman is kept in a first-class Chinese brothel after 24 years of age. Then, if they are not married, the parents (pocket mothers) take them away. What becomes of them is not known. They become, perhaps, hairdressers, servants, or prostitutes in other brothels. If these girls are not slaves in every sense of the word, there is no such thing as slavery in existence. If this buying and selling for the purpose of training female children up for this life is not slave-dealing, there never was such a thing as slave-dealing in this world.”

In October, 1879, Chief Justice Smale, from his place on the Bench, called attention to a placard offering rewards for the detention or restoration of a slave girl, and he said—

“Has Cuba or has Peru ever exhibited more palpable, more public evidence of the existence of generally recognized slavery in these hot-beds of slavery than such placards do?”

Writing in October, 1879, Chief Justice Smale said—

“The more I penetrate below the polished surface of our civilization, the more convinced am I that the broad undercurrent of life here is more like that in the Southern States of America when slavery was dominant, than it resembles the all-pervading civilization of England. Nothing less powerful than a Commission, with legislative powers to investigate and to examine on oath, will ever lay bare the evil which, from suggestions I have received, I believe to underlie our seemingly fair surface. My suggestion that the mild intervention of the law should be invoked was ignored. It was also met by the assertion that custom has so sanctioned the evil in this Colony, that they are above the reach of law, and that by custom the slavery was mild. I must leave it to the Government to decide whether there shall or shall not be investigation, and whether the status in quo of public morals in this Colony in these particulars shall be allowed to continue as one of the many evils which neither law nor legislation can cope with. That is a question which, fortunately, is not within the province of the Judge; it is for the statesman only to decide.”

And in another communication he said—

“I take shame to myself that the appalling extent of kidnapping, buying, and selling slaves, for what I may call ordinary servile purposes, and the buying and selling young females for worse than ordinary slavery, has not presented itself before to me in the light it ought. It seems to me that it has been recognized and accepted as an ordinary outturn of Chinese habits, and thus that, until special attention has been excited, it has escaped public notice. The practice is on the increase. It is in this port and in this Colony especially that the so-called Chinese custom prevails. Under the English flag slavery, it has been said, does not, cannot ever be. Under that flag it does exist in this Colony, and is, I believe, at this moment more openly practised than at any former period of its history.”

[The hon. Member read the text of a bill of sale under which a boy had been sold, and also the statement made by a Chinese girl of 14, who, at the age of 11, had been sold by her parents to a Chinaman, who in Hong Kong sold her to a young Chinese gentleman, who took her to his family house, from which she ran away, because she was beaten by her mistress.] He observed that there was a disposition to represent that these girls were well treated, and were benefited rather than injured by being thus dealt with. On that point he would quote from a judgment delivered by Chief Justice Smale in a case that came before his Court. The victim was brought into Court in the arms of an Inspector of Police. She could not stand, and was placed in a chair, much emaciated, with pale and hollow cheeks, to the eye of a non-medical man almost dying; and she then narrated the history of her sufferings. This child, of about 13 years of age, lost her father, and about a year ago her mother sold her to someone, who brought her to Hong Kong and sold her to the female prisoner. The female prisoner beat her very often, sometimes with a rattan, and sometimes with firewood, taken from the ordinary bundles of split firewood, perhaps two or three times a week. She was beaten with firewood on the 3rd of November last, when her leg was broken. She could not walk even now. Some time after that the female prisoner burnt her on the arm and hand with a hot crimping-iron. The little girl showed eight places where the marks of the burning remained. One neighbour described the beating on the 3rd of November last—that the little girl was tied up by her hands to a bamboo, which hung from the ceiling, by the clothes line by the male prisoner, and that she was beaten by the woman with a piece of firewood, described as being about 2 feet long and 2 inches in diameter. This witness saw the female prisoner strike the little girl two or three times on one of her legs; then the man struck the little girl, still tied up; and he then untied her, and on the support of her being tied up falling her the little girl fell down. It would be said, perhaps, that this was an isolated case; but Chief Justice Smale was not of that opinion. He said—

“I fear that, though it may be pre-eminently atrocious, hundreds, nay, thousands, of cases of a like kind have existed in this Colony and under the British flag.”

In Hong Kong a regular Slave Market existed for the purpose of supplying Australia and California. The price was various—bought in Hong Kong, the women cost from $50 to $150; and when sold in California, they were to be disposed of for from $250 to $350. That was stated in evidence in the course of a trial at Hong Kong. In such a matter the public opinion of an Eastern Colony was sure to be wrong, and the view taken of it by the Chinese might be gathered from a Petition published in the Blue Book. The petitioners (Natives) set forth that the decisions of the Lord Chief Justice had “put all Native residents of Hong Kong in a state of extreme terror;” the merchants and wealthy classes fearing that they might be found guilty of an indictable offence, and the low-class people that they might be deprived of a means to preserve their lives—that was, by selling children to be domestic servants. Now, his hon. Friend might, perhaps, argue that there was a defence for that state of things; and, if he did so, would probably take the line that the adoption of children was for their advantage, and that they were educated as domestic servants at Hong Kong. But there was the authority of the Chief Justice of the Colony to the effect that very few of these women became domestic servants, and that the children who were brought to Hong Kong were sold from one home to another, till at last they were exported to Australia and California. His hon. Friend, who had so often raised his voice on behalf of humanity, would, he was sure, not defend such a system now that he was in Office. He need say no more on this subject; the facts he had brought forward were incontestable, and he only hoped that the Government would do all in their power to prevent Hong Kong from becoming an entrepôt for the most infamous slavery.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND said, he thought that the House was greatly indebted to the hon. Member for Northampton for bringing this important question under the consideration of the House—a question, indeed, second in importance to none of those ordinarily brought under their notice. But he desired, before the Under Secretary for the Colonies made a full reply to the speech of the hon. Member, to point out some curious mistakes which the hon. Member for Northampton had made in his statement. In the first place, as regarded our Possessions in West Africa, he seemed to think that Lagos and the Gold Coast became protected Territories after the Ashantee War. Now, they never were protected Territories at all; but they were Crown Colonies long before the Ashantee War, and no slavery had existed in them for many years. The hon. Member complained that no Proclamation against slavery had been issued in Lagos; but there was no reason why any such Proclamation should have been issued, inasmuch as the law of England against slavery always was in force. Some States, however, bordering on the Gold Coast, we did take under our protection after the Ashantee War, and in these domestic slavery was being gradually extinguished under the conditions imposed by Lord Carnarvon. The result of Lord Carnarvon's efforts had been most satisfactory; and, as far as he (Sir Henry Holland) knew, no complaints of the existence of slavery in those protected States had been received at the Colonial Office, nor had the hon. Member for Northampton brought forward any cases. Then, as regarded the Malay States, the hon. Member had quoted from a letter of Sir Benson Maxwell, whom he stated to have been the late Chief Justice of those States. But Sir Benson Maxwell was Chief Justice of Singapore and the Straits Settlements, and had no jurisdiction over the protected Malay States. Nor had the Colonial Government, so far as he (Sir Henry Holland) knew, such absolute jurisdiction over those States as to enable them directly to enforce the abolition of domestic slavery there. But it was well known that the late Secretary of State for the Colonies took most active steps to check domestic slavery there, and those efforts had been attended with considerable success. Then, as regarded the new Company in North Borneo—as he (Sir Henry Holland) had ventured to point out in a former debate—the Charter imposed with regard to slavery the only practicable conditions which could be imposed. The Company were bound to use all their efforts to put an end, as soon as possible, to the system of domestic slavery. They could not have been called upon to put an end at once to an institution which was firmly rooted in the country, and which had existed there for years. Lastly, as regarded Hong Kong, he (Sir Henry Holland) entirely agreed with the hon. Member for Northampton in his strong condemnation of the abominable practice of selling young Chinese girls for the purposes of prostitution, and he trusted that the Colonial Office would use their best endeavours to stamp out that practice. But that practice, however iniquitous, was entirely different from the system of slavery; although, judging from what the hon. Member had said, it would almost seem as if the Chief Justice, Sir John Smale, must have confounded that system of selling for prostitution with the question of slavery, from which it was really quite distinct. It did not, however, appear whether the bill of sale, which the hon. Member read to the House, was brought before the Chief Justice in his judicial capacity. If it had been, it might possibly have been held to be null and void, and then those who relied upon it would have failed. But, at all events, as regarded slavery, the hon. Member was forced to admit that the law of England prevailed in Hong Kong; and if any case had been brought into Court, the presiding Judge would have been bound to act on that law and to free the slave. If, then, any fault was to be found, it was not in the law, but in the fact that sufficient care was not taken to see that the law was put in force. No evidence, however, was produced by the hon. Member to show that there was any failure in this respect; and even if there were, it would not bring the case within the terms of the Resolution before the House. But, although the question of slavery was immediately brought before the House, a question which he had shown to be quite distinct from that of Chinese Prostitution, he could not conclude without again expressing his earnest hope that the Colonial Office would not relax in any efforts to check that iniquitous traffic, and would not hesitate to introduce and enforce any legislation which might be found necessary for that end.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, it was matter for great satisfaction that there should be a discussion on Slavery at a time when that horrid institution was showing a new activity, and when we had just received information with regard to it from all parts of the world. That the Slave Trade was increasing at the present time was beyond doubt. From Jedda, in the Red Sea, our Consul reported that the stock of slaves was so increased by importation that prices had gone down 50 per cent, and that he could buy any number he pleased. From other quarters they had news which proved that the Circassian and Georgian slave dealings were also increasing. This was the White Slave Trade, and many of those were as fair and as lovely as the handsomest of our own people. That this trade was flourishing was chiefly due to the preference which the Turks had shown for the Circassian law with regard to slavery over their own. According to the Circassian law, the children born of slaves were themselves slaves, whereas, according to the Turkish law, the children of slaves were not slaves; The Turks, therefore, who were engaged in a general traffic in domestic slavery, habitually purchased large numbers of Circassians, especially children, and those children, being born in slavery, were themselves slaves. He reminded the House that just a year ago a Circassian female slave sought refuge from ill-treatment in the British Consulate at Larissa. In taking part in this debate his deliberate object was to encourage those of Her Majesty's Representatives in different parts of the world who did what they could at all times to uphold the doctrine of this country in reference to freedom, and to show them that when they took that course they would have the sympathy and support of the House of Commons. He was aware of the great difficulty which surrounded those who were resident in a country in which domestic slavery was practically universal; but he also knew something of what could be done, and was persuaded of the great importance in the eyes of our Representatives of having, not an evanescent, but a persistent encouragement from this House and from the people of this country when they set themselves with discretion, but with firmness, against the institution of Slavery. He did not wish to discourage efforts so praiseworthy and zealous which had long been made, and which were now being made, by the gallant Naval Forces of this country to annihilate slavery; but he had long been convinced that we should never succeed in the abolition of slavery unless our efforts, which were entirely directed against the supply of slaves, were devoted more earnestly and more thoroughly than they had been against the demand for slaves. In this case at Larissa there was no question of the ex-territoriality of the Vice Consulate. The Civil Governor told Mr. Longworth that this female slave was not amenable to the local laws while in the Consulate, but that when she went out she might be lawfully seized and restored to her owner. Upon hearing that, Mr. Longworth called the girl, and, in his own words, "told her plainly that she must return to her master." The cause of freedom would be advanced if that House would join in reproving Mr. Longworth for this flagrant disregard of the rights of this woman and the British flag. The Consul said—"The excitement and terror caused by my words on this poor woman were beyond description." He contrasted Mr. Longworth's dealings in this matter with that of the Vice Consul at Angora in a case which occurred lately of a slave girl named Hosheda. Her owner was about to sell her to some nomad Kurds, and she took refuge at the British Vice Consulate. Lord Granville telegraphed—"If the girl takes refuge at the Vice Consulate she should not be given up." It would be easy to quote much evidence to show that slavery was practically universal in European and Asiatic Turkey and in Egypt. There was a public Slave Market at Mecca, and there was a Slave Trade carried on by private brokers in every city of the Turkish and Persian Empires, including Egypt. Our operations, he held, ought to be directed against the demand for slaves. They were attempting the impossible when they supposed they could accomplish the abolition of slavery by attacking the traffic in the most remote parts of Africa from which black slaves were originally imported, while in every Mussulman city in the world, except in India and Algeria, there was a rapid and a constant and a certain demand for slaves from whatever quarter they might come. What a most painful contrast there was between effort and result, when we compared the brave energy of Captain Brownrigg with the fearful report that not fewer than 8,000 mutilated males, the survivors of 40,000 who had been subjected to the same cruelty, were annually imported into Turkey and Egypt. Consul Burton truly said that closing the Red Sea and hanging eunuch-manufacturers would not arrest slave importation into Egypt and Turkey, and that the absolute abolition of the legal status of slavery was the only effectual measure to adopt. He trusted the House would be of that opinion, and that the best efforts of the Government would be directed to that end. He believed that he had seen slaves imported under the British flag from Egypt to Turkey and from Turkey to Morocco, the slaves being entered as servants of the dealers with whom they were travelling. The Representative of Portugal reported that from the single province of Mozambique there was an average export of from 2,000 to 4,000 slaves per annum. There could be no doubt that two great centres of the Slave Trade were the cities known as "Mecca the venerated and Medina the resplendent," where, by an exception to the capitulations, no Power could place Consuls. Slavery was practised all over the coast of the Persian Gulf. It was not uncommon for slaves to take refuge on British vessels in those waters; but they were sometimes restored to their owners on the recommendation of the British political Residents. In fact, his observation led him to believe that a fugitive slave seeking refuge in a British ship had a better chance of escape if the British Crown had no Representative on the shore from which he had fled. In conclusion, he expressed an earnest hope that the European Powers would make strenuous efforts to procure the abolition of the status of slavery. He trusted all the Powers of Europe would unite with England in adopting a more robust attitude in opposition to slavery, so that we might hope, at no very distant date, to secure the abolition of that most grievous traffic.

Mr. Arthur Arnold

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, his hon. Friend the Under Secretary for the Colonies would answer that which formed the main portion of the speech of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere). He should like to say a few words in answer to what had fallen from the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Arthur Arnold) on one point that had not been touched by the hon. Member for Northampton. The first complaint of the hon. Member for Salford was that there had not been a general distribution of Slave Trade Papers. Previous to the year 1851, 2,000 Copies of those Papers were printed. The expense did not seem to be justified by the amount of interest taken in those Papers by the public. The number of the Copies was reduced in 1852. Alterations were made in the number of printed Copies in subsequent years. From 1862 to the present year about 900 Copies had been ordered. If another change was to be made on the subject, he thought it ought to be this—that, in all cases, such Papers only as were asked for should be delivered. The hon. Member for Salford made an attack, not based upon any evidence, upon Consul Longworth. The fact was, that a very large number of slaves had been emancipated through the exertions of that gentleman. That was shown by the Papers themselves. As regarded domestic slaves employed, or seeking refuge on board British merchant vessels in territorial waters of States in which the status of slavery was recognized by law, the language of the Motion was so vague that, if adopted, it would prevent the restoration by a Naval or Consular officer of any fugitive slave to his master, whatever might be the circumstances of the case. If such a rule were adopted it would be in violation of the principles of International Law; domestic slaves would flock to our ships; enormous claims for compensation would arise; and riots and hostilities would necessarily ensue. In the discussion which took place in 1876 on the Slave Trade Circular, the present Judge Advocate said—

"The Attorney General had argued that merchant ships were liable to the law of the territory in whose waters they were—a proposition which no one denied."

And the present Home Secretary said—

"The first Circular was founded on a supposed obligation on the part of a ship to submit to the local law of the port. If that was so, all he could say was that they reduced the Queen's ships to the condition of a merchant vessel, because that was the situation of a merchant vessel."

"Merchant vessels were not extra-territorial within the waters of Foreign States." As regarded British merchant vessels, it was well known that a slave did not obtain his freedom by having been on board a private ship, and that a slave who had come to this country or who had been on board a British ship on the high seas, when he returned to the place where he had been a slave, resumed, on so doing, his condition as a slave. It could scarcely be supposed, therefore, that the Motion was intended to apply to cases in which fugitive slaves were returned by Her Majesty's Naval and Consular officers to the local authorities, although thereby "retained in or consigned to domestic slavery." It might be that what was meant was that no British official in whom might be vested the exercise of jurisdiction over Natives in a country where the status of domestic slavery existed should recognize such status, and give any decision whereby such Natives should be retained in or consigned to slavery. But when could that happen? If the hon. Member referred to the probability of some of the officers of the Borneo Company being made British Consuls while the status of domestic slavery was recognized by the law of that country, and would point out that officers might be called upon to enforce that law while holding Her Majesty's Consular commission, he (Sir Charles W. Dilke) would explain that the status of domestic slavery would only exist pending its gradual extinction among the Natives. There were Courts of Justice for the Natives, in which that status would, no doubt, be recognized by the judicial officers who might preside over them. There would necessarily be also Courts of Justice for Foreigners, and in these the status of slavery would, of course, not be recognized. It was not contemplated that Consular appointments should be conferred on any officer of the Company who would preside over the Courts of Justice established for the Natives; consequently, the state of things which the hon. Member deprecated would not arise, as no officer of the Company, holding Her Majesty's Consular commission, would be called upon to recognize the status of domestic slavery, or have it in his power to retain in, or consign anybody to, slavery. In conclusion, he could only say that this subject was not only of general interest, but was one of the highest interest that could be brought before the House. No one could ever maintain that hon. Members were not entitled to bring the subject before the House from time to time; and certainly nothing but good could result from the minds of hon. Members being directed to it. It had always been the policy of this country, and he believed it would continue to be its policy, to take steps for the suppression of slavery.

MR. A. M'ARTHUR said, he could not regret that the subject had been brought before the House. The Blue Book dealing with this question showed that a system of slavery had been practised in the neighbourhood of Hong Kong, not only for domestic purposes, but also, in the case of women, for much viler uses. The highest praise was due to the Governor—Sir John Pope Hennessey—for the efforts which he had made to counteract these evils. It was true, as the Governor had pointed out, that a distinction should be drawn between the binding of boys and girls to domestic service, which was practised in that part of the world, and actual slavery. But the Governor had done all he could to vindicate English ideas and to prevent the importation into an English Colony of Chinese notions on the question of domestic service, and had laid down the principle that the parent was entitled to the support and aid of his children. There could be no doubt that slavery did exist in Hong Kong, although it was prohibited by English law. He trusted that the inquiry which was going to be held by Lord Kimberley into that matter would be made by impartial persons. He attached considerable importance to that debate, because he thought there were indications that we were not so vigorous in our efforts against slavery as we formerly were.

MR. COURTNEY said, he agreed with his hon. Friend (Sir Charles W. Dilke) in his statement that the Government viewed the purport of the Motion of the hon. Member for Northampton in a spirit of friendship. It would be admitted, he (Mr. Courtney) thought, that it had always been the desire of recent Governments to use their influence to prevent, not only slavery, but everything approaching thereto. The hon. Member for Northampton did not appear, however, to be of that opinion; and he had brought a charge against the Government which seemed to have no foundation whatever. He must point out to the House that the hon. Member had brought an extraordinary accusation against the Government. He said that he was credibly informed that slavery existed in Lagos. But he had not deemed it necessary to adduce a single fact or circumstance in support of that statement. How was it possible that the Government could meet such a charge as that? He should have thought that it would have been the duty of the hon. Member, before bringing such a charge, to make inquiry as to its correctness. It was the belief of the Government that slavery had ceased to exist, not only in Lagos, but in all the other places to which the hon. Member referred. Every attempt to revive it had been checked and punished by all recent Governments; but if the hon. Member furnished them with new facts they would cause further inquiry to be made, and take steps for the extinction of slavery where it was found to exist. The same observations applied regarding the alleged existence of slavery in the Malay States. The hon. Member complained that there were no Papers on the subject. But several Papers were published in reference to the West Coast of Africa in 1875, and many others dealing with other places had also been published from time to time. The hon. Member surely could not require that Papers on that subject should be issued year by year, when no fresh case of any description had arisen. As regarded the question of slavery in the Malay States, however, some Correspondence with the Governor of that district was in existence, and would be shortly laid before the House. The hon. Member for Northampton said he was going to rest his observations upon a substantial foundation—upon the remarks of Chief Justice Smale, and not upon the statement of any newspaper correspondent. He thought the hon. Member ought to know the value of newspaper correspondents, though he seemed to speak somewhat slightly of them. The fact was, the hon. Member used the word “slavery” with some degree of looseness. His remarks chiefly referred to Hong Kong, and to the slavery in existence there. But, as a fact, the state of things in Hong Kong, though, no doubt, deplorable, did not amount to slavery. Slavery he defined to be a condition of life in which one person was held under the authority and compelled to work for and fulfil the will of another in such a way that the subjugated person could not escape, which condition, also, the law of the country enforced. He defined slavery so, and so, indeed, it was. Nothing of the kind existed in Hong Kong, because in that city the English law prevailed. The hon. Member for Northampton considered the whole strength of his position lay in the fact that people were so bought and sold for the purpose of prostitution. Now, there were special laws in Hong Kong affecting purchases and sales for that purpose. It was enacted in 1875 that the sale or purchase of a woman or child for the purpose of prostitution, or the harbouring of any woman or child for that purpose, should be a misdemeanour. Every person, therefore, who affected to buy or sell, or to hold out that any woman or child had been bought or sold for the purpose of prostitution, was guilty of a misdemeanour. There was a vast number of people who were bought and sold for other purposes, and such sales constituted no offence. It was so in England. They all knew of the common accusation of husbands selling their wives in Smithfield, and how the practice was not unknown even at the present day. The transaction, however, was a pure nullity. That was the state of facts as at present existed in Hong Kong, and perhaps it might be the concomitant of a very dangerous state of society; but when they remembered the situation of Hong Kong, placed in the centre of a teeming population that could with difficulty obtain a livelihood, they could not be surprised at it. In quoting the Petition of the Chinese inhabitants of Hong Kong, with the view of showing how rotten public opinion there was, the hon. Member for Northampton omitted that part of the prayer in which they condemned the purchase of free people for the purposes of prostitution, and prayed that kidnapping and selling for such purposes should be severely punished. If the hon. Member had quoted this passage, he would have answered this part of his case, for the Chinese were most eager in their desire to help the Government in checking the evils which they admitted to exist. He admitted most fully the existence of the practice of buying and selling children for the purposes of adoption and apprenticeship; but he would point out that none who were so adopted could be held in servitude against their will, that they could escape, that they could apply to the Courts, and that anyone could apply on their behalf. The fact of their having been sold, Lord Kimberley had pointed out, did not deprive them of any rights. Undoubtedly the position of children so placed was one of peril, which required to be safeguarded; and his noble Friend had suggested for consideration whether the entering into agreements should be made a misdemeanour, whether specified conditions should be exacted, whether all transactions should be registered, or whether some combination of these provisions should be adopted, in order to prevent abuses. The Government would continue, not only in the task of preventing slavery, but also in doing what they could do to avert the growth of a servile class of a different race from the dominant class, conscious as they were of the dangers that were inseparable from such a condition of things.

Sir Charles W. Dilke

MR. DILLWYN said, he must confess he was generally disappointed at the tone adopted by the Under Secretary for the Colonies, and he could not help comparing the hon. Member's official utterances with those he used before he accepted Office. The hon. Member's speech was a half-hearted condemnation, amounting almost to a defence, of gross abuses. He was sure the reply of the hon. Gentleman would produce a general feeling of disappointment in the country, and he regretted the Government would not give a frank condemnation of the monstrous practices prevailing in Hong Kong. Whether there was legal slavery or not, there was practically slavery in its worst form; and the more the actual condition of things was realized the more would the country feel that the hon. Member for Northampton deserved thanks for having called attention to it.

MR. CROPPER said, that it was satisfactory that the Colonial Office had laid before the House the result of their investigations into that matter, and that it was not merely drawn from them by the investigations of any private individual. Lord Kimberley had expressed a desire that a full and trustworthy inquiry should be made into the facts and into what measures, if any, should be taken to remove the evils which might be brought to light. He had great confidence in Sir John Pope Hennessy and Sir John Smale, and he fully believed that what they would see was that in some way the system of Colonial Slavery, which it could not be denied existed at Hong Kong, would be abolished. The great evil of retaining girls in houses of ill-repute at Hong Kong was a much larger question, and it could only be removed when the question as to contagious diseases at Hong Kong was thoroughly gone into. He was convinced that the feeling expressed in England some years ago on the subject of the Slave Circular had had a good effect, and that it was now a point of honour in the Navy that wherever the British flag waved slavery was to be discouraged.

CIVIL SERVICE APPOINTMENTS—PRIVATE SECRETARIES TO MINISTERS.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR, who had given Notice of a Motion—

"That the practice of appointing clerks of the Treasury Office, and other gentlemen who have acted as private secretaries to Prime Ministers and Chancellors of the Exchequer, to important posts in Departments of the Civil Service other than the Treasury, is calculated to discourage zeal and industry in such Departments to the prejudice of the Public Service,"

said: Being precluded by the Forms of the House from moving the Resolution which stands in my name on the Paper, I rise now for the purpose of calling attention to the question, which is a very important one. I wish to disclaim, at the very outset, any desire to make any special attack upon the present Administration, because I am not aware that the practice which I ask the House to disapprove is followed by the Ministers who are now in power more than it has been followed by any of their Predecessors. Under all Governments it has been pretty much the same. My present object is not to blame or to disparage the Members of any Government, past or present, however much I may be, upon other grounds, opposed to a particular Administration. Still less do I wish to make an attack upon any of the gentlemen who have been exceptionally promoted, or to detract in any degree from the reputation they have acquired for more than ordinary strength of character, ability, and zeal. I am very ready to admit that they may all be considerably above the average. In fact, it is obvious that they must be able and qualified men; the interest of the Ministers themselves secures that in the selection of Private Secretaries they will have regard to those qualities of readiness and dispatch in business, tact, urbanity and firmness, and a certain aptitude for administrative work, which are all of the first importance in the direction of a Department, and without which they would scarcely be efficient assistants to a hard-worked Minister. There is, therefore, no question of their character or their qualifications; and the Motion which I placed upon the Paper was intended to be far removed from anything of a personal nature. I desired to bring it forward solely in the interest of the Civil Service, with which for years I was myself connected, and in which I must always take a lively interest. The Civil Service Departments may be divided into two great classes—the first class, comprising the Departments of Secretaries of State, which may be called the administrative and spending Departments; the other class, including the Revenue Departments of Customs and Inland Revenue, which are not presided over by Secretaries of State. Intermediate between these two classes is the Post Office, which partakes of the character of both, being at once a Revenue and a spending Department. And over all is the Treasury, the centre of administration and of patronage. The Departments of the first class are strong and influential; strong in the fact that their own Chiefs are Cabinet Ministers, able to protect the interests of their subordinates, and influential from the social position and connections of large numbers of their members. These Departments have, accordingly, little to complain of in consequence of the practice to which I refer. On the contrary, they sometimes, but only occasionally, receive some of those undue advantages of which the Treasury itself keeps the lion's share. A case in point, which I mention only incidentally, is that of Mr. Mitford, a clerk in the Home Office of 12 or 13 years' service, but who, having acted for some time as Private Secretary to the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department (Sir William Harcourt), was appointed by him, some six weeks ago, to be a Commissioner of Prisons, and the colleague of an experienced officer, Admiral Hornby, to the exclusion and discouragement of experienced Inspectors and Governors. The Home Office, therefore, does not suffer much, neither does the Admiralty, the Colonial Office, or the War Office; although there was a case in connection with the War Office, not many years ago, which gave rise to a discussion in this House. The Post Office, again, is able to offer a considerable resistance to any outrageous encroachments upon its own field attempted by anyone outside the Treasury. Thus, when some years ago the noble

Marquess, now the Secretary of State for India (the Marquess of Hartington), but formerly Postmaster General, after having been Under Secretary of State for War, attempted to appoint Mr. Hobart, a junior in the War Office, who was his Private Secretary, to one of the most lucrative postmasterships in the Kingdom, the design had to be given up. But when the encroachment is made by the Treasury itself, the Post Office sees its best prizes snatched away from its own officers, and given to junior outsiders. But the Customs and Inland Revenue Departments are still less influential, and their Chiefs are not Cabinet Ministers. The appointments they offer to the rapacity of outsiders are more numerous and more tempting to those who can strongly influence the actions of the chief Ministers of the Treasury; and these Departments, accordingly, are the principal sufferers. But these Departments are also the largest; and the discontent engendered by appointments such as I refer to is more extensively propagated, and, in its effects, more generally injurious to the Civil portion of the Public Service. Let me now give the most prominent cases of Private Secretaries of Ministers who have been appointed to posts of profit in the Civil Service. What are these appointments? I will content myself with a limited number of them; all notable cases, and all still in being. They are Mr. Herbert Murray, who was a clerk in the Treasury and Private Secretary to a Chancellor of the Exchequer, and who was appointed Assistant Paymaster General and a Queen's Remembrancer in Ireland, and is now Secretary of Customs, at a salary of £1,400 a-year; Mr. Algernon West, Private Secretary to Mr. Gladstone, Prime Minister, appointed Commissioner of Inland Revenue, and recently promoted to be Chairman of that Board—salaries, £1,200 and £2,000; Mr. Walter S. Northcote, who was not in the Civil Service at all, but was Private Secretary to Sir Stafford Northcote, when the right hon. Gentleman was Chancellor of the Exchequer, appointed Commissioner of Inland Revenue—salary, £1,200 a-year; Mr. Charles G. Turner, a clerk in the Treasury, appointed Accountant and Comptroller General of Inland Revenue—salary, £1,000 a-year; Mr. Stevenson Arthur Blackwood, a clerk in the Treasury, appointed Secretary to the General Post Office—salary, £2,000 a-year; Mr. Algernon Turner, clerk in the Treasury and Private Secretary to Lord Beaconsfield, Prime Minister, appointed Assistant Secretary at the General Post Office—salary, £1,500 a-year; Mr. (now Sir) Rivers Wilson, clerk in the Treasury and Private Secretary to Mr. Lowe, Chancellor of the Exchequer, appointed Controller of the National Debt—salary, £1,800 a-year; Mr. C. W. Fremantle, clerk in the Treasury and Private Secretary to Mr. Disraeli, Chancellor of the Exchequer, appointed Deputy Master of the Mint—salary, £1,200 a-year; and Mr. C. L. Ryan, who was a clerk in the Treasury and Private Secretary to the present Prime Minister, when he was Chancellor of the Exchequer, was appointed to the post of Assistant Controller and Auditor General, with a salary of £1,500 a-year. I do not wish to canvas any of these appointments; but, in order to show what may be said as to some of them, I may mention that, in regard to Mr. Ryan, he was not originally in the Treasury, but was in the Audit Office, and was not transferred to the Treasury for promotion, but was made Private Secretary. Whether he was an efficient Private Secretary or not, it is not for me to inquire; but he was afterwards appointed to the post of Assistant Controller over the heads of a considerable number of very efficient men, under whom he had previously served in a very subordinate capacity, to do very inferior work, and he was appointed, notwithstanding a protest sent in to the Treasury by these officers. The House will readily understand that Members of the Civil Service, knowing my own quondam connection with it, and knowing that they may, with perfect confidence and safety, make to me any communication they think fit as to their grievances—knowing, also, I am at least as well able to appreciate them as any other Member of the House, and that no man is more qualified to enter into them, or more desirous of having them removed—knowing this, they have, during the last two years, sent an immense number of representations to me. I have never been on the look-out for grievances. One has enough to do, in all conscience, without that; neither have I put forward a complaint at any time without having first assured myself that it was well founded. I think I may claim credit from the House for not having unnecessarily put forward any grievance in connection with the Service, unless it was clearly my duty to do so. When, the year before last, and again last year, I made some observations upon the Customs Department, I knew very well how well founded was that dissatisfaction which has now at last forced itself upon public attention, and is now known to the whole of the House, with regard to the re-organization attempted on its Staff. But when the hon. Member for Hull (Mr. Norwood) brought forward the grievances of the Outport Officers, though I appreciated fully the hardship of their position, I contented myself with a silent vote, and did not address one single word to the House upon the matter, because I saw that it was unnecessary, as it was in perfectly safe hands. But with regard to the matter to which I now wish to draw the attention of the House, I do feel that it is my duty to appeal, not to the Government, and not to the ex-Ministers, but to the House of Commons generally, and to declare, from my own knowledge and experience in the Service, that these appointments of specially-favoured individuals, however high their qualifications, to the best posts in Departments where they have never served, and over the heads of all the Staff of those Departments, produce evil effects, which it may be difficult exactly to define, but which are none the less real, and none the less injurious. Now, Sir, I have alluded to a number of these appointments, and I might have doubled the list if I had thought fit. It is obvious that each such appointment must necessarily produce great discontent, heartburning, and disappointment in the Department invaded. If the promoters had gone within the Department itself, not one man alone would have been advanced, but through every grade below him an official would have risen in his turn, and a healthy tone would have been imparted to the entire office, with that stimulus to exertion which the sight of fair promotion is always calculated to engender. But with the introduction of an outsider from the Treasury, you have first a disappointed man in the person immediately superseded, you have discontent at every step in the ladder below him, where men have been baulked of anticipated promotion, and you have a sense of injustice permeating that branch of the Service which naturally tends to render the entire Staff sullen and inert. The Treasury Staff secures the whole advantage, for the man removed from Downing Street obtains for himself extraordinary advancement, and his removal secures an improvement in the position of all below him on the Treasury list. It will, Sir, be in the recollection of many hon. Members of this House that during the last Parliament the House was invited, on the Motion of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. John Holms), to express its opinion upon an individual case somewhat akin, but not altogether on all fours, with the case to which I allude. At that time Lord Beaconsfield saw fit to appoint a junior from the War Office to the headship of the Stationery Office—I mean Mr. Pigott. Knowing Mr. Pigott personally, I was, for his own sake, glad of his advancement, and congratulated him upon it, and I claimed for Mr. Pigott the well-earned credit of having acquitted himself singularly well in a difficult and responsible post. But the hon. Member for Hackney would have been inclined, if he had been a friend of Mr. Pigott's, to congratulate him also, and he probably would have been ready to give that gentleman the credit which is his due. But the terms of the hon. Member's Motion were—

Mr. Arthur O'Connor

“That the recent appointment of Controller of Her Majesty's Stationery Office is calculated to diminish the . . . interest and zeal of officials employed in the Public Departments of the State.”

The hon. Member pointed out that Mr. Pigott had been Private Secretary to several Under Secretaries of State, and denounced the appointment as unfair to the country, and unfair to the Civil Service. The hon. Member for Wenlock (Mr. A. Brown), in seconding the Motion, said that the appointment must tend to discourage all those gentlemen who had been superseded, and could not be for the benefit of the Public Service. It fell to the Chancellor of the Exchequer of that day to say what he could in defence of his Chief. With regard to the personal qualifications of Mr. Pigott, he had not a very difficult task; but he went on to contend on the general question that—

“It was not a necessary rule that promotion must always take place within each Department, and reasons might easily be suggested why a man might be advantageously brought in from another Department. He would come with a fresh mind, and bring a fresh eye to bear on any abuses which might exist.”—[3 Hansard, ccxxxv. 1338.]

I am prepared to admit that there is a great deal of force and a certain amount of truth in that statement; but what did the right hon. Gentleman the present Secretary of State for War (Mr. Childers) say in reply? Mr. Childers said—I quote from Hansard—

“That he was not at all disposed to regard the affair from the point of view of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (the Chancellor of the Exchequer). At a time when they were doing their best to improve the status of the Civil Servants, it would be an unfortunate course to adopt, and altogether a departure from sound principle and common practice, if they were to say to men who had nearly reached the top of the tree:—‘No matter how long your services, or how great your efficiency may be, you will not be promoted to the headship of your Department, but we shall take a junior clerk out of another office who knows nothing about the business and appoint him over you, in order to have the advantage of a fresh mind.’”

He went on to say—

“He did not know how far that doctrine might be carried; but if a man was to be appointed, not because of his knowledge and experience, but because he came from somewhere else, and knew nothing of the particular business he would have to discharge, then, indeed, it would be a sorry look-out for the members of the Civil Service, who entered through the painful door of Competitive Examination in the hope that if they did their duty they would be promoted to the highest offices in the Department in which they were placed.”—[Ibid., 1339-40.]

Such were the sentiments of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War then, and such are his sentiments now. His action in respect of recent promotions in the War Office has been in accordance with them. Throughout that debate it was unanimously admitted that Mr. Pigott's character was of the highest; there was no imputation upon it, and no one questioned that his abilities were equal to his character. The House of Commons did not consider that question at all. It put it aside, and the decision was arrived at upon totally different grounds. The Motion of the hon. Member for Hackney was carried against the Government. And why was it carried? It was carried because the general sense of the House was that the appointment was given not altogether because of the qualifications of Mr. Pigott, high as they might be, but also because, over and above that, there were some kind of relations of a personal or political character between Lord Beaconsfield and Mr. Pigott or that gentleman's family, and that, but for these relations, the appointment would not have been made. Lord Beaconsfield afterwards, in his place in the House of Lords, made an explanatory statement, and emphatically denied that any such relations existed. On that explanation, and solely and only because of that contradiction, this House, with a loyalty and generous promptitude which did it honour, rescinded the vote. The House on that occasion was not only loyal and generous, but its position was strictly logical and as simple as a syllogism. Such a syllogism reduced to the simplest form would be: The appointment of a gentleman to the headship of an important office, in which he has not served, over the heads of the Staff of that Department, if made on account of his personal relations with the Minister in whose gift the appointment lies, is calculated to diminish the interest and zeal of officials employed in Public Departments of the State. That is the major premiss. The minor was this. Mr. Pigott was so appointed to be Controller of the Stationery Office. This the House accepted on the representation of the hon. Member for Hackney; and, having so accepted it, the House drew the logical conclusion in the shape of the Resolution which the hon. Member submitted. But when it was shown, as Lord Beaconsfield showed, that the minor premiss was false, the House properly abandoned its conclusion, and rescinded its vote. But what I want to point out is this—that it never abandoned its major premiss, and that, if Mr. Pigott had been Lord Beaconsfield's own Private Secretary, such a defence could not have been made, and the vote would have stood. I take it, therefore, that the vote on that occasion may be regarded as a proof that the House is prepared to condemn any such appointments, which would not have been made if the recipient of the benefit had not stood in some close personal relation to the Minister in whose gift the appointment lay. Now, there voted on that occasion, in support of the Motion of the hon. Member for Hackney, as shown by the Division List—the Hon. Evelyn Ashley, Mr. Thomas Brassey, the Right Hon. John Bright, Lord Frederick Cavendish, Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, Leonard H. Courtney, Sir Charles W. Dilke, the Right Hon. John G. Dodson, Henry Fawcett, Sir Charles Forster, the Right Hon. W. E. Forster, Sir William Harcourt, Arthur Divett Hayter, Sir Henry James, Lord Kensington, G. Osborne Morgan, Anthony J. Mundella, the Right Hon. Dr. Lyon Playfair, and George Otto Trevelyan. Now, Sir, that was in the last Parliament, of which I was not a Member, and, therefore, I cannot be supposed to know anything about the individuality of the persons to whom these names belong; but the list induces me to think that many present occupants of the Treasury Bench are not altogether indisposed to give a mental adhesion to the principle of my Motion. But, Sir, it may be said by those who do not agree with the majority of the present Ministry with reference to some of their appointments, that the gentlemen promoted had served as Private Secretaries to successive Ministers of different Parties, and that, therefore, no charge of undue partiality can be brought against the Minister who actually makes the beneficial appointment, because he is promoting a gentleman who occupied the same post with regard to his Predecessor as he did with regard to himself. But I may point out that any man who makes use of that argument—and it has been made use of on former occasions—by so doing entirely misses the force of the complaint which is made. It has absolutely nothing to do with the question. What matters it to the Staff of the Customs that the man who takes the prize of their Department has been Private Secretary first to one Minister and then another? Tory patronage or Liberal patronage, it is all one to them if the Treasury Staff is benefited always at their expense. Then, again, we may be told that these gentlemen are all singularly able men, and specially qualified beyond others for the posts to which they are translated. But, surely, we are not expected to believe—and I hope the House will not believe, and I am certain the Civil Service will not believe—that, from some unexplained and mysterious cause, one Department is so provided with an abnormally gifted Staff, that from its own ranks it is able to furnish a regular and constant supply of officials pre-eminently fitted to occupy all the most lucrative posts in other Departments, while not a single instance can be adduced of a junior of the Customs or Inland Revenue Department being recognized as so gifted as to be fit for preferment to the Treasury itself. No, Sir; however gifted an officer in the Inland Revenue Department may be, however long and faithful his service, however fully qualified he may be, by work and experience, to obtain one of the prizes which he is legitimately entitled to hope for, he must be a man of marvellously sanguine temperament if he does not find his zeal chilled and his assiduity clogged by the consciousness that when within reach of his goal he may be called upon to place his knowledge and his capacity at the command of a junior from the Treasury, who, with half his service and none of his special experience, will supplant him in the post which he has fairly earned. It was well remarked, some three weeks ago, in an article in The Times newspaper, that—

Mr. Arthur O'Connor

“The mere sense that years of labour and application may, and probably will, go for nothing in procuring promotion to the highest posts is the most serious damper to departmental zeal that can well be imagined.”

That is the result of my experience. I scarcely like to refer to a third argument—for it scarcely deserves the name of argument—in favour of some of these appointments; but I allude to it because it will possibly be put forward on this occasion—namely, that the man who has passed the whole of his service in one Department is sure to have his favourite hangers-on and favourites, who will be certain to establish a clique around him, which will influence promotion for the benefit of themselves or their friends. It is scarcely worth mentioning at all; but, I would answer, it is precisely this cliqueism of the Treasury that we object to; and, besides, an outsider is just as likely to be swayed by his likings and dislikings as another, while he cannot possibly be so well able to form a correct judgment of the qualifications of his subordinates as that man can who has watched their career for years. If cliqueism is what it is necessary to prevent, it is very much more necessary to prevent it in the Treasury than in any other Department. Cliqueism in a Department may produce evils, and unquestionably it has done so; but the evils produced by a clique in a Department are confined to the Department itself, whereas cliqueism in the Treasury extends its baneful influences all over the Services. In dealing with this question, I have been told that I am dealing with a difficult and a delicate question. I have endeavoured to avoid the least expression which might be calculated to irritate or provoke anything of personal feeling; and if I have made use of any expression calculated to produce such an effect, I have done so unwittingly. I have brought forward the matter, not for the purpose of attacking any Minister, or of offending any gentleman who may have been previously promoted; but solely in the interest of the Public Service. I have pointed out that the Treasury clerks who have acted as Private Secretaries are apparently endowed with abilities far exceeding those of all other clerks and Private Secretaries in the Public Service. It is a good thing for a young man in the Treasury, when a good post falls vacant, to be Private Secretary to a Minister, and to have his merits recognized; but it is not necessarily for the good of the Public Service that he should be rewarded with the prize post of another Department. It is a practice which has produced evil effects in the past, and must continue to produce evil effects as long as it is continued. I appeal, therefore, to the House of Commons—not to the present Ministry, but to the House of Commons—at least to do their duty in providing safeguards for our great Public Departments, and, by so doing, promoting the general interests of the public.

MR. WARTON said, he had no intention of following the hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) into all he had said upon the subject, because he was quite prepared to admit that, with regard to both political Parties, very much the same system was pursued in reference to these appointments, and neither Party could reproach the other as to the course that was taken. The Government were now engaged in dealing with corrupt practices at elections, with a view of rendering electoral contests more pure in future; and they were imposing heavy penalties upon venal candidates and agents. Yet it nevertheless appeared that they practised analogous arts themselves in the distribution of patronage. His object, however, in rising was not to enter into the cases which had been submitted to the House by the hon. Member; but rather to call attention to a matter that occurred a very short time ago. He had no doubt that it was sometimes possible to find in a Department a man fitted for any place—a man of super-eminent ability, who was naturally fitted to fill any position. There was, however, an Order in Council which provided for the promotion of these extraordinary geniuses, so that their services should not be lost to the public. He referred to the Order in Council dated 4th of June, 1870, in reference to promotion in the Civil Service; and the 7th Rule of that Order was as follows:—

“In case the Chief of a Department to which a situation belongs, and the Lords of the Treasury shall consider that the qualifications in respect of knowledge and ability deemed requisite for such situation are wholly or in part professional, or otherwise peculiar, and not ordinarily to be acquired in the Civil Service, and the said Chief of the Department shall propose to appoint thereto a person who has acquired such qualifications in other pursuits, and in case the said Chief of the Department and the Lords of the Treasury shall consider that either for the purpose of facilitating transfers from the Redundant List, or for other reason, it would be for the public interest that examination should be wholly or partially dispensed with, the Civil Service Commissioners may dispense with examination, wholly or partially, and may grant their certificate of qualification upon evidence satisfactory to them that the said person possesses the requisite knowledge and ability, and is duly qualified in respect of age, health, and character.”

He had felt it his duty, in the month of February last, to call attention, by a Question to the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General, to an appointment made by him of a gentleman who had been acting in the capacity of Private Secretary to himself. That person had been appointed, in defiance of all the safeguards provided by this Rule—a person neither qualified by age, nor distinguished by ability, and not in the Public Service at all, to a position in the Post Office. If hon. Members would look at the Rule he had just read, they would see at once how far the Postmaster General, in making this appointment, had obeyed the only Rule which could shield him from the charge of improper favouritism. The individual in question certainly did not come under the first part of the Rule or Order. There was neither any wonderful amount of knowledge or ability possessed by the gentleman who was appointed by the Postmaster General; and if it was for the public interest that an examination should be wholly or in part dispensed with, surely it was necessary that there should be some qualification as to age and so forth. Yet this person was considerably beyond the specified age, and possessed neither the qualification of ability, public service, or age. He (Mr. Warton) had put a Question to the Postmaster General on the subject, and the only answer he received was that he did not know what the age of the gentleman was. But there were hon. Members who recollected what Ministers said from time to time, and who occasionally brought them to book at a moment when it was not quite convenient to be reminded of their former statements. He had considered it his duty to move for a Return of the age of the gentleman who had obtained exemption from the stipulations of the Rule laid down in 1870. The Return was granted as far back as February last; but the Minister had not chosen to comply with it, and no steps had been taken to produce it.

Mr. Warton

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: The hon. and learned Member who has just sat down (Mr. Warton) has kindly stated that he is ready to make every allowance, both to the present and to any other Government, for the difficult circumstances under which they are required to exercise their political patronage. I regret very much that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister is not present to answer any attack which may be made upon him in regard to this particular question; and I can assure the House that the absence of my right hon. Friend is not intentional, but that it is simply owing to the fact that he did not expect that this question was likely to come on. I hold that no function of a Minister of State is more important than the exercise of the higher class of patronage in connection with appointments in the Civil Service, because the efficiency of the Civil Service depends mainly upon the character of the appointments which are made. From time to time these appointments have been called in question. It is perfectly proper that that should be the case, and that, if necessary, the person who has made them should be held strictly responsible and called to account. But I would venture to say that of all the appointments which have been made by the present Government, those which have been made by the Prime Minister, although I am not here to speak upon his behalf, are the least open to any challenge whatever. The hon. and learned Member opposite (Mr. Warton) has thought fit to make an attack upon my right hon. Friend the Postmaster General for an appointment which he has made in the Post Office, in connection with a gentleman who had previously occupied the position of his Private Secretary. It will scarcely be credited that the appointment thus called in question was not one of any important character whatever, but simply to a subordinate clerkship in the Post Office. I think I shall be perfectly within the recollection of the House, when I say that, after the explanation of my right hon. Friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Fawcett), the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton) is alone the hon. Member who continues to regard the appointment as unsatisfactory. I think there are very few Members of this House who will be of opinion that the faithful services rendered by the gentleman in question to my right hon. Friend the Postmaster General did not deserve the small recognition which they have received. As I have said, the patronage of the higher class appointments in the Civil Service is a very important question. I fully recognize the force of the observation of the hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. A. O'Connor), that it is discouraging to any branch of the Civil Service to find that they have been deprived of their well-deserved hopes of advancement. But the appointments which have been made in the Inland Revenue Department show that the Prime Minister is by no means insensible to that consideration. For instance, the appointment of the present very able Vice Chairman of the Board of Inland Revenue has, for the first time, placed a man who has fought his way from the very bottom of the Service in that responsible and important position. It is even more important still, than any other consideration that can be named, that the best man should be selected for such a post. The hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. A. O'Connor) has, at some length, dwelt on what he considers the unfair proportion of lucrative posts which have been awarded for political services to gentlemen connected with the Treasury. I was somewhat surprised that the hon. Gentleman did not illustrate his remarks by a reference to the Treasury itself; but it is a remarkable fact that for many years the Treasury has not had at the head of its own permanent Department a Member selected from the Treasury itself. Sir Ralph Lingen is not a Treasury man; his immediate predecessor, Mr. Hamilton, was not a Treasury man; and Sir Charles Trevelyan, who was the predecessor of Mr. Hamilton, was not a Treasury man. The reason of this has been that the head of the Treasury has felt that it was a most important object to obtain, in this responsible position, the man who was the best man for the Office; and, therefore, the Government of the day has altogether disregarded what the hon. Member has spoken of as the natural feeling of the Department in looking forward to promotion. I could illustrate the course which has been pursued still further; but I do not think that it is really necessary. The hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. A. O'Connor) adverted at considerable length to the harm which he said was effected by Mr. Pigott's appointment; and he has called attention to the Resolution which was passed by this House in reference to that appointment, a Resolution in favour of which I myself voted. Now, that appointment was of a most important nature, and the accusation which was made was that it was conferred not on account of service or ability, but because of the close personal relationship which existed between the Minister by whom it was made and the individual on whom it was conferred. I am not ashamed of the vote which I gave in favour of the Resolution. It appears to me to have been a most reasonable vote, if the appointment was made simply on account of personal relationship. Under such circumstances, I hold that such an appointment would be a bad appointment. At the same time, I do not hold that it is necessarily a bad appointment because the man appointed happens to have a personal relationship with the Minister by whom the appointment is made. Personal relationship should, by no means, be a matter of disqualification; but the appointment should be fairly judged upon its merits, and upon its merits solely. I do not think, after the explanations that were made, that the appointment really came within the terms of the Resolution which was subsequently passed by this House, and afterwards rescinded. It appears to me that the hon. Member has also been inconsistent in the treatment of the case of Mr. Herbert Murray. It so happens that Mr. Herbert Murray never had any personal relationship whatever with the Prime Minister. I believe that Mr. Murray was not even known to the Prime Minister, except by reputation as one of the most able of the members of the Civil Service.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: I hope the noble Lord will excuse me if I interrupt him. I did not ground anything upon the particular appointment of Mr. Herbert Murray. I only mentioned his case incidentally with other appointments.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: Then I have some difficulty in following the hon. Gentleman, because I certainly understood him to complain of the appointment of Mr. Herbert Murray. I understood him to complain that Mr. Herbert Murray, not having belonged to the Department to which he was appointed, had been selected over the heads of other Civil Servants; and all I have to say is, that I do not see how the Prime Minister could have been actuated by improper partiality towards Mr. Herbert Murray, seeing that he had had no previous acquaintance with him. The appointment was made for this reason, and this reason only—that, able as the officers of the Customs are, as there were important changes in view, it was considered desirable to have a man from the outside, who should be able to view the difficult questions under consideration from a different standpoint from one who had been brought up in the Department. And I venture to say that the appointment will be justified before long. The hon. Gentleman has complained not only of appointments from the Treasury generally, but of the appointments of Private Secretaries. The idea that Private Secretaries are gentlemen appointed simply because they are connections or friends of the Minister is an antiquated one, and has long since been exploded. So very much of the personal convenience of the Minister, and of the possibility of his discharging his duties, depends upon his appointing the man best fitted for the post, and best qualified to aid in the discharge of the duties of the Department, that such appointments can no longer be called in question. The Minister who has the appointment to make naturally looks out, in his own interest and convenience, for the best man he can get. I will take the case of a gentleman to whom the hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. A. O'Connor) has referred—Mr. West. Mr. West, when he was first appointed by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister as his Private Secretary, was not in the Treasury; but he was simply selected for the office of Private Secretary because, from all my right hon. Friend could learn, he was the man best fitted for the post. He discharged his duties in the most able manner, and, having proved himself to be so thoroughly qualified for that position, he was made a Commissioner of the Board of Inland Revenue; and when the post of Vice Chairman of the Board became vacant, he had so well performed his duties that Lord Beaconsfield, who had had no connection with him in a private capacity, appointed him to the vacancy.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: Lord Beaconsfield refused for a long time to promote Mr. West.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: The hon. Member is very ingenious in discovering a discrepancy with regard to the facts. I venture to say that anyone who knows anything about the working of the Department is fully aware that the reason why Mr. West was promoted to the Vice Chairmanship was, that he was looked upon as the best man for the post, and I will add that the appointment has been amply justified by the services which Mr. West has since rendered. I have already said that it is well Ministers should be called to account for the manner in which they discharge the important function of exercising patronage in regard to high appointments. The names which the hon. Member has read out contain those of some of the most able members of the Civil Service; and they afford convincing proof that the high function of patronage has, at any rate, in their case, neither been disgraced nor badly discharged. The hon. Member has referred to the case of Mr. Ryan. I appeal to every hon. Member who has sat upon the Public Accounts Committee to say how the important duties which fall to the lot of Mr. Ryan have been discharged. It would be absolutely impossible to obtain a better man. I could go through the other names which have been referred to by the hon. Member—Mr. Fremantle, Mr. Rivers Wilson, Mr. Stevenson Blackwood, and others—but all I will say is, that the Ministers who appointed them ought to be proud of having done so, and that there is nothing to regret or be ashamed of in appointing them.

Lord Frederick Cavendish

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he wished to offer a few words in confirmation of the view which the noble Lord (Lord Frederick Cavendish) had expressed. It had been his duty for some time to act as Secretary to the Treasury; and when he arrived at the Department he found it necessary to select a Private Secretary from amongst gentlemen in the office. This gentleman was, to all appearances, adverse in politics to himself, but possessed the best qualifications for the appointment—that was to say, great experience and knowledge of the office, added to a spirit of loyalty to the Department and to the State. It was urged that the Administration might suffer from the Party politics of gentlemen appointed to these offices; but, with his experience in administration, he could say that in his Department, no matter what the politics of gentlemen might be, their one desire and object was to serve the State and their superiors in office with vigour, loyalty, and perfect diligence. During the four or five years that he was Secretary to the Treasury, he was served, and the Exchequer and the State were likewise served, by a gentleman of the highest possible credit in the position which he then occupied—a gentleman who was since promoted to the position of Secretary to the Governor General of India. This gentleman was no sympathizer with any of his (Mr. W. H. Smith's) political views, but was, on the contrary, his political opponent; but, notwithstanding that, he served him with fidelity as Private Secretary, in which capacity he regarded him not so much as he did in the light of an important officer doing his duty to the Government and the State. He understood the hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. A. O'Connor) to refer to Mr. Herbert Murray, who was an officer in the Treasury Department in Dublin. It was a matter of great regret to him (Mr. W. H. Smith), when he heard that it was the intention of the present Government to remove that gentleman from the position which he held in Dublin, and which he exercised with so much advantage to the public. It would be a very hard thing, indeed, if, because an officer had done his duty to the State in one position, he was not to be promoted to another—in other words, that Mr. Herbert Murray should be disqualified for any other position in the Public Service. Reference had been made to the fact that gentlemen who had filled positions in one office had been promoted to positions in another. He would only quote the case of the Permanent Secretary to the Treasury, who was advanced to his present position from that of Under Secretary in the Education Department. This was an instance of the advantage of being able to remove gentlemen from one Department and utilize their services in another. He could say from his own experience that it was very much to the advantage of the Public Service that it should be possible to move gentlemen in this way, and that there should be no exclusive right that promotion should follow from step to step in any one Department. If a contrary rule were laid down, the Public Service would, in his opinion, suffer exceedingly; and, therefore, he trusted that the House would give its sanction to the principle that the responsibility in these matters must lie with the Minister in whom the patronage rested. If that Minister made a mistake in the exercise of his patronage, the consequences of that mistake would fall upon himself. He ventured to say that, if mistakes were occasionally made, it was better, on the whole, that some should occur than that it should be the recognized right of any Department to have a monopoly of the highest posts in that Department. He abstained from expressing any opinion whatever upon the appointment which the Prime Minister had thought it right to make, because that was a matter which must remain for his discretion alone; but he might be permitted to express his regret that Mr. Herbert Murray should be removed from Dublin, because he was doing good work there; but, inasmuch as the responsibility in that matter rested with the Prime Minister, he considered that the present arrangement ought not to be disturbed.

MR. O'DONNELL said, when he saw right hon. Gentlemen rising to take part in the discussion of this subject, which naturally excited the sympathies both of the actual occupants of Office and those who expected to be in Office again, it occurred to him that it was time to give way. The present was a case in which it was likely that the old Parliamentary saying would be verified, that when the Front Benches did agree their unanimity was wonderful. They had before them an example of the great value which the Government attached to this very important class of patronage, and he was not surprised at that, because it was, undoubtedly, an important branch of the patronage of which they were the dispensers. He by no means wished to convey that he believed in the theory that, in every case in which they exercised their powers of patronage in this respect, they must necessarily be in the wrong; but he had been struck, as anyone must be, by the remarkable manner in which some members of the Civil Service, and sometimes those who were not members of it, found themselves in a position to have their merits closely scanned by the dispensers of patronage, and to have those merits recognized in a degree and manner in which other Civil Servants did not succeed. He referred to those Civil Servants who spent long and laborious lives in the ordinary work of administration, and who, however much they might deserve the confidence and praise of their immediate superiors, were overlooked, because they did not happen to be brought within the charmed circle which surrounded the high dispensers of patronage in the Service. He had listened with great interest to the speech of the noble Lord the Secretary to the Treasury (Lord Frederick Cavendish), which certainly rose to the level of the occasion. But, at the same time, he did not think the noble Lord could have believed that hon. Members, in raising this question, were bent on ascribing bad motives to anyone on account of the appointments referred to. It was not bad motives that hon. Members found fault with; but the little foibles and weaknesses of human nature, as displayed by the dispensers of the powers of patronage. The speech of the noble Lord consisted partly in prophecy, and partly in solemn declarations that the best men were always chosen for these appointments. With regard to the prophecy, he was not sufficiently acquainted with the future to be able to test the accuracy of the noble Lord's vaticinations; but with regard to the declaration that the best men were chosen, no doubt, men were selected who, it was believed, would justify the choice made, although, by a remarkable coincidence, these fortunate Private Secretaries to Prime Ministers and other high personages were not promoted to the positions in which, as the House was informed, they were so much required, until just before the departure from Office of the Prime Minister to whom they acted as Private Secretaries, and who, while their services as Secretaries were required, did not see the necessity of promoting them over the heads of others. It was only when irreconcilable constituencies removed the Prime Minister that he thought of the merit of his Private Secretary, and at once promoted him to a position of £1,500 or £2,000 a-year. He (Mr. O'Donnell) had no doubt that, as a rule, Private Secretaries who were promoted were men of capacity. It was not likely that they would be chosen as Private Secretaries without capacity; and, therefore, that question need not be raised. The question was that, in the ordinary service of the State in various Departments, there were men who, by length of service, were working their way to the top, and were close to the top—men of equal ability with these Private Secretaries—who had their chances of promotion stopped on a sudden by someone being brought into the office from the immediate vicinity of the dispensers of power of the day, who might be able men, but who had not served long and well in the Department in which they obtained such high promotion. The noble Lord the Secretary to the Treasury had challenged his hon. Friend (Mr. Arthur O'Connor), who brought this question before the House on the present occasion, to say anything, if he had anything to say, against the recent appointment of Mr. Young to the position of Deputy Chairman to the Board of Inland Revenue. There was nothing to be said against that appointment, but against the system of appointment, for, if the merit of service alone had been considered, Mr. Young ought to have received promotion a very long time before. A Paper had been placed in his (Mr. O'Donnell's) hands, written by someone who appeared to be acquainted with the facts, and it gave the history of the appointment of Mr. Young to the following effect:—It seemed that Mr. Young was one of the best Secretaries which the Inland Revenue Office had seen for a generation, notwithstanding that, when it was deemed advisable to promote Mr. Algernon West, the Premier of that day, who was also the Premier of the present day, did not hesitate to appoint him to the position of Commissioner in the Inland Revenue Department, over the head of Mr. Young. Again, when, after a while, the merits of Mr. Northcote appeared to the Chancellor of the Exchequer of another Administration to require marked appreciation, Mr. Northcote was appointed Commissioner to the Board of Inland Revenue, again over the head of Mr. Young. Then, when Mr. Charles Herries was obliged to retire from the Board on account of ill-health, it was found absolutely necessary to promote Mr. Young, over the head of one Commissioner who had been promoted over his head without any previous service. The conclusion was, therefore, that Mr. Young's promotion was delayed as long as possible; that Mr. Algernon West, Private Secretary, was brought into the Department over his head previously, as was also Mr. Northcote, doubtless a very capable gentleman, but who, he (Mr. O'Donnell) believed, had not possessed the advantage of being a member of the Civil Service at all, until he was bombarded into the position of Commissioner of the Inland Revenue. Under the circumstances, he could not but think that the noble Lord had put forward a somewhat unfortunate example of the present system of promotion in the case of Private Secretaries. The fact remained that a surprisingly large number of Secretaries, clerks in the Treasury, and gentlemen in the immediate vicinity of the chief dispensers of power and patronage, had obtained promotion over the heads of old, tried, and experienced members of Departments. The right hon. Gentleman the late First Lord of the Admiralty (Mr. W. H. Smith) left to the present Prime Minister the entire responsibility of the appointment of Mr. Herbert Murray to his present position, and regretted he should have been removed from Dublin, where he regarded him as the right man in the right place. That gentleman had been rather fortunate in his career of promotion. He had been promoted to the Assistant Postmastership, and afterwards to the Secretaryship of the Customs Board, with the present salary of £1,400 a-year. He could assure the right hon. Gentleman the late First Lord of the Admiralty that, in the general opinion of the Service in Ireland, Mr. Herbert Murray was by no means that success, departmentally or socially, which the right hon. Gentleman seemed to imagine. Few interesting strangers from England ever earned less personal favour from the Staff of Irish officials than Mr. Herbert Murray, and it was not from Dublin that any wish would be expressed to have Mr. Murray back again. He (Mr. O'Donnell) understood that the only real justification for Mr. Murray's present appointment was that he was free from the traditions and free from the experience of the Customs Board; he had been specially selected for the purpose of pressing upon the Customs officials an entirely new view of Customs policy which the present Chancellor of the Exchequer thought it advisable to adopt. If Prime Ministers would promote their Private Secretaries, as a rule, at some date much earlier than their own approaching retirement, there would be much less ground for the suspicion that the promotions were made as a reward for faithful service as Private Secretaries to the Prime Minister, in which capacity they could be no longer retained. He could assure hon. Gentlemen sitting on both Front Benches that the dissatisfaction in the Service generally was extreme at the habitual interruption of promotion; at the habitual disregard of the merits of experienced officers; and at the habitual way in which private acquaintance, if not personal affection, seemed to interfere with the claims of the old and experienced servants of the State. Both the Government and the Opposition Front Bench could depend upon the applause and the votes of the Parties which they were in the habit of leading, upon this, as upon every question; but the fact remained that there was a wide-spread dissatisfaction in the Public Departments at the manner in which all the best prizes of the Public Departments seemed to be reserved for gentlemen within the immediate cognizance of the occupants of the Treasury Bench. The occupants of the Treasury Bench might assure the House in perfect good faith that they always desired to choose the best men; but so long as they seemed to confine their appreciation of the best men to the men whom they happened to know best in their own immediate circle, so long would that dissatisfaction in the Public Service continue. If it was possible to appoint any constitutional test by which the opinions of the Civil Servants at large could be laid before the House, he was persuaded the result would be something startling. They who had the advantage of the explanations of the right hon. Gentleman, of course, did not for a moment entertain the idea that any unworthy favouritism had prompted the appointments under review; but amongst the mass of Civil Servants who had not the same opportunities of becoming convinced of the entire disinterestedness with which the occupants of the Treasury and Front Opposition Benches devoted themselves to the service of the State there was considerable doubt as to the impartiality of these appointments. He hoped that out of regard for the feelings of the public servants at large, every effort would be made in the future by the Treasury Bench to give, more frequently, chances of promotion to those servants of the State who seemed to have earned promotion, not in the immediate vicinity of Ministers, but by hard service, and by gradual rise in the State Departments. A few well-advertised instances of promotion as a result of long service and merit within a Department would go an immense way towards removing the impressions which a long series of, to outsiders, strange appointments had produced upon the Civil Service at large.

Mr. W. H. Smith

Motion, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," by leave, withdrawn.

Committee deferred till Monday next.

Mr. O'Donnell

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (re-committed) BILL.—[BILL 113.]

(Mr. Hibbert, Secretary Sir William Harcourt.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House will, upon Tuesday next, at Two of the clock, resolve itself into the said Committee."—(Lord Frederick Cavendish.)

MR. CHAPLIN said, he rose to object to the Motion, and to repeat the protest which he made last week against what they must term those violent inroads upon the rights of private Members at that early period of the Session. ["Oh, oh!"] He hoped hon. Members opposite would allow him to express his opinion. He spoke on behalf of private Members, and he protested against the assumption of their time by the Government. He was bound to say that, after the announcement made that morning by the Prime Minister, he could not think hon. Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House could be surprised at the course he was adopting. They had been told by the Prime Minister that their Tuesdays were to be taken for the purpose of proceeding with Resolutions which were not only repugnant and obnoxious to hon. Gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House, but to a great many hon. Members opposite. But that was not all. The Prime Minister made another statement of great importance, and which afforded them stronger ground for resisting the present proposal. He understood the right hon. Gentleman to say, in answer to a Question put to him by the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. Joseph Cowen), that he would take advantage of a Motion to be made by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Wigton Burghs (Sir John Hay) to state whether or not the Government intended to release the "suspects" now in prison in Ireland. He need scarcely point out that the position of the Government was this—that whatever answer they made to that Question, it must lead to a protracted, and, in all probability, an acrimonious debate. If the Government announced their intention of releasing the "suspects"—and there were a great many rumours flying about the Lobbies to that effect—he (Mr. Chaplin) supposed they themselves must be prepared to expect a considerable debate upon a subject of such great and vast importance as that. He did not place any reliance upon the rumours he had alluded to; he did not believe the Government intended to pursue such a policy; but if, on the other hand, they stated they had no intention of releasing the "suspects," but were prepared to reject altogether the proposal of the hon. Member for Newcastle, they must be sure that such a declaration would undoubtedly lead to a long and protracted discussion, and one of great importance. He was bound to say that, under those circumstances, he did not think the Government were justified in proposing to take a debate of that nature at an Evening Sitting on Tuesday. The right hon. Gentleman told them that if they did not take Tuesdays, it would be considered by the country that the Government was faltering in its duty. He (Mr. Chaplin) had no doubt they were considered by the country to be faltering in their duty, because they had neglected their elementary duty in Ireland, and that was to give security to life and property in that country. He begged to move the omission of the words "at Two of the clock."

Amendment proposed, to leave out the words "at Two of the clock."—(Mr. Chaplin.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, he was glad the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington) was in his place, because his hon. Friend (Mr. Chaplin) had omitted to notice what struck him (Mr. Sclater-Booth) the other evening; and that was that, when the question of Morning Sittings on Tuesdays was before the House last Friday, the noble Marquess said that although the Government wished to take last Tuesday, for reasons then stated, the question of Morning Sittings in future would be decided when it arose. That was a very different statement to that made by the Prime Minister at 4 o'clock that day, and he (Mr. Sclater-Booth) hoped the discrepancy would be explained.

MR. HEALY rose for the purpose of supporting the Amendment of the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin). It would be in the recollection of the House that on this day week the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for India stated that the Government did not intend to ask for Morning Sittings on all Tuesdays, if occasions of importance arose as to justify the whole of the day being appropriated to private Members. He (Mr. Healy) would remind the noble Marquess that an occasion of extreme importance would arise on Tuesday next, and that it would not be wise or convenient that a debate on the release, or otherwise, of the "suspects" in Ireland should commence at 9 o'clock in the evening, instead of at half-past 4. Of course, it was not intended to resist Morning Sittings on every occasion that the Government should demand them; but Tuesday next was a special occasion. Seeing the importance of the subject involved in the Motion of the right hon. and gallant Member for the Wigton Burghs (Sir John Hay), a good case had been made out for resisting the present proposal. The question was important under any circumstances; but it was still more important owing to the fact that the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister stated that day that the Government would take the opportunity, on the Motion of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, of making a statement upon their general policy in Ireland. He (Mr. Healy) would put it to the noble Marquess, who at this moment led the House, whether it was wise that the Government should, as a matter of course, ask for a Morning Sitting on Tuesday next, seeing that the Motion of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman (Sir John Hay) stood first on the Paper for that day? He would remind the noble Marquess that, as far as his recollection went, a sort of pledge was given to the House on Friday last that the Government would not ask for Morning Sittings without due Notice; and certainly it could not be considered that, inasmuch as it was now 1 o'clock on Saturday morning, due Notice had been given in this instance. It was considered by those who were in the House at the time that due Notice would be given, owing to the form of the Motion. He would ask the noble Marquess if, by the attitude they had assumed, the Government were treating the House in the way it had a right to expect, remembering the tacit understanding arrived at last week, and seeing the importance which attached to the Motion of the right hon. and gallant Baronet (Sir John Hay), and to the statement to be made upon that Motion by the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister. The Irish Members desired discussion, and although they could not expect to go into all the circumstances connected with Ireland, there were various matters connected with the pacification of Ireland which would arise on the Motion of the right hon. and gallant Baronet, which required serious consideration. Under the circumstances, he trusted the Government would not persist in their Motion.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he was afraid the Government must persevere in the proposal now made to the House, and of which due Notice was given more than a week ago. He could not agree with the hon. Gentleman who had last spoken (Mr. Healy) that there had been any want of Notice. He stated last Friday that the intention of the Government was to ask the House to grant Morning Sitzings on all Tuesdays during the remainder of the Session, and Notice was given at that time. In the subsequent discussion which took place, the noble Earl the Member for North Northumberland (Earl Percy) asked whether due Notice would be given, in order to enable hon. Members who wished to do so to oppose any Morning Sitting being taken; and he (the Marquess of Hartington) stated, on the part of the Government, that they would not take any steps to secure a Morning Sitting for next Tuesday until Thursday in the present week. It was now Saturday morning; and the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister gave Notice, when the House was very full indeed, that it was the intention of the Government to ask the House to grant them a Morning Sitting on Tuesday. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Hampshire (Mr. Selater-Booth) had called attention to what he considered a discrepancy between the statement made by him (the Marquess of Hartington) last week and the statement made that evening by the Prime Minister. He (the Marquess of Hartington) ventured to think there was no discrepancy at all. He stated last week that the intention of the Government was to ask the House for a Morning Sitting on every Tuesday in future; and he also stated at that time that, owing to the form in which the House decided the matter, it was impossible to make any general Motion on the subject; but the point must be determined on each occasion that the Sitting was asked for. He further stated that, if there was an occasion on which the House thought it wise to withhold a Morning Sitting, it would be quite possible for it to do so. The only question was, whether, on Tuesday morning, the whole time should be given to the Motion of the right hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for the Wigton Burghs (Sir John Hay)? The hon. Member who opposed the Motion (Mr. Chaplin) had frankly stated that one of his objections to giving a Morning Sitting was that it would be for the purpose of discussing a measure which he disliked. That might be very natural; but the fact that a particular matter might not be agreeable to one section of the House was hardly a reason against granting a Morning Sitting. The subject must be discussed some time or other, and it was possible that the measure might be made, by discussion, somewhat less objectionable to the hon. Member. At all events, he (the Marquess of Hartington) did not know how they were to progress with the Business, unless the House would grant some greater facilities. The hon. Member opposed the Motion, and said that, whatever might be the nature of the announcement to be made by the Government, it was sure to lead to discussion, and the time for that discussion would be longer than was possible in a Morning Sitting, and that the discussion would be acrimonious.

MR. CHAPLIN: I said it was certain to be long, and probably acrimonious.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he misunderstood the hon. Member; but if it was likely to be acrimonious, then it was desirable that it should be short; and he must protest against the statement of the hon. Member, that the Government had announced their intention to make an important statement with regard to their whole policy in Ireland. His right hon. Friend was asked a Question that evening, and he said it would not be convenient to give an answer to that Question in a form which did not admit of discussion, but that it would be more convenient to answer the Question when a discussion might be had if necessary. They all knew that the right hon. and gallant Baronet (Sir John Hay) had a Motion on the Paper ; but, considering the amount of time that they had already devoted to Irish subjects, he did not know why it should be necessary for any of them to speak at any great length. He did not know whether it might not be possible to have a very interesting discussion, the speeches averaging not more than a quarter of an hour in duration. If they were limited to that extent, he did not know that a discussion of that kind would be inadequate to the importance of the question to be raised. He did not think it was necessary to discuss at greater length the general subject of Morning Sittings; and he ventured to think he had shown sufficient reason why they should not depart from that intention.

Mr. Healy

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT said, he was very much surprised at the statement of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington), for, if there was one thing at the present moment which the country was anxious to hear, it was a statement from the Government with regard to the preservation of peace in Ireland. The course they intended to pursue, and the new measures which they intended to bring in, were matters of great interest and importance to the country; and he was much struck with the statement of the Prime Minister that at 2 o'clock on Tuesday he intended to bring forward the clôture Resolutions, as against any statement with regard to peace and order in Ireland. The country was looking with great anxiety to the statement to be made by the Government; and there was not a man in any part of the House who did not regard with the gravest apprehension the present condition of Ireland. There was nothing which deserved the serious consideration of the House more than that subject; and when he heard from the noble Marquess that there was to be a short statement made on the Motion of the right hon. and gallant Baronet, and when he knew that the Prime Minister was able to make long statements whenever he liked, he thought it was not treating the House or the country with proper respect when this statement, which was so much expected, was put off from day to day, as it had been, by the Prime Minister. He, therefore, rose to enter his protest against taking the clôture Resolutions on Tuesday at 2 o'clock, when the House ought to have a statement of far greater importance than the clôture could be to the House or the country.

MR. WARTON hoped the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington) would not consider his answer as final, and said he made this appeal in obedience to one of the noble Marquess's strongest supporters—the hon. Member for Glamorganshire (Mr. Hussey Vivian). When the first discussion arose about taking last Tuesday for a Morning Sitting, that hon. Gentleman asked the noble Marquess to consider his unfortunate position; and he (Mr. Warton) was now speaking in the interests of that hon. Member, because, although he (Mr. Warton) himself was opposed to the hon. Member's Motion, and believed he would not be able to carry it through, yet it was fair, as an opponent, to state the position in which the hon. Member would be placed. The Statutes to which the hon. Member's Motion related were laid on the Table of the House on the first day of the Session, and they were then to remain on the Table for three months. That period would expire on Sunday, and therefore next Tuesday was the last occasion on which the hon. Member would be able to bring forward his Motion. When the Prime Minister intimated his intention to take all the Tuesdays for Morning Sittings, an appeal was made, which he had thought was successful, to the Government to reserve next Tuesday for private Members; and he hoped the noble Marquess would well consider that appeal, and spare next Tuesday for private Members.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, he must confess that, on a general consideration of this question, he regretted, on the whole, that the Government had not allowed the Business to proceed in the usual way on Tuesday, because, although he fully sympathized with their wish to push the Procedure Resolutions, yet, nevertheless, there was no doubt that the question which was to be brought on next Tuesday was one of such great and pressing and vital interest that nobody could complain if hon. Members opposite desired a full Sitting for its discussion. On the other hand, it seemed to him that the noble Marquess had asked a very fair question—namely, whether it was not the fact that this question, important and vital as it was, could not be discussed in the five hours of Tuesday's Sitting, if the House chose. The House would meet punctually again at 9 o'clock in the evening, and there was no reason why the debate should not be continued till 2 o'clock or later. They had all had the great misfortune, during the last few years, of often sitting up in the House for Business of much less importance until a much later hour than that. Therefore, if the Government intended to press the point, he should certainly go into the Lobby with them; for he felt that the attention of the House and the country was now fixed on the question of what progress was to be made with the Procedure Rules. He believed that to get those Resolutions settled, and order and decency in debate restored in the House, was the very first condition to a restoration of order in Ireland, which he understood to be the question which the right hon. and gallant Member for the Wigton Burghs (Sir John Hay) was anxious to bring before the House. He believed until that was done it did not much signify what else was done. They must first restore order in the House, and then he believed that the disorder which originated there, and spread from there elsewhere, would be limited. For that reason he hoped that the right hon. and gallant Member for the Wigton Burghs would not oppose the Government, and that hon. Members representing Irish constituencies would realize that they, objecting, as they did, to the principle of the Coercion Act, would have an opportunity of showing, by not offering anything approaching to what might be called factious opposition to the proposals of the Government, that they desired to do what was right by their own country—namely, to enable the House to get its Business into such a condition that it might be able to discuss fairly and fully questions relating not only to the good of England, but to the good of Ireland, which he believed many of them had sincerely at heart.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I think the noble Lord opposite (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) is very sanguine if he imagines that merely by securing a Morning Sitting on Tuesday the Government will be able to make such progress with the Procedure Resolutions as will lead to the desirable results which he has at heart. I regret very much that the Government have determined to appropriate the Morning Sitting on Tuesday, because it appears to me that, above all things, it is desirable that the present condition of Ireland should be fairly and fully discussed in this House. I am not by any means prepared to say that the Motion of my right hon. and gallant Friend the Member for the Wigton Burghs (Sir John Hay) affords the very best opportunity for initiating such a discussion; but what I do feel is, that such a discussion must take place before long; that it is absolutely demanded by the country, and that it is, in the mind of the country, a matter of far greater importance than the Procedure Resolutions. If, as appears to be probable, the Government think it best to take part of Tuesday for proceeding with those Resolutions, one result will certainly follow. There will be an imperfect discussion on the Motion of my right hon. and gallant Friend the Member for the Wigton Burghs, and then it will be felt to be necessary, I think, by every Party in this House, that the discussion shall be renewed upon an early occasion, and shall be thoroughly thrashed out and completed. Therefore, the whole of Tuesday evening will probably be wasted, and that simply to enable the Government to make some fancied progress with the Resolutions, with which I do not believe they will really make any progress in the Morning Sitting.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I do not think the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) has advanced any argument which is at all conclusive on this matter. He said he did not think the Motion of the right hon. and gallant Baronet (Sir John Hay) was a Motion which would adequately raise the general question of policy in Ireland, and I should have been very much surprised if the right hon. Gentleman had been of opinion that it would do so. So far as I recollect that Motion, I doubt whether it is one which the right hon. Gentleman would support. If you want a general discussion and a Motion on the policy of the Government in Ireland, you will not raise such a discussion upon that Motion. That Motion will be discussed as an isolated matter, and if there should be a Motion with reference to the whole condition of Ireland, the right hon. Gentleman can hardly suppose that a single Morning Sitting would dispose of that subject. Therefore, neither of the right hon. Gentleman's arguments is addressed to the question of a Morning Sitting. We are not going, and nobody proposes, as I understand, to raise the whole Irish policy on the Motion of the right hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for the Wigton Burghs, and the matter with which that Motion deals might very well be disposed of on Tuesday evening. We, in the present state of Parliamentary Business, ask the House to support us in getting on with the Business. That is the meaning of this appeal, and we must take the responsibility of asking the House of Commons to allow the Business of the country to be gone on with. The hon. and gallant Member opposite (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) complained bitterly that the noble Marquess had said that the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government would make a short speech, and said that if you have an early Sitting the Prime Minister would have an opportunity of making a long speech. I do not think that is a reason for a Morning Sitting. Then the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton) said—do not let us have a Morning Sitting, because that might interfere with the Motion of the hon. Member for Glamorganshire (Mr. Hussey Vivian)—whom he has taken under his wing for this occasion only. But if we are to do what the country wishes us to do with reference to the Public Business, the Government must ask the House to agree to their proposal. They take the responsibility of making that request, and those who oppose it must take the responsibility of resisting it. That is a very fair and proper issue; and upon that only the House of Commons will be able to decide whether there is any reason for making an exception of this Tuesday over any other Tuesday. I do think that the country, looking at what happened on former Tuesdays during this Session, will not consider that the Government are proposing any very great sacrifice of the time of private Members, of which we hear so much; but with regard to which, when hon. Members have the time, they prefer not to take it, but to take the Government time. That being so, I think we are not unduly encroaching on their manor, or making unjust demands on the House; and I do hope that the House will support the Government.

Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington) had told them it was the intention of the Prime Minister to make, on this forthcoming occasion, a speech which would not exceed a quarter of an hour's duration. ["No, no!"] Well, he would say half an hour; at all events, it had been intimated that the speech would be a brief one. Supposing the Prime Minister was able to fulfil his intention and to make a brief speech, no doubt, within the compass of a brief statement, the right hon. Gentleman would be capable of giving the House material for a very long debate—he would be capable of saying enough to make it a matter, he (Mr. Sullivan) would almost say, of necessity, to enter very fully into the matters the right hon. Gentleman had touched on. The Irish Members were bound to claim for themselves a pretty fair amount of time to deal with the topics that would be touched on by the Prime Minister. Not only the Irish Members, but, perhaps, the occupants of the Front Opposition Bench, might have a great deal to say with regard to the statement of the Prime Minister. It was all very well for the noble Marquess—a Member of the Government—to say that hon. Members should content themselves with quarter-hour or ten-minute speeches; but it was possible that so materially might they find themselves affected by the Prime Minister's statement, that the Irish Members would not be able to do justice to themselves, or their country, or the matter in hand. Even if 4 o'clock were decided upon as the hour for commencing the Business of the evening, he (Mr. Sullivan) did not suppose they would be able to get to the discussion of this matter for an hour or two hours afterwards; but if they got to it almost immediately the limit of time would be short enough. He only hoped that in the event of their commencing Business at 4 o'clock they might have a fair prospect of being able to give the matter full and adequate discussion. It would not be at all satisfactory to commence the discussion of such an important matter as that at 9 o'clock. They should, at least, be allowed the ordinary time for considering what was looked upon, not only by the people of Ireland, but also by the people of England, with the greatest amount of interest. Let the Prime Minister give them the day they required, and he would find that he would lose nothing by the transaction.

MR. GOSCHEN said, hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite had laid so much stress on the Government running the clôture against this debate on the evening in question that those of them who took deep interest in the 1st Resolution being passed were bound to support the Government on this occasion. The Government had stated, on their responsibility, the great necessity there was for making progress with this Resolution; and hon. Members opposite had shown that their objection to the Resolution entered largely into their objection to giving up Tuesday morning. At the same time, as the evening would be short, he trusted that an opportunity would be afforded, by the shortness of the speeches to which the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington) had alluded, for English Members, as well as Irish Members, to take part in the discussion that would occur. It had been too much the custom for these important questions to be made the occasion of a duel, if he might say so, between the Home Rule Party and the Front Bench, and many had been the times when hon. Members on the Ministerial side of the House would have liked very much to have supported Her Majesty's Government, and to have stated their views in opposition to views which had been urged by Home Rulers; but the value of time was felt so strongly by them that they refrained, and perhaps in that way it might have appeared, more than once, that Her Majesty's Government were not sufficiently supported by their followers. When the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland had been attacked, it had often been a matter for deep regret on the part of a great many hon. Members on that side of the House that, except under the penalty of speaking on a Motion for the adjournment of the House, or of interrupting at Question time, they were unable to support the right hon. Gentleman to the extent to which he had deserved support at the hands of his Party. He (Mr. Goschen) had ventured to say those few words, because he hoped that when the important question of the release of the "suspects" was discussed it would be possible for all sides to take part in the debate. Though it was the fashion for some

hon. Gentlemen opposite to refer to this as a foreign House of Parliament, and though the question might affect only Irish hon. Members, they (the supporters of the Government) knew that their constituents expected them to take part in the consideration of the position of their fellow-subjects in Ireland. Their constituents wished them to join in the discussion not only of what affected England, but of what affected Ireland also; and he believed the time had come when it was necessary that many English Members should take part in such debates as that they were to have on Tuesday. He trusted, therefore, that the advice of the noble Marquess would be followed on Tuesday, and that, by shortness of speeches, it might be possible for Her Majesty's Government to hear the opinions of all sides of the House on a question of first-rate importance.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, he had no doubt everyone had the highest respect for the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. Goschen); but the right hon. Gentleman's observations were a most conclusive reason why they should not have a Morning Sitting on Tuesday. He had said that there were many hon. Members sitting behind Her Majesty's Government who were anxious to speak in support of their Irish policy, and who had hitherto been unable to do so through want of time. The right hon. Gentleman arrived at the somewhat inconvenient conclusion that it would be right for those who had hitherto been prevented through want of time from taking part in these debates to take part in the discussion on Tuesday night, if a Morning Sitting were granted. There was one fact with which the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington) did not seem to be acquainted, and which, to his (Lord George Hamilton's) mind, very materially altered the position of affairs. His right hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Wigton Burghs (Sir John Hay) was about, on Tuesday, to make a Motion relating to a certain portion of the Irish Question. The noble Marquess stated that upon that question very short speeches would be made—in fact, he gave the House to understand that the Prime Minister's observations would be confined to about 15 minutes. With all deference to the noble Marquess, he (Lord George Hamilton) very much doubted that, because it was absolutely impossible for any Minister to say how long he would be on his legs, when he did not know the arguments he would have to answer. But since his right hon. and gallant Friend had put this Notice on the Paper, a distinguished Member of the Liberal Party—the Member for Bolton (Mr. J. K. Cross)—had put a Notice which would raise the whole Irish Question, because it was to the effect that those persons in prison in Ireland only suspected of a certain class of offences should be released. That Notice could only have been put on the Notice Paper with or without the knowledge of the Government. If it were put down with the knowledge of the Government, it was not fair for them to defer their observations until so late a period of the evening that it would not be possible to thoroughly discuss the matter. If, however, the Notice had been put down without the knowledge of the Government, and represented the views only of a considerable section of the Liberal Party, it was only fair that that section of the Liberal Party should have a proper opportunity of expressing their views. It therefore seemed to him that these circumstances must so change the aspect of affairs that the Government would be able to see their way to the withdrawal of their Motion for a Morning Sitting on Tuesday.

Mr. T. D. Sullivan

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, he was one of those who would be very glad to hear any English Member who felt inclined to speak on the Irish Question favour them with an expression of his views. He should be especially glad to hear the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen) express his opinions in that House, because he would then be spared the necessity of hearing him give them out, not perhaps in season or in due place. The right hon. Gentleman had favoured a non-political gathering at a dinner he himself (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) had attended with an expression of his views, notwithstanding that most of the company were of an opposite way of thinking to the right hon. Gentleman himself. The right hon. Gentleman had revenged himself for the privation from speaking he had experienced of late in the House by declaiming, with a great deal of acrimony, upon the wickedness of the Home Rule Members, and of the Tory Members who did not help the Government to crush them. He (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) hoped the Government would give them such an explanation as would save the Irish Members the necessity of entering into any prolonged discussion. While he should vote for giving the whole of Tuesday to the debate, he should not express his views in answer to the statement the Government might make at any great length.

MR. R. N. FOWLER said, the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton) had raised a new question in regard to this debate, having pointed out that there was an Amendment to the Motion of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Wigton Burghs (Sir John Hay), which would raise the whole Irish Question. Under these circumstances, he wished to say that it was perfectly impossible that they could have the whole question of the state of Ireland—which, as every Member of the House knew, and as the Government would not deny, created great anxiety in this country at that moment—discussed in a three or four hours' debate. It was most important that they should have the whole evening to discuss that question; and, under those circumstances, he begged to move the adjournment of the debate. The noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington) made a point of wishing to get on with the Resolutions, upon which he (Mr. R. N. Fowler) hoped, by the favour of the House, to have an opportunity of saying something when they came before them. He referred to what were called the Procedure Resolutions, but which he looked upon as gagging Resolutions. He believed that every hon. Member on that (the Opposition) side of the House felt very strongly on this question, and that they would only be doing their duty to their constituents by expressing, at the fullest length, their views on the subject. The time might come when they might not have an opportunity, because, when the Resolutions were passed, they would be tongue-tied, and would have no liberty left them. While they retained their liberty, however, they thought they were only doing their duty by giving expression to everything they felt in the matter. There had been a former discussion with regard most vital question of the day. It would be impossible for the right hon. Gentleman to confine his statement within very narrow limits. That was not a usual weakness on the part of the Prime Minister. Even if he desired to do so upon so important a question, and to confine himself to the topics raised by the Motion of his right hon. and gallant Friend the Member for the Wigton Burghs (Sir John Hay), the right hon. Gentleman would find himself compelled, by the new Amendment which had been placed upon the Paper, to enter into a much wider field, because, when the right hon. and gallant Member for the Wigton Burghs sat down, the hon. Member for Bolton (Mr. J. K. Cross) was to get up and to move a still wider Amendment. [Cries of "No!" from the Ministerial Benches.] That was certainly the way in which he (Mr. Gibson) read the Amendment, and he hoped to have an opportunity of studying it still more carefully before the hon. Gentleman submitted it to the House. Any hon. Member who read the Amendment and the Motion would see at once that it was altogether impossible for the Prime Minister not to make a statement of supreme importance. The statement must demand important public criticism from that (the Opposition) side of the House, and it would not be giving fair play either to the House or the country to compel the Opposition to deliver a crippled and imperfect criticism upon the policy of Her Majesty's Government, as announced in the speech of the Prime Minister at a late hour of the night, when it was impossible that any remarks they desired to make could be reported. Under those circumstances, he contended that the statement about to be made by the Prime Minister might and would demand prolonged and close criticism and examination; and it might become necessary, therefore, if there was a Morning Sitting, to ask respectfully for an adjournment of Tuesday's debate until the following Thursday.

MR. LEAMY would venture to express a hope that, in the event of the Government insisting upon having a Morning Sitting on Tuesday, and thus throwing over the important statement of the Prime Minister until a late hour, the right hon. Gentleman would consent to accept the suggestion thrown out by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson), and to adjourn the debate until Thursday. No doubt, there were many English Members among the supporters of the Government who would desire to express their opinions, and he was quite satisfied that most of the Irish Members would desire to express theirs. It was understood that the Government intended to declare their Irish policy; and it was not at all unlikely that many of the Radical Members, who had consented to give exceptional powers to the Irish Executive, might feel themselves called upon to say that they were not prepared to support any further coercive measures which the Government might have determined to take. It was, therefore, most improbable that the debate could be concluded on Tuesday night; and if the Government insisted on taking a Morning Sitting, the House ought to receive some intimation that there would be no opposition to a proposal for the adjournment of the debate.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I trust that the House will not consent to the Motion for the adjournment of the debate; and I hope it will be perfectly well understood that, although many hon. Members opposite may take exception to the course now proposed, there is no desire to adopt an obstructive line of policy. The question of having a Morning Sitting has now been fully discussed, and the House is perfectly competent to come to a decision upon it. All I wish to say is, that it is impossible to come to any understanding whether it will be necessary to adjourn the debate on Tuesday or not. No doubt, a discussion may arise which may make it necessary that the debate should be adjourned; and if it be necessary, of course the Government would not oppose the demand. It is impossible, however, to know now whether an adjournment will be desirable or not. I would venture to suggest to hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite, who think that they will not have a fair opportunity for discussion, that it is impossible for them at present to judge whether it will be requisite to discuss the statement which is to be made from these Benches at all or not. It would, therefore, be much more convenient that they should hear the statement before they arrive at any conclusion in regard to it. After they have nature of an important statement is to be made by the Prime Minister, then three hours will certainly not be sufficient to enable the House to discuss it satisfactorily.

MR. J. K. CROSS remarked, that allusions had been made in the course of the debate to the Amendment of which he had given Notice in the early part of the evening. It was said that he had placed the Amendment on the Paper with the knowledge and at the instance of the Government. All he had to say was that his intentions had been entirely unknown to the Government, and that he had given Notice of the Amendment solely upon his own account. Not only was the Notice given without the knowledge of the Government, but he had given it without consulting more than one, or at most two Members of the House. He had no wish to say a single word upon the merits of the question itself. He apprehended that at the time the House met on Tuesday that matter would be entirely in the hands of the Government; and if the statement which the Prime Minister proposed to make were of such a character as to be acceptable to the majority of the House, it might probably not be necessary that the Amendment of which he (Mr. J. K. Cross) had given Notice should be brought forward at all.

MR. CHAPLIN said, he was glad that the Motion had been made for the adjournment of the debate, because, undoubtedly, it had had the effect of eliciting from the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Hartington) a reply which he did not think would have been made under other circumstances. He confessed that the reply of the noble Marquess was not altogether satisfactory, because, although the noble Marquess made a sort of qualified concession that the debate should be adjourned if the statement of the Prime Minister was not satisfactory, that concession did not altogether get rid of his (Mr. Chaplin's) objection that private Members were deprived of their legitimate opportunities for bringing important questions before the House. He did not know whether his hon. Friend who moved the adjournment of the debate (Mr. R. N. Fowler) proposed to go to a division or not. If he did, he (Mr. Chaplin) should vote with him, because he wished to record his protest against the course which the Government were taking. The noble Marquess seemed to think that there was an intention to oppose the proceedings of the Government by moving successive Motions for Adjournment. He (Mr. Chaplin) did not believe there was any intention of the kind; but the noble Marquess must not be surprised, having regard to the manner in which the Government proposed to deprive private Members of their rights, if private Members took measures on their own account to protect their own interests. If the practice now pursued by the Government were persisted in, and if it led to further delay in Public Business, they would be entirely to blame.

MR. CALLAN pointed out that if the Government accepted the proposal which had been made on that side of the House, and gave up the idea of a Morning Sitting on Tuesday, the discussion consequent on the statement of the Prime Minister with regard to Irish affairs would, in all probability, terminate on Tuesday night; but if not, and the question came on at 9 o'clock at night, as it was probable that the right hon. Gentleman would not rise until after 10 o'clock, and would very likely not sit down until after midnight, there would clearly be no opportunity for discussion on the part of the Opposition. The manœuvre of the Government was evidently to give 48 hours' start in the country to the Ministerial Statement, without affording any opportunity for the comments of hon. Members on that side of the House to reach the public. The effect of that would be that Thursday night also would have to be given up to the discussion of the Irish Question; and so, instead of concluding the debate on Tuesday, the half of that day and the whole of Thursday would be lost.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he was not disposed to throw any difficulties in the way of Her Majesty's Government. Since he had seen an indication on their part of a desire to treat the Irish Question in a manner in which it ought to have been treated long since he was certainly not inclined to offer any unnecessary opposition. However, he could not but think that the disposal of the public time which was now proposed to the House was not calculated to carry out the intentions of the Government. There could be no doubt that the question of the release of the "suspects" was one which, until it was settled one way or the other, impeded the progress of every kind of Business in that House. He was sorry that the right hon. Gentleman had put off until Tuesday his definite answer upon that subject, and he also regretted that such an important matter as the Resolutions on Procedure were to be taken before the Irish Question had been dealt with. Those Resolutions raised serious questions in many minds; and although the discussions upon them might be calm, even to dullness, he could not but think that the state of anxiety in which the Government had left the House was not calculated to lead to even a business-like debate upon them next Monday. On the other hand, he believed that a calming and encouraging statement upon Irish affairs would do more towards facilitating the progress of Public Business than anything that could be devised. He thought that the Government had really indulged in a kind of cat-with-the-mouse treatment of the prisoners, their friends, and the Irish people generally; and he could not but express the hope that they would state, one way or another, what was their policy in this matter. The sooner they did so, the better he believed it would be for all parties interested. He repeated that the manner in which this question was kept hanging over was certainly not favourable to the progress of reform of Procedure. Moreover, he did not believe the Government would be gainers in the smallest degree by taking several hours from the discussion of the Irish Question on Tuesday next; and, therefore, in the interest of the Liberal policy as well as of fair play to all Parties in the House, he begged them to devote the whole of that day to its discussion. Although he would not say that there was a deliberate manoeuvre to place the Government Statement before the country without comment on the part of the Opposition, there was a strong opinion that the time and circumstances under which they had chosen to make that statement were calculated to give undue advantages to the Ministerial Statement, and give, so to speak, 48 hours' start to it, no matter how much time might be required for the statement of the Opposition. Therefore, he urged upon the

Mr. O'Donnell

Government the necessity of avoiding even the suspicion of unfairness in this matter. There could be no Ministerial Statement on Tuesday, under the proposed arrangement, until 11 o'clock; and, consequently, there could be no fair criticism of it which could appear in the papers of the following day. That fact would be known throughout the country, and would give the appearance of dodging to the Government policy, which he trusted and believed was quite undeserved, so far as this matter was concerned. Notwithstanding that, he could not shut his eyes to the fact that both the Government themselves and the independent Parties in the House would suffer by the proposed arrangement.

MR. BIGGAR said, the Government were doing what he had known many Governments to do on former occasions. They were trying to save time, and by their way of doing it they were throwing away twice as much as they expected to save. He could corroborate the statement of the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Callan), that the result of the Government proposal would be that, instead of the whole of Thursday being devoted to Public Business, it would be taken up entirely by the continued discussion upon the question to be brought before the House on Tuesday. Therefore, he suggested that the Government should appoint the whole of Tuesday for the discussion of the Irish Question, which certainly could not be concluded if it commenced after 9 o'clock in the evening. It was all very well for the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Hartington) to allege that a subject of that importance could be discussed at 2 o'clock in the morning; but hon. Members must know very well that no important question could be properly discussed after 1 o'clock in the morning. The probable effect of the Government proposal would be that the whole question would be raised again, and that another day would be wasted. The right hon. Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen) had expressed his opinion that it was desirable that a number of English Members should take part in the debate on Tuesday night, and that the Irish Members should abstain from doing so. That would certainly be another effect of the Government arrangement, because, as had been pointed out by the right hon. Member, a considerable number of English Members were to speak; and he (Mr. Biggar) could not, therefore, understand how it could be said that Irish Members would have any opportunity of expressing their views. What portion of time would be at the disposal of Irish Members, after the evening had been occupied by speeches from English Members and Members of the Government? The right hon. Member seemed to think that it was more important that hon. Members who knew nothing of the subject should state their opinions, than that those who were thoroughly acquainted with it should do so. It was needless to say that the reverse of this should take place; and, therefore, he appealed to the Government, in their own interest, and in the interest of all Parties, to afford Irish Members every opportunity for the discussion of the present question, by taking the debate at the ordinary time on Tuesday next, with the reasonable expectation that it would be concluded the same evening, and thereby secure the whole of Thursday for Government Business.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 36; Noes 90: Majority 54.—(Div. List, No. 73.)

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. BIGGAR begged to move that the House do now adjourn. It was now after 2 o'clock, and he thought the best thing to do would be to adjourn.

MR. HEALY rose for the purpose of seconding the Motion.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman has addressed the House on the Main Question; therefore, he is not in Order.

MR. R. POWER said, he would second the Motion, and he did so with very great regret. He assured the House that he should be very sorry to second the Motion; but its adoption was advisable in the interest of the Government themselves, and in the interest of economy of time. If the Government would consent to sit at the usual hour on Tuesday—namely, 4 o'clock, they would be able, most likely, to conclude the discussion upon the Irish Question about 2 o'clock the following morning. What was the real position of affairs? The Motion of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Wigton Burghs (Sir John Hay) would certainly give rise to a long debate, and the Prime Minister had told them that he himself was going to make a most important statement. He (Mr. R. Power) supposed that in the whole history of Ireland there never was a time when the people of that country looked forward with more interest and with more anxiety to any statement from any English Minister, and the idea of discussing an Irish difficulty in three or four hours was most ridiculous. If the Government acceded to the request of his hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle (Mr. Joseph Cowen), who had asked that the Members of Parliament who were now detained in Kilmainham should be released, the Irish Members on the Opposition side of the House would, in a few brief speeches, congratulate the Government upon the decision they had arrived at; but he was not quite certain that the Conservative Members would do the same. He believed they would get up, and, in very violent speeches, condemn such a policy. It was all very well to say that the Prime Minister would only take 15 minutes to make his statement as regarded the future policy of the Government towards Ireland. Although he very much doubted whether the Prime Minister could confine himself to 15 minutes, he was persuaded the right hon. Gentleman's remarks would give rise to a very long and protracted debate. If they knew exactly what they were to discuss on Tuesday, they might be able to form an opinion as to the amount of time the debate would occupy; but, at the present moment, they were quite in the dark. They might be asked to discuss the necessity for martial law in Ireland, or the release of the political prisoners, or the continuance of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant in Office; but no matter what they were required to discuss, as long as it related to Ireland it was absurd to suppose that the debate could be of short duration. He was very sorry, indeed, to find that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen) thought that the clôture was a far more important question than the Irish Question. He did hope that the right hon. Gentleman, who had been so successful in solving the Eastern difficulty, would have devoted some of his ability, and some of his time, to solving the Western difficulty. He was, however, glad to hear the right hon. Gentleman express the opinion that English Members ought to interfere in Irish debates. He could assure the right hon. Gentleman that the Irish Members intended to interfere in English debates. The idea of an Irish debate, like that which would take place on Tuesday, only lasting three hours, was perfectly ridiculous.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That this House do now adjourn."—
 (Mr. Buggar.)

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, it seemed to him that every speech that was made in the debate to which the House had listened for some time past showed very plainly that the proposal for a Morning Sitting on Tuesday was ill-advised, and was not really likely to facilitate the progress of Business in the House. The House, however, had pronounced, by a very considerable majority, in favour of that Morning Sitting being taken; and, so far as he was concerned, he did not think the present was an occasion in which they should endeavour, by repeated divisions, to prevent the majority from carrying their wishes into effect; therefore, he should take no further part in resisting the Government proposal.

MR. HEALY said, he would remind the House of the different position in which they found themselves that night to other occasions in which Morning Sittings had been asked. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Gloucestershire (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) said that, inasmuch as the House had decided by a considerable majority, he would execute the characteristic operation of "backing out." When it was proposed to take a Morning Sitting to consider the case of Mr. Bradlaugh, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Gloucestershire and the Tory Party cared little for the decision of the House. Majority after majority declared they would have a Morning Sitting; but minority after minority obstructed the Government and refused a Morning Sitting.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: No, no!] Well, the right hon. Gentleman might not have been present on that occasion. If the right hon. Gentleman said he was not present on that occasion, at least his party were. Two or three of the right

hon. Gentlemen now sitting near the right hon. Baronet were certainly present, and they cared little as to what the opinion of the House was. But now the Tory Party, after having got up a row as to whether there should be a Morning Sitting on Tuesday, found, when it got half-past 2 o'clock, that it would suit their purpose to go to bed; they told the House that as a large majority had decided in favour of a Morning Sitting they would bow their meek heads and go home to sleep. That was not the way in which these things ought to be met. If hon. Gentlemen set out by denouncing the Government as iniquitous for certain proceedings, they ought to be consistent. It seemed somewhat inconsistent to give way because they found themselves in a considerable minority. It was not a question whether the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Gloucestershire was right, but in a minority, but whether he was in the right. If the right hon. Gentleman was in the right at the onset, he was in the right now, and ought to continue his opposition to the Morning Sitting. He (Mr. Healy) never cared a button whether he was in a minority or majority. He and his hon. Friends were so used to finding themselves in a minority that it did not matter much to them how they were situated. Passing from that point, however, he must remind the House of the inconvenience they suffered from discussing these questions in the absence of the authorities who were competent to deal with them. They were dealing with a number of Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench who had got instructions to get a Morning Sitting on Tuesday next. They knew there was an important Irish question down for consideration on that day, and they would be glad to know what the decision of the Government was going to be. If they knew the decision was going to be in the direction which many hon. Members desired, there would be no objection on the part of those hon. Gentlemen to grant a Morning Sitting, because they would know they would not occupy more than an hour with any remarks they would have to make on the Motion of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Wigton Burghs (Sir John Hay). But they were altogether in the dark, and because they were in the dark they were obliged to resist the proposal to take a Morning Sitting on Tuesday. The most straightforward course for the Government to have adopted would have been to have announced earlier what their action was going to be with respect to the "suspects." If they had told the House that day, in reply to the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. Joseph Cowen), what their intention was, they would not now be wrangling about a Morning Sitting. He had no objection, on principle, to the Government having a Morning Sitting; but he did object that on special occasions, such as next Tuesday, the day should be whittled away by the Government scooping out the most material part of it. The Prime Minister himself was absent, and the right hon. Gentleman now on the Treasury Bench had not power to deal with the question; therefore, there was to be a Morning Sitting on Tuesday. He was sure that if the Prime Minister, who, as regarded the convenience and time of the House, had an open mind, were present, he would see the force of the observations which had been addressed to the Government during this debate, and would yield to the wishes of a large number of hon. Members.

MR. CHAPLIN said, that when the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) talked of his right hon. Friend (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) "backing out" after the Tories had got up a row, he must remind the hon. Member of how the discussion arose. As an Amendment to the Motion made by the Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Lord Frederick Cavendish), he (Mr. Chaplin) took the liberty of moving that the words "Two o'clock" should be omitted; and he stated at the time that he did so in order to have an opportunity of recording his protest against the course which was being adopted by the Government. During the debate he also stated that there was no intention whatever on the part of hon. Gentlemen sitting in that quarter of the House to prolong the discussion. He had no desire to engage in a fight with the large battalions he saw sitting opposite; but he had taken part in the division, and was satisfied with having entered his protest against the action of the Government in the matter.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, he would not have arisen at that time, were it not for the observations which had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen). The right hon. Gentleman had informed them that out of the few hours which the Government proposed to place at the disposal of the House for the discussion of the Motion of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Wigton Burghs (Sir John Hay) a large number of English Members wished to occupy some time; that a considerable number of English Members wished to take part in the debate; and he asked if it was possible to suppose that a considerable number of English Members could intervene in the debate without uttering a great deal of contentious matter, and giving rise to a great deal of exasperation on that side of the House? If the Prime Minister made a conciliatory speech—a speech which would be in some degree satisfactory to the Irish Members—it would inevitably be unsatisfactory to the Conservative Members. If, however, the speech was pleasing to Conservative Members, it would, unquestionably, be displeasing to Irish Members. However that might be, it was impossible to suppose that a considerable number of English Members could intervene without giving the Irish Members occasion, which they could not resist, to reply to them. If English Members attacked the Irish Members, if they attacked the "suspects," if they attempted to traduce the Irish National Land League, it would be the business of the Representatives of Ireland to reply, and, of course, they would discharge their duty. It was entirely ridiculous to suppose that the debate on the Motion of the right hon. and gallant Baronet (Sir John Hay) would only last three or four hours; therefore, the Government would act wisely in giving them more time.

MR. SEXTON said, the question could be put in a very narrow compass. That day the Prime Minister said he would make a statement on Irish affairs on Tuesday next. That statement, whatever it might be, would be of great importance; but, in the interval between now and then, he (Mr. Sexton) confessed he was unwilling to draw the House into a sustained contest on a collateral issue. He did not know what the statement might be; he hoped it might be of such a character as to call

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

—:O:—

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS (No. 2) BILL.

(Sir John Lubbock, Mr. William Henry Smith,
Mr. Compton Lawrence.)

[BILL 104.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK, in moving the second reading of the Bill, said, it was necessarily one of much detail; and he would suggest that it should be read a second time, and then be referred to the same Committee as the Bill about to be introduced by the Government. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade had been good enough to say that the Government would agree to that course; and he (Sir John Lubbock) hoped the House would also consent to it. The Bill had been very carefully prepared by the Society of Arts, and in their name he asked the House to consent to the second reading. It was of a comprehensive character, and went into the whole question very fully; but it was made up of a great number of separate points, which could be better dealt with in Committee than by the House.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"— Sir John Lubbock,)—put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday 22nd May.

JUDGMENTS (INFERIOR COURTS) BILL.

(Mr. Monk, Mr. Norwood, Mr. Anderson, Mr.
Corry, Mr. Reid, Mr. Serjeant Simon.)

[BILL 44.] CONSIDERATION AS AMENDED.

Order for Consideration, as amended, read.

Bill, as amended, considered.

On the Motion of Mr. MONK, new Clause brought up, and read a first and second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be added to the Bill."—
(Mr. Monk.)

Mr. WARTON said, he objected to the clause being added.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, the Amendment was introduced in order to produce complete reciprocity between the Three Kingdoms, in which at present the jurisdiction was not the same. The words of the clause were—

"Nothing contained in this Act shall authorize the registration in an Inferior Court of a certificated judgment for any greater amount than might have been recovered."

Mr. SPEAKER: I must point out to the right hon. and learned Gentleman that Notice ought to be given of a new clause brought up on the consideration of a Bill. Therefore this new clause cannot be proposed without Notice.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—
(Mr. Healy.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, he would agree to the Motion.

Question put, and agreed to.

Mr. MONK said, he would name Monday for the further consideration of the Bill.

Mr. WARTON said, he objected to Monday decidedly, and complained that the Bill had been hurried on, simply because of the rapid action and low tone of voices of the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk). The other evening he (Mr. Warton) had done what he could to help this Bill; but it was very awkward for the hon. Member for Gloucester to try, by sharp practice, to pass the Bill through the House. He therefore asked that time should be allowed for considering the effect of this clause, and if the hon. Member would consent to name Thursday that time would be obtained. He was not going to have Bills passed in that way. He always accepted what the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland said; but there must be proper time given for consideration.

Mr. BUCHANAN hoped the hon. Member in charge of the Bill (Mr. Monk) would listen to this appeal. The new clause had not been put on the Paper; but it affected the interests of Scotland, and he hoped the hon. Member would accede to the request.

Mr. MONK said, the Amendments made to the Bill had been on the Paper for three weeks. [Mr. WARTON: Not this clause.] That new clause had been approved by the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate; and he (Mr. Monk) understood from the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland that it only affected Ireland. He, therefore, should name Monday for the further consideration of the Bill.

MR. WHITLEY said, he understood from the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland's explanation that the proposed limitation would affect the whole of the United Kingdom. He, therefore, hoped the hon. Member (Mr. Monk) would allow the Bill to stand over until the following Thursday.

MR. MONK said, if it was the general wish of the House he would postpone the Bill until next Thursday.

Further Consideration, as amended, deferred till Thursday next.

House adjourned at Three o'clock till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, 1st May, 1882.

MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEE—Claims of Peerage, &c., The Lord Monk added.
PUBLIC BILL—First Reading—Pluralities Acts Amendment* (74).

STATE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS — THE IRISH POLICY OF THE GOVERNMENT — THE LORD LIEUTENANCY OF IRELAND.—OBSERVATIONS.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, I have waited some minutes in the full expectation that the Leader of the House would have vouchsafed some explanation as to the prodigies which have appeared in the political sky; but, as the noble Earl is silent, I am compelled, according to what I believe is the usage, to ask whether any explanation will be given of the resignation, if it is true, by a Member of your Lordships' House whom we all highly respect, of the highly responsible Office of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland; whether it is true that the Office is to be held in commendam as a subordinate Office of the Lord Presidency of the Council by the noble Lord who now occupies that post; whether such a junction, if it be a fact, is to be held to indicate that the arrangement is provisional, or that the existence of the Lord Lieutenancy is provisional, or that the existence of the Lord Presidency is provisional; also, whether we are to infer from this change that any change is also about to take place in the policy of Her Majesty's Government in Ireland; and whether they have any new measure or new proposals to announce with respect to the appalling condition into which Ireland has lapsed? But, first of all, and most of all, for what reason it is, if a reason can be given, that the Lord Lieutenant has resigned?

Mr. Monk

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I have been some time longer than the noble Marquess in this House, and I am not aware of the precedent on which he rests for asking nine Questions without the slightest Notice, either public or private. If the noble Marquess will repeat his nine Questions on Thursday, I will endeavour to give an answer.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, I wish to give Notice that I will ask the noble Earl, in order to give him time to ascertain the facts, which, no doubt, he has not had an opportunity of ascertaining, whether Lord Cowper has resigned; whether Lord Spencer is to hold the place, in commendam; and whether Her Majesty's Government have any new policy in regard to Ireland; and what are the reasons for Lord Cowper's resignation? I can perfectly understand that the noble Earl is ignorant on these subjects.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, as the noble Marquess has reduced the number of his Questions from nine to four it will make it easier for me to answer them.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I will ask the Questions to-morrow.

OXFORD AND CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITIES COMMISSION—THE STATUTES —RELIGIOUS TEACHING AND WORSHIP.—OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON rose to call attention to the provision made for religious teaching and worship in the Statutes laid on the Table of the House by the Oxford and Cambridge Universities Commissioners. The noble Earl said, that they were within two days of the time when it would be necessary for their Lordships to express assent to, or dissent from, the Statutes which lay on the Table of the House; and, therefore, now or never, the House should express its opinion on the subject. Those Statutes, taken in combination with the Acts constituting the powers of the Commissioners, effected a material change in the studies, discipline, worship, and religious instruction of the Universities; but in his observations he should confine himself entirely to the religious question and the University of Oxford. In former years the system of religious instruction and worship in Chapel was a clearly defined system, though different Acts of Parliament had been passed, and had greatly modified that system. First, there was the great University Reform of 1854. Since that time various provisions had been made by the Legislature, the most important of which was the Act of 1871, by which tests were abolished in the Universities. Finally, there was the Act of 1877, upon which the present Commission was appointed. In all those Acts there were very distinct provisions for promoting the designs of the Founders and benefactors of Colleges in our Universities; and the Acts required that the Universities should be mainly what they were in former days—places of religion and learning. In the Preamble of the original Act, to which he had referred, it was laid down that the object in view was to promote the main designs of Founders and donors. The Act of 1871, in its Preamble, defined the Universities as places of learning and religion. In the enacting part it was said that nothing was to interfere with the system of worship and discipline, according to the Established Church. Lastly, provision was made for the performance of religious service in the College Chapels. The Act of 1877 re-affirmed all those principles even more strongly. Clause 14 referred to the designs of Founders and donors; Clause 15 declared that the Commissioners should have regard to the interests of religion; Clause 59 re-affirmed the clause in the original Act of 1871, to which he had called attention. In addition to that, distinct assurances had repeatedly been given to quiet all alarm on the subject. He called attention to these facts, because, partly by direct legislation, partly in consequence of the powers given to the Governing Bodies, all those promises had practically come to nought; and no such safeguards now existed for religious teaching and discipline as had been promised. He next came to the Statutes themselves, as framed by the University Commission. There was a good deal of difference in the Statutes as regarded the different Colleges. Those Statutes contained provisions—first, regarding Clerical Headships; secondly, regarding Clerical Fellowships; and, thirdly, regarding College Chapels. The question of Clerical Headships he regarded as an important one, and now more important than ever, though he should not discuss it. It had, on former occasions, been much debated, and his opinion remained unaltered. But the case of Clerical Fellowships was even more important, because in the Fellows rested the whole teaching and influencing power in the Universities. He would take the case of Christ Church. In the old days there were 101 students, of whom 97 were in Orders, and four faculty or lay students. Now there were to be only three in Orders, and all the rest would probably be laymen. He mentioned this to show how great was the revolution proposed. Brasenose had formerly six Fellows in Orders; now the number was limited to one. Lastly, as he had said, there were the College Chapels. In old days the Chapels might be described as the Parish Churches of the undergraduates. They had now ceased to have any such character, and attendance at Chapel was now optional. He would observe, also, that, under the old system, all the authorities of Colleges that directed and controlled the Chapel belonged to the Church of England. What were now the Governing Bodies of the Colleges? They were composed partly of resident and partly of non-resident members of the Universities, and these latter had little or no knowledge of the actual state of the Colleges; nor was there any reason whatever why the members of those Governing Bodies should profess any religion at all. Yet those Bodies appointed College Chaplains and dismissed them at pleasure. Further, they had full power to regulate the Services in any fashion they pleased; they could provide how and when the Communion was to be administered, and arrange any detail of the Services. Whatever religious discipline there might be lay with that Body to enforce or not. They had even the very remarkable power of altering, varying, or abridging Services as they pleased. The result was that the power of regulating the whole religious teaching and discipline of the University had been placed in the hands of men not necessarily professing any religious belief whatever, even in the existence of a Supreme Being. There was thus nothing left of the original purposes of the Founders. In many of the Colleges there had been a complete revolution in religious feeling. The old learning and religion had been absolutely divorced, and the old relations between culture and Christianity had been severed. He should not overstate matters when he said that numbers of young men in recent years had returned from the University with their belief in religion gone, and their faith sapped, in consequence of their connection with their Colleges. It might be said that this had arisen from many other causes, and especially from that atmosphere of doubt which pervaded every department of inquiry in the present day. It was, doubtless, true in part; but the change mainly arose from the legislation which had been pressed on for Party purposes, and in a Party spirit, the results of which had been repeatedly predicted, and were now all but verified. None had been more active, unfortunately, than the Dissenters, and they were already beginning to learn that on them the blow must fall first and heaviest. It might be said that under the old system there was often little real religion, and that the Chapel Service was, in fact, but a mere roll-call. In certain cases he believed that was true; but there was this great difference between the two cases. In former days they had all the machinery for religious life, though often unused; now it was the intention to sweep that machinery entirely away, and to leave all the surrounding influences adverse to religion. The leading objections that he had to the Statutes were, first, that the responsibility on the part of the authorities of the College in religious teaching would cease to exist; secondly, that the machinery of religious influence and teaching had been swept away; thirdly, that the teaching would be taken out of the hands of the Governing Bodies; and, fourthly, that it would be placed where no Clerical Fellow could be got to undertake the instruction, in the hands of a clergyman to be appointed for that purpose. This clergyman, who was to be the sole representative of religion in these matters, was in many cases a man receiving an utterly inadequate stipend, and his position would be a feeble one against the great forces arrayed against him. The position of such a clergyman would be very similar to that of a chaplain in the houses of the rich in the 17th century, as described by the great Whig historian of England. He would be a tame Levite, whose first duty it would be to make himself agreeable to the common rooms of the future, and whose religious attributes might easily be limited to his black coat and white necktie. It was not his intention to move to omit these objectionable clauses from the Statutes, as he believed that the Universities needed rest after the long period of Parliamentary agitation through which they had passed; and he would not, therefore, be a party to throwing them back into that state of agitation. He accepted those Statutes simply because he bowed to superior force; but he protested against them, and he distinctly wished it to be understood that he was no consenting party to legislation which he believed to be both dangerous and wrong.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY said, that their Lordships would, no doubt, allow him to say a few words on that subject, especially when they knew that he rose to give Notice, on behalf of the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Lincoln), that he would, on Friday of next week, move the rejection of the Statutes which had been framed by the Commissioners for Lincoln College. He thanked the noble Earl for the speech which he had just delivered. He did not think, however, that the effect of the Statutes would be to sweep away religious teaching so entirely as the noble Earl seemed to fear, because, inadequate as the arrangements were, they still furnished some means by which, under a happier state of things, the religious life of the University could be maintained. As regarded Lincoln College, however, he thought that there was nothing to be done but to reject the Statutes, in the hope that a better scheme might be prepared and adopted. There was one point to which he would venture to call attention, which was connected with the legal aspect of the whole matter. But he would pronounce no opinion, because, of course, he was not in a position to decide so difficult and technical a question. Representations had been made to him to the effect that the Commissioners, in making these Statutes, had exceeded the powers which had been conferred upon them by Parliament. That contention, whether right or wrong—and on that he expressed no opinion—involved this further proposition—that no power to remove disabilities or tests was conferred by the Act of 1877, and that in such matters the Commissioners were referred back to the Test Act of 1871. It was further contended that in the Act of 1877 there was a distinct clause that the Test Act of 1871 should be binding upon the Commissioners appointed in 1877. When the Test Act of 1871 was referred back to, certain provisions were found in it, which appeared to apply, in the first instance, merely to a single clause; but, on examination, that clause turned out to be the really governing clause of the whole Act, and was the only one which conferred upon the Commissioners the power of doing away with those tests. That clause was as follows:—

“Nothing in this section”—i.e., the governing section of the Act—“shall render a layman or a person not a member of the Church of England eligible to any office or capable of exercising any right in any of the said Colleges, which office or right under the authority of any Act of Parliament, or of any Statute or Ordinance of such College in force at the time of the passing of this Act, is restricted to persons in Holy Orders, or shall remove any obligation to enter into Holy Orders, which is by such authority attached to any such office.”

Rightly or wrongly, it was contended that there was nothing in the subsequent Act repealing that restriction, and that, therefore, the Commissioners, by this wholesale abolition of union of Clerical offices with the Fellowships, had gone beyond the provisions of the Act; and special attention was drawn to the repeated admonitions which were contained in both Acts that regard should be paid to the maintenance of religious instruction and of Chapel Services in the Colleges. For his own part, he should be very glad if this matter were cleared up, because it had left a very unpleasant impression on the minds of those who took an interest in it. He could not himself see in the Act of 1877 any distinct power given for superseding the Act of 1871; on the contrary, it appeared to him that the Act of 1871 was re-enacted and strengthened by certain clauses of the subsequent Act. But, however that might be, there still remained the objection to some of these Statutes, especially when it was remembered that the Commissioners were called upon to use their best endeavours to maintain religious instruction and religious services in the Colleges. What was contended was that the peculiarly unfortunate mode which, in the case of Lincoln College, the Commissioners had selected for securing the continuance of those Services, and of giving that instruction, would lead to utter and entire failure, and that the hiring of two persons at a salary of £100 a-year between them, persons who were to be removable at pleasure, and who would not have the power of speaking with authority to the undergraduates, would end in making the whole religious service and instruction ridiculous and impracticable.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN said, that the noble Earl who introduced this subject had uttered a very gloomy prophecy with regard to the Universities, and more especially the University of Oxford. He hoped that the prophecy would not be realized. It was rather unfortunate that the noble Earl did not enter a little more into detail, and point out how the various Colleges had failed so entirely, as he had represented, to fulfil the letter and the spirit of the Act of 1871. Being himself an Oxford man, he (the Earl of Camperdown) had paid more attention to the Statutes of that University. He had taken 10 Colleges, in order to see how the Act was carried out. Those included Brasenose, Balliol, Christ Church, Exeter, &c.; and, in every case he had examined into, the result was that it was necessary to appoint a Fellow in Holy Orders to perform the duties of Divine Service. In every single Statute for every College in the University of Oxford it was expressly stated that Services should be performed, and, he thought, in almost every instance, in the morning and in the evening in the College Chapel. The noble Earl had seemed to propose that the Colleges should revert to the old, exploded practice of appointing to Fellowships only those persons who were in Holy Orders; but such a retrograde step was impracticable in these days, and would hardly commend itself to any.

one. The noble Earl had complained that no provision had been made that the chaplains should be members of the Colleges; but there the noble Earl was again in error, inasmuch as in the Statutes of a large number of the Colleges it was provided that one or more of the Fellows must be in Holy Orders, and in others that the chaplain should be a Fellow if possible. The abridgment of the Service of which complaint had been made was to be done by the Governing Bodies, with the assent of the Visitor in almost every case. Such was, at all events, the case at Cambridge.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, he particularly limited his observations to Oxford.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: And, after all, who, he would ask, was more fit to undertake the government of the Colleges than the Governing Bodies? No other mode of government was possible, unless they chose to accept some unknown form of government from outside. For his own part, he did not think it so absolutely essential that the chaplain should be a Fellow of his College. Undergraduates appreciated clearly the distinction between those Fellows who attained to their position by open competition and those who came in by some other door; and it was a mistake to suppose that a Clerical Fellow obtained by virtue of his position any additional influence in the College. He thought it would be undesirable, on the evidence before them, to assume that the Colleges had failed to comply with the Statutes of 1871.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that, as he had at one time been a Commissioner for the University of Oxford, it might, perhaps, be expected that he should say something upon the subjects which the noble Earl had introduced. In the first place, he must shortly say that there was no ground for the doubt, which the most rev. Prelate had stated to be felt by some persons, as to the power of the Commissioners to abolish Clerical restrictions on Headships and Fellowships. The 17th section of the Act of 1877 expressly authorized the Commissioners to make provision for altering and regulating the conditions of eligibility to any endowment or office held in, or connected with, a College, and the conditions of tenure thereof. Headships were not within this power, when the Bill was first introduced by the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury); but it was made to include them in consequence of great pressure, with the very object of removing Clerical restrictions, both within the Universities and in the House of Commons. With respect to the provision for religious instruction and Chapel Services, which it was the duty of the Commissioners, under the 59th section of the Act (repeating the enactments for that purpose of the Tests Abolition Act) to make, the Commissioners had, in all Colleges where there were Fellows under the obligation of taking Holy Orders, retained one or more Clerical Fellowships, for those purposes. But there were several Colleges in which no Fellowships were so restricted; and, as to these, the same section prohibited the Commissioners from making, either directly or indirectly, the entering into Holy Orders, or the taking of any test, a condition of the holding of any office or emolument not so restricted at the time of the passing of the Act. In those Colleges, the Commissioners were, therefore, prevented by law from requiring that there should always be one or more Fellows in Holy Orders charged with the duty of religious instruction. At New College, for instance, there were for a long time a certain number of Clerical Fellows; but there being also in the Statutes the power of making alterations, the College, before 1877, obtained the consent of its Visitor to do away with the requirement as to Clerical Fellowships altogether; and, although there always had been, and probably always would be, Clerical Fellows in that noble Foundation fit to undertake the duties of religious instruction and Divine Service, the Commissioners could not require that this should be a condition of election to any Fellowship there. Passing to the observations of the noble Earl with respect to the abolition of Clerical Headships, which the noble Earl stated to have been effected in every College except Christ Church, he pointed out that at Pembroke, at least, this was not the case, a Canonry in Gloucester Cathedral being attached to the Headship of that College. There might be differences of opinion as to whether it was desirable to remove those restrictions; but there could be no question that it was done in accordance with an almost unanimous opinion in the University itself. In every, or nearly every, case, the two Commissioners who were appointed from each College to assist in the consideration of the new Statutes reported the prevailing opinion of their own Society to be against retaining the Clerical qualification, as necessary, for the Headship. Under those circumstances, it could not be a matter of surprise to their Lordships that the Commissioners yielded to such a general desire of the Colleges themselves, and acceded to their request. With regard to the other points, it was invariably provided, for the purpose of religious instruction and for the maintenance of the Chapel Services in those Colleges in which the Commissioners had power so to provide, that there should be at least one Clerical Fellow. At Christ Church there were three, and at Magdalen two such Clerical Fellows. He was himself very strongly impressed with the importance of intrusting these duties to a member of the Governing Body of the College, and not to a stranger to that Body, whenever it could be done; and he knew that the same opinion was entertained, before he became a Commissioner, by one who thoroughly understood the wants of the University, and was a most liberal-minded man, the present Dean of Westminster. The noble Lord was in error in supposing that any of the Statutes gave the Governing Body powers to abridge the Chapel Services. That power was conferred by the Acts of 1871 and 1874, which enabled the Governing Bodies to abridge the morning and evening prayer on any day except Sunday, with the consent of the Visitor. Upon the general question, as to the abolition of Clerical restrictions, except when they were retained for Fellowships having Clerical duties annexed to them, he would only say, that it was not so clear, even from a Churchman's point of view, as to some it might perhaps appear. It might well be doubted whether the maintenance of those Clerical restrictions had in past times tended to increase the influence of religious principles in the Universities. Under the old system gentlemen who had obtained Clerical Fellowships either went away from the Universities to country curacies, or remained long in the University, often without taking part in the work of education, and ultimately accepted College livings. Since that state of affairs had been changed, appointments to College livings had been made on more satisfactory principles. At the same time, he would point out that there was nothing in the new Statutes, of any College, to prevent the College from electing as many Clerical Fellows as they pleased, or to prevent gentlemen elected to Fellowships from taking Holy Orders if they pleased. He did not think in any case that the new Statutes would prevent the majority of young men in College from remaining subject to very much the same influences as they had always been. They were told that the present state of things as regarded religious instruction and worship was deplorable. He could not but feel that, as to some individual cases of persons now holding College emoluments, there might possibly be some ground for that statement; but he was unwilling to believe that the picture drawn by the noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon) represented the general state of things at the Universities, especially among the undergraduates. But, if it were true that there was, at the present time, that general deleterious influence which his noble Friend who introduced the subject had supposed, he would like those who objected to the new Statutes to consider, whether that state of things had come to pass under the new Statutes, which put an end to many of the Clerical restrictions which were previously maintained, or did it come to pass under the system of Clerical restrictions? It came to pass under the system of Clerical restrictions. If influences were now abroad which tended to unsettle men's minds, would it not be a greater evil that such consequences should take place among those who had taken Holy Orders to qualify themselves to hold particular endowments? and was it not better that there should be freedom for those who, unfortunately, were not in a state of mind which would induce them to take Holy Orders from choice? He could not but help thinking that if such influences existed, they had arisen, not out of the removal of Clerical restrictions, but from other causes, which, he hoped, would pass away.

THE BISHOP OF WINCHESTER said, that there was a great difference, in regard to the religious instruction of a College, between having that instruction provided for by the Governing Body, and only having it provided for by a chaplain appointed from without. At Cambridge they had had a certain number of such chaplains in some of the Colleges, and he could say from his own experience that those chaplains exercised no sort or kind of influence over the young men of the College; whereas the Clerical Fellows and Clerical Heads of the Colleges often exercised a very great influence. He entirely agreed with the noble Earl who had spoken first that it would not be desirable to try to oppose the passing of those Statutes, because if those Statutes were thrown out it was possible, considering how rapidly opinion in regard to theology was running in the present direction, they might be left in even a worse position than they were now. It should, however, be remembered that many of the Colleges were founded in old times for the special purpose of giving religious instruction. Out of the five Colleges at Oxford of which he was Visitor, all were founded for that special purpose, and three of them by eminent predecessors of his own. He did not say that religious instruction would not be given after the passing of those Statutes; but the only provision for it was that there was to be one Fellow who might be a clergyman, or there might be a College chaplain appointed from without. Although he was inclined to acquiesce in the recommendations of the Commissioners, with the exception of the case of Lincoln College, he could not but fear that their tendency must be to impair the influence of religious teaching. It was said that the Fellows of Colleges took Holy Orders often merely to obtain Fellowships. That might be so in some instances, but, he said, that a body of Clerical Fellows was almost without exception a body of well-conducted men; and he feared that they would not have the same restraining influences in a body of Lay Fellows.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he did not desire now to express any opinion with respect to the matter under discussion, because it seemed to him they would have a more convenient opportunity of discussing the question more fully when the Motion, of which Notice had been given by the most rev. Prelate, was before the House. With respect to the general operations of those Statutes, he had only to express his general concurrence and sympathy with his noble Friend behind him, who introduced the subject. There was, however, one point which he could not pass over, and it was for that reason that he ventured to trouble their Lordships with a very few words. He could not help thinking that the provision by which, in the case of most of the Colleges, a Clerical Fellow was to be appointed, in order to provide for religious instruction, was not a valueless or an unimportant provision. On the contrary, he regarded it as one of the very highest importance. He earnestly regretted that the Commissioners did not see their way to give them more in the same direction. But still the fact that they were, for whatever reason, unable to come to that decision, ought not to blind their Lordships as to the great importance of having among the Governing Body of the College a man whose duty it was to superintend the religious instruction, which it was the duty of the College to give; and such a man, selected, as he would doubtless be, with a due sense of the responsibility of the selection, must exercise a valuable influence over those committed to his charge. It was the importance he attached to that provision which had induced him, for one, to abstain from bringing any of those Statutes under the consideration of their Lordships. If their Lordships had been asked to vote against the Statutes in which that provision existed, and if they had acceded to that suggestion, the result would have been that those Statutes would simply have been swept away; and the old Statutes, in a more or less mutilated condition, would have revived to take their place. The consequence of that would have been to throw the whole legislation of the Universities into the crucible again. As far as he was able to ascertain the opinion of men of all the parties connected with the University, that would not be regarded as a desirable, or even a tolerable possibility. He was bound to look to the probabilities which there were of the substitution of improved provisions for those which, under the hypothesis he had suggested, were to have been repealed. With regard to the appointment of Clerical Fellowships, he was compelled to express his opinion that whatever any of their Lordships might individually think, there had been for many years past, and he was certain there was now, a very strong and growing feeling against the arrangement which had existed up to the present time—namely, the arrangement that had been reported on by the Commissioners in 1854. He believed that opinion was strong; and that it was so was evidenced by one circumstance that he would mention. In the original draft of the Act of 1877 a power of dealing with Clerical Headships was not included; but when the matter came to be discussed in the House of Commons, which was certainly not then an exceptionally Radical or Liberal House, it was found that the pressure of feeling was so strong that it became necessary to consent to a modification of the Bill. If the House of Commons of 1877 was not fully prepared to accept the system of Clerical Fellowships, it would be a matter of very great doubt, if they now repealed all the Statutes and framed new Statutes, whether the present House of Commons would consent to more favourable terms than the present. He would not discuss the peculiar provisions that had been inserted into the Statutes; but speaking of the Statutes generally, though he sympathized with his noble Friend behind him, he thought it very doubtful whether any interference would result in the Statutes being rendered more advantageous to religious teaching and worship than they were at present.

The Bishop of Winchester

TUNIS—BOMBARDMENT OF SFAX— INDEMNITY TO BRITISH SUBJECTS.

QUESTION. ADDRESS FOR PAPERS.

EARL DE LA WARR rose to present a petition from British subjects residing and carrying on business at Sfax in the Regency of Tunis; and to ask if Her Majesty's Government intend to take any steps to procure relief or indemnity for the losses which have been sustained in consequence of the bombardment of that city by the French; also to move an Address for papers and correspondence relating to the International Commission held at Sfax in August 1881 to inquire into the pillaging and destruction of property after the entry of the French troops; also for the Reports of M. Galea and M. Leonardi on the same subject; and for Papers and Correspondence relative to the affairs of Tunis since the last papers were presented. He wished to add that the Petition, which was numerously signed by British subjects, merchants, and others engaged in business at Sfax, stated that in the months of June and July last the city of Sfax was bombarded, and afterwards occupied by the French Forces; that the Petitioners had all suffered great damage and loss by the injury or destruction of their habitations, as well as by the pillage of the city; that the allegations of the Petitioners were fully substantiated before an International Commission held at Sfax during the months of August, September, and October, 1881; that, although several months had passed since then, the Petitioners (many of whom were completely ruined) had received no indemnity or relief, although the Natives of Sfax had been compelled to pay a large war contribution; and the Petitioners prayed that their Lordships' House might be pleased to take their case into consideration, and direct such representation to be made to the Government of the French Republic, and to that of His Highness the Bey of Tunis, as might result in their receiving the indemnity due to them for the loss they had sustained. He thought the Petitioners had a strong claim upon their Lordships' attention, and that of the country generally, under the very trying and peculiar circumstances in which they were placed. The British trade in Tunis had been hitherto carried on upon most favourable terms. It had been protected by Treaties; and British subjects, especially from Malta, had been induced to invest their capital in trade and other ways. The most friendly feelings had existed, of which he could speak from personal knowledge, between the Government of the Bey and the Government of this country. There had also been a kindly feeling between the Native population and the English. It had been enough for an Englishman to declare his nationality to insure a hospitable reception. The climate was one of the finest in the world, and a large field had been at all times open to British industry. This applied especially to Sfax, the most important city in the Regency of Tunis, as regards commerce, and where the trade was chiefly in the hands of British merchants. But what had happened? The country had been unexpectedly invaded by a friendly Power in alliance with Tunis and England; and British subjects found themselves, without any declaration of war, bombarded by a French fleet, their property destroyed, and their houses afterwards pillaged by French troops in consequence of the patriotic resistance which was offered to the invaders by the Native Arab tribes, as related by an eye-witness as follows:—

“In the narrow streets of the Native town, house after house was only occupied after a desperate hand-to-hand conflict.”

The effect of this upon the trading and commercial part of the city could readily be imagined; and although the European and Jewish quarter was separated from the Arab, both seem to have suffered alike. Another narrator, speaking of what took place, for whose accuracy he could vouch, said—

“There can be no doubt that the French soldiers who drove the Arabs out of Sfax on the 16th of July, 1881, followed up their triumph by an indiscriminate pillage of both the European and Arab quarters of the town. What was done happened in the face of day, and can neither be gainsaid nor denied.”

The same witness said—

“We next entered the European faubourg. Most of the houses were much damaged and knocked about by the shells; but on the pretext that some Arabs had fired from the dwelling of M. Gili, a Maltese merchant, an order had been given to break open the doors of every habitation in the quarter; and as soon as this was done a general pillage ensued. I was an unwilling witness of all that happened. The soldiers (i.e., the French) took or spoiled everything they could carry away, and broke or defaced what they were unable to move. None of the officers seemed disposed to interfere, and the whole business was a sad contrast to the measures taken by the insurgents (i.e., the Native population) to preserve our property.”

This witness of what took place further added—

“July 19.—This morning I went to visit the Grand Mosque. Its minaret is disabled, and it is turned into a barrack. I saw the soldiers cooking in various parts of it. Throughout the Moorish town the traces of the sack were painful to witness. . . . Valuable Arabic manuscripts were torn up and their pages distributed as souvenirs of the siege.”

After many other particulars, he went on to say—

“In short, the Maltese Colonists of Sfax have been the chief sufferers by the pillage of the town committed in the manner I have described. Some of them have, indeed, lost their all; hardly one has escaped unscathed. As an eye-witness, I have recorded what really happened in broad daylight and in the sight of hundreds of people. The only hope of the half-ruined British community is in the support which they feel sure their claims must inevitably have from the British Government.”

He could give many further details; but he thought he had said enough to justify the words of the Petition as regarded the losses which had been sustained by British subjects at Sfax in consequence of the bombardment of that city by the French and the pillage which ensued. The Petition concluded by stating that the allegations were fully substantiated before an International Commission, which was appointed to inquire into the circumstances of the case; but that, notwithstanding several months had elapsed, no relief or indemnity of any kind had been afforded them, although the Natives of Sfax had been compelled to pay a large war contribution. The Commission here referred to was appointed, he believed, in September, 1881, and was composed of Count Marquessac, captain of the French ship La Reine Blanche, who acted as President; Caïd Jelluli, the Governor of the city; Captain Tryon, of Her Majesty's ship Monarch; and Captain Conti, of the Italian frigate Maria Pia. After sitting several weeks, the Commission was abruptly dissolved. Sir Charles W. Dilke stated in “another place,” in March last—

“That the proceedings of the Sfax Commission were brought to a close by the French Chairman, on the ground that the British Commissioner had recalled a witness who had been already examined, and whose second deposition differed from that previously given.”

This was a somewhat unusual way of terminating an important Commission where considerable interests were at stake—by the ipse dixit of the French Chairman. He asked that the proceedings of the Sfax Commission, together with the Report of M. Galea and M. Leonardi, might be laid upon the Table of the House. He further asked for Papers and Correspondence relative to the general affairs of Tunis since the last Papers were presented, including Correspondence upon the still unsolved question of the Enfida Estate. With reference generally to these questions as affecting British interests, it was impossible to pass unnoticed the recent Decree of the President of the French Republic, dated the 22nd of April, which amounted to the virtual annexation to France of the Regency of Tunis. By this Decree the various branches of Government in Tunis, as far as they related to France, were placed under the corresponding Ministerial Departments in Paris. There remained, therefore, but one step more—namely, to include other nationalities—and the annexation was complete. The Kroumir phantom had disappeared, and, in the words of M. de Freycinet, upon whose Report this Decree was founded—

“Le moment semble venu d'adopter une organisation plus en harmonie avec la nature des choses.”

He asked the attention of the House, and especially of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to these words—for, if they meant anything, it must surely be that the protectorate of Tunis which France had assumed would shortly pass into annexation similar to that of Algeria. They had heard much lately of the danger to this country of the proposed Channel Tunnel; but this question seemed to him to sink into insignificance when compared with that of the annexation of Tunis to France, which would give her possession of what might become two of the finest harbours in the Mediterranean, Bizerta and Porto Farina, and would thus virtually give a naval preponderance to France from Gibraltar to Malta, which, in the event of war, might prove most disastrous to this country. In conclusion, the noble Earl moved that the Petition be laid upon the Table.

Moved, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for papers and correspondence relating to the International Commission held at Sfax in August 1881 to inquire into the pillaging and destruction of property after the entry of the French troops; also for the reports of M. Galea and M. Leonardi on the same subject; and for papers and correspondence relative to the affairs of Tunis since the last papers were presented.—(The Earl De La Warr.)

EARL GRANVILLE said: My Lords, in answer to the noble Earl's Question, of which he gave Notice, but which he has put with some development, I have to say that I regret that the Commission of Inquiry at Sfax led to no practical result. Her Majesty's Government at once put themselves in communication with the French Government on the subject of the British claims. Those claims are now nearly prepared, and will be diplomatically communicated to the French Government through our Ambassador at Paris. As to the Motion of the noble Earl, I cannot agree to it. The Papers will be prepared and presented when the communications which are now going on have come to an end.

EARL DE LA WARR: If the noble Earl will present the Papers at the earliest possible time, I shall be happy to withdraw my Motion.

EARL GRANVILLE: They will be presented when the communications are concluded.

EARL DE LA WARR: There are other Papers—i.e., Reports of what occurred.

EARL GRANVILLE: They will be presented.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

THEATRES AND MUSIC HALLS (METROPOLIS)—PRECAUTIONS IN CASE OF FIRE.—ADDRESS FOR PAPERS.

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN rose to move that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for Copies of the Report made to the Home Office by Captain Shaw, chief officer of the London Fire Brigade, with regard to the dangers to which the public are exposed from fire in the Metropolitan theatres, and as to the means of exit provided for them. The noble Earl said it could not be denied that these dangers actually existed to a serious extent. Nothing could be more fallacious than to imagine themselves safe merely because they chose to shut their eyes to the perils around them. It had been stated that Captain Shaw's Report on the subject was of a very alarming character or description; but that was no reason for concealing its purpose. The dangers that existed were, to some extent, shown by the fires and panics which had recently occurred in different parts of the world; and if it had not been for the characteristic courage of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, on a recent occasion in London, when a bag of gas burst in connection with the limelight in a theatre, there might have been a great loss of life. The lessees of the theatres were bound to take reasonable care for the protection of the public in this matter; and if they failed or neglected to do so, he submitted that their licences should be refused and their theatres closed. The noble Earl concluded by moving his Motion.

Moved, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for copies of the Report made to the Home Office by Captain Shaw, chief with the regulations, his letters would have been duly forwarded.

MR. HEALY: I would like to ask the right hon. Gentleman, if he thought my Question referred only to American citizenship, why he obtained information as to the latter part of it?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I thought the first part of the Question was most important.

PEACE PRESERVATION (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—SEARCH FOR ARMS.

MR. CALLAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he issued a warrant under the provisions of the Arms Act of last Session to search the residence of Mr. John Connolly, Town Hall, Dundalk, a pensioner of the 19th Regiment, who lost his arm at the Alma; and, if so, whether he issued the said warrant upon sworn informations, or on the mere "reasonable suspicion" of Mr. Supple, Sub-Inspector Royal Irish Constabulary, Dundalk?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that the warrant had been issued upon credible and trustworthy sworn information.

INTERNATIONAL FISHERY CONFERENCE—POLICE OF THE NORTH SEA.

MR. BIRKBECK asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether the Governments who were represented at the International Fishery Conference held at the Hague last autumn, have approved the recommendations made by their delegates with regard to regulating the police of the fisheries in the North Sea; and, whether it is probable that any Convention will be concluded on this subject between the Maritime Countries whose coasts abut on the North Sea?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: All the Governments who were represented at the International Fisheries Conference held at the Hague last autumn, with the exception of Sweden and Norway, from whom no final reply has yet been received, have approved generally of the draft Convention which was recommended by the delegates, and which was, in the main, based on the suggestions made by Her Majesty's Government before the Conference assembled. I have every reason to hope that an International Convention will be concluded in a few days; and Mr. Trevor and Mr. Kennedy, who conducted the negotiations on behalf of this country with great ability and complete success, have been appointed Her Majesty's Plenipotentiaries for signature of such a Convention, and will leave to-morrow for Holland, Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, and the Netherlands will also be represented on this occasion. The Papers will be laid on the Table as soon as practicable; and I anticipate with confidence that the establishment by this Convention of efficient police regulations will be sufficient to check the disorders which have, unfortunately, been too frequent among the fishermen in the North Sea.

MAIN ROADS (ENGLAND)—LEGISLATION.

SIR MASSEY LOPES asked the President of the Local Government Board, If he can state when he proposes to introduce the Bill, referred to by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, with reference to the expenses of main roads?

MR. DODSON: In answer to the hon. Baronet, I have to say that I hope shortly to be able to make a statement as to the mode in which it is proposed to distribute this grant. I also hope that, as it is a financial arrangement, it will be found practicable to give effect to it without any special legislation.

PUBLIC HEALTH—SHEFFIELD SMALL-POX HOSPITAL.

MR. W. LOWTHER asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether it is true that the resident surgeon, one of the nurses, and the cook, at a lately erected small-pox and fever hospital at Sheffield, were attacked by small-pox; and, whether he has any information that these officials were vaccinated before entering on their duties?

MR. DODSON: It is true that the resident surgeon and the cook at this hospital have recently been attacked with small-pox; but none of the nurses have been attacked. The medical officer had been vaccinated and re-vaccinated; the cook had been vaccinated in infancy, but, having afterwards suffered from small-pox, was not re-vaccinated on entering the hospital. Besides the medical officer and cook, one of the ward servants was attacked. She had been vaccinated when a child and re-vaccinated after coming to the hospital, but with only partial success. In all these three instances the attack was in a modified form, and, in the cases of the medical officer and the ward servant, scarcely any rash appeared. The infection seems to have been derived from a very severe case of confluent hemorrhagic small-pox, where the patient had never been vaccinated, and this is the only case which has terminated fatally in the hospital.

POOR LAW (ENGLAND)—OLDHAM BOARD OF GUARDIANS.

MR. W. LOWTHER asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether three members of the Board of Guardians at Oldham lately bought the carcass of a pig which the medical officer had ordered to be killed and burned; whether the carcass of the pig was sold to a butcher for twenty-five shillings by these three guardians; whether, on the facts becoming known, the money was handed over to the master of the workhouse; and, whether those three gentlemen continue to act as guardians?

MR. DODSON: I have caused inquiry to be made into this matter; but it does not appear that the medical officer ordered the pig in question to be killed, although, assuming that it was suffering from the same malady as another one which had been taken ill, he suggested that the carcass should be burnt. It is right, however, to say that he does not appear to have seen the pig; and the Guardians afterwards called in a veterinary surgeon, who examined the carcass and distinctly stated that it was fit for human food. The pig was subsequently taken away and sold by three of the Guardians for a sovereign, and the amount paid by one of them to the master of the workhouse. The three Guardians who took away the pig still continue to act as Guardians.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELECTION OF GUARDIANS FOR THE RATHDRUM UNION.

MR. W. J. CORBET asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If, as President of the Local Government Board, he is aware that Mr.

Mr. Dodson

Gaskin, of Newtownboswell, Ashford, county Wicklow, has memorialized the Board, complaining of the conduct of the clerk of Rathdrum Union, in his capacity of returning officer, at the late election of guardian for the electoral division of Killoaky, in that Union, and asking for a scrutiny of the votes; whether Mr. Gaskin had a large majority of the votes of rated occupiers, but was defeated by proxy votes; whether the validity of many of such votes was questioned by Mr. Gaskin, but, no professional agent being present on behalf of the rated occupiers to press the objections, all the proxy votes were admitted; whether, at the election for the adjoining electoral division of Wicklow, where a professional agent was employed, a large number of proxy votes were presented, and were objected to; whether the returning officer asserted they were all right, and wanted to record them; but, the objector insisting on examining them, many were rejected, being irregular, and the other candidate was returned; whether the Local Government Board have, on the ex parte statement of the officer whose conduct is impugned, refused Mr. Gaskin the inquiry sought for; and, whether, in justice to the rated occupiers, he will cause a strict investigation to be made into the circumstances of the case?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, it was the case that Mr. Gaskin had memorialized the Local Government Board; and the latter, having made inquiry into the matter, were satisfied with the explanation of the Returning Officer. In the absence of evidence in support of Mr. Gaskin's statements, they did not think further inquiry necessary.

'PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PRO-
PERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881.—MR.
MICHAEL RYAN-WALL.

MR. REDMOND asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the case of Mr. Michael Ryan-Wall, at present detained under the Coercion Act in Naas Gaol, has been considered; and, whether he will order his release?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: This case has been reconsidered; and I regret to state that the Lord Lieutenant cannot, at present, recommend his release.

WAYS AND MEANS—RESOLUTION 3—

COFFEE

MR. STEWART MACLIVER asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, Whether, after the proposed Resolution has become Law, prohibiting the mixture with coffee of any other ingredient than chicory, a drawback will be allowed to manufacturers upon other vegetables hitherto used for mixing, and upon which the same Duty as the Duty upon Chicory has been paid?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: The Government will be prepared to refund the duty in all cases in which such vegetable substances are still in charge, after the duty has been paid thereon. But where the duty has been paid, and the goods have been delivered for home consumption, Her Majesty's Government must adhere to their invariable practice of not making repayment.

THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—
CO. MONAGHAN.

MR. LEWIS asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, in the town of Monaghan, it is a fact that of a force of over twenty men all are Roman Catholics but three, and that the head constable, the sub-inspector, and the county inspector are also Roman Catholics; whether this is in accordance with the usual practice in the distribution of the force; and, whether he will direct any change to be made?

MR. CALLAN: Before the right hon. Gentleman answers that Question, I beg to ask him, Whether it is a fact that in Dundalk, where nine-tenths of the population are Catholics, the County Inspector, the Sub-Inspector, the Head Constable, and the majority of the constables are Protestants; and, whether this is in accordance with the usual practice in the distribution of the force?

MR. SEXTON also asked the right hon. Gentleman, Whether he was aware that in Cookstown the Constabulary Force was entirely composed of Protestants; and that in Armagh, Downpatrick, Enniskillen, and several other towns in Ulster all the police officers were Protestants?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he had no knowledge of the facts referred to in the Questions of the hon. Members for Louth and for the county of Sligo; but they enabled him to state, in reply to the first Question, how exceedingly inconvenient it would be if the police were distributed and located according to their religious persuasion. Any attempt thus to distribute them would, he believed, be most disadvantageous to the good government and the efficiency of the force. As regarded the facts mentioned, he was informed that the actual number of constables in Monaghan was 21, of whom five were Protestants, which was about the same proportion as existed between the two religious persuasions in the place. The Head Constable, the Sub-Inspector, and the County Inspector were Roman Catholics. The County Inspector and Head Constable had been several years in the town, and the Inspector General was not aware of any reason for their removal. To remove a police officer from one district to another solely on account of his religion would not be expedient.

MR. MACFARLANE inquired, whether the Chief Secretary had received any complaint of misconduct on the part of the Sub-Inspector which would justify his removal?

MR. HEALY asked further, whether it was not the practice to send police to the South from the North, and to the North from the South?

[No answers were given to these Questions.]

THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—
PENSIONS.

MR. LEWIS asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, having regard to the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown in the late Government with reference to the claims of those members of the Royal Irish Constabulary Force who retired before August 1874 to the increased scale of pensions provided by the Act of 1874, the Government will consent to the appointment of a Select Committee of this House to consider and report upon such claims, and the justice or expediency of satisfying the same?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that this was a matter which had been very carefully considered by his Predecessor and himself, and the conclusion arrived at was that there was not a sufficient case for the appointment of a Select Committee.

inspection of the emigrants before starting, and that the passengers were not in an exhausted condition. The passengers, the ship, and the food were inspected before the ship left. There were no cases of infectious disease found among the emigrants, the accommodation was found to be good, and in accordance with the statutory enactment bearing upon it, and the food, which was sufficient for 32 days, was found to be good. The passage lasted 12 days. If the hon. Member will give particulars of any special point on which he thinks inquiry ought to be made, I will consider it; but, as at present advised, I cannot see anything calling for further inquiry.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—
LABOURERS' COTTAGES.

MR. VILLIERS STUART asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he will lay upon the Table a Return of the number of cases in which the Commissioners under the Land Act have ordered the building or improvement of labourers cottages with the addition of garden allotments; in how many cases their orders have been carried out; and, whether he will inform the House what penalty the Commissioners are empowered to inflict in case of non-compliance with their orders?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that the House had ordered a Return of the provision made for labourers on the 28th of January last, and that Return would give all the information which could be supplied up to that date. A further Return would be prepared. The Commissioners informed him that they had no means of knowing what provision for labourers had been made. The penalties for non-compliance with the orders of the Commissioners were of the ordinary kind—namely, attachment of the person or sequestration of goods.

MR. HEALY: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman, If it is not a fact that there is no machinery provided by the Land Act to compel farmers to comply with the order of the Court regarding cottages and garden allotments?

MR. W. E. FORSTER was understood to assent to the statement.

RUSSIA—PERSECUTION OF THE JEWS.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, inasmuch as the course hitherto pursued by Her Majesty's Government with regard to the outrages on the Jews in Russia has failed to bring about a cessation of these outrages, Her Majesty's Government will now, following the humane example of the Government of the United States, consider the necessity of making a representation, either in conjunction with the other Great Powers in the form of a Collective Note, or otherwise, demanding that Russia shall discharge the common obligations of justice and humanity towards the Jews?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: As to the addition which the hon. Member has just made to his Question, I have to say that though paragraphs have appeared in the newspapers to that effect, we know nothing with regard to the truth of the statement. I can only say, in answer to the Question as it appeared on the Paper, Her Majesty's Government had reason to believe that official representations would do more harm than good. The further Reports which have been received will be presented to Parliament.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—
MICHAEL WHITTAKER AND THOMAS DUNPHY.

MR. LALOR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, nearly five months ago, Michael Whittaker and Thomas Dunphy were arrested under the Coercion Act, on the same charge of "inciting others to an act of intimidation;" whether the parish of Aghaboe, in the Queen's County, where the Messrs. Whittaker and Dunphy reside, has been entirely free, both before and since their arrest, from crime and outrage of any kind; and, is it not a fact that Thomas Dunphy has been released from prison, while Michael Whittaker is still detained there; and, if so, why has Mr. Whittaker been treated differently?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that the cases referred to by the hon. Member were under consideration.

THE PARKS (METROPOLIS)—
RICHMOND PARK.

MR. MOLLOY asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether he has withstanding the evidence of this information, no prosecution took place.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—RULES RELATING TO VISITS TO PERSONS DETAINED UNDER THE ACT.

MR. REDMOND asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he would consent to modify the rules relating to visits to prisoners detained under the Coercion Act, so that visits of wives to their husbands might take place in an ordinary room instead of the cage, and be extended beyond fifteen minutes in every case where a promise has been given by the visitor not to bring out any letter, or otherwise infringe the regulations?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that, as he stated on a former occasion, the 15 minutes allowed for each visit would be extended in any case in which reasonable representations were made to the Governor of the prison.

MR. REDMOND said, the right hon. Gentleman had not dealt with that part of the Question which related to visitors promising not to convey away letters.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Representations must be made in each case.

PEACE PRESERVATION (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—REV. THOMAS FEEHAN.

MR. MARUM asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, in reference to the case of the Rev. Thomas Feehan, C.C. now detained in Maryborough Gaol, in default of entering into bail for good behaviour, his attention has been called to the following circumstances:—That the High Court of Justice of the Queen's Bench in Ireland has, upon application for a certiorari, with the view to have the committal quashed, granted a conditional order, on the ground of the rejection of legal evidence in the Court below, that is to say: the refusal to hear the reverend defendant himself, as a witness on his own behalf, in order to show cause why he should not be put under a rule of bail; that one of the three presiding justices, viz. myself, dissented from such ruling, but, upon asking counsel for the reverend defendant for some authority for the procedure, was informed that none existed upon the point, although the Statute of Edward III. under which the proceedings were laid, has been in operation for over five hundred years; that it is laid down in Coke's Institutes, 4, p. 181, that bail under the Statute shall be demanded for "the prevention of offences before they be done," and therefore the reverend defendant was a competent witness on his own behalf, and should have been heard; that the reverend defendant has now been in custody for upwards of one month, and his curacy has lapsed in his regard, inasmuch as another clergyman has been appointed in his absence to the mission of Rathdrasay; and, whether, under all the circumstances of the case, he will consult the Law Officers of the Crown; and if, in their opinion, the committal and detention be not warranted in Law, he will forthwith take proper steps to have the Rev. Thomas Feehan at once released from prison, instead of being obliged to await the dilatory process incidental to a decision of the Court of Law?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, a Provisional Order had been granted by the Queen's Bench for a review of the question of the legality of this gentleman's detention. The matter had been decided by the Court as the proper tribunal, and it was impossible for the Irish Executive to interfere.

LANDLORD AND TENANT (SCOTLAND) — EVICTIONS IN THE ISLAND OF SKYE.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH asked the Lord Advocate, Whether he will order that the Skye Crofters, now committed for trial, shall, instead of being tried summarily, have the privilege of being tried by a jury of their countrymen, and that the presiding judge shall be one disconnected with the exceptional proceedings attendant on their recent apprehension?

MR. DICK-PEDDIE asked, Whether it is the case that instructions have been given that the five Crofters recently arrested in Skye, and now released on bail, be tried summarily; whether they have applied through their agent to be tried by jury; whether he intends to comply with their application; and, whether he will give directions that the trial shall take place at Portree instead of Inverness?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): I see no reason for recalling the order for trial before the Sheriff summarily, which was made, after full consideration of the case, by my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General for Scotland and myself, when it was first reported during the Easter Recess. Knowing that the people of Skye are generally peaceable, honest, and law-abiding, and having reason to believe that they had been misled by evil counsel into resisting an officer of the law executing a legal warrant, we thought that the offence would not be repeated if it were made clear to them, as speedily as possible, that the law would be vindicated, though for the first offence the sentence and punishment might not be severe. A summary trial before the Sheriff is the proceeding appropriate to the least grave offences reported to the Crown Office. It can be held with the least delay, and imprisonment for 60 days is the maximum punishment which the Sheriff can award in such a trial; while it is, of course, within his competency to pronounce even a lighter sentence, if he thinks it will meet the justice of the case. As regards the last part of the Question, I have to say that it is intended that the trial shall proceed before Sheriff Blair at Inverness. He has not hitherto taken part in the measures which have, unfortunately, become necessary for vindicating the law in Skye. I may also add that this arrangement was made before the present Question was put. In answer to my hon. Friend's (Mr. Dick-Peddie's) Question, I have to say that I shall communicate on the subject, and ascertain whether the trial can take place at Portree.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH said, the Lord Advocate had not answered the last part of his Question.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): The solicitor or agent for the accused did make such an application.

ENGLAND AND FRANCE—THE CHANNEL TUNNEL SCHEME.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the President of the Board of Trade, If it is to be understood that Her Majesty's Government have determined not only to refuse permission to construct a Channel Tunnel without the consent of Parliament, but also to prohibit the mere boring of an experimental hole of limited dimensions under the sea, in order to ascertain the nature of the strata, at the risk and expense of the borers?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: Yes, Sir; the Government have come to the conclusion that it is desirable that what is called the experimental boring of the Channel Tunnel Company should be stopped, and that further expenses should, as far as possible, be saved until Parliament has come to a decision whether the Channel Tunnel is to be made or not.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MR. MOLLOY.

MR. REDMOND asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he has received an application from Mr. Molloy, a prisoner under the Coercion Act in Dundalk Prison, for release on parole to attend to some necessary farming operations; whether the men arrested in the district of Wexford County, to which Mr. Molloy belongs, have not all been released; and, whether he will reconsider his case?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, the release of this prisoner had been ordered.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—CAPTAIN PLUNKET, R.M.

MR. REDMOND asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the Report, in the "Daily News" of 28th April, of certain observations made by Captain Plunket, R.M. at the Petty Sessions Court of Castleisland, county Kerry; whether Captain Plunket stated, amongst other things, that the "people had lost all sense of honesty, decency, and religion," and that

"if any persons were found in his district attempting to establish a branch of the Ladies' Land League, he would issue a warrant for their arrest," and, whether it is a fact that recently Captain Plunket issued orders to the police in his district, whenever they found more than two men assembled upon the road to disperse them, and, if necessary, to use their weapons in doing so?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, there was another Question on the same subject by the noble Lord (Lord Algernon Percy)—Whether his attention has been called to the following statement in the “Dublin Daily Express” of the 28th of April:—

“The Hon. Captain Plunkett, the special resident Magistrate of the South-Western District, delivered an address yesterday from the Bench at Castleisland Petty Sessions Court, county Kerry, on the terrorism prevailing in the country, and the cowardice of the farmers, who will not combine against it. Captain Plunkett said there was no case on record in the history of the world where the people had become so demoralised in a short time;”

and, whether he proposed to take any further steps to put a stop to the system of terrorism at present existing in Ireland? He should like to answer both Questions. He had received a telegram from Captain Plunkett, who informed him that he did say—

“The people had lost all sense of honesty, decency, and religion;”

and that—

“If any persons were found in his district attempting to establish a branch of the Ladies’ Land League, he would issue a warrant for their arrest;”

but he did not give orders to the police to disperse parties of two or more assembled upon the road. He did say that the intimidation prevailing was appalling, and that—“There was no case on record in the history of the world where the people had become so demoralized”—[Mr. HEALY: Bosh!]—“in so short a space of time.”

He did not say that it was impossible for the Government to cope with the outrages; but he did say that people who did not assist in their own protection and in the repression of crime did not deserve any protection. He (Mr. W. E. Forster) did not know that he should exactly have recommended the use of these words, had he been consulted; but he thought that in the meaning of them, and in what they were understood to imply, they were very correct statements.

MR. ARTHUR O’CONNOR inquired whether the right hon. Gentleman was aware that the County Kerry was the most rack-rented county in Ireland, and that the Land Courts reduced the rents in many cases in the proportion of £17 to £4?

[No answer was given.]

VOL. CCLXVIII. [THIRD SERIES.]

LAW AND POLICE—THE SALVATION ARMY—RIOTS AT OLDHAM.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is true that on Wednesday last the roughs of Oldham made an organised attack on a meeting of peaceable citizens by throwing burning materials into the building where they were assembled, and then savagely driving back those who attempted to escape from the danger; whether any of those taking part in these proceedings have been arrested; and, whether, in view of these constantly occurring and recurring savage scenes, he contemplates introducing any measure for the repression of outrages in England and in Scotland?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I am happy to inform my hon. Friend—and I am sure he will be glad to hear—that the Report of the Chief Constable states that the newspaper report on which his Question is founded is entirely untrue. The service was continued without interruption. Mr. Cooper Clay, a leading member of the Salvation Army, was present during the whole of the service, and states that when he saw the newspaper report on Thursday morning he immediately wrote to The Manchester Courier, contradicting the statement. That, however, has not prevented its being re-printed in many other newspapers. The whole foundation for this story is that some mischievous person inserted some burning cotton with Cayenne pepper into the orifice of the ventilator leading into the room, which caused some of the people to sneeze; a proceeding, no doubt, much to be reprobated. I would say to my hon. Friend and others, there appears to be an increasing demand for sensational paragraphs. When there is a sensational paragraph, there is a sensational article founded on it—[Mr. WARTON: And a sensational Question!]—and the people give credit to it that it does not deserve, and form an exaggerated notion of the state of the country and of dangers that do not exist.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MR. LUKE ARMSTRONG.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, there being two Gannons, one of whom was arrested on suspicion of maiming cattle; but as the one arrested with John Reynolds was not the one arrested for that act, it was only right that he should make this statement to the House.

MR. HEALY: I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it makes any difference to the man what he was arrested for, so long as as he is kept in gaol?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Evidently this person—and very naturally—did think it made a difference whether he was arrested for maiming cattle or intimidation, as he had written complaining of the accidental mis-statement.

MR. HEALY: Nobody would believe either charge.

TURKEY—ADMINISTRATIVE REFORMS.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether there is any truth in the statement, which has appeared in several newspapers, to the effect that the Sultan has recently taken steps to effect reforms both in his Asiatic and European Dominions; whether it is proposed in such reforms to introduce into European Turkey the institutions drawn up by the Commission, of which the noble Lord the Member for Oalme was a member; and, whether any Papers can be laid upon the Table on the subject?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Nothing very definite is known as to the intentions of His Majesty the Sultan with regard to the introduction of administrative reforms; and I cannot, therefore, say whether the reforms contemplated extend to the whole Empire, nor can I state their probable nature. His Majesty has, however, given Lord Dufferin repeated assurances of his determination to introduce reforms; but it would not be advisable to lay on the Table, at the present moment, any Papers upon the subject.

THE REVENUE—THE WINE DUTIES.

EARL PERCY asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he contemplates the readjustment of the Duty on Spanish wine in the direction indicated in his Financial Statement on June 10th, 1880?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: The question of the Wine Duties has been, and is still, under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government.

INLAND REVENUE—RAILWAY PASSENGER DUTY—THE CHEAP TRAINS ACT, 1844.

MR. BUXTON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, considering that he has declared himself unable to repeal the Railway Passenger Duty, and that his predecessor has admitted that he is prepared to bring in a Bill for the better regulation of the Exemption from the Duty, which may be capable of enforcement?

“The state of the Law on the subject is one which cannot be permanent, and ought not to be permanently maintained,”

MR. BROADHURST asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, considering that he is unable to repeal the Railway Passenger Duty, and that the Cheap Trains Act of 1844 has been practically abrogated by judicial decisions, which, though only partially put in force, have increased the duty on third class passengers from £70,322 in 1873, to £333,032 in 1880, he will at the earliest opportunity bring in a Bill to carry out the intention of the Cheap Trains Act, namely, to exempt from duty the fares of “the poorer class of travellers” when such fares do not exceed the rate of one penny per mile.

MR. THOROLD ROGERS asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, considering that a Select Committee of this House reported in 1876 that the Board of Inland Revenue make arrangements with the Railway Companies respecting the exemption from Passenger Duty, based on three different plans, “which are all entirely outside the Cheap Trains Act,” and that the same Committee recommended, inter alia, that until the finances of the State warrant the abolition of the Tax, it should be restricted to fares over a penny per mile, he will bring in a Bill which will carry out this recommendation, or, at any rate, will establish a harmony between the intentions of the Legislature and the practice of the Board of Inland Revenue?

MR. R. BIDDULPH MARTIN asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, since by 5 and 6 Vic. c. 79, s. 4, it is enacted that the Company of Proprietors of every Railway in Great Britain shall cause copies of the accounts of their respective Railways to be delivered to the Commissioners of Stamps and Taxes, verified by affidavit, and Duties to be paid thereon monthly, and since such Duties have been from time to time further settled and enacted, Whether it is competent for any Railway Company to charge such Duties on the passengers; whether any such Duty so charged on the passenger does not become part of the fare payable, and is itself liable to a Duty, provided that the fare and Duty together do not exceed the maximum toll authorised to be levied under any public or private Act; whether his attention has been called to the fact that the South-Eastern Railway Company charge their season ticket holders with the amount of Duty payable, in addition to the advertised fare; and, whether he has collected or intends to collect from the South Eastern Railway Company (and any other Company whose practice is identical) the Duty on the fare collected under the name of Duty, and on all arrears thereof?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GLADSTONE): In answer to the first Question, there is no doubt it will be necessary at some future time to modify the provisions of the Cheap Trains Act, in order to adapt them to the changes in the mode of conducting passenger traffic. But I do not think I can hold out any expectation of being able to legislate on the matter at present. I am truly concerned at being compelled, from week to week, to make the state of Business in Parliament a reason why the legitimate demands of the country, quite apart from Party distinction, should be postponed; but my hon. Friends are judges of the circumstances along with myself, and I think they will understand my answer. In answer to the second Question, the Cheap Trains Act of 1844 has not been practically abrogated by judicial decisions, but rather confirmed; and those decisions have only led to an increased charge of duty in cases where the Act, in the view of the Board of Inland Revenue, had not been complied with according to its full meaning. The increase in the duty on third-class passengers from £70,322 in 1873 to £333,032 in 1880 was not entirely due to increase charge, but was largely due to the immense increase in the number of third-class passengers. The intention of the Cheap

Trains Act, which exempted from duty the fares of the poorer class of passengers, is, in the opinion of the Revenue Department, fairly carried out at present, but, as they think, with possibly somewhat less strictness than the law warrants or even might require. As to the third Question, I have to say that the restriction on the Passenger Duty to fares above 1*d.* per mile would involve a loss to the Revenue, I am sorry to say, of £250,000 a-year. As to the fourth Question, it is quite within the competency of any Railway Company to charge duties on fares from passengers, provided they do not exceed the limit laid down in the Act; and there is no provision in law to prevent the Company from dividing the charge as between them and the passengers into two portions—one portion being for the fare and the other for the duty.

IRELAND — ADDRESS OF THE DOMINION HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MR. CALLAN asked leave to postpone the following Questions, which stood in his name on the Notice Paper:—

“To ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether his attention has been called to the telegraphic Despatch in the “Times” of April 22nd, under date:—

‘Ottawa, April 20th.

‘In to-day’s sitting of the Dominion of the House of Commons, Mr. Cortigan, a Conservative, moved that an Address should be presented to the Queen, praying that a form of Self-Government should be granted to Ireland similar to that enjoyed by Canada, and that clemency should be extended to the political prisoners in Ireland. Mr. Blake, the leader of the Opposition, made a powerful speech in favour of Home Rule for Ireland. Sir John Macdonald, the Premier, also supported the Resolution proposed by Mr. Cortigan, which was unanimously adopted. Sir John Macdonald stated that he would see that the necessary steps were taken to have the Address prepared, in order that it might be sent to the Senate for concurrence;’

whether he will have any objection to direct that a Copy of the said Address be laid upon the Table of the House; and, whether he purposes taking any action in the matter?”

MR. GLADSTONE: I think that when such a Question relating to a public body has been for some time on the Paper it is necessary that it should be answered as soon as possible, and I propose to answer, at any rate, so much of the Question as is before us.

Mr. R. Biddulph Martin

MR. CALLAN: I wish to make an addition to the Question, and to ask whether the right hon. Gentleman is aware that since my Notice was first given the Canadian Senate, or Upper House, has confirmed the Resolution?

MR. GLADSTONE: No, Sir; I am not aware that the Senate had concurred in the proceedings of the Assembly. The Address has not been transmitted to us in the regular manner. We are cognizant of the Resolution having been passed and of its contents, but only by telegraphic report. We cannot present it to the House, because we are not in possession of the document. With regard to the substance of the Resolution, the hon. Gentleman has called upon me to enter upon a matter which is fitter for debate than a mere reply to a Question; but, of course, I may observe that although, no doubt, the Assembly of Canada desired to assist our deliberations, the question referred to in the Address appertains exclusively to the Imperial Parliament and the Imperial Government; and I may add that so much of the subject-matter as touches the discretion of the Executive Government—for this is part of the subject-matter—had our close and constant attention before the intimation of the wish expressed in the Address, either from that quarter or any other quarter, had reached us in the shape of any suggestion.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether Sir John Macdonald, the Premier of Canada, is not a Member of the Privy Council; and whether, as such, he is not responsible for any advice he may tender to the Crown?

MR. GLADSTONE: Perhaps that is a Question, Sir, on which, I think, before answering it, I ought to take the advice of the Law Officers of the Crown; but as my own impression is undoubtedly that although a gentleman becomes a Minister of Canada, and, as such, is responsible only to the Canadian Parliament, yet directly he becomes a Member of the British Privy Council, unquestionably he must come under every responsibility in exactly the same degree as any other Member of the Privy Council.

THE LAND COMMISSION (IRELAND)— DECISION UNDER THE LAND ACT.

MR. HEALY asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If his attention has been called to the cases of Dillon and Hanrahan versus Knight of Glin, reported in the "Freeman's Journal" of the 31st ultimo, in which the landlord appealed to the Land Commission from the judicial rent fixed by the Sub-Commission, and in which Mr. Justice O'Hagan stated that the Land Commission found themselves compelled to increase the judicial rents, as fixed by the Sub-Commission, by sums of £4 a year and £3 a year respectively, in consequence of the judgment of the Court of Appeal in the case of Adams versus Dunseath, deciding that, as regards tenants' improvements made prior to the Land Act of 1870, mere user of them by the tenant must be regarded as to some extent a compensation for them; whether he is aware that the present Lord Chancellor of Ireland, then Attorney General, in refusing to consent to an amendment to the recent Land Act proposed by Mr. Parnell, which would have prevented this, declared it "absurd" to think that the Courts could come to such a decision; whether he himself expressed an equally strong opinion; whether, in spite of this, the tenants Dillon and Hanrahan will now be compelled to pay the increased judicial rent for fifteen years; whether he can give any assurance that, in the vast number of applications to fix a fair rent now pending, steps will be taken to prevent decisions contrary to what has been stated to have been the intentions of the Government when the Act was passed; whether any amending legislation which the Government may bring in to carry out these intentions will be retrospective, so as to give tenants like Messrs. Dillon and Hanrahan the benefit of it; and, whether it can be speedily introduced to prevent further cases of the same kind?

MR. GLADSTONE: I must avail myself of the aid of arithmetic to follow the paragraphs of the hon. Gentleman's Question. The first paragraph is, I believe, perfectly accurate. With regard to the second, I do not think it is quite accurate. I have communicated with the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, and he does not recollect using the expression quoted in the Question; and as a reference to the reports of the debates shows—so far as they can be considered an authority, and, of course, in connection with the discussion of details, they cannot be taken as an absolute authority—it does not appear that he took part in the discussion referred to by the hon. Member. As a matter of fact, however, he had no apprehension that any such decision would be arrived at. Thirdly, I believe my own expression was that I had no doubt that this was nothing short of impossible. Perhaps that was too strong a term to use about the interpretation of an Act of Parliament; but I did contend that the matter was perfectly plain, and did not admit of doubt. The answer to paragraph 4 is, "Yes." The answer to paragraph 5 is, that I am not able to give the desired assurance, inasmuch as fresh legislation would be required, and as in considering the expediency and policy of introducing amending legislation at this early date we must necessarily take into view the comparative importance of different subjects and the difficulty of adjusting them. With regard to paragraph 6, as far as I am advised by the best legal authorities, the case which the hon. Member has very naturally, and not unfairly, quoted, is very much in the nature of an isolated case, and is not likely to form a fair or probable representation of the ordinary working of the law.

MR. HEALY remarked, that it was a mistake for him to have represented that the Lord Chancellor's statement was in reply to his hon. Friend (Mr. Parnell). It was in reply to himself (Mr. Healy).

STATE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS—THE IRISH POLICY OF THE GOVERNMENT.

MR. GORST asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the Government have, as promised before the Easter Recess, taken into their consideration the increase of agrarian crime and the general collapse of the administration of justice in Ireland; whether the Government are yet prepared to state to Parliament the measures they intend to propose for restoring peace and order in Ireland; and, whether he will indicate the time at which such statement on behalf of the Government will be made?

MR. GLADSTONE: I think, Sir, the hon. and learned Member has put this Question in ignorance—which is no wonder—[Laughter—no wonder respecting either him or any other Member of this House, considering the voluminous nature of our proceedings—in ignorance that a similar Question was put to me by the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr.

J. Cowen) on Friday last. ["No!"] Well, perhaps not a precisely similar Question, but a Question with respect to which the answer falls under the same category. With regard to the Question put by the hon. Member for Newcastle, and still more with regard to this Question, which refers to a statement of our intentions, I can only say that I could not undertake to enter into that subject in reply to a Parliamentary Question. Though it would not require any very detailed explanations, considered as a matter of speech, it would certainly amount to the character of a speech, and for that a very convenient opportunity will, I think, offer itself to-morrow.

MR. J. LOWTHER: Might I ask, having regard to the fact that a discussion of very considerable importance must obviously arise in consequence of the Ministerial Statement which has been promised for to-morrow night, whether the right hon. Gentleman will re-consider the proposal for a Morning Sitting to-morrow, and thus allow the House to meet when an opportunity will be afforded for a full discussion of that important subject? At the same time, I would wish to address a Question to my right hon. and gallant Friend the Member for the Wigtown Burghs (Sir John Hay). It is whether, having regard to the facts to which I have just referred, he will feel justified in bringing forward so important a Motion as his is at a time when it could not be fully discussed? I cannot expect an answer to this Question now, for, no doubt, he would like to consult his political friends, and perhaps the Government, on this matter; but before the rising of the House I trust he will be in a position to answer.

MR. GLADSTONE: The Question put to me is really whether I will ask the House to rescind a decision come to by a considerable majority after a long discussion? I am not prepared to ask the House to rescind that decision, more particularly as I do not think that the time has yet arrived when a full examination of the proposals which it may be the duty of the Government to make some little time hence, could be entered upon with any benefit to the Public Service.

MR. GORST said, he wanted an answer to the third paragraph of his

Mr. Gladstone

Question. He asked at what time a general statement of Irish policy would be made by the Government? The noble Lord on the Front Ministerial Bench (the Marquess of Hartington) had said on Friday that no such general statement would be made on Tuesday night, and that the statement then made would be about the release of the "suspects." The Government ought to indicate to Parliament the time when they would be prepared to make a general statement.

MR. HEALY: I rise to Order. I wish to ask whether a general statement on the question as to the collapse of justice in Ireland is not a matter of argument, and whether such a question ought not to appear on the Votes of the House? I put this Question because, if Irish Members import into Questions anything of the nature of argument, it is immediately struck out.

MR. GLADSTONE: I might myself take exception to one part of the Question. I am not disposed to admit the alleged promise which I am supposed to have given. What I stated was that the whole subject had been and would continue—not during the Recess in particular—under the consideration of the Government. My noble Friend was perfectly right in guarding the House against the idea that a general statement of policy would be made. A general statement of policy, as those terms are usually understood, would be held to mean a statement which would occupy a very considerable period, and would open up many branches of questions with regard to the general condition of Ireland. I am not sure that in that sense it will be our duty to-morrow to make a general statement; but I have no doubt we can conveniently indicate to the House that which, as at present advised, we are inclined to think will have to be proposed or not proposed. The proposals which we may entertain we shall desire to proceed with at as early a period as the necessary Business of the House will permit. It would be quite impossible to indicate them in detail at the present moment.

SIR JOHN HAY said, the right hon. Gentleman might not be aware that Notices of Amendment to his Motion had been given Notice of by the hon. Members for Salford (Mr. Arthur Arnold) and Glasgow (Mr. Anderson). He had not had the pleasure of being in the House when the subject of the Evening Sitting was discussed last week, and as far as he had been able to gather—["Order, order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: I must point out to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman that this matter cannot now become the subject of debate.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he wished to renew his appeal to the Prime Minister, and in doing so he wished to reply to the Question which was put to him by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Lincolnshire (Mr. J. Lowther). He felt it would be unfair to the House to allow him to suppose that, even if the Government did not make an alteration, he should abstain from going on at 9 o'clock. He (Sir John Hay) proposed going on at 9 o'clock, whatever might happen; but he thought it very inconvenient to commence the discussion of so important a Motion at an Evening Sitting, and that, perhaps, it would lead to an adjourned debate.

STATE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS—THE LORD LIEUTENANCY OF IRELAND —EARL COWPER.

MR. ONSLOW: I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether Earl Cowper has retired from the Office of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland on private or political grounds?

MR. GLADSTONE: I think it is my duty simply to say that Earl Cowper has resigned the Office of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. In reply to the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Lincolnshire, I thought I had indicated the sufficiency of the occasion that we shall have to-morrow night for the Business which shall come before us; and, so far as I can judge, there will be no public advantage in an alteration of the arrangements of the House.

THE LIBERAL ASSOCIATION OF IPS- WICH AND IRISH LANDLORDS.

MR. BELLINGHAM asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If his attention has been drawn to the account of a meeting recently held at Ipswich, at which the secretary of a Liberal Association is reported to have used the following language:—

"I feel a sort of satisfaction in hearing the Irish people have taken to shooting landlords. If anybody ought to be shot in Ireland it is the landlords;"

and, whether, since such opinions were expressed in the presence of the leading Liberals of the town, including the president and ex-president of the Liberal Association and three members of the council, without rebuke, and are of a character calculated to incite to a breach of the peace and encourage murder, some steps cannot be taken by the Government to prevent a repetition of similar language at public meetings at Ipswich or elsewhere?

MR. GLADSTONE: The hon. Gentleman has put a Question to me, with respect to which I must say I hope I am not to be made a tribunal of appeal as to language, of which I may approve or disapprove, that may be used by any independent person in the country. A censorship of speech is a function which cannot be conveniently added to the duties I am called upon to discharge. I shall only, by way of information, inform the hon. Gentleman one thing. Of course, I am bound to say that if the words which the hon. Gentleman has cited were used as they stand without any qualifying connection to alter sense—[Laughter, cries of "Oh, oh!" from Mr. WARTON and other Members of the Opposition, and "Order!"].—I must beg the hon. Member for Bridport—[MR. WARTON: I am not alone; and cries of "Order!"].—to permit me freedom of speech. [MR. WARTON: With pleasure, Sir.] If the words cited by the hon. Member were used without any context which would essentially define and alter their apparent construction, they are words upon which too severe a censure could not be passed. I am, however, assured by a gentleman who is acquainted with Ipswich that they were not so used; that they were not understood by anyone who heard them in the sense that the hon. Member has not unnaturally attached to them; and, finally, that the hon. Member has not correctly described this gentleman, because, as I understand, he is not secretary of the Liberal Association, as has been stated in the Question.

MR. BELLINGHAM stated that, in consequence of the answer of the Prime Minister, he should, on Tuesday or Thursday, put this Question to the Home Secretary.

MR. GLADSTONE: I ought to have stated that if the Question of the hon. Member is, whether it is the opinion of the Government that a prosecution ought to be instituted, far be it from me to say that it is not a Question which he is not entirely entitled to put; but I did not conceive that that was his meaning.

OXFORD AND CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITIES COMMISSION—THE OXFORD STATUTES.

MR. THOROLD ROGERS asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, having regard to the fact that the Statutes for the University of Oxford were not ordered to be printed until March 3rd, and not distributed to Members till March 27th, and the Act gives twelve weeks during which this House may address the Crown, he will afford this House an opportunity for criticising those statutes on which its judgment is invited by the Act in question?

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, he was afraid he could not find time for the discussion of these statutes in the interval between the 27th of March and the 21st of May.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman when he expects to take the second reading of the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill? I should also ask the Financial Secretary to the Treasury if he can accelerate the distribution of the Paper usually published giving the Financial Statement?

MR. GLADSTONE: I will give an answer to-morrow at 2 o'clock.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: As to the Financial Statement, I will make inquiries.

STATE OF IRELAND—ALLEGED RIOT AT FRANKFORT, KING'S CO.

MR. GIBSON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he had received any confirmatory telegrams with respect to a statement of an alarming character which appeared in the evening papers in reference to Ireland? The statement was to the effect that at a riot at Frankfort, King's County, on Saturday, a number of persons who were reported to have paid their rent were attacked and beaten in a fearful manner. The police succeeded in arresting 30 men, and, under the command of the resident magistrate, proceeded to clear the streets at the point of the bayonet. He wished to know if the right hon. Gentleman was aware whether order had been at present restored to the town, and what was the condition of the people who were said to have been beaten in a fearful manner?

Mr. Bellingham

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he had not seen the evening papers, and as he had not been at the Irish Office he had not received any confirmatory telegram on the subject.

MR. GIBSON said, he would ask the Question to-morrow.

LAW AND POLICE — THE SALVATION ARMY (HAMPSHIRE).

MR. CAINE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department a Question of which he had given him private Notice, with reference to the imprisonment with hard labour for one month of a member of the Salvation Army in Hampshire for an alleged assault on the police, and the refusal of the magistrate to state a case for an appeal.

No answer having been given, the hon. MEMBER said he would repeat the Question to-morrow.

TUNIS—BOMBARDMENT OF SFAX—INDEMNITY TO BRITISH SUBJECTS.

In reply to the Earl of Bective,
SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: The Commission of Inquiry into the losses arising out of the bombardment of Sfax did not lead to any particular result, and Her Majesty's Government have since been in communication with the French Government on the subject of the British claims. These claims have been prepared for presentation to the French Government through Lord Lyons, and are nearly ready for transmission. Pending the conclusion of negotiations Her Majesty's Government do not propose to lay the Papers before Parliament.

PRISONS BOARD (IRELAND)—CAPTAIN BARLOW.

MR. SEXTON: Mr. Speaker, with reference to a document issued this morning as a Parliamentary Paper—namely, a letter from Captain Barlow, Vice President of the Prisons Board—I have to repeat a Question which I asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland some time ago, and to which I did not then obtain a direct and satisfactory answer. I wish to ask whether, considering that a matter involving the character of the Irish Executive and their agents has now come into controversy between the Irish Executive and a Member of this House, the Government will grant an independent inquiry?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that if the hon. Member brought the Question before the House, it would form a proper subject of discussion; but until the House had come to a decision upon it, he should not recommend an inquiry.

MR. SEXTON said, that he should bring before the House the quibbles, prevarications, and falsehood contained in the letter of Captain Barlow.

STATE OF IRELAND—ALLEGED MURDERS.

MR. LEWIS asked, Whether the Government were in possession of information as to the truth or falsity of the report of murders which were committed in Ireland last night?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Perhaps the hon. Member will put the Question in the usual way, and will say what murders.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

—o—

PARLIAMENT — BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE (PUTTING THE QUESTION).

RESOLUTION. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

[SIXTH NIGHT.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [20th February],

“That when it shall appear to Mr. Speaker, or to the Chairman of a Committee of the whole House, during any Debate, to be the evident sense of the House, or of the Committee, that the Question be now put, he may so inform the House or the Committee; and, if a Motion be made ‘That the Question be now put,’ Mr. Speaker, or the Chairman, shall forthwith put such Question; and, if the same be decided in the affirmative, the Question under discussion shall be put forthwith: Provided that the Question shall not be decided in the affirmative, if a Division be taken, unless it shall appear to have been supported by more than two hundred Members, or unless it shall appear to have been opposed by less than forty Members and supported by more than one hundred Members.”—
(Mr. Gladstone.)

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

[Sixth Night.]

MR. O'DONNELL said, that the Amendment he intended to move had reference to one particular feature of the 1st Rule. It was proposed that when it should appear to Mr. Speaker, or the Chairman of Committees, that it was the evident sense of the House that the debate should close, the Speaker or the Chairman should put a certain Question forthwith, and on the vote of the House the debate should be closed. His Amendment was, after the words "Mr. Speaker," to insert these words—"after an appeal to his judgment by a Minister of the Crown." He had originally intended to have moved the omission of the words "Mr. Speaker," and to substitute for them the words "a Minister of the Crown;" but he found that in consequence of a previous Amendment having been negatived, the words "Mr. Speaker" had been ordered to stand part of the Question. He was, therefore, obliged to fall back upon the next best alternative. The effect of his Amendment, if adopted, would be that, instead of the proceedings for closing the debate being put in motion by the Speaker, or at the Speaker's initiative, they must openly, unmistakably, and undeniably come from a Minister of the Crown. He desired that a Motion for silencing the Opposition and for precipitating the decision of the House should be made by an authority commensurate with the responsible and grave nature of the proposal. The Speaker was not a responsible person to the House in the sense in which a Minister of the Crown was responsible both to the House and to the country. The Speaker was, practically, irresponsible—that was to say, through the choice of the House and the authority reposed in him he was quite above ordinary responsibility. As was repeatedly stated in the debate upon the Rule now upon the Standing Orders with reference to the naming of a Member, although the vote of the House was called in to ratify the decision of the Speaker, yet, in reality, the decision of the Speaker ought to be considered quite above discussion. If the Speaker's conduct were to be called in question, it must be done by a special Motion, so as to leave his authority absolutely free from challenge. The Speaker was not responsible to the country, and, therefore, he ought not to take the initiative in closing a debate which might be of interest to the country. For thesamereason he objected to an Amendment of the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton), who proposed to throw the responsibility upon the Member in charge of the subject under discussion. There were numbers of subjects introduced by hon. Members for which they themselves were in no sense responsible to the country. A strange confusion was to be traced in the mind of the Government, for the reasons could not be the same which influenced them in proposing that the initiative should be taken by the Chairman of Committees as well as by the Speaker. While the Speaker was chosen, not by a Party, but by the Whole House, the Chairman of Committees was the choice of the Ministerial Party for the time being. It was in order to remove all obscurity, and to enable the House and the country to know on whom the responsibility rested, that he proposed that the Speaker should not exercise the functions which the Rule would devolve upon him except upon an open and undisguised appeal to his judgment by a Minister of the Crown. In any case it would be a Ministerial appeal, and it ought not to be passed off upon the country as anything else. Under the present plan, under cover of the Speaker, the Government would, in reality, however innocent their intentions might be, be parties to an attempt to hoodwink the country as to the real significance of the Motion before the House. If the Government considered a debate had been sufficiently prolonged, what reason was there in common sense, in Constitutional Law, or in the practice of Parliament, why they should not openly ask, on their own responsibility, that the Question should be forthwith put? If the Motion were a fair one, a necessary one, and demanded in the interest of Public Business, why should the Government of the day be ashamed to put it in force, or shrink from doing their duty? He proposed that the initiative should be openly taken by a Minister of the Crown, because that was the only means of preventing the Speakership from becoming an appanage of the Ministerial Bench. Of late currency had been given to erroneous ideas concerning the relationship of the Speaker to the House. For a considerable time successive Speakers had deserved the highest credit as impartial arbiters of debate between Party and Party; but they must not close their eyes to history. The dignified, impartial, trusted position of the Speaker in that House was a plant of modern growth, and of comparatively recent development. He doubted if the impartiality, dignity, the unquestioned authority of the Speaker could be traced back for more than a century—certainly not for more than a century and a-half. Down to the time of the Revolution the Speakership was an appanage much more of Royalty than of the House of Commons; under the Tudors and the Stuarts the Speaker watched the proceedings of the House in the interests of Royalty rather than as an impartial arbiter or defender of its privileges. According to Mr. Reginald Palgrave, Charles I. had placed himself far beyond excuse or palliation when the Speaker (Lenthall), on the occasion of the King's attempt to seize the five Members, had the courage and the resolution to refuse to be a Royal minion, and determined to speak as the mouthpiece of the House alone. Hitherto the Speaker had been the servant of the King against the House, and the King must have proved himself most culpable when even the Speaker turned against him. The conversion of the House into a Committee of the Whole House, was an innovation designed, among other reasons, for the purpose of getting rid of the Speaker. The authority of the Speaker had assumed its present dignity and purity very slowly and gradually in a House of Commons, which last century was notoriously corrupt, and in which it was as well known that there was a market for Members to be bought by the Treasury as it was that there was a market for fat cattle at Smithfield. He agreed with all that had been said on both sides of the House with such grave emphasis and unctuous frequency to impress Irish Members with regard to the dignity and impartiality of the Speaker in recent times. It would be hard if just when, by the confession of both political Parties, the Speakership had reached its highest point and culmination, it was by the proposal of a Liberal Government to be thrust back into a position lower than that from which it had been lifted. The Speaker had long ago ceased to be the minion of the King. But if this Resolution passed as it was at present worded, the Speaker would become the minion of the Ministry of the day, and would be as absolutely the mouthpiece of the majority as the Presidents of Continental Legislative Chambers. Nor would it be in any way derogatory for future Speakers to hold such a position, seeing that the right hon. Gentleman's Successors in the Chair could not be judged by the canons of political morality of the present day. Partizans they would undoubtedly be, just as the Whips were partizans, and in closing a debate a Speaker of the future would be merely giving effect to the Whip's instructions as to a division. He proposed, therefore, that the initiative in this matter, which must necessarily belong to the Government in reality, should proceed from them openly and avowedly. In whatever way the Speaker was to gather the evident sense of the House—whether by a discreet whisper from the Treasury Bench, or by uproarious clamour of the House—it would equally come from the Government of the day; and the only result of putting the initiative in the hands of the Speaker would be to produce confusion in the public mind, and lead the people to imagine something had been done on the pure initiative of the Speaker, which had really been planned in the office of the Government Whip. Now, a doubt existed as to the object of the clôture. According to some, it was intended to put down a small band of desperate conspirators against the Constitution; according to others, it was to stifle legitimate opposition. In either case the Government might have the courage of their convictions and take the initiative upon themselves, whether they desired to overwhelm a regular Opposition, or to silence a clique of malcontents. There was, in truth, not a single rational argument against his Amendment; and it would have the very great merit of fixing responsibility on the right persons, and of avoiding the scandals that would some day prevail of divisions unfairly snatched at critical moments, after which the Government of the day would throw the odium on the Speaker, while the Opposition denounced equally both Speaker and Government. If ever there was a country where burning questions were likely to arise and multiply, and temptations to Party passions and Party unscrupulousness to abound, it was this country. Here they had an ancient Constitution approaching a great crisis, and certain to undergo great transformations. They would have the grave questions of religion, of authority, of the distribution of power before them in the near future; and, if in foreign countries these questions called forth such Party passions, how could it be expected that this country should escape them. They need not wonder at the high distinction and impartiality of the Speaker of the British House of Commons hitherto. One reason for it was that he never had the power of being partial. The Speaker was the lord and arbiter of order; but, above all things, the protector of minorities and of individuals. He was, in fact, the mouth-piece and the champion of minorities. They were entitled, therefore, by a sort of reverse reasoning, to conclude that, when the whole character and nature of the Speakership was altered by this unmanly Rule of Clôture, the impartiality of the Chair would disappear. With the view of leaving the responsibility where it ought to rest—namely, with the Ministry of the day—he begged to move his Amendment.

[Sixth Night.]

Amendment proposed,

In line 1, after the words "Mr. Speaker," to insert the words "after an appeal to his judgment by a Minister of the Crown."—(Mr. O'Donnell.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, he had an Amendment on the Paper, the earlier part of which was identical with that of the hon. Member (Mr. O'Donnell), and he rose to move as an Amendment to that of the hon. Member the latter part of his Amendment. If the House were to accept this, with some other Amendments further down, the Resolution would run—

"When it shall appear to Mr. Speaker, after an appeal to him by a Minister of the Crown, or by the Member in charge of the subject under discussion, or to the Chairman of a Committee of the whole House, after a similar appeal, that the question under discussion has been fully debated, and that it is evidently the general sense of the House, or of the Committee, that the question be now put, he may, if he thinks fit, so inform the House or the Committee."

He thought there was great force in many of the arguments of the hon. Member (Mr. O'Donnell); but he thought they ought to place other Members on an equality with the Ministers in this respect, and not establish a difference between Ministers of the Crown and other Members which did not at present exist. He before asked the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair whether it would be in Order to move to omit the words "Mr. Speaker." He desired to move the omission of these words, because he thought that if there was to be this power of silencing the minority it ought to be dissociated from the functions of the Chair; but, unfortunately, the last division not only negatived the Amendment of the hon. Member (Mr. Marriott), but practically affirmed that the Speaker was to be associated with this Rule, though this was not what they had discussed. He was, therefore, driven to move this Amendment, which, in one sense, was inadequate; but if any hon. Member should propose anything stronger he would support it. He believed it was an established principle that if any alteration in the Rules or Standing Orders of the House was proposed and the Party in power allowed such alteration to be made without protest, they were to a certain extent responsible for it. What he wished to point out was how exceedingly mischievous must be the result if they chose deliberately to take the Speaker out of his proper sphere of action and to associate him with this Resolution. The Government informed the House that they could not be responsible for the further conduct of affairs unless they had the power of imposing restraint upon Members of the House other than themselves. That power had not been asked for by any preceding Ministry; and he would go a step further, and say that if the proposal had emanated from any Ministry other than the present Government, the Members of the present Government would have opposed it tooth-and-nail. When a Government admitted their inability to carry on the affairs of the country without coercive powers, the House was ever ready to grant those powers; but only upon one condition—that the Government should be made responsible. They were now asked to assent to a Resolution which was a standing Coercion Act. There was no Coercion Act passed during the present century which could have, or was intended to have, such a far-reaching and abiding effect. It was a Resolution which placed the minority at the mercy of the majority. [The Marquess of HARTINGTON dissented.] The noble Marquess seemed to deny that. Could the noble Marquess deny that the Prime Minister had stated that the 1st Resolution, when it was passed, would be used for the purpose of passing the other Resolutions?

Mr. O'Donnell

MR. GLADSTONE: I never said anything of the kind.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: It is difficult always to understand the Prime Minister. When he was asked if this was intended, he declined to reply.

MR. GLADSTONE: Quite so.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: This Resolution, therefore, would be used to carry or amend certain other Standing Orders that were upon the Notice Paper; and, consequently, if it was competent for the majority to alter any Standing Order, it was equally competent to revise this one when it was passed. The minority of the House would be placed absolutely at the mercy of the majority; and the only control which the minority could exercise would be regulated by the forbearance of the majority. It was a tremendous power to give to the Government of the day. And yet the Government asked them to give them this power dissociated from those safeguards which they might reasonably expect. The Government were not to be made responsible; but the Speaker and his Successors were asked to assume the odious task of silencing the minority. The Government were, therefore, attempting to deprive the House of two safeguards—namely, the responsibility of the Government and the impartiality of the Chair. He feared it would not remain as impartial in the future as it had been in the past. If a Speaker was to be impelled to put in force coercion, having for its object the silencing of a minority, the exercise which he would make of that Resolution would benefit the Government and embarrass the Opposition. Again, the action which the Speaker might take must form part of the indictment of the Government at a General Election. The Secretary of State for India had admitted that, because he had said that this would give an effectual cry with which to go to the country. Well, if it did, it gave the Opposition a cry which would not be against the Government, who was not responsible, but against the Speaker, who was responsible. [Mr. JOHN BRIGHT: No, no; against the majority.] Therefore, it was quite clear, if anyone was to be made responsible out-of-doors, it was the Speaker of the House of Commons. But if the Speaker was to be publicly attacked, he must be publicly defended. He might consider it necessary to defend himself. In such a case they would have the Speaker stumping the country in defence of his action in that House. Whether the Speaker was absorbed into the ranks of the Ministry or not, he would generally be regarded by the public as a partizan. But let them take the other side of the question. He was prepared to find that the Speaker declined to defend himself on the ground that he was a Judge. But the Government could not allow him to remain without defence. He could see the Prime Minister of the day coming down, with a countenance arranged for the occasion, and denouncing the indecency of anyone calling in question the judicial functions of the Speaker. If the Speaker was to be subject to criticisms, he must degenerate into a partizan; but if, on the other hand, he was not subjected to criticisms, there was no safeguard whatever against his rulings. It would become a little more clear when they considered the position of the Speaker now. The present Speaker had informed them that he was the servant of the House. He thought by that language that the Speaker intended to convey that the Speaker had no inherent power except what he derived from the Standing Orders and past practice of the House. Therefore, it was quite clear that whatever power in future in excess of this was derived from these Rules must be derived from the Resolution under discussion. It was necessary to inquire carefully into the effect of this Resolution. If they took the first part of this Resolution and joined it on to the latter part they would find what it meant. It was that a majority of 1 in a full House could stop the discussion of a question by the minority. But if a majority hereafter took that view, in what position would the Speaker be? The majority would say they had a right to silence the minority; but the Speaker, by declining to take the initiative, was refusing to grant them that right. Therefore, it might be said the Speaker was making a partizan use of his power. He contended that it would be a great mistake to associate the power in the manner proposed with the Speaker. The Resolution as it stood was not clear; it was scarcely intelligible. The difficulty of working it would be enormous. It had been well shown in a letter from Mr. Baden Powell to the Prime Minister. Mr. Powell said—

[Sixth Night.]

“My difficulty is that this Rule seems for a certainty to legalize such results as the following. If 201 Members vote for and 200 Members against the closing a debate the debate is closed; if 200 Members vote for and 41 against closing a debate the debate is not closed; if 100 Members vote for and 2 Members against closing a debate the debate is not closed, and there are, of course, the intermediate results in their due order. In other words—firstly, in all cases where more than 200 Members support the Motion, a bare majority of 1 suffices to stop discussion. Secondly, in all cases where some 101 to 206 Members support the Motion, discussion is not stopped, unless a majority of four-fifths is in favour of so doing. Thirdly, it is impossible to stop discussion unless more than 100 Members vote for so doing.”

He thought no Member would dispute that Mr. Baden Powell had accurately interpreted this Rule. He did not believe that it would be possible for the President of any Foreign Assembly to work that Resolution; and he ventured to say it was absolutely impossible for the Speaker or Chairman of Committees to work it without the assistance of the Government Whips. They sat longer in that House than any other Assembly; and, in the second place, the accommodation in the House was not sufficient for all the Members. How would the Speaker know how many Members were in the House? He held that it would be impossible to carry out the Resolution, except by the help of the Government Whips, with whom it was inexpedient that the Speaker or Chairman of Committees should come into contact, as the Whips must necessarily be partizans. The primary duty of the Speaker was to maintain order; but “the evident sense of the House” must be conveyed to him by noise and interruption, so that that high dignitary would, in a manner, be associated with the disorderly, who were exactly the people who ought not to lead the House. Rhadamanthus himself, if in the Chair, could not, under the proposed new conditions, conduct himself with propriety and dignity. The stronger an hon. Member's lungs the more efficient would be the aid which he would render his Party. It was all very well now, when they were talking calmly, to say that the clôture would only be applied in exceptional cases, and with the consent of both sides of the House. But his experience was that it was just when men ought to be heard that the disposition to silence them was greatest. This struck him very much the other day, when there happened to be a painful incident. Mr. Bradlaugh had committed certain offences, and it was proposed to punish him by expulsion. Mr. Bradlaugh asked to be heard. His request was met by a stentorian “No” from both sides of the House; and if this Rule had been passed, the Speaker would have had no option but to say that this represented “the evident sense of the House.” There was no doubt that at the French Revolution the Jacobins, who were numerically a small body, gained their ends by organized clamour, and Constitutional forms, &c., degenerated into the Reign of Terror. It was a curious notion to entertain that an official in a judicial position could be fitted to perform his duties more successfully by becoming a partizan. There was a singular parallel in the case of Charles Fox, who, after the death of Mr. Pitt, occupied a similar position to the present Prime Minister. Mr. Fox had assailed his opponents with an animosity nearly equal to that with which the Prime Minister, when in Opposition, assailed the late Government; and Mr. Fox had only been in Office for two months before the exigencies of his Government made him forget his previous professions, and he then suggested the monstrous proposal that the Lord Chief Justice of England should become a Member of his Cabinet. If such a proposal had been made by Mr. Pitt, it would have been denounced almost as loudly as the proposal of the clôture, if it had emanated from Lord Beaconsfield, would have been assailed by Her Majesty's present Ministers. Mr. Fox's proposal was supported by the Liberal Party of that day, just as the clôture was now supported by the present Liberal Party, because of the tremendous pressure brought to bear on them; but the result, as far as the reputation of that Government was concerned, was not a fortunate one. He asked anyone to consider whether it would be possible for the Speaker to have the confidence of the minority without incurring the animosity of the majority? His strong impression was that the course which was proposed would put the Speaker in an intolerable position, and that in the end he would, perhaps, forfeit the good opinion of both sides of the House. The Amendment which he proposed raised no Party question, nor did it affect the Resolution under discussion. He trusted, therefore, that an effort would be made to save out of the wreck of their Parliamentary traditions the position which the Speaker at present occupied.

Lord George Hamilton

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment,

To add, at the end thereof, the words "or by the Member in charge of the subject under discussion."—(Lord George Hamilton.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. GLADSTONE: I am afraid it will be my fate to speak in a much cooler tone than that which was adopted by the Mover of the Amendment or the Mover of the Amendment of the Amendment. There is, I know, an exaggeration of conjuring up fears which it is difficult to measure, and which magnifies every subject of the most moderate dimensions into a gigantic question, involving, commonly, the very life of the Constitution, or of our Parliamentary system. Now, in my opinion, this is a very limited matter, and the sentiments I shall deliver upon it will be entirely without heat. I must, however, regret that the noble Lord has not pursued, except in the last sentence of his speech, a similar course. On the hon. Member who moved the Amendment I make this observation, that though he was undoubtedly copious in the performance of his work, yet he limited himself to the question of his Amendment, and he likewise observed a strict impartiality as between Parties. The noble Lord has not thought fit to abstain from introducing considerations of Party into what ought to have been a perfectly temperate and dispassionate discussion. The noble Lord undertakes to say that all of us who sit on these Benches would have opposed that proposal if made in any other quarter. I am not going to enter upon that subject. In my opinion, it is a strange thing for the noble Lord to make that accusation, considering that, as far as my recollection goes, when a demand was made by the late Government for some power in a penal direction, as far as I am concerned—and I believe I may say the same thing of my noble Friend (the Marquess of Hartington)—I did nothing except in a few sentences to support the demand, and to commend the spirit in which it had been made. But why is it necessary to introduce these matters? Do they really assist us in the consideration of the question. Then the noble Lord goes on to speak of the immense results which, as he says, this Resolution is intended to produce. Is it wise, is it expedient, does it promote harmony or expedition in our proceedings to charge upon any Party in this House views diametrically opposed to those they had emphatically proclaimed? We had always said that none of those large results would be produced by the Resolution; and I submit, if good manners permit, that that kind of contradiction is certainly adverse to Parliamentary policy and expediency. Upon the speech of the noble Lord, I must observe that it is a speech partly against the entire Resolution, and partly against the introduction of the Speaker into the Resolution. The noble Lord entirely forgot, in the whole of his speech, the Amendment, which is the only subject of discussion. Now, I will give only one instance of how exaggerated fears distort powers of judgment naturally acute enough. The noble Lord said that the tendency of this Resolution is to encourage noise on the part of certain noisy Members in the House. [Mr. BIGGAR: Hear, hear!] Everybody knows who they are, and, as I understand the noble Lord, he implied that they are persons whose conduct is generally condemned and disapproved by the House. But then the noble Lord goes on to say these are the men whose conduct will guide the conduct of the Speaker. [Mr. BIGGAR: Hear, hear!] These noisy Members of the House—a handful of individuals, unknown and unnamed, but supposed to exist—will be mistaken by the Speaker, and interpreted by him as the arbiters of the "evident sense of the House." I do not think the remark is quite relevant to the present debate. I own I think it shows a state of mind much heated by unnecessary apprehension, when a speaker of ability thinks it necessary to hold that a certain limited number of Members of the House, whose conduct is known to be irrational, will be the people whom the Speaker in the Chair will take as representing the sense of the whole House, and accept them as his guide. Now, let us really endeavour to deal with the question before us, as between the Amendment of the noble Lord and the Amendment of the hon. Member for Dungarvan. There is, I think, a good deal to be said in favour of the Amendment of the noble Lord, because the Amendment of the noble Lord proceeds upon this basis—that if there is to be an initiative apart from the Speaker, it ought not to be exclusively in the hands of the Government. As far as that proposal goes, I certainly am not disposed to take any exception to it. I think there is a good deal of difficulty in the Amendment of the noble Lord, as it stands; because, although I understand the responsibility of a Member in charge of a Bill, yet when we speak of a Member in charge of a subject; and recollect that that subject would, I apprehend, be held to involve every description of Amendment moved in any proceeding of the House in Committee of Supply, in Committee on a Bill, or anything else—perhaps a Motion for the adjournment of the House—I think it is a question whether they would not require some limitations. But I am not going to dwell upon minute distinctions between the two Amendments, because, upon the whole, though I do not take up the subject with any warmth, I recommend that the House will do better not to adopt them. But I do so by no means upon the ground that the question of the initiative is not a question for argument and for fair consideration. I quite understand that it is a serious question whether the responsibility of initiating the sense of the House, which alone can decide a closing of the debate, should rest with the Chair, or should rest with some Member or number of Members in the House. That is not the question before us; and, further, I will say that undoubtedly the form which now stands in the Resolutions was adopted in the full belief, which they continue to entertain, that there would be a fear of the abuse of the closing power, if it were left simply in the hands of the Government, or of a certain number of their supporters, to invoke exercise of it; but that by placing it in the hands of the Speaker they were affording the very best security in their power against its possible abuse. There are those two systems—the one system that of giving the power of initiative to the Government apart from the Chair, and leaving to the Chair no duty except that of putting the Question; and the other system is to take the Resolution as it stands, and say that upon the Speaker shall be the responsibility of making the appeal to the House. The noble Lord said we must not have the Speaker put under compulsion. Upon that we are entirely at one with the noble Lord. But to guard against that, in our view, there are two things. First of all, the Speaker must be convinced of a certain state of facts as to the sense of the House. Secondly, the Speaker must be of opinion that the apparent demand, or the evident sense of the House, is in conformity with justice. But what the Amendment proposes is neither the one nor the other. The Amendment proposed to us is to clap on a responsibility of the Minister of the Crown, or of some other Member of Parliament as well as the Minister of the Crown, upon the back of the responsibility of the Speaker, to make it necessary for them to invoke his aid, but still to leave upon him the responsibility which the Resolution at present places in his hands. Upon the whole, we are of opinion that this system is less safe than the system embodied in the Resolution as it stands. The hon. Member for Dungarvan argued on the assumption that by this Resolution the power is to be placed really in the hands of the Government, and the Speaker is to act really as the organ of the majority of the House. If that were true, I would not only accept at once the Amendment, but I would refuse to admit any Resolutions in which the Speaker appeared at all, because I agree entirely that those who are to exercise the power ought to bear the responsibility. But I differ respectfully from the hon. Gentleman, and affirm that no power whatever is given by the Resolution to the majority for influencing the Speaker of the House. The special duty of the Speaker of the House is to avoid giving scope to his mere sympathy, if he has a sympathy, to the majority of the House. But, then, says the hon. Member—"Do not let us have our Speaker discredited by being forced into relations with the Government." "Do not let us have him placed," says the noble Lord, "in connection with the Government Whips." I entirely agree with the noble Lord. But I am sorry to say that it appears to me that the Amendment has a decided tendency in that direction. If we pass a Resolution which makes it the duty of the Speaker to determine in his own mind what is the sense of the House, and whether that sense is the just sense, then I can understand that the action of the Speaker may be a spontaneous action. But if we say the Speaker is to act upon the suggestion and demand of the Minister of the Crown, what is the immediate effect? That the Minister of the Crown must, and will have to, put himself in communication with the Speaker before he makes that suggestion to the Chair; and, therefore, undoubtedly, as I apprehend, it is the duty of the Minister of the Crown to be in communication with the Government Whips. This Amendment, I am afraid, instead of relieving the Speaker from any of his difficulties in that respect, would result in establishing a channel of communication between him and the Government Whips, and thereby of exposing the Speaker to the suspicion and reproach from which the noble Lord and others are justly most anxious to shield him. Now, I shall not meet reproach by reproach, nor insinuation by insinuation, nor will I go back into any pluperfects of the potential mood for the sake of entangling this, I think, very simple argument in considerations that may be connected with temper and with feeling. I do not at all disguise that there may be fair choice between the use of the Speaker and the use of private Members or of Ministers of the Crown as wielding the initiative in this case. I believe we have made the right choice as between these two, and the Amendment before us is neither one nor the other. It proposes to double the responsibility, and it would lead to those communications I have described, which would be eminently unsatisfactory to the House, and which, let me say to the hon. Member for Dungarvan, would exactly open up that danger that he is justly desirous to avert—namely, that we should be in a condition to attempt, at least, to exercise a pressure on the Speaker, and therefore to take some benefit, or supposed benefit, from the action of the Speaker, from which, as the Resolution now stands, he is entirely free. I believe it to be a small matter. Had there been a clear and general view of the House, an evident sense of the House in favour of a change of this kind, I do not see that we could have taken upon ourselves to refuse it; but I frankly own that, in our opinion, the Resolution is better as it stands.

[Sixth Night.]

Mr. Gladstone

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY quite failed to see that the Prime Minister had made out his argument that the Amendment of the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) would lead to communication between the Speaker and the Government Whips. For his own part, he preferred the Amendment as unamended, although there was much force in some of the remarks of the noble Lord (Lord George Hamilton), especially when he said that the distinction between a Minister of the Crown and any other Member of the House was a novelty and an innovation. But they had already gone so far on the way of change that they need not stickle at one or two more innovations. The object of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Dungarvan would be entirely marred by the manner in which the noble Lord proposed to amend that Amendment. If the initiative in closing the debate were taken by the Speaker, he would become the organ of the majority. The majority was, in its turn, governed by the inspiration of the Prime Minister and his Colleagues, and the Speaker would become the mouthpiece of the Prime Minister and the majority. For his own part, he would have preferred that the Prime Minister, and not the Speaker, should be the mouthpiece of the majority. The words "evident sense of the House," used in the Resolution, were misleading. It meant the sense of a majority which might be scattered in various parts of the House, and it might very often lead to enforcing a wrong conclusion. The "evident sense of the House" had been employed against many great statesmen and thinkers in the House. It had declared against many a policy which afterwards proved to be most wise and just. He supposed the "evident sense of the House" was against Burke in his great speeches against the Stamp Act, when he argued against those measures which contributed to bring about the severance of England and America. He supposed it declared against Fox in some of his wisest appeals for a policy of peace, and for a time against Cobden on the question of Free Trade. Indeed, the evident sense of the majority was more than once against the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister himself when, a short time ago, he justly opposed the Foreign Policy of the late Government. Thus, with a strong majority in the House, the Speaker for the time being would, under the New Rules, become its mere instrument. Under such conditions, it was utterly impossible that a Speaker could retain his present position and high popularity, or be regarded as an impartial Officer of the House. A Speaker was impartial now because he had hardly any temptation to be otherwise. If they gave a Speaker the power of closing a debate at any time, it would be giving his impartiality a strain which no ordinary man could long endure. Before long it was certain that he would be accused in the country of partiality. It could not be satisfactory that any great Officer of the House, or any great public man, should have the power of frequently doing acts for which he could not be assailed, and for which he could not be defended. If he were not to be assailed, they were raising an official to a position of perilous immunity; and, on the other hand, if he were open to attack, they were reducing the Speaker to the level of an ordinary Minister exposed to friendly and unfriendly criticism, and who merely performed the duty of a partizan and a Party Leader. Under those circumstances, it would be impossible for the dignity of the Chair to remain as unassailed and as perfect as it now was, and the Speaker would become the mere mouthpiece of a temporary majority. The responsibility ought to rest with a Minister of the Crown. In his opinion, the proposed change was not of the unimportant nature the Prime Minister had described. It would introduce into the House an authority similar to that of the despotic President of a Continental Assembly. Such a power ought not to be placed in the hands of an official who, up to the present time, had been a person of strict impartiality; but who, if these Resolutions were passed, would be no longer regarded as impartial in the eyes of the public.

MR. BRYCE, who had the following Amendment to the 1st Resolution on the Paper:—

"Line 5, leave out all after 'may,' to 'put,' in line 6, and insert 'upon the request of a Minister of the Crown, or of the Member in charge, either of any original Motion then under discussion, or of any amendment thereto, give leave to such Minister or Member to move 'That the Question be now put,' and if such Member shall so move," said, when it was arrived at it might possibly be ruled out of Order, on the ground of its being substantially the same as that now before the House, and he would therefore say now what he had to say upon the subject. If the two Amendments were nearly the same in principle, the terms of his Amendment were, probably—as being somewhat more precise, and more clearly throwing the initiative on the Member who desired that the discussion should close—to be preferred. He could not help feeling that it would have been much better if the Chair had not been brought into the matter at all. With regard to the argument of the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton), that the Resolution meant in substance that a majority of 1 was to constitute the "evident sense of the House," it went far to discredit the other arguments which accompanied it. The noble Lord had presented such an exaggerated view of the results of this Resolution as to make it much more difficult for Members on this side of the House to support his Amendment. He (Mr. Bryce) thought the present Resolution not strong enough, instead of too strong, and proposed to amend it only because he thought it better that the responsibility of ascertaining the "evident sense of the House" should be fixed upon the Government of the day, and that it should lie upon a Minister, rather than on the Speaker, to move primarily in the matter. If a Minister put the Speaker in motion, the responsibility was, to a certain extent, shared. No one who prized, as they all prized, the impartiality of the Chair, would like the Chair to incur censure. The Speaker might, if the responsibility rested with him alone, make a mistake as to what was the evident sense of the House, though, as the Resolution required the "evident" sense, this, perhaps, would not be very likely to happen; but, supposing such a mistake did happen, would not the blame rest upon the Speaker alone? And, if so, would he not, on a future occasion, be more slow to exercise his power? He thought, therefore, it would be better that the responsibility of the initiative should rest with the Minister or Member who sought to close the debate, so that the Speaker, if a mistake were made, might feel that the Minister shared the responsibility of it. He believed the effect of such an Amendment would be to strengthen the Resolution, and make it a somewhat more efficient engine against Obstruction; and it was for that reason, fearing that a clôture which proceeded from the Speaker alone would be too rarely used, that he supported this proposal.

Mr. Justin McCarthy

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, that the Prime Minister had made some observations on the tone of the speech of the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton), and had said that such remarks were calculated to impede the course of the debate. But, at the same time, the Prime Minister himself indulged in language of exactly the same kind, and had characterized one of the arguments of the noble Lord as irrational. That argument was that the Speaker, in deciding what should be the "evident sense of the House," would be reduced to two sources of information, the one being the knowledge which he obtained from the Government Whips, and the other being the noises which were going on in the House at the time. But he contended that it was perfectly impossible for the Speaker in the latter case clearly to interpret the desire of the House; and in the former case the Speaker would necessarily be biassed by the information afforded to him by the Whips. On previous nights they had discussed the effect of the clôture on a minority; but they had now introduced the question of the position of the Speaker if the Rules were passed. He would remind the House that the Speaker of the future could not possibly ever occupy the position which the Speaker of the past had occupied. He thought the Government were somewhat to blame in this matter. They had concluded that all future Speakers would be as impartial as the right hon. Gentleman then in the Chair. But the contention of those who sat on that side was that the Speaker of the future would be by no means so impartial. They said that the fact of putting these new powers in his hands would entirely alter his character. He felt sure that the effects of the Rule would be to make future Chairmen Government nominees. He thought that the Government honestly believed that by giving the Speaker the initiative in that matter they were protecting the right of minorities; but he wished to point out that the result of the operation of the Rule would probably be, not to protect minorities, but to give the Speaker authority whereby he might screen the action of the Government majority. The noble Lord the Secretary of State for India said no Minister would ever think of abusing the power of the clôture, because the responsibility would be brought home to him with crushing effect. The noble Lord seemed to argue instinctively that the Speaker of the future would act as a tool of the Government. It must be remembered that by the initiative of the Speaker the Ministers of the day were entirely screened from any responsibility in the matter. He himself was strongly of opinion that no such power as that proposed to be given ought to be placed in the hands of Mr. Speaker; and he thought that if they were able to exclude his name from that Rule they would have done the best they could to smooth the way for the Government to adopt the Amendment which proposed that the clôture should only come into force when voted by a majority of two-thirds.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he thought that when the alarms which were now felt with regard to this subject had passed away, Members of that House would be more inclined to take an equitable view of the subject than they were now. He did not think that the proposition to give the initiative to the Government would in any way relieve the Speaker from his responsibility in the matter, for it would produce a divided responsibility, and a responsibility of a most objectionable character. Neither did he think the matter was mended by the proposition of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce), that the Speaker should merely give permission to take the initiative, for that would come to the same thing. The judicial decision as to what was or was not the "evident sense of the House" would have to be put from the Chair, and thus the responsibility would be divided with the Speaker. He felt, with many hon. Members who had already spoken in this and former debates, that it was most objectionable that a question of this kind should be left to the Chair, and he could not conceive how such a system could work. A Predecessor of the Speaker had said on a memorable historical occasion that he had neither eyes to see nor tongue to speak except what was suggested to him by the House, whose servant he was. He held that that principle applied with equal force at the present day. It was impossible for the Speaker to ascertain what was the sense of the House until that sense had been declared by a division. The Speaker ought not to listen to any noises that might come from the Back Benches, nor to any private suggestion that might be made by the Government or its supporters. He could only decide upon that sense as expressed in a division, and that occasion would be afforded by every debate. A Motion would be made to adjourn, the Government would oppose it, and there would be a majority. But how was the Speaker to act? If it was a bare majority, he presumed the Speaker would not accept that as the sense of the House; and if it was a large majority, there would, of course, be no difficulty. If it were a Ministerial majority, whether large or small, it would give rise to insinuations and complaints against the conduct of the Speaker, and would put the Speaker in a position which he never ought to occupy. He therefore strongly objected to the initiative resting with the Chair. He gave full credit to the Government for endeavouring to cover such a Resolution in every way, by means of protecting the Motion from any suggestion of Party Spirit whatever; but he thought when the question was further advanced the House would arrive at a better means of deciding what was the "evident sense of the House." When they had to consider the Motions of the hon. Member for the University of London (Sir John Lubbock) and of other hon. Members who proposed that the evident sense must be a preponderating sense, that was a question which the House ought not to shirk; they ought to express their opinion decidedly as to whether the "evident sense of the House" was to be a bare majority, or one something more than even a Ministerial majority. He would not anticipate that discussion; but he thought it was a point upon which the Government might make some concession, and in that way many of the difficulties which surrounded the question would pass away. He earnestly appealed to the Government to consider that question fairly and broadly, for he deeply regretted that it should have given rise to so much Party feeling. It was a question upon which a great body of the House felt strongly that something ought to be done to prevent such scandals as had recently occurred; and he believed that if it was fairly considered they would be prepared, even though some risk might attend the question of introducing the clôture, to sacrifice some part of their liberties for the sake of the remainder. The House was in a difficult position. They had fairly responded to the demand outside the House; and he thought they would be cordially supported in the House in some attempt to bring the matter to an issue, and that some concession on this point would lead to a satisfactory decision.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH was convinced of the necessity for taking some steps to prevent a recurrence of the scandals of last year, when they had Sittings on more than one occasion which lasted all night. These scandals reflected upon the dignity of the House, and ought certainly to be prevented from occurring again. If, however, the clôture was to be introduced with that object, it should be made more akin to the old Forms of the House. It might have been done in some form of the Previous Question, thus keeping the initiative out of the hands of the Speaker. If, indeed, this Rule was frequently applied, a confusion would undoubtedly arise from its similarity to the Motion of the Previous Question. To the initiative being left with the Speaker there were grave objections. He should prefer to support the Amendment of the hon. Member (Mr. O'Donnell) that the initiative should rest with the Government. The Government possessed means of knowing what was the general sense of the House far beyond those which were in the power of the Speaker. It might be that a large number of Members were in the precincts of the House, and that they might take a different view of a subject under discussion than was held by a few Members in the House itself. Of this fact the Government would be aware, while it was utterly impossible for the Speaker to know it. With regard to the Amendment of his noble Friend (Lord George Hamilton) he felt in some difficulty, and he hoped that his noble Friend would not ask the House to divide upon the additional words which he had proposed. Those words were extremely ambiguous; and as they stood it seemed to him that the initiative might be taken by a Member who, by proposing a hostile Amendment, had taken the subject out of the hands of the Member who originally introduced it. He could not, even now, help expressing a hope that this Resolution might ultimately take a shape that would be less offensive than it was at present to a large number of Members of the House.

Sir Edward Colebrooke

MR. HUGH SHIELD said, he was surprised to find the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) and the noble Lord opposite (Lord George Hamilton) proposing to engraft upon the Resolution an expression of Ministerial initiative. He objected to that Amendment, because it struck at the safeguards which were proposed in the Rule. Clôture pure and simple would never be defended; but the safeguards with which it was surrounded precluded the possibility of any dangerous consequences. What was the action which the Resolution called upon the occupant of the Chair to take? When the occupant of the Chair had arrived at the conclusion that the evident sense of the House was in favour of closing the debate, he might put that Motion to the House. How was he to judge of the evident sense of the House? He would avail himself of every means; he would not be excluded from attending to the noisy cries raised on this side of the House or that, though he was not to be limited to them. Access to the Speaker's Chair would not then, any more than now, be denied to hon. Members; indeed, the Speaker would be put in possession of the feelings of the House by all the means now open to him. His own fear was that the Speaker would hesitate to apply the Rule, even on occasions when it could properly be applied. That defect, however, the noble Lord was determined to cure with a vengeance, by proposing that the initiative should be absolutely in the power of the Minister. They ought not to hear any more about the despotic Minister after that; and although he was himself in favour of the proposal, he did not think public opinion was prepared for such a step, and, therefore, he objected to it per se.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON said, that when the Prime Minister introduced that Resolution for establishing the clôture, he said that the Speaker was the pivot on which the whole business turned, and that on his initiative depended altogether the beneficial exercise of the Rules. Other Gentlemen had followed in the same strain, and had spoken of the impossibility of any Speaker becoming confederate with any Ministry or any Party, or taking interest in any Party manoeuvres. They described him as a person who must always stand above the level of political factions and their controversies. Instead of indulging in grandiloquent language, it would have been well if hon. Gentlemen had studied the history of Parliament, which would have led them to a very different conclusion. Now, let him give the House a few historical facts. Take the first great Speaker after the Restoration, Sir Harbottle Grimston, an old Commonwealth man. No sooner had the King been brought back than Sir Harbottle Grimston went over to the other side, and on being presented to the King after his election to the Chair grovelled in the dust in such a way that Charles II.—a man not unaccustomed to flattery—said to him, "Stand up old rebel, and speak like a man." Speaker Charlton was supposed to have had a sum of money to give up his Chair. Speaker Williams was fined and imprisoned by the Order of the House, and was succeeded by Speaker Trevor, who had a strange peculiarity in his vision—one eye looking one way, one another. He suffered the singular degradation of being obliged to put from the Chair the Question whether he had been guilty of taking bribes. That Question was instantly voted in the affirmative by the House of Commons, and Speaker Trevor was expelled from the House for corruption. But he was expelled only to take his seat as Master of the Rolls; whereupon it was said "that justice was blind, but corruption only squinted." He was followed in the next Reign by the first Speaker Onslow—Sir Richard Onslow—who, according to contemporary descriptions, was a trifling, vain man, of ludicrous figure, and full of Party zeal. Speaker Sir Fletcher Norton, an organ of the Whigs, was a violent Party politician, and was at last dismissed from his Office. He was shortly succeeded by Speaker Cornewall, who had an unfortunate habit of taking too much porter, which resulted in much inconvenience. In the next Reign two Speakers—Grenville and Addington—both left the Chair to mix in the very heat of Party politics; the one to be Prime Minister, and the other to be a Secretary of State. Almost in our own times Speaker Mitford was removed from the Chair by a new Government with an indecent haste, in no way creditable to the Whig Administration. Speaker Manners Sutton was removed from the Chair, because he had busied himself with the subversion of the previous Government, and had assisted with others in the formation of a new Ministry. The present Premier was in the House at the time (1835), and would remember these words used by Lord John Russell on that occasion—

[Sixth Night.]

"There was this fact that the political bias of the right hon. Gentleman had not remained entirely inert, but it had got the better of him, and had induced him to concur in acts, which, as Speaker of the House of Commons, he had much better have avoided."

The next Speaker was removed from the Chair after a very short time, owing to the evil circumstances in which he was elected. These were some of the precedents which it was well to recall, because if they wanted to know what the Speakers of the future would be, they should take some account of what the Speakers of the past had been. The Prime Minister, knowing a little more history than his followers, took care not to allude to antecedents. The Prime Minister had asked them to accept his Resolution, because they had the assurance of the present Speaker's own character, and there, perhaps, the right hon. Gentleman stood on better and stronger grounds. But the right hon. Gentleman had insisted on introducing into the debate the painful incident of the 2nd of February, 1881, and had called on them, on account of the action taken on that day, to intrust a large and elastic power to the hands of the Speaker. He hardly liked to trust himself to say what he thought on that occasion. He preferred to quote the words of the right hon. Gentleman himself—namely,

"You took into your hands the exercise of a power not committed to you, either by the Orders of the House or the Usage of the House."

In other words, the Speaker broke the law. He whose bounden duty it was to maintain inviolate the Usages and Orders of the House, violated them. [Murmurs.] He to whom the minority of the House, however small, looked for support, took a jurisdiction that was not given to him to suppress a minority. The Speaker had, in the Standing Orders of the House, Rules which were sufficient for the occasion; he had been appealed to in the debate to put in force those Rules and Orders which would have enabled him to suspend individuals; but he refused, and his Deputy in the Chair through that long debate likewise refused to do so. The Speaker was the master of every individual in the House; but he was the servant of the House. He had the right to check individuals; but he had no jurisdiction over the House that was not committed to him. ["Order!"]

MR. W. M. TORRENS: I rise, Sir, to Order. I have really borne this as long as I could. I hardly know how to express the sense I entertain of the repugnance with which I, in common I presume with the rest of the House, have listened to this attack on the person we most honour in this Assembly; and, even although it may be a matter personal to yourself, I hope, Sir, you will call the hon. Member to Order.

MR. SEXTON: On the point of Order, Sir, I only rise to say that, as the matter no doubt does relate to yourself personally, it may safely be left in your own hands.

MR. SPEAKER: I am bound to say that, under the circumstances, I have not thought it right to interpose; but the hon. Member must be perfectly aware that the observations which he has ventured on lately are not relevant to the subject-matter now before the House. The Question is the Amendment of the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex.

Mr. Stanley Leighton

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON said, in the words of the Prime Minister, the Speaker thereby earned an additional measure of respect by the action he took on the occasion referred to, and that was now urged as a reason why still greater powers should be given to him. The Prime Minister used the words "an additional measure of respect and gratitude." These words were received with cheers; and he wished those who gave them had been a little discriminating, and that they had apportioned praise and blame to whom praise and blame were due. For he put this Question to the Government, and asked for an answer—Had the Speaker on that occasion any accessories? Had he any confederate on one side or the other of the House? ["Oh!"]

Mr. DODSON and Sir R. ASSHETON CROSS rose with the SPEAKER, to whom they gave way.

MR. SPEAKER: I must again remind the hon. Member that the Amendment before the House is the Amendment of the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex, and I must call upon him to adhere to it.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: I ask you, Sir, whether—

MR. DODSON: I rise to the point of Order. I was about to rise when you, Sir, rose to point out that the hon. Member was not discussing the Question before the House, and also at the same time to express the feeling which I will take the opportunity of expressing now—that it is my belief that hon. Members on both sides of the House have heard the remarks of the hon. Member with unfeigned regret. ["Order!"]

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS: On the point of Order, I also rose as you yourself rose some time ago; but, of course, your rising rendered my rising unnecessary, and the point of Order having been disposed of, I do not think the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Dodson) should have made those remarks.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON said, he wished plainly and without offence, if he were in Order, to refer to the argument that had been used—that a certain action of the Speaker in the present Parliament was a reason why they should give to the Speaker large and elastic powers. It appeared to him that this must be relevant when the Prime Minister himself had alluded to this very incident. It appeared to him that an independent Member might also allude to and express an opinion about it without giving offence. The Prime Minister was supporting this very Resolution which he was now objecting to, and if the incident could be appealed to in support of the Resolution, he thought he might appeal to it in opposition to the Resolution. If, after this explanation, he was ruled out of Order, he would pass away from the subject. He wished to impress upon the House that he had been quoting the words of the Prime Minister, and he had followed the Prime Minister's argument almost sentence by sentence in referring to this incident. What he desired to impress upon the House was that they should not give the proposed power to the Speaker, because he might confederate with the Ministry of the day, with the majority of the day. He wished to show from this very incident that, so far as he could judge, the Speaker had confederated with the Ministry of the day, and that he had accessories in the House on that very occasion. He appealed to the Prime Minister to say whether he was not one of the accessories? An accessory was a man who knew that a breach of the law was about to take place, who did not disclose the fact, and who did not use his utmost endeavours to prevent it. He asked the Prime Minister whether he did not know beforehand that something was about to occur at 9 o'clock on that Wednesday morning? He hoped the Government would answer that question. It was a singular thing that all the Members of the Government were in their places at that unreasonable hour of the morning, when the coup d'état took place.

MR. GLADSTONE: I rise to Order, Sir. It appears to me that the hon. Member is not obeying the injunction received from the Chair, to speak to the Amendment which is before us. ["Oh!"]

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member, I understand, is calling in question the conduct of the Speaker upon the occasion to which he refers. In so doing I cannot say I think the hon. Member is out of Order. At the same time, he is wandering very much from the Question, and I would seriously advise him to speak more closely to the Question before the House.

[Sixth Night.]

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON said, that what he maintained was simply that, under this Rule, the Speakers of the future would be in the hands of the Ministry of the day; and he maintained that this would place the Speaker in a wholly false position. He drew attention to what happened on that occasion in order to show that, as far as he could judge, the Prime Minister was accessory to what was going to happen; for, as soon as the Speaker had stopped discussion, and had appealed to the House to give him greater powers, the Prime Minister pulled out of his pocket an elaborate Resolution of 20 lines, which exactly met the appeal of the Speaker. This was what made him think that the right hon. Gentleman knew what was going to happen. Yet the incident would have been of some advantage if it showed what surprises might be in store for us under the large and elastic discretion which this Resolution would give the Speaker. He feared that behind the Speakers of the future there would be a secret mentor and voice, invisible and inaudible to the House, telling them what they were to do. It must be remembered that the quality of the Speakers would depend upon the quality of the majority in the House which elected them; if that majority was violent, the Speakers would be violent, too. Under this Rule the Speaker would hold a somewhat judicial position. We were never able to get rid of judicial corruption until we abolished the power of the Crown to remove Judges at pleasure. Yet the Speaker would hold Office by the insecure tenure of the will of the majority; and, as we approached to democracy, did any one suppose that our political conscience, would be purer, our political methods less violent, our political partizanship less extreme? If we were to keep in the Chair Gentlemen whose characters were free from suspicion, we must dissociate their already arduous duties from the invidious exercising of a function upon which the fate of Parties and Ministries would in future depend.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton) had assumed his favourite attitude of a political Jeremiah, warning the House and the country of the terrible plots that were being devised against liberty by the Prime Minister. His noble Friend rather reminded him of the description given by one of our comic poets of certain persons who went about asking—

“Who made the stocks to fall, and prices rise,
And filled the butchers' shops with great blue flies?”

And the answer of the noble Lord always was “The Prime Minister.” It was, no doubt, encouraged by his example; but the hon. Gentleman the Member for Longford (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) had favoured the House with a quotation from Isaiah. For himself he should have been very glad to keep the ball rolling, and if only he could have found anything relevant in their works to have given the House a quotation or two from the minor prophets; but the fact was that any such attempt had been rendered wholly superfluous by the extraordinary histrionic performance of the hon. Member for Shropshire (Mr. Stanley Leighton) to whom the House had just listened. In one of Mr. Dickens's novels there was a description of the old Court of Chancery and of an unfortunate man who rose at 4 o'clock every day, and, waiving his arms wildly at the Chancellor, said, “My lord;” whereupon the ushers ordered him either to keep his seat or to leave the Court, and this person was known as “the Man from Shropshire.” Now, it was his rooted belief that, owing to the reform of the Court of Chancery, the man from Shropshire had found the place too hot for him, and had taken up his abode in the House of Commons. As for the debate on this Amendment, anyone who had listened to it without having read the Order Book would have thought that it referred solely to the question whether the initiative should be left to the Speaker or to the Government, while, in point of fact, that was neither the only nor the principle matter to be decided. Both the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex and the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) proposed to retain the words relating to the Speaker.

MR. O'DONNELL said, that he should have been out of Order if he had omitted them.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Those words remained part of the Resolution, and yet, as he was pointing out, everyone would have imagined from the debate that that question was still unsettled, and that it was in the power of the House to strike them out. The real point at issue was more limited—whether the responsibility of the Speaker was to be sole or divided. Now, he demurred altogether to the description given by the noble Lord of the Office of Speaker. The noble Lord, following the views expressed by the hon. Member for Cork City (Mr. Parnell) in the last Parliament, had attempted to argue that the Speaker's duty was practically confined to expressing the sense of the House.

Mr. Speaker

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, that was the view taken of his functions by the Speaker.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: He did not think so; but, in any case, that was the position combated at the time by his noble Friend the Secretary of State for India, who pointed out that the Speaker, as guardian of the rights of the House, of minorities, and of individual Members, had many other equally important duties to perform. He had no doubt that the Government, in proposing to invest the Speaker with new and important duties, were conscious of the fact that they were observing the Constitutional traditions of his high Office. The Speaker was always regarded as the natural protector of oppressed minorities and individual Members, and he believed that none of the right hon. Gentleman's Successors in the Chair would be likely to abuse that trust. A long catalogue had been given of the high crimes and misdemeanours of former Speakers; and men who had been supposed during the debate of the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Brighton (Mr. Marriott) to have possessed all the virtues, were now declared to have been the corrupt creatures of the Crown. The hon. Member for Dungarvan contended that the clôture ought not to be put into operation except at the suggestion of a Minister of the Crown. As a private Member he protested against that most unconstitutional doctrine. It was one of the most important rights and privileges of Members of Parliament that, as Members, all were equal, with the exception that Ministers alone were privileged to propose money Votes on their own responsibilities as Ministers of the Crown. The Crown, however, had nothing whatever to do with the Question before the House. The privileges of Members that were now being debated had often been asserted against the Crown, and there could not, therefore, be any more unconstitutional proceeding than to enlarge the Parliamentary powers of Ministers by the adoption of the Amendment. The noble Lord the Member for Middlesex made, indeed, a proposition to which the objection he had just made could not apply. But, then, the speech of the noble Lord, like that of the hon. Member for Dungarvan, was almost entirely confined to what should be the rights or duties of Ministers of the Crown in this matter; and, apparently, he brought in the private Member as a sort of bogey in the background, in order to meet the objection which he foresaw might be made, while it enabled him to make that great diatribe against the Prime Minister with which he favoured the House. He hoped, however, the Government would not make a greater concession to the noble Lord than to the hon. Member for Dungarvan. The private Member was not the man the noble Lord had in his eye; his object was that the Speaker should act in conjunction with a Minister of the Crown. But he would thereby incur the very risks to prevent which the noble Lord and his Friends pretended they were making this proposition. He would ask anyone acquainted with the ways of the House, whether the Speaker would be in a more independent position if he was to be looking to the right or to the left and asking either a Minister of the Crown or some hon. Member—perhaps the noble Lord himself and his Friends—whether the moment had come when he was to consult the opinion of the House, or if he was to act on his own undivided responsibility? This proposition, if carried, would make the Speaker almost necessarily the slave of faction, and he could not understand how it could have been brought forward from any wish to preserve the integrity of the Speaker's high Office and those traditions which were its glory. For these reasons he would most unhesitatingly vote against this proposition, and upon the most Conservative grounds, though he sat on the Liberal side of the House.

[Sixth Night.]

MR. PLUNKET said, that not many days ago the noble Lord who had just sat down performed with considerable effect the office of Jeremiah to his own Party; but when a political opponent ventured to make a few criticisms on the policy of the Prime Minister, the noble Lord was extremely indignant. The noble Lord found fault with his noble Friend the Member for Middlesex for having discussed the matter as if the words "Mr. Speaker" had not been already introduced into the Resolution. But the line taken by his noble Friend the Member for Middlesex was that the words "Mr. Speaker" had been unfortunately introduced, and, as it was not possible for him to strike them out, he desired to minimize the evil, and, as far as possible, take from the Speaker the initiative in this odious procedure. With regard to the two Amendments now before the House, his own opinion was rather in favour of that of the hon. Member for Dungarvan, because, while regretting that this machinery for the silencing of Members should be put in motion, he thought if it was to be done it should be done in the most solemn manner by those who would not only feel the responsibility, but who could be made responsible to the House. But, said the noble Lord who had just sat down, "who ever heard of introducing in such a case a Minister of the Crown?" Had the noble Lord ever heard of the Rules of Urgency, which were only to be applied on the initiative of a Minister? He did not find that the noble Lord had all those misgivings of unconstitutional action to which he had just given utterance when those Rules were passed.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, that they were only passed as a temporary measure.

MR. PLUNKET said, the whole of the argument amounted to this, thrash it backwards and forwards how they would, whether under the circumstances in which the words "Mr. Speaker" were introduced into the Resolution, the conditions upon which the Speaker was directed by the subsequent part of it to act would not oblige him to have regard to the sense of a bare majority of the House at any time. If that were not so, of course the initiative of the Speaker would be a great protection, and he would be the last person in the world to fear the oppression of an impatient majority. On the other hand, if it could be shown, as he thought it could, that the inevitable effect of the Resolution as it stood would be to tie the hands of the Speaker so that he would be obliged to consider the sense of a bare majority of the House, the case was different. That was the point upon which they were to make up their minds, and upon that point the noble Lord the Member for Calne did not meet the arguments of his noble Friend the Member for Middlesex. There was another consideration which had been glanced at by other Members. While the introduction of the Speaker's initiative was really no protection to one of the great Parties against whom the clôture might be applied, and while its necessary tendency was swiftly and effectually to degrade the Speakers of the House, it went far to deprive those who were aggrieved of that very ally which some found in public opinion out-of-doors. A great deal had been said of public opinion out-of-doors as a security against any abuse of the clôture in the House of Commons. For his own part, so far as Members had been recommended to betake themselves to the Press and to the platform when they were dissatisfied with the decisions of the House through the agency of the clôture, he must decline to accept that recommendation. As regarded the Press, it must be remembered that probably every nine people out of ten who read the newspapers only heard one side of the question; and it was only in the reports of the debates in Parliament that the whole subject was carefully presented to them. With all respect to the Press, therefore, he could not consent to rely upon that as a protection against abuse of the clôture. Neither could he accept the protection of the platform. It was in the House itself that the protection must rest. It would be no satisfaction to a great political Party to be told, when a question was carried over their heads through the exercise of the clôture, that they might appeal to public opinion out-of-doors after the thing had become an accomplished fact. If the clôture now recommended for adoption were used in an unfair manner against a political Party in the House, they might appeal to public opinion out-of-doors, and if they did not obtain satisfaction, they might, at all events, have retaliation. The intervention and initiative of the Speaker as proposed in the Resolution practically would deprive them of the protection of public opinion out-of-doors, because when they charged the opposite Party with having acted unfairly, the answer would be that it was done by the Speaker in the discharge of his duty. It was therefore desirable, as far as possible, to withdraw the Speaker from all initiative in the position in which the Resolution now stood, because it was inevitable that the force of the language used in the latter part of it would compel the Speaker to adopt the sense of a majority of the House, and not of the whole House, as that "evident sense" on which he was to act. The words of the Resolution made this at least clear. His contention was that in the earlier part of this Resolution the Speaker was left entirely free to put what construction he pleased upon the "evident sense" of the House. He wanted to know what House? It was left open to the Speaker to take any point of the relative points of balance of opinion of the House—whether the nine-tenths, or a mere majority of 1. Whatever construction he placed on the latter words of the Resolution, Mr. Speaker was left entirely to his own discretion in the earlier part. Suppose—and it was not a violent supposition—that within two or three years another Radical Government were in power who thought it of great national importance to carry without delay some sweeping measure, the Minister of the day might consider that a Speaker of his own views would be worth a ton of argument. The minority would be placed at a great disadvantage, and Revolutionary measures might be carried, and carried by a comparatively small and reluctant majority. It had been said more than once that the Speakers of the House of Commons held a position of impartiality which could not be found in the corresponding Officers in any other Assembly in the world. That was so. He remembered very well the incident which happened about eight years ago, when the present Speaker was elected to the Chair by political opponents. He would remind the House that in 1874, when the Conservative Party came into power with a great and unexpected majority, it was in the power of the Prime Minister to name as Speaker whom he would, for any person whom Mr. Disraeli might have named would have certainly been elected; and there were men in the Party who might have justly aspired to that honour. But Mr. Disraeli had sat long in that House—and, whatever might be said against him, no one could deny that he was devoted to the interests and the honour of the House of Commons. He looked upon the position of Speaker as too high a one to be used for purposes of Party advantage. He regarded that position rather as a trust on behalf of all Parties in the House; and in the present Speaker he selected one whom all agreed was the best qualified to fulfil the duties of the Chair. The Speaker had himself been a stout partizan of the Liberals; but his election was proposed by the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin), an equally stout partizan of the other side. The present Prime Minister, on that occasion, spoke eloquently of the Speaker of that Assembly as one whose position it was difficult for foreigners to realize. The right hon. Gentleman might have added that the scene which was enacted that day in the English House of Commons could not have been presented in any other Legislative Assembly in the world. He (Mr. Plunket) feared it might never be witnessed in that House again. On that occasion the Speaker had used memorable words to the effect that, knowing the House, faithful to its traditions, would sustain the occupant of the Chair in vindicating their rights and privileges, and in securing freedom of debate according to established usage, he would humbly place such services as he possessed at the disposal of the House. Throughout all the calamities that had fallen on the House in recent years, the Speaker's position had shone with undiminished lustre. It was because he feared that those who succeeded to that place would be elected on different principles, that he should resist the introduction of the Speaker's authority in the Resolution, as to some extent it had been introduced—that he should support the Amendment, in order to prevent those evils from arising which he foresaw in the future.

MR. W. M. TORRENS said, he regretted that the right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken should have referred to the possible abuse, for Party purposes, of the Speaker's authority. He wished to resume the thread of the discussion as it fell on the 30th of March. It had wandered very far from the point. He desired to confine his attention to the Question before the House. On the 30th of March the House decided, not on any plan of clôture or rigid system of Rules for the future, but simply that the House was prepared to consider the recommendations of the Prime Minister as to whether any system of clôture could be adopted consistently with the ancient traditions of the House. Nothing more was decided—unless in the putting of the Question two or three words were added which were not essential to the Question. He put it confidently that the man who, of all men, had the responsibility on his shoulders—the Prime Minister—would readily and cheerfully, especially after his candid speech that evening, modify the Resolution before them if he could be convinced that it would be for the benefit of the House to do so, and it were in consonance with the feelings of the majority on the subject. It would be wholly unworthy of the great career of the right hon. Gentleman to do otherwise. He could not conceive that those who claimed to be a majority in the House would be easily induced to shut up nearly half the Members who sat there. He would not believe that the illustrious man, the last Predecessor but one of the present occupant of the Chair, whose name had been so often quoted as an authority for the Resolution—he would not believe that Lord Eversley would ever have advised a majority in that manner to shut up a minority, or that he would have desired the invidious duty of deciding, silently and without expressed reason, the sense of the House. It was not in human nature that a man should desire to exercise such a power. But what he desired was that the Prime Minister would not lay upon the Speaker such a burden as none of the Predecessors of the present Speaker ever assumed or were ever desirous to assume. All the Speakers of that House, from the Long Parliament downwards, whether good or bad, had considered themselves to be the spokesmen of the House and nothing else. The greatest poet of our language had said that the truest equality was not where all men were equal, but where all had equal liberty; and he would not consent that the House should place itself entirely in the discretion of even the present

[Sixth Night.]

Speaker. There were some who would winnow the corn and retain the chaff. He was not one of those. He would be neither accuser, nor accessory, nor accomplice, nor adviser; but he simply claimed the right to have his future liberty protected against even the honest desire of the Minister of the day to get on with the Public Business and put down Obstruction. He was not indifferent to Order, and in the last painful Session there was no occasion on which he had not supported the authority of the Chair. He did not see what was to prevent the Whips crowding the Benches with the supporters of the Government, who might, by their conduct, overpower the judgment of the Speaker, and so influence him to call for the clôture when in reality it was not required. On the other hand, if they put upon the Speaker the odious duty of watching the House and of seizing a safe opportunity for the Government to choke an Opposition, he would never be able to disengage his mind from that day forward of the idea that it was a moral obligation on his part, a religious duty, to exercise that power. That would render him an object of fear and suspicion, and all confidence in his impartiality would disappear. At present he had no such power, and, therefore, they had no such fear of him. On the contrary, the humblest Member of the House had a free access to the Chair, and had as much right as the most influential among them to ask the Speaker for his advice and assistance. If they took that right away, and once allowed this humble man to think that he was looked upon with disfavour by the Chair, how could it be possible that he could any longer have confidence in him? The present Speaker had discharged his duty so impartially and satisfactorily as to disarm all suspicion, and to render hon. Members less wary than they ought to be with respect to what might take place in the future; but when, perhaps, one less worthy than he occupied the same position, who would venture to ask for his advice or to follow it? He therefore implored the Government not to impose upon him a weight too heavy for him to bear, and under which it was impossible he could stand upright. These proposals were not English—they were things of foreign growth, and he could not see how such exotics could grow and flourish in the fair atmosphere of England. Anyone who had been in the House an hour ago would understand from what then took place how hopeless it was to challenge the decision of the Chair. He would take a case. It was quite possible a small minority might become intolerable to the Ministers of the day. They, very naturally, looked to the passing of their Bills. The Speaker saw—he would be made to see without telegraphic messages or whispers, without nods or winks—that he would do a great service to the public if he would do what was called “shutting out the Opposition,” and let the Business of the Government go on. The next time the minority might be larger, and they would be in a similar case. The Whips filled the Back Benches with steady followers; the Benches opposite were half empty, and thus they would be shut out. The next experiment might be the shutting out of a great political Party; and if ever they came to a day when they put the closure upon a Party with a doubtful resemblance in numbers to the present majority, then they might have a House of Caucus, but they would have no longer a House of Commons. He would go further. Unless they believed in the infallibility of the Chair, they must contemplate the possibility of the Speaker making a mistake. Did they believe that if the Speaker attempted to shut down the House, and failed, any man would have the same confidence in him as before? If there was a precious jewel which the House ought to preserve, it was the untainted and undoubted impartiality of the Chair. If they lost that, they were on the highway to lose the independence of the House, because they were on the highway to lose the personal individuality of the House. There was one other subject which he should not like to sit down without referring to. For months he had thought about it, and he felt that it was impossible to leave it unsaid. At an hour like the present, when there was such a strain upon the Empire, and danger was confessedly so near—when distraction was so deep, and alienation had become so widespread and so bitter, he could not shut his eyes to what seemed to him an impending danger—that when they passed the clôture, they would inflict the first great blow to the Union between England and Ireland. Let it not be supposed that he said this in exaggeration or in lightness. Members from Ireland were invited to enter that House in the proportion of 100 to 500. In spite of the protest of Mr. Fox, Irishmen were invited—he must say forced—into the Union in the proportion of one to five. One danger was indicated by Grattan in the memorable protest he made in favour of the national life of his stricken country. He said—

“You can have no security for equal freedom. There may be every disposition to treat you well; I believe in the honour of British statesmen; but you can have no security in such proportion as you form in the House for equal freedom.”

To that Mr. Pitt replied that they might trust inviolably the honour and the generosity and the national self-respect of England. She asked Ireland to join her for better or for worse, and she would never put down or trample upon her because she was weaker, but would always listen and attend to her complaints. Mr. Grattan's answer to that should be remembered. He said—

“When I am asked on behalf of a weaker to trust irrevocably its fortunes and its liberties to the honour of the greater, the greater may have much honour, but the weaker can have no security.”

That day had, undoubtedly, now come within sight. For 80 years hon. Members from Ireland, however divided among themselves, however antagonistic in creed and in opinions, had found themselves at home in that great Assembly, and had never found themselves unable to obtain a hearing on account of their numerical inferiority. This he would say, that in 1801, with the bloodshed of 1798 still recent, and even with the unexampled bribery notoriously exercised at that day, if anyone had ventured to tell the stricken, weakened, and emaciated Parliament of Ireland that they would be choked, and choked when they could not retaliate, no power on earth would have forced them to the Union. For the sake of the honour and the liberties of the House, for the sake of the legislation of the future, for the sake of their institutions, and for the honour of the Union, he implored the House to consider well before it rashly adopted a system of unqualified clôture.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he must congratulate the House upon having had from the hon. Member for Finsbury

[Sixth Night.]

(Mr. W. M. Torrens) a speech which was worthy of the Whig-Radicals who had in former years been his contemporaries as Members of the House—men of the stamp of the late Mr. Wakley and the late Mr. Duncombe. They had heard how Whig-Radicals were wont to speak; and he hoped the younger Members of the House connected with the Liberal Party would understand that their Predecessors, who had studied the elements of freedom, were not satisfied with mere platform oratory based upon fallacies and not upon proofs. The hon. Member for Finsbury had clearly pointed out that this, which the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury had called a “trifling question” at the beginning of the evening, really involved the freedom of debate. [Mr. GLADSTONE: No, no.] If he understood the right hon. Gentleman, he certainly spoke of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell), and the Amendment upon that of the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton), as involving a “small point.” These, he believed, were the right hon. Gentleman's words, and he thought the hon. Member for Finsbury had shown that it was not by any means a “small point.” He must say, also, that the Amendment of the hon. Member for Dungarvan threw into plainer light the real meaning of leaving in the hands of the Speaker a discretionary power that was altogether unprecedented. When, on the 4th of February, 1881, the Speaker, in acknowledging the confidence which the House had placed in him by trusting him to draw up the Rules of Urgency, the right hon. Gentleman used these words—

“The House has intrusted to me great and unprecedented powers, and I accept them with a grave sense of the responsibility imposed upon me. I shall endeavour to carry them out in such a manner as to maintain freedom of debate, which is one of the most cherished traditions of this House, and at the same time to restrain any abuses of that freedom.”—[3 Hansard, cclviii. 162.]

The House adopted, at a period of emergency, what the right hon. Gentleman himself termed an unprecedented course; and on the 4th of February, 1881, when the right hon. Gentleman also presented the Rules of Urgency, he used the expression that no Speaker ought to use those powers unauthorized again. What the House was now asked to do was this—to make the measures, which the right hon. Gentleman stated to be unprecedented, the ordinary Rules hereafter in this House. On the 2nd of February, 1881, the Speaker, in acknowledging the confidence of the House in sanctioning the unprecedented power he had used in an emergency, said—

“Future measures for insuring orderly debate I must leave to the judgment of the House. But I may add that it will be necessary, either for the House itself to assume more effectual control over its debates, or to intrust greater authority to the Chair.”—[Ibid.]

The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had chosen the latter alternative without even attempting the former. He had preferred the clôture to every attempt to regulate debate, and they had before them the probability of the clôture in its most dangerous form. If the clôture could be made more dangerous by any manner in which it was introduced, it was by placing it first in order, and first for their consideration; so that every measure for regulating debate was postponed to the adoption of the clôture. It was evident that the Speaker considered that the House ought to have first discovered and to have adopted Rules for the regulation of debate, perhaps analogous in some degree with the Rules of Urgency, and not first to adopt the clôture, which was liable to the reasonable interpretation that the Amendment of the hon. Member for Dungarvan conveyed. The hon. Member had, in that Amendment, put in plain light the course that would be pursued, if the Resolution before the House were to be adopted as it stood. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister did not like to have this glaring light thrown upon his scheme. The noble Lord the Member for Middlesex had a glimmering of the vice of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Dungarvan. It would limit the clôture to the initiative of the Minister of the Crown, and the noble Lord proposed that the origination of the clôture might be exercised by any Member in charge of the subject under discussion. The effect of this Amendment was that, although in the right direction, it did not go far enough. Why limit this power to a Member who probably was in love with his own hobby? He (Mr. Newdegate) objected to both Amendments, but most to the first. Why should the House now, for the first time, increase the functions of the Minister of the Crown in that House? He saw that the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister assented to that. It was a violation of the first principle of the constitution of the House, which was equality in the conditions upon which hon. Gentleman sat in the House. The Amendment proposed almost as great a violation of this fundamental principle as would be made by intrusting to the Speaker the imposition of the clôture upon the House. If any such power was intrusted to any Speaker, upon the solicitation of a Minister of the Crown, that would be fatal to the equality that had always prevailed among the Members of the House when once at the commencement of a Parliament the Speaker had been chosen, and on his demand the Crown had granted its time-honoured privileges to the House. The House then became Republic within itself. The proposal now before the House was in violation of the Republican principle of the constitution of the House; and it was for this reason that he, as an old Constitutionalist, assumed the position which was filled in former days by Mr. Duncombe or Mr. Wakley, and rejoiced to say was now ably taken by the hon. Member for Finsbury. These truths must be spoken, and it had fallen to his lot to utter them. All Members had equal privileges in that House, except that the Ministers of the Crown were intrusted solely with the right of proposing taxation. That was their sole rightful privilege. But now the hon. Member for Dungarvan had shown that Her Majesty's Ministers would arrogate to themselves another enormous privilege in addition to that which they had of right, as directly responsible; while the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex would make them share the enormous power only with the proposer of a Motion before the House—not always the most competent judge of the sense of the House with regard to concluding a discussion of his own favourite topic. He trusted, then, that the House would not invest the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair and his Successors with a power which must destroy confidence in their impartiality; for the wide discretion which it was proposed that they should continually exercise must generate at least suspicion.

Mr. Newdegate

It was the clear duty of the Leader of the House to make the proposal regularly by Motion if the clôture was to be enforced in this House. They had known that right hon. Gentleman to abandon his functions on two or three occasions in the Bradlaugh case. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to think that he should leave the House in a helpless condition. But, fortunately, there was a Leader of the Opposition, who efficiently took his place. If the clôture, which he abominated, was to be enforced, by courtesy of the House, no doubt, either the Leader of the House or the Leader of the Opposition would undertake the ungrateful task of setting it in operation. It must be supposed that it was because this must be an ungrateful task that the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister proposed to saddle it upon the Speaker. It was of vital interest to the House that the Speaker should not be compelled to perform invidious duties—duties that would render him or his Successors open to suspicion. It was of vital interest to the House that the Leader of the House should behave himself in a manner worthy of his position, and if he failed, that the Leader of the Opposition should take his place on every occasion when that might be necessary. He regretted to have to say it; but he ventured to do so, in the presence of both of the right hon. Gentlemen, that he had never known men in their position fail so entirely in guiding the House, in proposing such regulation of the debates as might obviate the necessity, the painful necessity, which was pretended for the clôture. He (Mr. Newdegate) had ventured to give Notice of his intention to propose a method, which he, as an old Party organizer in the House, believed would preserve Order, and would preserve, by regulating, the freedom of debate. He had no right, however, at present to allude to that. But the House was in this position. Instead of following the order which Mr. Speaker pointed out in February, 1881, and endeavouring, first, to regulate the debates and the proceedings of the House, the Government had precipitated the proposal of the clôture. In fact, they had done and were doing nothing effectual whatever towards regulating the proceedings of the House. He supposed that they had not read that which was to be found in

[Sixth Night.]

Mr. Hatsell's well-known and authoritative book on the precedents and proceedings in the House of Commons, or they had adopted a view exactly opposite to that of the author. As they all knew, Mr. Hatsell was a great authority on the subject of the proceedings of the House, and he wrote in his learned work to this effect, that the Ministers of the Crown always gained increased power when confusion prevailed in the House of Commons. He invited the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister to this statement of the learned authority to whom he referred, who had warned the House that the Ministers of the Crown always gained power by promoting confusion in the House. He (Mr. Newdegate), therefore, as an old Member of the House, did not take it kindly that the right hon. Gentleman the present Prime Minister and the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition had allowed the House to remain so long in disorder that it was losing the respect and confidence of the country. It rested with those right hon. Gentlemen, not with the Speaker, to renovate the means of preserving Order—it rested, in fact, with the House itself. The House had been brought to this lamentable strait by the attempt of these two right hon. Gentlemen to relieve themselves of responsibility. They were seeking, for the same purpose, to invest the Speaker with a power that was at once unprecedented and inconsistent with his Office. He (Mr. Newdegate) held that those who were the most responsible for the confusion that had reigned in the House were the Leader of the House and the Leader of the Opposition, through not fulfilling the duties which, by the courtesy of the House, devolved upon them.

MR. JOHN BRIGHT: It is not my intention to occupy the time of the House more than for a very few minutes, for, after all, the question before us may be discussed, I think, and disposed of in a few words, notwithstanding the somewhat lengthy debate that has taken place. Such Members of the House as were present when I last addressed it on this subject will recollect that I began my speech by referring to the exaggerated fears which Members opposite had somehow or other—I do not know how—become possessed of during their consideration of the question. I proceeded to show that those Members of the House—some on that side, and a few, it was said, on this—who preferred a certain other proposition—a two-thirds vote—to the proposal of the Government seemed to me entirely mistaken; that whilst they were objecting to the severity and strength of what the majority does, they themselves were in favour of what was much more severe. I think I proved that to demonstration by giving figures showing how the one course would affect a small minority, and how much more severely treated a small minority would be by the other course. Well, now we come to another point, and I have to express my astonishment at the view which hon. Members opposite have taken of the particular question submitted by the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell). The opponents of the Resolution are—I do not know why—actuated with a strange fear of what may happen to the House and to minorities, and more especially, Sir, to you, the Speaker of the House, if the Resolution as proposed by the Government should be accepted. The hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. W. M. Torrens), in a very interesting speech, directed, I think, hardly at all to the Amendment, has pointed out, towards the conclusion of his speech, the tremendous pressure and injustice that may be practised upon small minorities at the end of the Session. Well, our plan, at any rate with regard to the clôture, as against the two-thirds proposition, is clearly more in favour of small minorities. But I should like to ask the House whether they think the proposition that is made in the Amendment is more favourable to small minorities than the one in the Resolution, as it is proposed by the Government? I think nothing could be more conclusive than that the Resolution, as it stands will be infinitely more favourable to small minorities than the Resolution would be if amended by the hon. Member for Dungarvan. The speech of the hon. Member for Finsbury, so far as I heard it—and I am sorry I did not hear the whole of it—was largely a warning against trusting the Speakers with the power of injuring the House, and damaging the authority and the honourable independence of the Gentleman who may occupy that Chair. That seemed to be the great object of his speech. Now, what is proposed by the Amendment—I do not know that the hon. Member for Finsbury supported the Amendment? [Mr. W. M. TORRENS: Yes, Sir; I did.] Well, I did not gather it from what I heard of the speech; and I do not think anybody else gathered it. I know it was somewhat cheered by hon. Gentlemen opposite, perhaps in that sense; but then they are always very ready to cheer anything from this side of the House that attacks Her Majesty's Government. Now, what is it that the Amendment proposes?—because that is the real point we are to discuss. It proposes this—that, in calling into action the Resolution that is to be passed, an opinion should be expressed by some Minister of the Crown—I suppose the First Minister of the Crown necessarily, if he be present in the House—and the Ministerial majority, for he is the Representative of the Ministerial majority, and will not act contrary to the opinion of the majority by whom he is supported; and, therefore, the majority of the House, speaking through the Minister, is to call into action the opinion and the declaration of the Speaker as to when the cloture is to be brought into play. The idea that we are to keep this question free from Party seems to be entirely given up by the Amendment of the hon. Member for Dungarvan, because, first of all, the most distinguished Member of the Party in the House is the Prime Minister. The most important portion of the House, as a Party in numbers, is the majority by which the Prime Minister is supported; and that majority, and that Minister, before anything can be done, has to intimate by standing up at this Table, I suppose, and calling upon the Speaker, and making an observation that he thinks the debate ought to close, declaring that the sense of the House is in favour of its being closed, and thereupon the Speaker proceeds to take his part in the transaction. Now, the hon. Member for Finsbury spoke about former Speakers being connected with great political Leaders, being on terms of friendship with them—some of them, indeed, I think he said, even taking part in debate, as is done by the President of the House of Lords. Well, we must be sensible, all of us, that if this matter is to be transacted by alliance between the Minister and the Speaker, then it is very likely, during the course of debate, that the Minister, by means known to all of us, can intimate to the Speaker that the time is approaching when he shall make a proposition that the debate shall close, and the Speaker, in all probability, if the Minister is judicious, if he has not pressed his authority too far, will take the hint; and if the Minister makes a proposition, the Speaker, in all probability, will support it, and do what the Resolution requires him to do. But by this you are introducing into a very critical matter—because we all admit, I as freely as anyone, that it is critical, and not at all, if it could be avoided, a pleasant matter—that there should be any limitation of the power of debate, or the prolongation of discussion in the House. But if it is to be done in any way, it seems to me of all ways the worst that the Minister of the Crown, the trusted guide of the majority, should take action, and call upon the Speaker to act. The Minister is not—I will not say an independent, but he is not an impartial person. The Minister has his majority, and he has his policy; he has his Bills and his Supplies; and all the great work of the Session, and some of it, as we know, difficult and crowded towards the end of the Session; he has every reason, for the purpose of furthering his own policy and that of his Party, to call into action this Resolution, probably far sooner, and probably far more often, than would be done if it was left entirely in the impartial hands of the Speaker. I agree entirely with the charming account which the hon. Member for Finsbury drew of the confidence which all Members of the House have in the Speaker. It has been so for the very long time I have been in the House. I have always felt there was no question in which I could not go up to the Speaker and take his advice, and I believe he would give me his advice in as friendly and free a manner as he would to any Minister of the Crown sitting on this Bench. But if a Minister whom we do not always like very well—[Mr. WARTON: Hear, hear!]

Mr. Newdegate

—the hon. and learned Member cheers that sentiment—where, I say, we do not like him very well, sitting in Opposition, we are not very much in favour of some portion of his policy—we object to it—I should not like, certainly, if I were on that side of the House, and the late Government sitting here, that the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Stafford Northcote) should be able to get up, any time during the debates, especially towards the end of the Session, and that he should then call upon the Speaker to put in action the Resolution and to stop the debate. I believe the motives which would press upon the Minister would be ten times stronger, and come to him ten times more often, to stir him to action than would be the case if the whole power were left in the hands of the Speaker. The hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) surprises me very much. He says that the clôture is an abominable thing, or used some other disagreeable word. He has been the advocate for many years past of some measure of this kind, or for this object. I do not know why he objects to the proposition of the Government. At any rate, I can understand why he objects to the proposition of the Amendment. He sees, as I see, that the Amendment is the very thing that an unscrupulous Minister sitting on this Bench would ask the House to agree to, because it gives greater power to the Minister, it lessens immensely the power of the minority, it takes out of the hands of the most impartial man within these walls the decision of a very important question in which we are all, and in which minorities especially, are particularly concerned, and therefore I must say I am astonished that Members opposite should take the course they do. They took a wrong course, I think, upon the other question to which I have already referred, and I think now they are proposing what is much less moderate than that which the Government has proposed. I am not allowed to speak, of course, of the opinion of the Speaker in the Chair; but I judge and believe that any Speaker—the present one in the Chair or his successors—would prefer that he should be left to his own impartial judgment on all matters of this kind rather than he should be subjected to the hints, the proffered alliance, the urging and stimulating of a Minister of the Crown, who might ask him, under certain circumstances, to help him out of a difficulty that might have arisen. If I were a Member of a small minority, or of any minority, I should like to take the course of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate). I would shut out the Minister from any extra power on this matter over that of any other Member of the House.

MR. NEWDEGATE: What I said was, that I thought by courtesy the duty ought to devolve on the Leader of the House or the Leader of the Opposition.

MR. JOHN BRIGHT: That is exactly what I understood the hon. Gentleman to say. The hon. Gentleman complains, and condemns the right hon. Gentleman opposite, and my right hon. Friend, because they have not done all he thinks they ought in a particular case; but surely if he leaves it entirely to the Minister of the day, and shuts out the Speaker altogether, then the question becomes a pure question of Party. Nothing, in my opinion, could be more unfair, and more unreasonable to a minority, and especially to small minorities, which, towards the end of the Session, are often the most troublesome in preventing the transaction of Business. Now, I put it to hon. Members, if this matter is to be done at all, if there is to be any mode of bringing a debate to a close by the general sense of the House, when that debate has been protracted to an unconscionable length, is it not better to adopt the proposition which the Government has offered to the House, a proposition, I say, conspicuous in its moderation, rather than, so far as we have gone, the Amendments offered—the Amendment of two-thirds, or that of handing over to the initiative of a Minister, or of shutting out the only absolute impartial authority in the House? I do not claim to be impartial at all. I am a Member of a Party anxious to do certain things, and am always very glad when we have a majority on a division. I do not complain of any man acting honestly and honourably with and for his Party; but with the feelings that we have against our opponents, and in favour of our own policy, I think the less this matter is intrusted to any Member on either side of the House, or to any handful or number of Members, the better, and that all that has been said by the hon. Member for Finsbury and others as to the character of the Speaker, and the manner in which all men in the House wish that that character should be permanently and for ever sustained, I think, wishing that done, it is our secure interest that to the Speaker should be committed this delicate power, and that all men in the House and every minority would feel that when the House has been called to decide the question whether a debate should be prolonged or not by the Speaker, and the decision was against the prolongation of the debate, I think he would feel he had been better treated, and more consistently with the character and practice of the House, than if the Leader of the majority of the House should get up and by his fiat should put a stop to the debate. Therefore, on the ground that those fears with regard to the minority, and those fears with regard to the effect of this proposition on the character of the Speaker are exaggerated, and without any sensible foundation, I think that the proposition made by Her Majesty's Government is one of as great moderation as it is possible to offer on a case of this kind; and, therefore, I hope that the Resolution as it is offered to the House will be sustained by the House.

Mr. John Bright

MR. CHAPLIN said, he found himself in a somewhat difficult position, for while he disliked the hon. Member for Dungarvan's Amendment, he did not care very much for the Amendment to it moved by his noble Friend the Member for Middlesex. Yet, on the whole, he liked the original Resolution less than either of the Amendments. He had always held that it was unfair to place on the Speaker the very unenviable responsibility of taking the initiative in this matter. He thought the initiative ought to rest in the hands of the House, and that they alone ought to be responsible for whatever decision was taken. Inasmuch as the Amendment, to a certain degree, mitigated the evils of which he complained, he preferred it to the original Resolution. His objection to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Dungarvan was that it raised an inequality that did not exist at present between Ministers of the Crown and other Members of the House. That, to his mind, was fatal to it. It was modified by the Amendment of the noble Lord; but he should not be satisfied with any Amendment, except one which would place the initiative in any Member of the House.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he should vote for the Amendment, because he was in favour of the clôture, and was anxious that it should be strengthened; but he could not understand how hon. Gentlemen opposite could support it. He was of opinion that you could not obtain the clôture by a majority unless some Amendment of this kind was added to the Resolution. The Speaker, when he informed the House that a debate had lasted long enough, would have to consider whether it was reasonably certain that the clôture would pass or not, because, if it did not pass, the Speaker would be in an entirely false position. He apprehended that the Speaker never would say that it was the general sense of the House that a debate should close unless he was pretty certain that there was a large majority in favour of it; and that was why he said this Amendment would render it far more probable that it would be clôture by a simple majority than was ever likely to be the case so long as the matter was left entirely in the hands of the Speaker. The effect of such an Amendment as the present would be to shift the responsibility from the Speaker to its proper place—namely, to the Ministers of the Crown. It had been said that the Speaker was the natural protector of minorities; but why, if so, did they not vote with him for the Amendment? What was the alternative proposed? The hon. Member for North Warwickshire had enunciated the very Republican doctrine that they were all equal.

MR. NEWDEGATE: I referred to Members in the House, not all mankind.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he held that even in that House Ministers of the Crown were superior to ordinary Members, and they had special reasons and rights to interfere to bring a debate to a close, on account of the responsibility that lay on them alone in regard to the conduct of the Business of the House. Although he was anxious that the clôture should pass in a strong form, he would not vote for the Amendment as he proposed to do if the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House had stated that by that issue the Government would stand or fall, because, knowing, as he did, that the right hon. Gentleman had more experience in Parliamentary matters than anyone then present, he should be bound, under such circumstances, to support him. They had had two speeches from the Treasury Bench, one from the Prime Minister, and the other from the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster; and he must say he never heard two worse speeches from those right hon. Gentlemen in his life. The reason of that, no doubt, was because in their hearts they were not opposed to the Amendment. He felt, therefore, that he should only be supporting the policy they were in favour of by voting against them on this particular occasion.

MR. GRANTHAM said, that the Resolution proposed that the responsibility should mainly devolve on the Speaker; but when they came to the latter part, and interpreted that by the speech of the Prime Minister, it was quite evident that the responsibility was to be taken away, and it was to devolve on the majority. The basis of the Prime Minister's speech was that the House had always been governed by a majority. The obvious conclusion was that this question was to be determined by the House independently of the Speaker. That being so, he agreed with the principle of the Amendment, that if the majority of the House was to determine the matter, it ought to be done on the responsibility of a Minister of the Crown. He objected to the Amendment as it stood, because if the initiative were left to a Minister that would make it a Party question. He wished to avoid that, and for that reason he would prefer that it should be left in the hands of the Speaker with some limitation. It was not desirable that it should always be a Party question. He believed in the independence of Speakers in the future, and he preferred to trust the Speaker rather than a majority or a Minister. The Resolution was inconsistent with itself; it was drawn on the principle that the Speaker was to be responsible; but towards the close it was provided that the question was not to be decided in the affirmative without the support of so many Members; and for that reason he said the power of the Speaker was taken away. If a majority was to have the power, it was far better that a Minister of the Crown should be responsible. For these reasons, he should vote for the Amendment, although he disliked it.

MR. HICKS said, the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster had asked what the Amendment proposed. He ventured to ask the Government another question, what did the Resolution propose? Up to this time there seemed no agreement as to what it did mean. Did it mean that the initiative was to rest with the Speaker, or did it mean that it was to rest with the power behind the Prime Minister? The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster had spoken of the Speaker receiving a hint from someone; if he had been earlier in the House he would have heard his hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire say that the Speaker should receive hints from both sides. If that were so, how was he to be independent? The great thing was to have the Resolution made clear and simple, for, tyrannical as the Motion was, it was better that it should be passed than that they should pass something which no one could understand.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Sir, I do not propose to detain the House for any length of time; but I am anxious to say one word, especially in consequence of the speech of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere). It is perfectly true, I must say, that there is some difficulty in deciding upon the vote that we ought to give upon such a question as this, and for this reason—that we are entering into the discussion and settlement of a Resolution with the whole scope and object of which a great many of us entirely disagree. It is extremely difficult, therefore, when you come to judge the different points in the Resolution, to consider how far we ought to take one course or another with reference to the particular question raised. I confess I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) in the general view he expressed on the subject. I am not very much charmed with the Amendment proposed; but I think it a less evil than the Resolution as it stands, and I will explain in a moment why I think so. The difficulty that I feel in regard to the whole proposal is, that it is a proposal, assuming that it is to be a Resolution which is to give the power of closing a debate to a bare majority, which is essentially of a Party character. We cannot disguise that fact from ourselves. If you are prepared to say you would only give that power to a large majority, such as two-thirds, you would be obviously placing the matter on a wholly different footing, and giving the great bulk of the House, irrespective of Party, the option of saying that, at a certain time, they had enough of the discussion. But when that had been suggested, the objection was taken that you could not agree to that, because, if you did, you would be making the minority parties to a question which ought to be decided by the majority. The majority ought to rule, and that is why we insist on a simple majority deciding in this matter. But the majority means the Party of the Government of the day, unless you mean a snap majority — an accidental majority that happened to be in the House at a particular time. You can hardly mean that you are thinking of an accidental majority, but of the permanent majority of the House. If that is to be the case, and if the object in passing this Resolution is not to save time in irrelevant debates, but that you may enable the Ministry to go on and carry measures to which they attach importance, we have to consider what is the object of calling on the Speaker to originate a Motion for the closing of the debate. If the question were one which was to be decided according to the feeling of the great majority of the House — of the majority and the minority — then I could understand the Speaker, without imparting the least Party character to his action, might say — “I think the House is now desirous of closing this debate.” But if that is not to be so, and the Speaker is to be called upon to ask the House whether they wish to close a debate when he perceives the evident sense of the House to be so and so, what is meant by the evident sense of the House? You have defined that by saying it is a bare majority. If it is, therefore, in the mind of the Speaker that there is a bare majority in favour of closing the debate, it may be fairly argued and defended that the Speaker is bound to put the Question. Let us take a case which may frequently occur. There is a debate of great importance, which lasts, perhaps, two days, and the question arises whether the debate should be adjourned again. The Government, or the majority, oppose it, and a large minority vote for it. The practice now would be that the majority, if they insist on continuing the debate, divided two or three times, would be sure to carry the Motion; but if the Speaker perceives that the minority were not in favour of adjourning the debate, he would feel himself bound to put the Question. [Mr. GLADSTONE dissented.] The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) shakes his head. I do not say that a strong Speaker, like the Gentleman who at present occupies the Chair, might not stand against such action; but it would be very difficult for an ordinary Speaker, subject to the pressure which would be put on him both in the House and out of the House, to refuse, in the circumstances, to put the Question. You, therefore, put the Speaker into an unfair position by throwing upon him the initiative; and I do not scruple to say that of the two proposals before the House, the less objectionable is that the clôture Motion should come from those who occupy a responsible position. I am, therefore, inclined to vote for the Amendment of the hon. Member for Dungarvan. Not that I do not feel the disadvantage of putting the initiative in the hands of the Minister of the day. I can perceive cases in which the Minister would abuse the power of bringing about the close of a debate; but, of the two evils, I believe the lesser is that we should be entirely above board in what we are doing, and put the responsibility on the proper shoulders — these being the shoulders of the Minister of the Crown.

Mr. Labouchere

COLONEL MAKINS said, that when he first saw the Amendment on the Paper he felt inclined to oppose it; but, considering it in connection with the original Resolution, he had reluctantly arrived at the conclusion that it was better, in the interests of the House, to vote for it — and this for two reasons. In the first place, he thought it would be a more honest way of dealing with the question. The object of the Rule, as he understood it from the description given by the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for India (the Marquess of Hartington), was to enable the Government to carry out the programme which they laid before the country at the General Election in 1880. If that were so, then it was more honest that the closing of a debate should be at the instance of the Government, and it was not desirable that they should be able to shield themselves behind the Speaker. If they were allowed to do so, and the Speaker's decisions were in their favour, of course those decisions would be perfectly satisfactory to them; but if the Government made mistakes, and the decisions were against them, they could disown all participation in the matter, and say it was the Speaker's fault, and not theirs, that the sense of the House had been taken. The other reason why he objected to the original proposition, and preferred the Amendment, was because, if it were carried as it stood, it would revolutionize the Office of Speaker. Hitherto, the Speaker had only acted when called on—he had only submitted a Resolution to the House when it had been duly put and seconded. Let them take an extreme case. When there was almost an empty House—when there were only two or three Members in it—the Speaker did not, of his own motion, declare there was not a quorum; but he waited until someone had called attention to the fact. Therefore, in the future, if the sense of the House was to be taken as proposed by the Resolution, it should not be taken on the responsibility of a private individual, but on the Motion of the Leader of the House. For these reasons, he should vote—though most reluctantly—for the Amendment of the hon. Member for Dungarvan.

[Sixth Night.]

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, that, after the discussion which had taken place, certain practical objections having been made to his Amendment to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Dungarvan, he would not put the House to the trouble of a division.

Amendment to the proposed Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The House divided:—Ayes 164; Noes 220: Majority 56.—(Div. List, No. 74.)

Main Question again proposed.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Sir H. Drummond Wolff.)

MR. GLADSTONE: It is certainly early to adjourn (12.5 A.M.); but, under the circumstances, I will accede to the proposal, and I will take this opportunity of stating in regard to the Notice given to-night by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Preston (Mr. Raikes), which proposes to recognize the Chairman of Ways and Means—being an Officer of the House—but to wholly exclude from the operation of the Resolution casual Chairmen—Chairmen pro hac vice—that it is an Amendment that I think perfectly reasonable, and that we are prepared to accede to.

Motion agreed to.

Debate adjourned till To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

MILITARY MANŒUVRES BILL.

(Mr. Secretary Childers, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman.)

[BILL 134.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Childers.)

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, he did not for a moment wish to oppose the second reading of this Bill, which, he believed, was uniform with other measures which had been introduced on the same subject; but they had a right to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War to make a statement to the House with regard to it, so that the country might know what troops were likely to be employed in the manœuvres. They had a right to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the Army Corps that was to be kept in a state of preparedness for embarkation at a moment's notice was to be employed; and they had a right to know whether proper Generals—Generals who would command this Army Corps in case of any emergency—would be appointed to command. They had a right, also, to ask whether the Commissariat, Transport, and an organized Medical Department would be included in the manœuvres, in fact, whether they would have an Army Corps complete in every arm, and with all the appliances of war, so that, in case of necessity, they might know they were able to embark an Army Corps, thoroughly equipped, at a moment's notice? He laid special emphasis on "proper Generals," because he imagined that the men who ought to be employed were officers who had had every opportunity of manœuvring troops as they would have on an emergency. He would ask the right hon. Gentleman what were the troops who were to be employed in the Autumn Manœuvres, and whether the First Army Corps was to be included in the number?

Colonel Makins

MR. CHILDERS: I am glad the hon. and gallant Baronet has asked me the question, because, to a great extent, I am able to answer him at this moment. I say "to a great extent," because, of course, at the beginning of May it is impossible for me to say who will be the officers employed in the month of August to carry out the details of the operations. But I am able to say that it will be our endeavour to collect for the purposes of these manœuvres, not the whole of the First Army Corps, because a part of it is at the Curragh and elsewhere, but a sufficient force of the Regular troops, and also of the Militia and Volunteers, to show the country the progress that had been made, and the readiness with which a large body of men could take the field. The men will be under the command of officers such as would be called upon to lead in the event of actual war. The object of the War Office in restoring, after a lapse of some years, I will not say the annual practice, but what is known as the Autumn Manœuvres, is not merely for the purpose of show, but for utility, and to prepare both the Army and Auxiliary Forces for what they might be called upon to undergo in warfare. I thoroughly appreciate the object of the hon. and gallant Baronet, and cordially thank him for putting the question.

. Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

TURNPIKE ROADS (SOUTH WALES)

BILL.—[BILL 101.]

(Mr. Dodson, Mr. Hibbert.)

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(Mr. Dodson.)

Amendment proposed, to leave out the words "now read the third time," and add the word "re-committed," instead thereof.—(Mr. Hussey Vivian.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. PUGH said, he had a Notice on the Paper of a Resolution on the third reading of the Bill. He trusted the House would take into consideration the manner in which the measure passed its last stage. It was slipped through Committee at 5 minutes to 7 on the occasion of a Morning Sitting, although there were, at least, two Notices of hostile Motions placed opposite to it on the Paper by Members representing South Wales county constituencies. He should not have thought that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board would have proceeded with the measure, at such a time, under such circumstances. He did not know whether he would be now in order in moving his Resolution; but if he was not he should seek a more favourable opportunity. The terms of his Motion were—

"That, in the opinion of this House, considering the constitution of the County Roads Boards of South Wales, the purposes for which they were originally formed, and the comparatively small number of roads under their control, it is not expedient, in view of the contemplated change in the whole system of County Government, to pass any measure which, whilst neglecting to provide for the better and more economical management of highways as well as turnpike roads, unnecessarily provides for the making of any additional appointments by the boards, and throws the additional expense upon persons who are not represented thereon."

He wished to point out that at the time of the Rebecca Riots in South Wales it became necessary to pass a measure dealing with the turnpike roads, and providing for the money due by the trusts being paid off. Part of the scheme consisted in the appointment of a General Superintendent of the turnpike roads in South Wales. The Act had been put into operation by the Government, and had answered its purpose well. The roads had been well kept, and the debt had now been paid off. He (Mr. Pugh) had put down a Motion, a little more than 12 months ago, asking the Government to assent to an inquiry into the operation of this Act, and also of the South Wales Highways Act; but the Motion had been opposed by the President of the Local Government Board, and consequently came to nothing. It was understood at that time that the Local Government Board knew what was necessary, and that they would do what was requisite; but he found at the expiration of the 12 months that they had no proposition to make, except to throw the cost of the Superintendent upon the counties. If such an officer were still necessary to see that the roads were kept in order, his services were required as much for the highways, which received very inadequate supervision, as for the turnpike roads, and the unnecessary expense of two separate systems ought to be saved. Finally, he wished to point out that, since the turnpike roads were taken over, many other roads which were now of great importance in the various districts—main roads, to all intents and purposes—were in a very bad state; and those, he said, ought certainly to be looked after just as much as the turnpike roads. On the whole, his contention was that, as the Government were now laying an additional burden upon the taxpayers in South Wales, who were already highly taxed, those taxpayers had a right to ask that the general question of the roads in that part of the country should be considered, and that the Government should bring forward a scheme that would provide not only better roads, but more economical management in the future. He did not think that the Local Government Board were doing their duty in this matter in a way that the country had a right to expect. If, therefore, it would be in Order, he desired to move the Amendment of which he had given Notice; and, in any case, he should resist further progress with this Bill, which would only throw greater expense upon South Wales, and was opposed by nearly all the Members for that portion of the country.

MR. SPEAKER: I must point out, in answer to the hon. Member, that an Amendment has been moved for the re-committal of the Bill; and, therefore, the Amendment of the hon. Member cannot be taken until that question is disposed of.

VISCOUNT EMLYN said, that one of the grounds on which this Bill was brought forward was to exonerate the Government from appointing a Superintendent of Roads, and the other was to exonerate the English taxpayers from paying for the maintenance of main roads in South Wales. Was it the intention of the Government to give the same assistance towards the maintenance of main roads in South Wales as was to be given in the case of the English main roads? The House was informed by the President of the Local Government Board that he was not sure there would be any legislation at all upon this subject. But he maintained that, if it were unjust to the English taxpayer to contribute towards the maintenance of roads in South Wales, it was equally unjust for the people of South Wales to pay the additional tax upon carriages, or any other tax which might be levied on them for the maintenance of roads in England. It was important to ascertain what were the intentions of the Government in this matter; and, therefore, before the Bill went any further, he should like an answer to be given by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board to the question he had asked.

MR. DODSON said, although he was prepared to assent to the Motion of his hon. Friend for the re-committal of the Bill, and to the clause of which Notice had been given by the noble Lord, and to the Amendments of two other hon. Members, he was unable to agree to the proposal of the hon. Member for Cardiganshire (Mr. Pugh). He considered himself pledged to bring in a Bill, on behalf of the Local Government Board, to deal with the question in a manner that would meet the wishes of those interested as far as possible. The Superintendent of Roads in South Wales had been for many years paid out of the Exchequer. He was appointed for the purpose of seeing that the roads were maintained in an efficient state and watching over their finance in order to secure the repayment of the money advanced by the Government. But, the debt having been extinguished, it had been for several years a matter of complaint in that House that the Superintendent continued to be paid out of the general taxes of the country, seeing that the reason for his appointment no longer existed; and the Government, in consequence, determined this year that the appointment should cease. The Department had put themselves in communication with the several County Roads Boards in South Wales in order to ascertain their views; and the result of those communications was to find that the Roads Boards in question desired that the appointment of a Superintendent or Superintendents should be left at their option. Accordingly, a Bill had been brought in, which gave power to the County Roads Boards to appoint, if they thought fit, a Superintendent or Superintendents, jointly or separately, in addition to the officers they already had power to appoint, for the performance of the duties connected with the roads. Power was also given to provide for the remuneration of the Superintendents, as was already the case in regard to other expenses, out of the county rates, if the tolls proved insufficient; but, as he had pointed out, it was entirely optional with the County Roads Boards to appoint or not additional officers, or to provide them or not with any additional pay. Now, the noble Lord opposite had asked what were the intentions of the Government with regard to a grant in aid of main roads.

Mr. Pugh

VISCOUNT EMLYN said, he had asked whether the Government was going to extend to the main roads in South Wales the assistance which was to be given to the main roads in England?

MR. DODSON said, in answer to the noble Lord, he must decline to enter into fragmentary explanations of a general scheme. If he were to explain part of the proposal in answer to the noble Lord, he might be called upon, and with justice, by hon. Members to explain other parts of it in which they were more particularly interested. He should, of course, enter into the desired explanations at the proper time; but, on the present occasion, he must abstain from making any further observations.

SIR JOSEPH BAILEY said, that the roads in South Wales were under a different Act of Parliament from the English roads. They had enjoyed, up to the present time, a special advantage, inasmuch as the Government had appointed a Superintendent for the purpose of overlooking them. They were now to lose that advantage, and, moreover, at a time when further taxation was about to be placed on that part of the country in respect of the additional tax upon carriages. Therefore, the question of the noble Lord as to whether South Wales was to share in the advantage which was to be given to the ratepayers on account of the English roads was a very reasonable one, and one which he thought the Government, in common courtesy, should answer.

MR. C. JAMES said, he hoped the House would agree with him that the Bill was unnecessary, and that it would be dropped. The history of this matter was not very long. Some time ago the people of Wales had a difficulty not altogether unlike that which troubled the Irish people at the present day. The Welsh difficulty, however, related to turnpike roads, and a Society was formed for the purpose of protecting the farmers in the matter of tolls, which were raised in such a manner as to constitute a great tyranny upon that class. It was eventually arranged that the Government should pay off the Bonds originally issued on the making of the roads, which Bonds, at that time, had no great value. A gentleman was sent down, a value was placed upon them, and the Government paid the money. Under those circumstances, it was reasonable enough that the Government should appoint some person to receive the money from the counties in South Wales, who were pledged to make up the deficiency which arose by reason of the tolls not being paid. There could be no doubt that the Government had a perfect right in justice to see that this was paid. Accordingly, they exercised their power of appointing an Inspector with a salary of some hundreds a-year—a fair salary, no doubt; but he had forgotten the exact amount—for the simple purpose of seeing that the roads were kept in order, and that the money was received. But the money had all been paid, the business of the receiver was over; and he was therefore bound to ask what further necessity there was for any intervention on the part of the Government? He contended that the salary of the Inspector ought to have been stopped as soon as the Government had received their money. Governments were always very slow to discontinue the salaries of officers when they were once appointed. Still, it appeared that the salary of the officer in question had been stopped since the month of March last; and he could, therefore, only regard this Bill as an invitation to the people of South Wales to put forward somebody else to receive the salary. It had been suggested that there was something to be done, in connection with the roads in South Wales, which the people of that part of the country could not carry out unless this appointment was continued. But there was not the slightest foundation for that suggestion. The County Roads Boards in South Wales were possessed of ample powers to do everything necessary for the purpose of keeping their roads in perfect order, and he held that nothing more was required to be done in that respect.

On the contrary, he repeated his belief that the Bill amounted to a mere invitation to the County Boards to put forward another person to receive the salary; and he had no doubt that some good gentleman—the best man in the world for the purpose—would turn up and receive the appointment. But the people of South Wales stood in no need of such assistance. They did not want it at all; and, therefore, he hoped that the House, looking at the question as he had placed it before them, would not allow the Bill to pass, and would say that the matter should be left in the hands of the South Wales people, who knew perfectly well how to deal with it.

MR. H. G. ALLEN said, he could not agree with the whole of the remarks of the hon. Member who had just spoken; nevertheless, he had a great objection to the Bill introduced by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board. He was of opinion that a Superintendent of Roads was very much wanted at the present time. The roads in South Wales were in most excellent order, as his hon. Friend the Member for Cardiganshire (Mr. Pugh) had pointed out; and he believed that that was in a great measure to be ascribed to the Government superintendence and inspection which they had received up to the present time. But his objection to the Bill was that it constituted a passing off of the responsibility which the Government undertook many years ago, and under which they had acted from that time to the present. He held in his hand an extract from the Report of the Special Commission, made at the time when the office of this Superintendent was created, and on which Report the Act creating it was founded, which showed that it was never intended that the appointment of the Superintendent should only be coincident with the existence of the Government debt, because their representation was based upon the general advantage of having a Superintendent of Roads in the district. The Report of the Commissioners was to the effect that they thought it highly expedient that a Superintendent Engineer should be appointed for the six counties of South Wales, to be charged with the duties specified; and it went on to say that as an annual sum was saved to the Government in the cost of transport of letters, by the exemption of mail carts from tolls, it might not unreasonably be expected by the inhabitants of South Wales that the salary of that officer should be charged to the Ordnance Department. It was perfectly clear, from this, that it was never intended that the appointments should be temporary merely. The arrangement had so far succeeded that the roads in South Wales were in good order, and, by the exemption of the mails from toll, a considerable saving had been effected to the State. He was bound to say that the saving of the paltry sum of £350, the amount of the Inspector's salary, came at a singularly inappropriate time—namely, when, as they were told, £250,000 was about to be devoted to the relief of the general rate-payers of the country in this very particular—namely, to lighten the burden attaching to them from the cost of repairing main roads. For these reasons, he trusted that the Government would continue to pay the Superintendent, as before, the small salary of £350 a-year, and so secure to the inhabitants of South Wales the maintenance in good order of their 800 miles of turnpike roads.

MR. R. H. PAGET said, that, as far as he could glean from the opinions which had been freely expressed on both sides of the House, the Welsh Members did not want the Bill at all. Under those circumstances, he thought the House was entitled to some further explanation from the Government with regard to it, because it might be said that if the Bill did nothing else it gave a new lease of life, so to speak, to the system of turnpike roads which existed in the Southern portion of Wales, and not in the Northern portion, and which was rapidly disappearing from England. He would like to know if this was to be an instance of the kind of local self-government which had been promised? He thought the noble Lord who had addressed a question to the President of the Local Government Board had a right to complain of not having received an answer, for he did not consider it a sufficient answer to say that it would be but a fragmentary exposition of the proposals of the Government to state how they intended to dispose of that £250,000 of which so much had been heard. If he might venture to do so, he would like, on this occasion, to ask the right hon. Gentleman to tell him in what way that money was to be disposed of with regard to English roads; but Mr. Speaker would rightly rule him out of Order, as that was a matter which could not rightly come within a discussion on the re-committal of a Bill dealing solely with turnpike roads in Wales. Still, he would like to have a full exposition from the right hon. Gentleman on that subject, and he did not think it would be long before he would have a right to ask for that. Now, however, he would advise the noble Lord (Viscount Emlyn) not to ask for that; but simply to ask whether, in allotting the sum derived from the new tax, the Government did or did not mean that Wales should have its full share? That was a matter of importance, and one which might be answered by a simple "Aye" or "No," without entering into any of the details which the President of the Local Government Board did not seem to wish to disclose. He hoped, however, that if the right hon. Gentleman was precluded from giving an answer to that question, some other Member of the Government would answer a question which was a very fair one and easily answered.

MR. DUCKHAM said, the cost had been, for the last eight years, £844 a-year; but for 30 years previously it was upwards of £1,200 a-year. As a taxpayer, he had felt justified in bringing this matter before the House in the first week of his occupying a seat in the House, and he was only too glad that the Government were dealing with the subject. It was a great grievance that the people of England should have to contribute to the maintenance of the roads in South Wales, while they had also to maintain their own roads, and, when they went into Wales, to pay tolls on the South Wales roads. The noble Lord opposite, and the hon. Member for Herefordshire (Sir Joseph Bailey), had put a pointed question to the Government with respect to the proposed subvention or tax which was to be imposed on carriages as some relief to the ratepayers of England, in consequence of the roads having to be maintained by them. But, surely, those gentlemen who enjoyed the privilege of turnpike gates could not rightly ask for a contribution for the repair of roads towards the maintenance of which English ratepayers contributed. The cases were not parallel; and he hoped the Government would not accede to the suggestion which had been so pressed upon them, and that the benefit shadowed forth by the Prime Minister when he produced his Budget would be given to those who had to maintain those roads from the rates, and not to those who had the advantage of the turnpike gates.

MR. H. G. ALLEN said, that in the House of Lords Committee in 1880 Lord Aberdare asked—"Why has the Superintendent been continued since the debt was paid off?" And Sir John Lambert replied—

"There was a general desire expressed that he should be continued in order to have the advantage of his superintendence. I may say that the late Superintendent received a salary of £600 a-year; but the salary, upon the appointment of Mr. Codrington, the present Superintendent, was reduced to £350."

There were, no doubt, incidental expenses—for clerk and travelling—which would explain the difference between his figures and those of the hon. Member for Herefordshire (Mr. Duckham); but he was speaking of the Superintendent's salary only.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he did not wish to intervene between the Welsh Members and the Government; but he could not understand why the right hon. Gentleman who had charge of the Bill could not give the noble Lord an answer. The right hon. Gentleman had argued that he could not say whether any part of the new tax would be devoted to Wales, because he could not disclose one part of the scheme alone; but the Prime Minister, when he was asked a Question about Scotland the other day, was not restrained by the scruples of the right hon. Gentleman, but at once assured the Scotch Members that they would share in the benefits. If the right hon. Gentleman could not give an answer, perhaps the noble Lord the Secretary to the Treasury could.

MR. W. DAVIES pointed out that the Bill was to apply to six counties in South Wales, and its main object was to enable them to appoint a General Superintendent. It was true that the County Roads Board had a power of appointment; but the Government had agreed to his Amendment that no such appointment should be valid unless confirmed by the Quarter Sessions. What he submitted was that, as a measure for County Government was in contemplation, there was no necessity at all for this Bill; and he believed he could state that the county of Pembroke was very much opposed to the Bill in any shape. They did not want a General Superintendent in that county. They had two or three Surveyors and 12 or 15 other officials for the administration of the fund; and the farmers regarded with terror anything that was likely to increase the heavy burdens they had to bear. He should, therefore, oppose the Bill entirely; and he would strongly urge the Government to abandon it, and wait till they introduced their County Government Bill, which could provide properly for the superintendence of county roads.

MR. HIBBERT said, that no two Welsh Members seemed to have the same opinion upon this matter; but the noble Lord opposite had strongly pressed the President of the Local Government Board to deal with the question, and had reproached him for not having legislated on the matter, so that appointments might be made by the county authorities.

VISCOUNT EMLYN said, that what he had found fault with was the removal of the General Superintendent without some legislation being first adopted by which someone could be appointed in his place.

MR. HIBBERT said, his right hon. Friend had taken action with a view to appointing someone in the place of the General Superintendent. This Bill did not propose in any way to compel the Local Boards to appoint any officer, but only gave them power to do what they had asked to be able to do. Several hon. Members from Wales objected to the Bill as unnecessary, while the hon. Member for Glamorganshire (Mr. Hussey Vivian) was anxious to pass it; but his right hon. Friend was not so enamoured of the Bill that he cared to press it to-night, and was willing to adjourn the debate in order to give Welsh Members further time to consider the Bill. With respect to the point raised by the hon. Member for Herefordshire, as to what would be done in regard to any subvention for roads in South Wales, his right hon. Friend was not able to give any information upon that matter to-night, though, no doubt, hon. Members, not only from South Wales, but from other parts of Wales, would be glad to have some information. He therefore begged to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—
(Mr. Hibbert.)

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, it was hardly for him to oppose the adjournment, for he thought that was a wise course. The Government had withdrawn this payment, but he believed they had no power to dismiss the Superintendent; but they now hoped that the counties would re-appoint the Superintendent and pay him from their own resources. He had always held the opinion that the counties would not agree to anything of the kind, though, he believed, the counties had largely benefited by the uniform manner in which their roads had been dealt with. He appointed Mr. Codrington, and reduced the salary, although he believed that the salary of his predecessor was nearly double the amount mentioned by the hon. Member opposite. He thought it would be unwise to disturb South Wales until a proper system had been adopted in England. The House had learnt something from the Government to-night as to the mode in which they intended to assist the highway rates in England. It was not to be done by Act of Parliament; but he was afraid there would be a subvention. The late Government would not have dreamt of any subvention except from the surplus of the year; but the present Government proposed a new tax.

MR. DODSON said, it was true the right hon. Gentleman had appointed Mr. Codrington; but he gave him notice that the appointment was terminable, and was likely to be terminated.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH: By fresh legislation.

MR. HUSSEY VIVIAN said, the County Boards of South Wales were unanimously of opinion that it was absolutely necessary that this Bill should pass. The existing Turnpike Act turned on the existence of a General Superintendent; no payments could be legally made without such an officer. It was absolutely necessary they should have some Act analogous to this. He thought the Government had done wisely and justly in ceasing to appoint and pay this officer, for he knew of no ground why the taxpayers of England should be called upon to pay for the superintendence of the South Wales turnpike roads. He did not believe the Bill would entail any serious burden upon the county rates of South Wales. His hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr (Mr. C. James) had hinted that the County Roads Board was likely to make a job of the appointment; but he (Mr. Hussey Vivian) altogether scouted such an idea. The County Roads Board was conducted with the greatest possible economy. He had served on the Board for the last 30 years, and he could safely say that every effort was made to reduce, as far as possible, the working expenses. He did trust his right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board would press the present measure, and that they might receive the benefits of its provisions as soon as possible. He believed that every payment they were now making was illegal. He knew that very considerable doubt existed in the mind of his noble Friend (Viscount Emlyn) as to what happened from the day the Superintendent ceased to have any power; and, therefore, the House had a right to ask the Government to press forward this measure, in order to place the County Roads Board in a legal position. He was convinced that no serious charge would be entailed upon the counties of South Wales in respect to the measure.

Mr. W. Davies

MR. GORST said, he did not wish to follow the hon. Member (Mr. Hussey Vivian) in the discussion of the Bill; but desired to offer to the hon. Member, and the other hon. Members from Wales who were in favour of the passing of the Bill, his sincere sympathy with them at the disappointment of seeing the hope, which they must have entertained, frustrated by the obstructive Motion of an hon. Gentleman sitting below the Government Gangway. It was not often that the Government had succeeded in this Session of Parliament in getting a Bill in before half-past 12 o'clock, and it did seem hard that the fate of this measure now seemed imperilled. The Government themselves had pressed the third reading, and everything went on smoothly until the noble Lord the Member for Carmarthenshire (Viscount Emlyn) asked a question. First of all, the Government by that system of dogged silence which they had used on certain occasions tried to evade answering questions; and when they were obliged, by the observation of another hon. Gentleman (Mr. R. H. Paget) to answer the question, they immediately obstructed the Bill.

SIR HARDINGE GIFFARD said, that, although not a Member for Wales, he was the Chairman of the Quarter Sessions of Carmarthenshire; and he was therefore in a position to say that this was a matter of serious interest to the ratepayers of that county. He believed the action which had been taken by Her Majesty's Government through the President of the Local Government Board was entirely illegal; and why he was desirous of saying one word on the adjournment was this—that he hoped that before the Bill again came on for discussion, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Dodson) would take the opportunity of consulting the Law Officers of the Crown on the subject. The appointment of this officer was made under circumstances with which, as a matter of history, they were most of them familiar. It arose out of the Rebecca Riots; and Sir James Graham, in introducing the Bill, pointed out that an officer should be appointed and paid by the Government, and that it should be his duty to take care that the state of confusion in which South Wales had got, by reason of non-attendance to the repair of the roads, should in future be rendered impossible. In Sir James Graham's speech there was not a hint that the functions of that officer should cease with the cessation of the Government subvention. The Statute said that the officer might be dismissed, and another, or two, if necessary, be appointed in his room by the proper authority—it was then the Secretary of State, it was now the President of the Local Government Board. But in the Statute there was not the smallest hint of the right of the President of the Local Government Board to discontinue the office. The sting of the Bill was in its tail, and he confessed that it seemed to him that the sole object of the measure was to shift upon the ratepayers that responsibility which, in 1845, Sir James Graham said was to rest on the Government—namely, the payment of the officer in question. He hoped that when the Bill was again brought on for consideration, the President of the Local Government Board would be fortified with the opinions of the Law Officers of the Crown as to the Government action, which he (Sir Hardinge Giffard) considered illegal.

MR. DUCKHAM said, that £844 was the amount of money paid from the National Exchequer. On reference to the Estimates for the past and the present year, hon. Gentlemen would find that £350 was set down as the salary of the Superintendent; that another amount was allowed for the Superintendent's Clerk; another amount for Offices; and a further amount for travelling expenses, the total sum being what he had stated.

VISCOUNT EMLYN said, that, as the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board was unable to give them any information as to whether they would get any assistance towards the maintenance of main roads in general, he should, on Thursday, ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether it was his intention to extend to South Wales the same assistance towards the maintenance of main roads as he had announced he intended to extend to the Scotch main roads?

MR. WARTON said, if the noble Lord did put such a question to the Premier, the right hon. Gentleman would, no doubt, refer it to the President of the Local Government Board.

Question put, and agreed to.

Debate adjourned till Monday 15th May.

MILITIA STOREHOUSES BILL.

(Mr. Hastings, Sir Matthew Ridley.)

[BILL 116.] COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clauses 1 to 3, inclusive, agreed to.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT asked if the Government intended to take and pay for the remainder of the Militia Storehouses? There were many not yet taken over, and great inconvenience was resulting to the different counties.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, the Secretary of State for War would be the best person to answer such a question.

Bill reported, without Amendment; to be read the third time To-morrow.

Sir Hardinge Giffard

MOTIONS.

EDUCATIONAL ENDOWMENTS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. MUNDELLA: I beg to ask leave to introduce a Bill, which has been twice before the House, dealing with the re-organization of the Educational Endowments of Scotland. I shall not, at this late hour, detain the House more than two or three minutes in explaining the change which has taken place in the Bill. The necessity for the measure has been admitted on all hands, and it has not made progress solely on account of the pressure of Business during the last two Sessions; but within that period we have had the advantage of ascertaining the views of Members of this House, especially of Members from Scotland, and of the Public Bodies in Scotland, and we have so altered the measure, both in form and substance, that we hope to meet the circumstances of Scotland and the general wishes of the people of Scotland. The present state of the endowments in Scotland, in many respects, strikingly resembles that which existed in England in 1869. When the Commission reported in 1875, it was shown that there were endowments to the extent of £175,000 a-year which required dealing with. It is believed that they have since increased to £250,000 a-year, and in the City of Glasgow alone the dormant endowments amount to something like £500,000 sterling. Well, Sir, in their present state, many of these endowments are inoperative, many of them are useless, on account of being applied to obsolete purposes; some are too close and too restricted both as to aims and objects; and in the case of others the Governing Bodies are inconvenient. What we propose is not to change the class of beneficiaries, but to make the benefits more suitable and more adapted to the present day, to provide for a rise from elementary schools to technical schools and to Universities, to help the School Board to secure attendance by assisting the class above the pauper class in obtaining education, and, lastly, to help to complete the educational system of Scotland by maintaining that high standard of education which is required under Section 67 of the Scotch Act of 1872. The Bill is altered, as I have said, both in form and substance; and it is hoped that it will be more clear and better adapted for its purpose, and make the procedure more direct; and we have somewhat enlarged the scope of the Bill. We have attempted—and I hope we have succeeded in obtaining—a fair solution of the most disputed question—namely, that of the Governing Body. The Bill provides for maintaining popular representation, and gives that representation a preponderance where it already exists, admitting, at the same time, the elective element as in school boards. The Bill contains 45 clauses, and we can hardly hope to pass, during the present Session, a Bill of such dimensions unless we have the general help of Scotch Members. I trust that, in the shape in which we have placed the Bill before the House, it will commend itself to Scotch Members; that any Amendments which may be necessary will not be Amendments as to principle, but as to form and practice, and to which I hope we shall be in a position to give effect. I beg to ask leave to introduce the Bill.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to re-organise the Educational Endowments of Scotland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. MUNDELLA, The LORD ADVOCATE, and Mr. SOLICITOR GENERAL for SCOTLAND.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 147.]

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDERS (NO. 2) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. HIBBERT, Bill to confirm certain Provisional Orders of the Local Government Board relating to the City and Borough of Bath, the Local Government District of Brierley Hill, the Borough of Burton-upon-Trent, the Rural Sanitary District of the Keighley Union, the Boroughs of Margate, Newbury, and Preston, the Town of Ramsgate, the Borough of Saint Helens, and the Rural Sanitary District of the Settle Union, ordered to be brought in by Mr. HIBBERT and Mr. DODSON.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 145.]

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (GAS) PROVISIONAL ORDER BILL.

On Motion of Mr. HIBBERT, Bill to confirm a Provisional Order of the Local Government Board under the provisions of "The Gas and Water Works Facilities Act, 1870," and "The Public Health Act, 1875," relating to the Local Government District of Upper Sedgley, ordered to be brought in by Mr. HIBBERT and Mr. DODSON.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 144.]

COUNTY COURTS ACT (1867) AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. HENRY H. FOWLER, Bill to amend "The County Courts Act, 1867," ordered to be brought in by Mr. HENRY H. FOWLER, Mr. MONK, and Mr. REID.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 146.]

CIVIL IMPRISONMENT (SCOTLAND) BILL.

Ordered, That the Report of the Select Committee on "The Fraudulent Debtors (Scotland) Bill, 1880," with the Evidence, be referred to the Select Committee on the Civil Imprisonment (Scotland) Bill.

House adjourned at half after
One o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, 2nd May, 1882.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Commonable Rights* (73).

Second Reading—Elementary Education Provisional Orders Confirmation (Finchley, &c.)* (63); Payment of Wages in Public Houses Prohibition (41).

Committee — Report — Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders (Ballymena, &c.)* (57).

OXFORD AND CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITIES COMMISSION—LINCOLN COLLEGE (OXFORD) STATUTES.

OBSERVATIONS. QUESTION.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN said, he wished to ask the noble and learned Lord (the Lord Chancellor) a Question of which he had given him private Notice. The right rev. Prelate the Bishop of Lincoln had given Notice of his intention to move, on the 12th instant—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to withhold Her assent from a portion of the Statutes which have been laid upon the Table relating to Lincoln College, Oxford."

The Question he desired to ask was, Whether the 50th clause of the University Act of 1817 permitted a Member of Parliament to move the rejection has always shown in difficult times, he left at the option of Mr. Gladstone the particular moment at which that resignation should take place. My Lords, the noble Marquess stated yesterday—and, notwithstanding the omission in the Notice, he still thinks it important to know—what are the reasons for that resignation? I have some doubts whether it is a usual course, or whether there is any right on the part of a Member of this House to ask Her Majesty's Government what are the reasons why any one of their Members has left them. I cannot help remembering circumstances about four years ago, when Her Majesty's then Ministry found the attempt to give reasons why one of their Colleagues left their body was not a success. I certainly do not think it is my duty to give the reasons that have operated in this case; but, as I think my noble Friend (Earl Cowper) will not object, I will go so far as to say—and I think it will be satisfactory for the noble Marquess to know—that the resignation of my noble Friend was not founded on any difference as to the policy of Her Majesty's Government. My Lords, I have another announcement to make, which is one that is very painful indeed to me and to Her Majesty's Government; and as it is a fact of importance, I ought to bring it before your Lordships immediately. It is that Mr. Forster, the Chief Secretary for Ireland, has also resigned. With regard to the noble Earl the Lord President of the Council (Earl Spencer), I have to say that Her Majesty has been advised to appoint him as the Successor to my noble Friend (Earl Cowper). The noble Marquess to-day, as he did yesterday, found fault with the combination that has been made; and, yesterday, he asked whether it was the fact that the Lord Lieutenancy had been placed in commendam? I beg to say that that phrase, if it can be correctly applied at all in this case, does most certainly not apply to the Lord Lieutenancy, but rather to the Presidency of the Council. I trust that the Council will not suffer during the time that this arrangement will last, and that my noble Friend the Lord Privy Seal, whose Office the House, in common with myself, often thought is a great advantage to the Cabinet, will be enabled to assume the work of an Office which, although it has greatly increased of late years, is not the hardest work of the Departments of the Government. The noble Marquess asks what inference is to be drawn from this? The inference is a very simple one. I suppose that nobody will deny the very critical state of Ireland at this moment; and we thought it desirable that the person who should succeed to the post of the Lord Lieutenant should not only have personal qualities, but should be clothed with the greatest possible authority; and I know of no way in which that authority can be better sustained than by the appointment of a Cabinet Minister who has been intimately acquainted with the views of the Cabinet during the past two years, and is, therefore, best qualified to fill this most important Office. But the noble Marquess says that is an unprecedented combination—

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: The word I used was "incompatible." There was a precedent in 1708.

EARL GRANVILLE: Well, the other day I quoted a remark of Lord John Russell's, to the effect that if you could quote a precedent from the days of Queen Elizabeth it was a most invaluable resource. But I think, if it were necessary, I could quote a later precedent, when the Lord President of the Council occupied both positions, not provisionally, but for a considerable time. The noble Marquess asks me whether there is any fresh policy—I think he expressly used the word—intended on the part of Her Majesty's Government? My Lords, we have no fresh policy. We are acting entirely in harmony, as we believe, with the principles that have guided us up to this present time. We have certain administrative measures and certain legislative measures in our view. My Lords, it has been said that the Protection of Person and Property Bill has been a failure. That is not the opinion of Her Majesty's Government. We believe that in a very important crisis that Act has been of great use, especially in one particular—namely, in enabling the Government to counteract a most formidable agitation against rent. That Act will be in existence some months longer. But at the present time, and as now advised, it is not our intention to ask Parliament to renew the Act as it stands. At this moment the Government are carefully considering a measure designed for the purpose of strengthening the means of the administration of justice, and to protect the lives and property of private persons. As soon as the necessary Business in the House of Commons will permit, that measure will be introduced, and no other legislation except, perhaps, some of a financial character, will be allowed to come on before it is advanced or completed. My Lords, if the existence of secret societies, taken in connection with the number of those societies, shall create a necessity, we shall apply the provisions of the Protection of Person and Property Act to those societies, and we shall propose to renew the Act as far as those provisions are concerned; and also ask for such other powers as may be thought necessary for the occasion. One administrative measure which has been decided upon, but which has not been acted on, is of great importance. It was the very painful duty of Her Majesty's Government to imprison not only many persons of different classes, but also three Members of Parliament during a long time. They did it under a sense of grave responsibility. They believed it was necessary to do so, not as penal measure, but as a measure of protection, in order to secure the safety of the public at large, and the maintenance of order in Ireland. Acting under the same grave sense of responsibility, in the same way, and with exactly the same object in view, they have now come to the conclusion that the time has arrived when it is no longer desirable to keep these three Members in prison; and an examination of other cases will immediately take place, though not as regards those who have committed crimes. I may now, my Lords, advert to another point—with regard to legislation. Your Lordships are aware that the Land Act does not deal with the question of arrears, which is an important, although a provisional, question. Then there are also what are popularly known as the "Bright Clauses" of that Act. On both those subjects the Act will require revision, and with regard to them a detailed statement will be made in Parliament at an early date.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Against one, at least, of those three Gentlemen who are to be released—Mr. Parnell—there is a warrant that he is suspected of treasonable practices. I suppose that that statement Her Majesty's Government are prepared to withdraw, if they are going to release them? I also wish to ask whether the prisoner at Portland is to be released as well as the prisoners at Kilmainham?

Earl Granville

EARL GRANVILLE: I must trouble the noble Marquess to give me Notice of the Question.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: The noble Earl proffered the information as to the "suspects," and my Question is entirely germane to the information that he has given us.

EARL GRANVILLE: I beg the noble Marquess's pardon; he is under a mistake. It is quite distinct. The prisoner at Portland is not imprisoned under the same Act. In the one case persons are imprisoned under Act of Parliament, and in the other the prisoner is confined under ticket-of-leave.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: There is one Question which I wish to ask—namely, Whether or not the noble Earl is prepared to tell the House the reasons that have induced the resignation of Mr. Forster? If he is not prepared to go so far as that, whether he is prepared to reiterate the statement which he just now made in the case of my noble Friend opposite (Earl Cowper), that the resignation did not proceed from difference of opinion with his Colleagues?

EARL GRANVILLE: I certainly am not prepared to answer the noble Earl's Question, which seems to me to be a singularly unusual one. The right hon. Gentleman is in the House of Commons, and I have no doubt that the proper method will be taken to obtain Her Majesty's permission to give the reasons which prompted him to take the course he has done—painful to himself as well as to his associates.

VISCOUNT POWERSCOURT said, he should not wish to let this occasion pass without bearing tribute to the great tact and temper shown by his Excellency the Lord Lieutenant and the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary in a time of unparalleled anxiety and difficulty. He trusted that Her Majesty's Government would continue to pursue the course upon which they had entered, and that nothing would turn them from the path of the redressing of grievances and the conciliation of the Irish people.

[Subject dropped.]

PAYMENT OF WAGES IN PUBLIC HOUSES PROHIBITION BILL.(The Earl Stanhope.)

(NO. 41.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

EARL STANHOPE, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that a custom existed with many managers to pay their workmen their wages at a public-house, and the object of the Bill was to prohibit such a practice. He believed that such a proceeding was attended with very bad results, and that workmen were thereby induced to spend a considerable part of their wages as soon as they had earned them in treating their companions, or were morally bound to spend some portion of them for the "good of the house," as it was called. He had heard of instances of people being paid their wages and remaining in a drunken state all through Saturday night and all day Sunday in the licensed house; and of cases where the landlords had admitted that, after closing, they had found large sums of money, sometimes as much as £5, lying under the counter, which had been literally thrown away by people who had lost their reason through drink. The Select Committee on Intemperance, which considered the whole subject in 1878, had taken much evidence and made an elaborate Report. Though their Lordships' Committee had not made a special Report on this particular branch of the subject, he found the following paragraph in page 32 of their Report:—

"Almost all the witnesses concurred in expressing their belief that by far the greatest amount of drunkenness occurs on the evening of Saturday, that being the day on which wages are usually paid, and when the men, by leaving off work at an earlier hour, have more leisure and opportunity for indulging in drink."

When wages are paid in public-houses—as was so frequently the case—this fact was doubly true. The Mersey Dock Managers had in February last issued a circular against paying their stevedores in public-houses. Brickmakers were accustomed to pay their gangs in public-houses; and it had come to his knowledge that certain brickmakers in the neighbourhood of Portsmouth had obtained licences and opened houses for the purpose of paying their men in these public-houses, knowing that they would thus obtain back a considerable portion of their hard-earned wages. He proposed by the Bill that the payment of wages in a public-house should be prohibited by inflicting a penalty of £10 for each offence, and that all offences and penalties might be recovered by any person under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts. He trusted that the House would allow the Bill, which was a step in the right direction; to be read a second time, and that the Government would assist the passing of the measure in the House of Commons.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Earl Stanhope.)

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY said, the noble Earl (Earl Stanhope) seemed to be under the impression that Her Majesty's Government would be able to take charge of this Bill in the House of Commons; but he could not be aware of the state of things in that House, if he believed the Government were in a position to give disinterested and philanthropic assistance to Bills other than their own. Therefore, while he would not oppose the measure, he could not, on their behalf, undertake that they should assist in its progress through the other House. It must be obvious to him that the state of Public Business in that House was such that the Government had more than enough to do with their own measures, without taking upon themselves to assist Private Bills of that kind. His noble Relative had described the Bill as a step in the right direction. He (the Earl of Rosebery) was not quite sure that this was the case. He would have been glad if the time for Bills of that kind had passed away. It did seem strange that at a time when the power of combination was so well understood by the working classes, and had been in one or two directions exerted so successfully, a Bill of this nature should be needed. The considerations, however, which his noble Relative had brought forward could not fail to have weight, especially as the noble Earl had alluded, he believed, to the case of brickfields, which was a glaring instance of this practice. He confessed he would have been glad if the Bill had been preceded by some such full and careful inquiry as had preceded the Mines Regulation Act; but he considered the measure to be an undoubted improvement on the existing state of things, and for that reason, as representing the Home Office, he should not oppose the second reading.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, he warmly supported the Bill. He had himself carried the same provision in the Mines and Collieries Act, passed many years ago, and he could bear testimony to the good working of the Acts in force with regard to the payment of wages by the large mining and manufacturing bodies throughout the country. They paid wages in their own offices; but the smaller employers of labour did not, they paid the wages due at certain public-houses, and the men were unfortunately compelled to receive their wages there. Sometimes they were kept waiting so long for their money that the temptation to imbibe strong drinks became greater, and by the time the wages arrived they were all spent, and the poor men were left without any to take home for their wives and families. He knew himself that in the case of lightermen the men were told to go to a public-house to receive their wages at 6 o'clock on Saturday evening, and were kept waiting until, perhaps, midnight, spending in the meantime a large portion of their earnings. He did not think that their Lordships could confer a greater boon upon the working classes of the country than that which the Bill proposed to give them.

THE BISHOP OF CARLISLE, as a member of the Committee on Intemperance, thought that an apology was due for the omission of this subject from their Report; it had not been brought strongly under their notice. He believed, however, that the measure would be received with great satisfaction throughout the country.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY also supported the Bill, and said, that even if, as the noble Earl who represented the Home Office had said, that working men were indifferent to this Bill, that would not be the case with their wives, who would be grateful for it. He hoped that the noble Earl would re-consider what he had said about Government not being able to undertake to assist its progress. The noble Earl, in saying that Government could hardly get its own Bills passed, seemed to think that he was in "another place," and was making a speech in behalf of the clôture, which was of no use here.

The Earl of Rosebery

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^d accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday the 16th instant.

House adjourned at Five o'clock, to Thursday next, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 2nd May, 1882.

The House met at Two of the clock.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—First Reading—Sunday Closing (Ireland) * [148].
Second Reading—Gas Provisional Orders * [136]; Inclosure (Arkleside) Provisional Order * [128]; Inclosure (Bettws Dissarth) Provisional Order * [127]; Inclosure (Cefn Drawen) Provisional Order * [126]; Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Order * [138]; Water Provisional Orders * [135].
Committee—Municipal Corporations (re-comm) * [113]—R.P.; Distress Amendment [73]—R.P.; Metropolis Management and Building Acts Amendment [107]—R.P.
Third Reading—Militia Storehouses * [116]; Places of Worship Sites * [97], and passed.

QUESTIONS.

STATE OF IRELAND—DISTURBANCES IN BALLINTUBBER.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he can state what outrages or disturbance have taken place in the parish of Ballintubber, county Mayo, recently; whether it is true that the attempt on the life of Mr. C. Crotty was made some ten or twelve years ago; whether there has been any such subsequent attempt; whether Mr. Crotty was under police protection so far back as ten or twelve years ago, and had a police barrack built within a few yards of his house; and, whether such protection has ever been withdrawn; and, if so, what was the date of its renewal?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, I have telegraphed for information on this subject, and have not yet received a reply.

MR. HEALY: The right hon. Gentleman is aware that this Question arises out of a previous statement made by him.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—RELEASE OF PRISONERS UNDER THE ACT.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If there is any reason for the further detention of Mr. Edward Slevin, of Ballinrobe, county Mayo, who has been imprisoned for thirteen months under the Coercion Act; whether there is any reason for the further detention of Mr. Thomas Dunleavy, of Kilmovee, county Mayo, who has been imprisoned as a suspect since the 23rd of November 1881; whether he will consider the advisability of releasing Mr. Martin King, a suspect imprisoned in Enniskillen, or give him an opportunity, according to the ordinary process of Law, of meeting the charge alleged against him; whether the time has not come when Mr. John McCarthy, of Loughrea, who has been detained for more than eight months as a suspect, may be released; whether Mr. Edward Connor, of Ballymore, county Roscommon, who has been detained for the past five months as a suspect in Galway Prison, may now be released; whether he will give the House a statement of the dimensions of the cell which Mr. Connor has been forced to occupy during that time; and, whether the cell is so small and dark as to have injuriously affected Mr. Connor's sight?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: The hon. Member asks me Questions as to several prisoners, and I have to say that their cases have all been considered, but up to the present time I have not been able to recommend to his Excellency the release of any of them. With respect to Mr. Connor, of Ballymore, Roscommon, I have made inquiries, and find that he occupies a cell in Galway Prison measuring 17 feet long by 8 feet wide. The medical officer certifies that he can find nothing wrong with Mr. Connor's eyes, and that, if his sight is defective, it must have been so before his admission to the prison.

MINES (COAL) REGULATION ACT, 1872—ABRAM COLLIERY EXPLOSION.

MR. BURT asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been called to the verdict of the coroner's jury in the Abram Colliery explosion, and to the report of Mr. Young, who represented the Home Office at the inquiry; whether he has noticed that Mr. Young complains of the unsatisfactory nature of some of the special rules at the Colliery, and makes the following statement:—

"Having heard the whole evidence, I feel bound to state that, in my opinion, a similar explosion may occur at any time, and will occur almost certainly if another outburst of gas takes place when the men are at work. I quite concur with the jury as to the unsatisfactory character of the regulations at the Colliery in question with regard to the lamps generally, and especially to the re-lighting of lamps which have been accidentally extinguished;"

and, whether, considering the fiery nature of the seams in the locality, he has instructed, or, if not, he will instruct the inspector of mines for the district to urge that the Mines Regulation Act be strictly enforced, and that every possible precaution be taken to insure the safe working of the Colliery?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, that he had seen Mr. Young's Report, and that instructions such as those suggested in the hon. Member's Question would be sent to the District Inspector of Mines.

PRISONS (IRELAND)—THE GOVERNOR OF LIMERICK PRISON.

MR. O'SULLIVAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether there have been numerous complaints made from time to time against Mr. Egan, the governor of the County Limerick Prison, regarding the treatment of untried prisoners under his charge; whether he has been reprimanded on more than one occasion by the prison authorities; and, whether His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant will continue this officer in so responsible a position?

MR. W. E. FORSTER asked to have the Question postponed till Thursday, as he had not yet received an answer to his inquiries on the subject.

MR. HEALY: Would the right hon. Gentleman have any objection to publish as a Parliamentary Paper the result of the inquiry in the same way as the letter of Captain Barlow has been published?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I must ask the hon. Gentleman to give Notice of the Question.

is confident that they were not intended to do so, the use of firearms without reasonable apprehension of imminent danger to the person under protection; and, his Excellency adds, should such use of firearms result in killing any person, no assumption of responsibility on the part of the County Inspector can confer any immunity on the constable who so uses his weapon. You will, therefore, withdraw the instructions, and admonish County Inspector Smith to use greater care in future."

I may add that it is not correct to speak of these instructions as a Circular at all. These instructions were private and confidential instructions sent to the Sub-Inspector, and no similar instructions were issued in any other county. The County Inspector of Limerick had, indeed, issued instructions to the Sub-Inspectors to take care and give full protection to Mr. Clifford Lloyd; but, at the same time, they were not to make any unnecessary display in doing so.

MR. SEXTON: I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman, Does the Government intend to retain County Inspector Smith in office in the county where these private and confidential instructions were issued?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: We do not consider that it is necessary to remove him in consequence of these instructions.

MR. HEALY: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that since County Inspector Smith received the reprimand he has gone about the district bragging that he does not care one pin about it or the House of Commons?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I do not believe that statement.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member has not put a Question to the right hon. Gentleman, but has made a statement which is quite irregular.

MR. REDMOND wished to know how it happened that Inspector Smith's instructions were issued without the knowledge of the Inspector General?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that, undoubtedly, County Inspector Smith made a mistake in that matter. He was not now justifying the terms of these instructions; but it was not an unnatural mistake that he made, because instructions were sent to him, and also to the County Inspector in Limerick, to issue to their Sub-Inspectors a particular caution with regard to Mr. Clifford Lloyd, and he (Mr. W. E. Forster) had no doubt that County Inspector Smith thought he was merely carrying them out, and that, therefore, it was not necessary for him to send the particular wording to the Inspector General. He was not aware of other cases with regard to the Constabulary in which a similar mistake had been made.

MR. SEXTON said, he must, under all the circumstances, give Notice of his intention to submit a Motion calling for the removal of County Inspector Smith.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—THE MAGISTRACY—SUMMARY JURISDICTION.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware that it is now becoming a common practice with some magistrates in Ireland to exercise summary jurisdiction, and sentence persons to imprisonment either immediately after arrest upon a warrant, or arrest without a warrant, although the Law in these cases as laid down in the Petty Sessions Act, 14 and 15 Vic. c. 93, s. 11, provides that—

"In all cases of summary jurisdiction the justices shall issue a summons requiring the defendant to appear and answer the complaint;"

whether it is also becoming the practice of some magistrates to refuse applications by the defendant for adjournment to allow them to prepare defence, obtain legal assistance, and subpoena witnesses, although the Petty Sessions Act provides (c. 93, s. 9, Clause 1) that the defendant shall have the right to have witnesses examined or cross-examined by counsel or attorney, and (s. 3), that the summons should be served a reasonable time before the hearing of the complaint (ten days or a fortnight being the usual time); and, whether the Government will take any steps to point out to Irish magistrates the duty of complying with the Law?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON), in reply, said, that neither he nor his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant was aware of the existence of any such practices as the hon. Member referred to in his Question. He would, however, make inquiries if the hon. Member would specify any instances of this sort of practices, or would communicate with him privately.

CRIME (IRELAND) — ARSON.

Mr. SIDNEY HERBERT asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If his attention has been called to the following statement in the "Times" of the 1st instant:—

"The sub-offices and haggard of Jeremiah Doherty, a tenant on the estate of Mr. N. Buckley, near Mitchelstown, were destroyed by fire a few nights ago. Seven young pigs were lost in the flames, and a brood mare was rescued with difficulty. Doherty was suspected of having paid his rent. Three years' rent is reported to be due by some of the tenants on the property."

and, whether any person or persons have been arrested for this crime?

Mr. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that he had no information as to the statement referred to by the hon. Gentleman.

PEACE PRESERVATION (IRELAND) ACT, 1891—CO. KERRY—SEARCH FOR ARMS.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he has received any information corroborating the statement which appeared in the Irish Correspondence of the "Times" of the 1st instant, viz., that—

"A daring raid for arms is reported from Kerry. The house of Samuel Morgan, steward of Mr. Mahony, of Dromore, was entered in broad daylight by a party of disguised men during the absence of the family at church, and two guns were carried away. Three men named Sullivan, Shea, and Laveny have been arrested;"

and, in the event of these men being returned for trial to the next assizes, if he will consider, whether, in the present state of the Country, there can be a satisfactory trial?

Mr. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he must appeal to hon. Members not to put down Questions immediately after reading statements in newspapers and before it was possible for the authorities to make the necessary inquiries. It was true, however, that there had been a raid for arms in County Kerry. One man had been arrested and discharged, and another, who was suspected of being concerned in the crime, was believed to have escaped to America.

The Attorney General for Ireland

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACTS—FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE.

Mr. BLENNERHASSETT (for Mr. JAMES HOWARD) asked the Vice President of the Council, What is the present condition of the Country in respect of cattle disease; and, whether the Department can suggest any means for stamping out foot and mouth disease as effectually as has been the case in Ireland?

Mr. CHAPLIN asked whether it was not a fact that foot-and-mouth disease was stamped out by the late Administration, and that the country was free from the disease for nine months, until it was imported by the admission of cargoes of diseased animals from abroad?

Mr. MUNDELLA: It would be much more convenient that Notice should be given by the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire. I saw it stated that the hon. Member said that immediately the Liberal Government came into Office they spread foot-and-mouth disease over the country.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I beg the right hon. Gentleman's pardon. I should be obliged if the right hon. Gentleman would inform me where he saw that statement? What I did say was that, unfortunately, with the Liberal Government foot-and-mouth disease re-appeared in the country.

Mr. MUNDELLA: Sir, I think I shall have no difficulty in supplying the hon. Gentleman with the extract in question. I read it in a Lincolnshire paper during the Elections. It is true that the country was free from foot-and-mouth disease for nine months; but I hope the hon. Gentleman does not imply that we imported the disease any more than our Predecessors, because we were able to take greater precautions, as we had the benefit of our Predecessors' experience. I think I am justified in stating that, in the opinion of the best authorities, the live stock of the country is freer from disease than it has been for many years past. Of course, every outbreak, even if a single animal is attacked, is reported, and appears in the Gazette, and although this information is most valuable, it gives the impression that disease is more prevalent than is really the case. We have no suggestions to offer, except that the local authorities should carry out the provisions of the Act with vigilance and promptitude, for, wherever this has been done, the result has been most encouraging. It is difficult to answer the Question of my hon. Friend, except at some length; but I will do so as briefly as possible. The condition of the country with regard to cattle disease is, on the whole, very satisfactory. During the past three years pleuro-pneumonia has steadily declined. There has been no outbreak of the more serious diseases of rinderpest or sheep-pox. During the last year swine fever has been prevalent in certain districts; and although the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease which commenced in October, 1880, continues to give some trouble, the regulations in force have checked it in a remarkable manner. In 1881, as compared with the last serious outbreak which took place in 1871—the last year for which we have any complete Returns previous to the passing of the Act of 1878—the outbreaks in 1871 were 52,164, and the number of animals attacked was 691,565. In 1881 the outbreaks were 4,833, and the number of animals attacked 183,046. The results, comparing the first three months of this year with last year, are still more satisfactory. The comparison between the Returns of the undermentioned diseases during the first 13 weeks of 1881 and those of 1882 is as follows:—

Pleuro-pneumonia.—Outbreaks in 1881, 223; in 1882, 136. Animals attacked in 1881, 495; in 1882, 326.

Foot-and-mouth disease.—Outbreaks in 1881, 1,812; in 1882, 339. Animals attacked in 1881, 105,389; in 1882, 8,136. Died in 1881, 1,781; in 1882, 91. The outbreaks of foot-and-mouth disease in 1871 were 52,164; the animals attacked, 691,565. In 1881 the outbreaks were 4,833, and the animals attacked 183,046. As to pleuro-pneumonia, the outbreaks in 1877 were 2,007, and animals attacked 5,330; in 1878—outbreaks, 1,721; animals attacked, 4,593; in 1879—outbreaks, 1,549; animals attacked, 4,414; in 1880—outbreaks, 1,052; animals attacked, 2,765; in 1881—outbreaks, 729; animals attacked, 1,875. Pleuro-pneumonia has steadily declined since the passing of the Act. With respect to Ireland, the last outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease never reached that country. In Scotland only two outbreaks have taken place; and, owing to the vigorous way of dealing with them by the local authorities, in one case the animals being bought up and slaughtered, the disease has not spread.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—ARRESTS UNDER THE ACT.

MR. GIBSON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he would inform the House how many persons were arrested since the 1st April last under “The Protection of Person and Property (Ireland) Act, 1881,” for intimidation and inciting others wrongfully and without legal authority to intimidate certain persons; how many persons previously arrested for the aforesaid offences had their cases reconsidered on the expiration of the statutory period of three months during the month of April last; and, in how many of such cases did the Government, as the result of such reconsideration, decide that the said persons should still be detained in custody?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that 17 persons had been arrested since the 1st April under the Protection of Person and Property Act. The right hon. and learned Gentleman having asked him on private Notice to state how many were released each week since that time—for the week ending 10th April the number was 39; for the 17th April, 37; the 24th April, 23; and 30th April, 44. He could not answer the two latter paragraphs of the Question on the Paper.

MR. GIBSON: Could the right hon. Gentleman give the approximate number?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I really could not give an answer to-day.

MR. GIBSON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the following Report, in the “Saint James’ Gazette” of May 1st:—

“A riot occurred on Saturday, at Frankfort, King’s County. A number of persons, who were reported to have paid their rents, were attacked and beaten in a fearful manner. The police succeeded in arresting thirty men. The public houses were closed by order of the resident magistrate, and the streets were cleared at the point of the bayonet;”

whether the above occurrences took place; and, whether any of the persons reported to have been beaten were seriously injured?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I find there is no truth whatever in this report.

LORD ARTHUR HILL asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether any information has reached him to the effect that—

“A large rick of hay, the property of a bailiff named Hayes, residing near Kilmorna, in the county of Limerick, has been totally destroyed by fire;”

and, whether any one has been made amenable for this outrage?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that no information had been received at the Constabulary Office as to any persons being made amenable for this offence. He believed a rick of hay was burned.

IRELAND—IRISH POLICY OF THE GOVERNMENT—ALLEGED NEGOTIATIONS.

COLONEL WALROND asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If his attention has been called to the following paragraph, which appeared in the “Times” of May 1st:—

“There is a growing opinion that a treaty of peace has been arrived at, and the fact that a gentleman was allowed the unusual privilege of paying two visits to Kilmainham yesterday has strengthened the belief that some diplomatic negotiations have been going on between the heads of the rival Governments, the one within and the other without the prison walls;”

and, whether it is a fact that a gentleman was allowed such an exceptional privilege; and, if so, who was he?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he was not aware that any gentleman was allowed to pay two visits; but it was true that a gentleman was allowed to pay a visit exceptionally a day or two ago. That Gentleman was the hon. Member for the county of Clare (Mr. O’Shea), and he had an opportunity of seeing Mr. Parnell.

REVENUE AND EXPENDITURE—THE FINANCE ACCOUNTS.

MR. W. J. CORBET asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, If he will this year cause the Finance Accounts to be laid before Parliament on or before the 30th June, in accordance with the provisions of the Act of Parliament, 17 and 18 Vic. c. 94?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: Sir, it has been found impracticable to complete the numerous accounts which make up the volume of the Finance Accounts by the 30th of June; and I can only undertake that they shall be presented as soon as we can complete them and satisfy ourselves that they are correctly rendered and accurately printed.

Lord Arthur Hill

CRIME (IRELAND) — ALLEGED OUTRAGES—COUNTY LIMERICK.

MR. TOTTENHAM asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is correct, as stated in the “Times” of the 1st instant—

“On Friday night the house of a bailiff named Thompson, living at Oula, county Limerick, was attacked by a party of men, who fired three shots, and posted threatening notices on the door;”

and, if any one is in custody on suspicion of having committed the offence?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, I am informed by the Inspector General that no information has been received of this alleged outrage. I must again say that it would be very convenient if hon. Members would wait a day or two before they ask Questions about what appears in the newspapers.

MR. TOTTENHAM asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the report which appeared in the Dublin Press of Saturday last is correct, to the effect that—

“Late on Thursday night a party of men disguised visited the farmstead of Michael Harney, at Belnamullia, near Athlone, county Roscommon, and set fire to his house, the occupants at the time being in bed. Some passers by aroused the inmates, and, having procured help, succeeded in extinguishing the fire before any material injury was done. Harney had paid his rent;”

and, whether the Government have reason to believe that the fact that Harney had paid his rent, as is stated in the report, was the cause of the outrage? Also, Whether it is true, as stated in the telegraphic news of the 1st instant, that another murder was perpetrated in the county of Cork, on the night of the 30th April, the victim being a man named John Keefe, and whether any arrests have been made in connection therewith; whether it is also true that the house of a farmer named Martin, near Limerick, was attacked on the same night by a party of Moonlighters, who were driven off by those in the house; whether any of the assailants were injured by the defenders; and, whether any arrests have been made?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I believe it is a fact that Michael Harney’s house had been set on fire, but I am not yet in possession of the particulars. It is also a fact that a man named John Keefe has been murdered in County Cork. Two men have been arrested—his brother and nephew.

LAW AND POLICE—THE SALVATION ARMY.

MR. CAINE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, if he is aware that, on Sunday April 23rd, four members of the Salvation Army, men of admittedly good character, were sentenced to one month's imprisonment with hard labour for an assault on the police, who attempted to prevent their forming a procession in the streets of Whitechurch; if he is aware that the chairman of the Petty Sessions, who passed this severe sentence, admitted in Court that there was no attempt on the part of the inspector bringing the prosecution, to say that "the assault or the attempted rescue were deliberately carried out," and that "the assault was only a technical one, sufficient for the police to proceed upon," and "that all the Court had to dispose of was simply a point of Law;" if he is aware that the Bench refused to state a case, telling the prisoners' counsel to proceed by the cumbersome and antiquated method of writ of habeas corpus; if he is aware that Lord Coleridge and Mr. Justice Grove, in the Court of Queen's Bench on Monday, granted a rule to compel the magistrates to show cause why they should not state a case for the opinion of this Court. Lord Coleridge stating, in giving his decision—

"That hard labour was ignominious, that the defendants might be religious enthusiasts, but such sentences were not to be tolerated for one moment;"

and, if, in view of so strong a condemnation of the sentence by a Superior Court, he will at once order the release of the prisoners on their own recognizances pending the settlement of the case by appeal?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he was happy to think that the sentence passed by the magistrates was now under review by the Lord Chief Justice. He agreed very much, if he might be allowed to say so, with both of the opinions expressed by the Lord Chief Justice—that, first of all, a person was not to be excused by religious enthusiasm for breaking the peace, and also that the sentence of imprisonment, with a month's hard labour, was singularly inappropriate for an offence of this description.

His hon. Friend would see that the case being now in possession of a Court of Law, it was not for him to interfere in any way until the decision, which would be given on Friday, should be pronounced. Meanwhile, acting in accordance with the view of the Lord Chief Justice, he had given directions that, until the case was decided, the prisoners should be treated with the greatest possible leniency during their confinement.

PRISONS (ENGLAND)—TOTHILL FIELDS PRISON.

MR. BROADHURST asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to an article in the May number of the "Herald of Health," giving a description of the condition of prison life in the Tothill Fields Prison for women, in which very grave charges are made as to the insufficiency of clean linen, both in respect to wearing apparel and bedding, also the bad light and bad ventilation of the cells and to the want of more sanitary conveniences and to the occasional bad condition of those at present provided; and, whether he will cause inquiries to be made into the truth or otherwise of the charges in question; and, if they are found to be true, whether he will order the prison authorities to make better arrangements for the cleanliness of the inmates of that prison?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, he had caused inquiries to be made into the case, and the reports of the Medical Officer and the Lady Superintendent satisfied him that the charges were not well founded.

SOUTH AFRICA—CETEWAYO, EX-KING OF ZULULAND—VISIT TO THIS COUNTRY.

MR. ONSLOW asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he can now state to the House what is the object of, and what are the arrangements made for, the visit of Cetewayo to this Country; what is the estimated cost of the visit; whether any provision has been made for the accompaniment of his wives; and, if so, for how many; whether any opportunity will be given to the House for the discussion of the propriety of this visit, which is to be paid for by the taxpayers of this Country, before Cetewayo leaves the Cape; what is proposed to be done with him when he arrives in England; and, what his social position will be?

MR. COURTNEY rose to answer the Question—

MR. ONSLOW: I rise to a point of Order. I intentionally asked the Question of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as it involves a matter of finance.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GLADSTONE): Sir, the Question involves a great amount of detail entirely connected with the Colonial Office, and though I am very loth indeed to take objection to any Question being put to myself, yet at times the pressure of the Offices I hold makes it impossible for me to enter into these details in such a manner as to give full satisfaction. I must therefore ask my hon. Friend the Under Secretary for the Colonies to reply.

MR. COURTNEY, in reply, said, he thought the hon. Member would see that the financial part of the Question was a very small one. As to the object of Cetewayo's visit, the answer was that his health had been seriously undermined. [Laughter.] Hon. Members might laugh; but that was what they were informed by their responsible agents at the Cape—that his health had been seriously undermined by his detention; and it was thought reasonable to accede to his wish to visit this country—a wish that was recommended and endorsed by those who were responsible to the Government in the administration of the Cape. It was also believed that the visit would facilitate the solution of the question of Cetewayo's ultimate destination. As to the arrangements made, it was proposed that he should be accompanied by Mr. Shepstone and an interpreter. He also desired to bring with him three Zulu Chiefs and three attendants. The estimated cost of the visit was from £1,300 to £1,500. He did not desire to bring any wives with him. The hon. Gentleman was no doubt aware that the cost of the detention of Cetewayo at present fell upon this country, and therefore it was only a question of the difference of expense to be added; and that was not thought to be a matter of very great importance requiring a distinct discussion in that House. Then, as to what was to be done with him when he arrived in England, it was proposed to place him in quiet lodgings, probably with some gentleman acquainted with Zulu affairs; and great care would be taken to secure him from the intrusion of persons actuated by mere curiosity. He did not think it was necessary to answer the Question as to the social status of Cetewayo, which would not be affected.

LANDLORD AND TENANT (IRELAND) —THE EARL OF KENMARE'S ESTATE.

MR. SEXTON asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is the fact that the Earl of Kenmare, has caused to be served upon two of his tenants, Michael Leahy and William Herlihy, writs of summons from the Superior Courts in Dublin (involving heavy costs), in respect of a half-year's rent due in November 1881, and, according to custom, only payable last month; whether the tenants of Lord Kenmare, in the month of November last, served originating notices in the Land Court, and whether his Lordship, having retaliated in the course of the following week by serving writs upon a number of them, the two tenants above referred to, Michael Leahy and William Herlihy, in order to avoid costs, immediately went in and paid their half-year's rent, and whether a sum of £2 10s. was deducted from each of them for costs of writs which had never been served upon them, and this sum of £2 10s. is now charged in each case as an arrear of rent in the writs served a few days since; whether it is the fact that although these two tenants, and many other tenants of Lord Kenmare served originating notices so long ago as November, and although the Sub-Commission for the district have held two sittings in Killarney, not one of the many cases on the Kenmare Estate has been heard, or listed for hearing, and what is the explanation of this fact; and, whether he is prepared to say that he will take any steps to prevent poor tenants, unable to pay rents, from suffering the sale of their interest, and incur the loss of the rights conferred upon them by the Land Act before the Court can deal with their applications?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, the only part of the Question with respect to which he had any right to obtain information was that relating to the proceedings of the Sub-Commission. Two tenants on Lord Kenmare's estate served originating notices on the 13th and 29th October respectively, and the cases were sent for hearing to the first sitting of the Sub-Commission in Kilarney in December last. No other application was received from any of Lord Kenmare's tenants till the 11th November. In the meantime 940 applications were received from Kerry, and they, of course, took precedence of the case of Lord Kenmare's tenants. In regard of the two cases held in December, one was dismissed, and in the other the rent was upheld.

Mr. Onslow

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE asked what Business would be proceeded with on Thursday?

MR. GLADSTONE said, they should proceed with the Procedure Resolutions on Thursday. The financial measure would not be taken.

IRELAND — IRISH POLITICAL PRISONERS—SIR JOHN HAY'S MOTION.

COLONEL NOLAN wished to know whether the Motion of the right hon. and gallant Baronet (Sir John Hay), which was to the following effect:—

“That the detention of large numbers of Her Majesty's subjects in solitary confinement, without cause assigned, and without trial, is repugnant to the spirit of the Constitution, and that, to enable them to be brought to trial, jury trials should, for a limited time (in Ireland), and in regard to crimes of a well-defined character, be replaced by some form of trial less liable to abuse,”

did not contain two distinct propositions; and, if so, whether they should not be put separately to the House?

MR. SPEAKER: It appears to me that the Motion of the right hon. and gallant Baronet is consistent on the whole; and if he proposes that Resolution to the House, I shall think it my duty so to put it to the House.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MR. P. L. WHITE.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, in consideration that Mr. P. L. White, now a suspect in Armagh Gaol, has ten of a family, his wife being an inmate of the County Infirmary of Mayo, he will grant his release?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, this case had been recently considered, but it was decided that Mr. White could not be released.

POST OFFICE—THE AMERICAN MAILS.

MR. HEALY asked the Postmaster General, Whether arrangements can be made by which the American mails may be sent by the fastest steamers leaving Liverpool; and, whether it is the fact that the “Batavia,” a Cunard steamer, which carried the mails from Liverpool, on a recent occasion, was distanced by three days by the “Alaska,” of the Guion Line, which had no mails on board, but which left Liverpool on the same day as the “Batavia?”

MR. FAWCETT: Sir, presuming that the hon. Member refers to the voyage of the Cunard packet Batavia which left Liverpool on the 8th of April, and called at Queenstown on the following day for the mails, I find that she made a rather long voyage as compared with that of the Alaska. The Post Office has an agreement with the Cunard, Inman, and White Star Companies to carry the mails to New York on regular days of the week, and on the whole the service is satisfactorily performed. The average voyages on two of these lines are superior to those of the Guion, and on the third are about equal. Independently of these mail packets, the public have the option of sending any letters they wish by the Guion or any other vessels; and, in point of fact, a ship letter mail was forwarded by the Alaska, containing letters specially addressed to be forwarded by that ship.

MOTION.

—o:0:—

PARLIAMENT—WIGAN NEW WRIT. RESOLUTION.

MR. LEWIS, in rising to move—

“That Mr. Speaker do issue his Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to make out a new Writ for the election of a Member to serve in this present Parliament for the Borough of Wigan, in the room of Francis Sharp Powell, esquire, whose election has been declared to be void,” said, that, in the absence of any information from the Attorney General as to his being willing to assent to this Motion, he assumed that it would be opposed by the Government; and, therefore, he should give as shortly as he could the reasons upon which he moved it. Before he did so it would be advisable for him to refer to an Amendment on the Paper by the hon. Member for Cheltenham (Baron De Ferrieres)—

“That no Writ be issued to fill up any vacancy occasioned by corrupt practices until this House has disposed of the Corrupt Practices (Disfranchisement) Bill.”

He did not understand what connection there was between the Motion and the Amendment. If the hon. Member looked at the Disfranchisement Bill, he would find that it dealt with particular constituencies, of which Wigan was not one. There was no direct or collateral result of that Bill which could in any way affect Wigan, and, therefore, the Amendment was clearly beside the question. The Motion he presented to the House contained a question of Constitutional importance. What he suggested was founded upon precedent. It was considered a matter of great importance that no constituency entitled to return Members to that House should be prevented from exercising that Constitutional right except in due course of law. What was the case in reference to Wigan? A year ago, when the Election Petition was tried, it resulted in the Member being unseated, and the Judges reported that there was reason to believe that corrupt practices extensively prevailed. In the expiring days of last Session the Attorney General moved for the issue of a Commission to inquire into the corrupt practices at Wigan; but the House decided that the Commission should not issue. Nothing further was done until the present Session, and on being questioned on the subject the Attorney General intimated that the Government had no intention whatever to repeat the Motion to issue a Commission. He had no doubt a great many Members would agree that the Government exercised a wise discretion upon that subject. He had no intention to detain the House at any length with regard to the Report of the Election Judges; but he ventured to say that if anyone looked at the evidence they would see that very few pounds indeed were proved to have been corruptly spent. If they turned to the decision itself, they found that the decision had been made upon the payment of five sums of 10s. each, under circumstances which made the sitting Member responsible for the acts of his agents. He admitted that there was some evidence given of considerable treating, which had an effect upon the minds of the Judges; but, as a matter of arithmetical calculation, it would be found that a very small sum indeed was involved in the alleged corrupt practices upon which the Judges proceeded. But had the House ever exercised indirectly that punishment for the iniquities of constituencies which it had the power to punish directly after a Report had been made by Election Judges? He had precedents which were of considerable value. In 1874 the then sitting Member for Wakefield was unseated, and there was a specific case of bribery reported against the constituency; but in consequence of there being no statement of general corrupt practices prevailing the House did not think fit to stop the issue of the Writ. In the Stroud Election case it was reported that corrupt practices extensively prevailed. In those circumstances, the Motion for a new Writ came before the House in the month of May. On that occasion he (Mr. Lewis) drew attention to the Report of the Judges, and it was then objected by the present Attorney General himself that, there being no opportunity of issuing a Commission and no occasion for issuing a Commission legally, there was no reason to retain the Writ, and the constituency had a right to have the Writ issued. The hon. and learned Attorney General, on that occasion, resisted the Motion that he (Mr. Lewis) made, and he did so on the ground that as no step was taken by the House for a Commission, it was improper and useless to suspend the Writ, and that the constituency had a right to it. Was not the present a much stronger case? The case they now had was this—that the House had deliberately decided that it would not issue a Commission, and following upon that the Government had decided they would not ask the House to re-consider the election. Then how did they stand? Why, in the words of the Attorney General in the Stroud case, it was not possible to take any further steps. What steps did the hon. and learned Attorney General mean to take? After all the action of the House and the action of the Government, an Address to the Crown could not now be moved. He did not understand such a step to be intended.

Mr. Lewis

The House remained face to face with this—it did not please Her Majesty's Government to issue a Writ. Why not? In the existing state of the House a matter of this kind was of no great importance; but they must consider the rights of the constituencies. There were great matters daily and almost hourly coming before the House, and the constituency of Wigan had as clear a right to representation, whether the Representative belonged to the majority or the minority, as any other constituency represented in the House. What would be the effect if this were to be carried on? It would be in the power of the Government to suspend the rights of many a constituency. Let them see how the matter stood. Last Session the subject came before the House, and the Resolution which was proposed by the Attorney General was rejected, not by a Party majority. He would read what was said by the hon. Member for Bolton (Mr. J. K. Cross). That hon. Member said—

“I must say that in the sense of Southern corruption, the borough of Wigan is perfectly pure. I live within seven miles of the place, and I know it perfectly well. The people are rough and ready, and a great many of them are colliers, who are certainly a dog-running, pigeon-flying, cock-fighting, Church-and-King lot, who always vote Tory.”—[3 Hansard, cclxv. 508]

Well, no doubt, in the mind of the hon. and learned Attorney General, that was the chief fault—that they were a dog-fighting, pigeon-flying, Church-and-King-loving lot. What he asked the House to consider was what grounds were presented for depriving the constituency of Wigan of the right to be represented by two Members in the House. He supposed they would draw from the Attorney General whether he had made up his mind on the subject of an Address to the Crown for a Commission. Most likely he had not changed his mind, and the House had not changed its mind. That being so, the House had no proper function to discharge in connection with the suspension of the Writ. He quite admitted that before the Corrupt Practices Act was passed, when it became competent to the Crown to issue a Commission, it was customary for the House to exercise a kind of peremptory action on the constituency by suspending the Writ; but he challenged the hon. and learned Attorney General to find a single case since the Corrupt Practices

Act where a Commission was refused analogous to the case before the House. He would have to go back to a time before the Corrupt Practices Act, when there was no power to inquire into the condition or conduct of a constituency to find a case where the House had refused to issue a Writ. When the Corrupt Practices Act was passed, the right of a constituency was not placed at the caprice of a Party. It was taken out of the hands of the House, and remitted in the first instance to an authorized tribunal. He would ask the hon. and learned Attorney General where was his precedent since the Corrupt Practices Act was passed, after a Commission had been refused for a detention of a Writ for over 12 months, as in this case? He asked him, further, how was it possible for him to escape from the precedent he himself set in the Stroud case, where the House refused to suspend the Writ for three or four days even for the evidence to be placed on the Table? The Attorney General then said it was perfectly useless, and that no further step should be taken; and, therefore, they ought not to do any indirect injustice to the constituency, and he would be no party to it. The Attorney General by his own act, and the House by its own act, had renounced the intention of issuing a Commission, and they had now only the will of the Government and the will of the Attorney General, who thought, probably, that Wigan had not been punished enough. No doubt that was his opinion; probably many others might think it was so. This case was a miserable case. Learned Judges could make mistakes, and they did so in the case of Knaresborough. The Judges in that case made a grievous mistake, for there was not the smallest ground for the slur on the constituency contained in their Report; and, therefore, it was allowed to go scot-free. He would appeal to independent Members opposite, and ask them if they were going to vote against this Writ because it might produce an increase in the Party minority of one? He did not know how the result might be; but this he would say, that there existed the gravest reason why Members of the House should not vote in a Party sense in a matter like this. He thought Election Petitions were given up in order to extract altogether from the domain of opinion the action of the House in election matters; but now he supposed they were going to be appealed to by the Attorney General to punish this borough. If that was the appeal he made, that 12 months' privation was not sufficient, he (Mr. Lewis) would ask the House to consider what was the nature of the case provided. He challenged the Attorney General to show that there was anything more than a few pounds proved to have been received. When the House was asked to issue a Commission, there was a majority against it. If it was said that the House exceeded its right last year, he was unable to understand how it was the Act of Parliament did not call upon the Attorney General to do, as an Executive Officer, a particular thing outside the Office, but required that he should appeal to the deliberate action of the House as to whether it should or should not appoint a Commission. He contended that the action of the House was more Judicial than Ministerial. There must be something meant in the deliberate action of the House of Lords and House of Commons being called into operation under the Statute. If that was not so, the hon. and learned Attorney General was placed in this difficulty, that the House of Commons had refused to do that which by law it ought to have done. If that were so, surely the power of the Attorney General was sufficient to point out to the House what it should do now. Whatever the case might be in reference to that, the hon. and learned Attorney General was wholly unable to point out to the House any precedent or usage for refusing to issue a Writ for Wigan, and the House had no legitimate right whatever for interfering with the right of the constituency. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That Mr. Speaker do issue his Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to make out a new Writ for the election of a Member to serve in this present Parliament for the Borough of Wigan, in the room of Francis Sharp Powell, esquire, whose election has been declared to be void."—(Mr. Lewis.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he was sure the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Lewis) would not have taken up the time of the House as he had done for any

Mr. Lewis

Party reasons, and he regretted that he should have suggested that the Government were opposed to the issuing of the Writ because it might give one vote against them in the House. He would, however, suggest to the House this consideration—that he believed that the House made a mistake last Session in refusing a Commission; and all they could do now was to remedy as far as possible the mistake that had been made. The House would allow him to remind them of the position in which they stood. When the Act of 1868 gave power to the Judges to determine Election Petitions, it also gave them power to say whether corrupt practices extensively prevailed; and it would be at once seen by the House that it would be impossible for the House to go beyond the decision of the Judges, and inquire into the correctness of their decision. In the year 1869 it was suggested by Mr. Gathorne Hardy that it would be for the general good that where the decision of the Judges showed that corrupt practices extensively prevailed, a Commission should issue in consequence of that Report. That rule was accepted by both sides of the House, and it had been followed ever since; and it was never deviated from until the unfortunate vote of last Session. He must say he felt some little blame attached to him in the matter; and the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) pointed it out at the time. He did not go very fully into the facts of the case. He referred to the general rule; and he thought that wrong arguments were brought to bear on the House, in order to set aside the rule which had been so long acted on. One was that of the hon. Member for Bolton (Mr. J. K. Cross), who argued that as the constituency was one of very peculiar habits it should be exempted from the ordinary practice. He presumed that the argument prevailed. At any rate, the House, by a narrow majority, refused the Motion for a Commission; and the question now was, what were they to do in consequence of that decision? The Report of the Judges was that corrupt practices extensively prevailed.

MR. LEWIS begged the hon. and learned Gentleman's pardon; that was not the Report.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that a Report that corrupt practices prevailed, or that the Judges had reason to believe that they prevailed, had exactly the same effect. There was no difference between the two, except in the hon. Gentleman's view, in the spirit in which he was discussing the matter. The learned Judge gave his judgment, not, as had been said, that there was a small amount of treating, but that there was a deplorable condition of things in the borough of Wigan, one witness proving extensive bribery of 150 voters in one room alone in one public-house. Another witness spoke of 20 persons being bribed; and the result was that the learned Judge, at page 220 of the Report, proceeded to deal with this as one of the gravest cases of corruption, and thought it to be a rare thing if the electors did not receive money for their votes. The House had now to deal with such a Report in such a state of things. The House thought it wise in August last that there should not be a Commission. If they were now to grant a Writ they would be giving great encouragement to corruption. He confessed that it was an inconvenient position to be placed in, because he admitted that the consequence of the Report should have been the issuing of a Commission; but they had deviated from the rule laid down. Ought they to make two mistakes instead of one; or ought they rather to do the best they could in order to remedy the mistake already made? The hon. Member challenged him to give a precedent for the course he (the Attorney General) had taken in suspending the Writ. The hon. Member knew there was no precedent. And why? Because the House had never before arrived at such a vote as that of August last. It always issued a Commission till that time; and this was a case in which a Commission ought to have been issued. He submitted to the House that the House ought to exercise its judgment. He was sorry to see the House placed in this position; but, being placed in that position, it was the duty of the House to treat cases as they arose. It would have been far better to let the Judges' Report have its proper result. The House had sufficient before them on which to act. If there had been a Commission, they would have been able to treat all the constituencies alike. Although a Commission had not issued, the House knew this was a case of considerable gravity. He had not thought it right to include Wigan in the Disfranchisement Bill, as he considered that disfranchisement ought only to be proposed upon such certain information as could be supplied by a Commission. What course ought the House to take? The hon. Member for Londonderry professed to be very anxious on behalf of the electors of Wigan that a Writ should issue; but the electors themselves had made no such demand to the House. Wigan was represented by his hon. Friend the sitting Member for Wigan, and it had able Representatives in the Members for the county of Lancaster. These Members had made no such demand. He could not help feeling that, considering the Report of the learned Judge, the suspension of the Writ should continue for some time longer, for the purpose of showing that the House entirely disapproved of the electoral corruption of Wigan. For this there was a precedent in the case of Gloucester in 1859. At the election which took place there that year it was reported that corruption extensively prevailed; but no step was taken for the issue of a new Writ for Gloucester till 1862, when Mr. Disraeli pointed out that the time had come when the Writ should be no longer delayed. A Writ was then moved for. He was acting within that period now. With reference to the borough of Stroud, he certainly did say the Writ ought to go in that case, because there was no corrupt practice but treating suggested, and he felt there could be no disfranchisement for that offence alone. There was no evidence that there had been bribery in Stroud. In reference to Wigan, however, when the Disfranchisement Bill came on it would be open to any Member to move to insert Wigan in the Schedule. But he did not recommend that course. It was not for him to determine the matter; but he would suggest that the House should not pass over the matter lightly or hastily, and the House should show that it disapproved of what had taken place. He could not fix one time more than another when the House should express its views; but if the House asked him he should say that as in Gloucester the Writ was suspended for three years, in the case of Wigan it might be for two years, and at the end of the present Session a Motion might be made for a new Writ. By taking that course the House would show that they had done something to mark their disapproval of the conduct of the electors, without acting with severity towards the constituency.

BARON DE FERRIERES said, he thought it was not only undesirable, but unfair, that any Member of the House should go on moving for new Writs for different boroughs in which he had no particular interest. He did not think that a place like Wigan could complain if its case were hung up till the whole question of corrupt boroughs had been considered by the House, though that Bill ought not to be delayed any longer than was necessary. He begged to move the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That," to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "no Writ be issued to fill up any vacancy occasioned by corrupt practices until this House has disposed of the Corrupt Practices (Disfranchisement) Bill,"—(Baron de Ferrieres),

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. EDWARD CLARKE said, he was anxious to call the attention of the House to the singular position in which it would be placed if it adopted the unconstitutional and arbitrary course suggested by the Attorney General. The precedent which the Attorney General had given for the course he proposed was that of the City of Gloucester. It was true that that unhappy City was found out in 1859, and the Government repeatedly resisted any proposal for a Writ. In 1861 Sir George Grey stated that the Government had resolved to ask the House to withhold the issue of a Writ for the City; but in 1862 the Government changed its mind, and a Writ was issued. It was alleged by the Attorney General that in the debate on the Writ Mr. Disraeli alluded to the suspension of the Writ for three years as a sufficient punishment. That was not a correct statement of his views. He did not say that the three years which had elapsed might be taken as a sufficient punishment upon Gloucester. On the contrary, alluding to the suspension of the Writs for Wakefield and Gloucester,

The Attorney General

Mr. Disraeli said, "that the suspension of those two Writs had been continuously arbitrary and unconstitutional." He further observed—"In 1861 the Government refused to introduce a Bill for the suspension of the Writ for three years, and that, neither the Government nor any Member making such a proposition, another year had passed, the arbitrary and unconstitutional suspension still remained." No language could more clearly show that it was not accurate to represent Mr. Disraeli as saying that, three years having elapsed, sufficient punishment had been inflicted, but that, on the contrary, from beginning to end, he spoke of the suspension of the Writ, unless it was with the intention of bringing in any measure for disfranchisement, as arbitrary and unconstitutional. There was also the authority of Sir George Grey, who, in the same debate, in consenting to the issue of the Writ, never said that Gloucester had been sufficiently punished, but put it upon Constitutional grounds. He stated that, while adhering to the opinion he had previously expressed, there were serious objections to the suspension of a Writ for a protracted period, without reference to any proceedings or any impending measure. He (Mr. E. Clarke) would ask the Government to act, not upon the suggestion of the Attorney General, but upon the principle laid down by Sir George Grey, that the suspension of a Writ was only to be justified when the Government was prepared to introduce, or the House was considering a Bill to disfranchise the borough. It would be a most serious innovation upon the Constitutional rights of constituencies, which had recently been so loudly and rightly proclaimed, that the majority for the movement should ask the House not to re-try a case, but to deprive constituencies of their representation, even when the Government was not prepared to legislate. Then, the Attorney General based his suggestion upon the fact that the House had refused to issue a Royal Commission. Through that refusal, he said, the matter was in the same form as it would have been before the Corrupt Practices Act had passed. That he entirely challenged. It was clear that upon receiving the Report of an Election Judge the House, if it chose, could vote for the issue of a Royal Commission, and, if that Commission reported against the borough, could proceed to deal with the subject by legislation. But if the House did not think sufficient ground had been shown for the issue of a Royal Commission, how could it be contended that its refusal to impose that penalty upon the borough enabled the majority of the House to inflict punishment as if that inquiry had taken place? Although the House had refused to try the people, it was contended that the House was entitled to punish them. Anything more monstrous could not be conceived. The Attorney General not only asked the House to punish where it had refused to try, but he asked it to form an opinion upon materials which he did not take the trouble to lay before it, and which he did not indicate in his speech. It was quite as arbitrary and unconstitutional to ask for the suspension of the Writ, under the circumstances, for the Session as for any length of time. Immense mischief would be inflicted upon the unhappy borough of Wigan by the course proposed. Till the month of August Wigan would be in the middle of a contested election, which would probably delight those who wished to see that borough disfranchised, as it would then have plenty of time in which to gratify any propensity for corruption it happened to possess, and so to render itself disqualified for the franchise. There was no proposal, either from the Government or from a private Member, for dealing with the matter in a Constitutional way; and the refusal of the Writ had become a matter to be dealt with simply by the arbitrary majority for the moment.

MR. THOMAS COLLINS said, he very much regretted the course the House took last Session on this matter. The position seemed to be that every borough must wait, if it had been guilty of any isolated act of corruption, till the Attorney General's Corrupt Practices Bill passed. He did not think that that was a fair thing to do, especially as many of the charges made were based upon the ipse dixit of one or two individuals. As a Representative of a borough, he recently had to pay a rate of 5s. in the pound, owing to the erroneous finding of the Judges, because they had no witness of truth. In 1859 there were no Royal Commissions issued for Wakefield and Stroud, and they were worse cases of corruption than some of those which had recently deprived boroughs of their representation. The question the House had to deal with was whether the Writ for Wigan should issue now, or at some future period. He thought the House came to an unfortunate decision last year, for the object of legislation of late years had been to remove these questions out of the hands of the House and treat them in a quasi-judicial manner. If, in these cases, the House were to pass over the Report of the Judges, it would revert to the vices of the old system, and the question would lapse into a contest between those Members of the House who wished a new Writ to issue, and to negative the decision of the Judges, and those who wished to support the decision. With regard to a Royal Commission, that could not be issued unless the statutory enactments were complied with; otherwise, it would be an illegal trial from beginning to end. The decision of last year was arrived at at the fag-end of the Session, and in a very thin House; and it was the duty of the Government to have afforded an opportunity of raising the discussion again. The main object of a Parliamentary Commission was not to punish individuals, but to eradicate corruption from boroughs. The House having committed one blunder last year, should be careful not to make another this year. Upon the whole, he thought the House was bound to issue the Writ; and he should, therefore, vote for its being issued.

MR. KNOWLES said, he wished to refer to one or two points raised in the observations of the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth (Mr. E. Clarke). One was that very few Members of the House had read the Judge's Report. He was quite sure that the Attorney General had read it carefully and thoroughly, as he had acted wisely in not pressing for a Commission. It would have been found a very weak case indeed. Wigan had undoubtedly erred; but it was not so bad as Gloucester, Chester, and other places. No doubt, as the sitting Member was unseated, the constituency was to some extent guilty; but the Judges exonerated him from blame, and said he did all he could to avoid corruption. With reference to the second point, as to the issuing of a new Writ, he trusted that the Attorney General would reconsider his decision, which would be likely to plunge Wigan into a state of turmoil until the end of the Session. The House had not thought it necessary to act on the recommendation of the Election Judges to issue a Commission, and, in doing so, had acted wisely. He himself knew something of Wigan people, and he knew that a Commission would have been unnecessary, expensive, and not worth the trouble. And who were the people said to be guilty of corrupt action? Generally they were enthusiastic and indiscreet shopkeepers, who were giving free breakfasts right and left to everybody, both electors and non-electors, and, to some extent also, because they had an idea that it would afterwards assist their business. There had been a strike amongst the colliers for a long time, and they were then in the middle of it. There was great distress. The weather was very inclement and severe—the worst they had had, perhaps, for 50 years; and nearly all the railways in the Kingdom were snowed up, and what was done was more as an act of kindness than with intent to bribe. With reference to the observations which had been made last Session by the hon. Member for Bolton (Mr. J. K. Cross) as to the habits of the people of Wigan, and that they were a “Church and King loving” people, that was quite true. He (Mr. Knowles) was glad to say that they were. As to his description of their being a cock-fighting people, that was a mistake; and he (Mr. Knowles) did not believe there was any truth in the statement. He had been at some trouble to make inquiries as to this matter, and found it was not so. He had been brought up amongst the people and knew them well; and he thought they would compare favourably with the inhabitants of any similar manufacturing and mining district. The borough, however, was, to some extent, under a cloud; and, under the circumstances, he did not blame the Attorney General for objecting to grant the Writ at the present time. He hoped that the Motion would be withdrawn. He himself had not moved for the issue of a Writ, and would not have thought of doing so until nearer the end of the Session, because he considered that the borough deserved some punishment. He would be very glad, however, if the Attorney General would, without any long interval of time, again agree to issue the Writ, and so put the borough out of suspense, and prevent the turmoil and agitation of an impending election being spread over a long period.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, they found themselves in an unfortunate position. The Judges found there was bribery and treating; but the House refused to issue a Commission, and then arose the question, what was the Government to do? They, no doubt, acted wisely in not renewing the Motion for a Commission, and they were equally well-advised in not including Wigan in their Bill as a place to be punished by disfranchisement. The Attorney General, he thought, had acted very fairly. The question was—What was to be done in the present circumstances? Personally, he would not have moved in the matter at present, and he was very sorry the Writ had been moved for. He should have been content if the Writ had been moved for in the course of the present Session; but they were placed in a different position now that the Constitutional question had been raised and argued. It was a great stretch of power in the House to say, without the consent of the other House in an Act of Parliament, that they would punish a constituency by depriving it of representation. He was sorry the question was raised. He would not have raised it; but as it was raised, unless it was answered by the Government in some form, they would be entering upon a dangerous precedent, for the House would appear to be assuming, of its own authority and without a Bill, to deprive a constituency of a Member. It would have been better that the Constitutional question should have been avoided by acquiescence in the issue of the Writ in two or three months' time. But, the question having been raised, he could have no doubt as to the course that he ought to take.

MR. MAC IVER said, he charged the Government with doing that in a political capacity which they would have been ashamed to do as private Members. The Government were not in earnest last year in moving for the issue of a Commission. If they had been in earnest they would easily have obtained the inquiry. He happened to know something about the borough of Wigan; and the sole reason why the Government refused to issue a Writ at the present moment was because the Conservatives had prematurely announced the name of the candidate they intended to run at the next election. The object of postponing the issue of a Writ until the end of the Session was obvious. They were prolonging the period over which the election agitation extended, in order that some injudicious agent might do something sufficiently technically illegal as to unseat the newly-elected Member. They knew, too, that if the election were to take place now they would lose the seat; and, like Mr. Micawber, they were waiting for something to turn up. The reasons given by the Attorney General for the postponement of the issue of the Writ were not the real reasons; and they were those which he (Mr. Mac Iver) had described to the House.

Mr. Knowles

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he did not think the debate ought to be allowed to close without a further statement of the views and intentions of the Government. Last year the Government made a specific proposal to the House. The House, in its wisdom or its folly—he did not say which—declined to accede to the proposals. The speech of the Attorney General consisted mainly of the allegation that the House of Commons had last year made a mistake; and, no doubt, the House had made many mistakes; but if it had made one, that would be no reason why it should continue to make another. The hon. and learned Member for Plymouth (Mr. E. Clarke) had pointed out that there was an essential difference between the case of Gloucester and the proposal now made by the Attorney General. The contention of the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite apparently was that the penalty of temporary disfranchisement might be imposed by its own fiat, instead of by Statute. He proposed the disfranchisement of Wigan for a certain definite number of weeks; but what distinction was there in theory between the suspension of a Writ for a few weeks and for a few years? The hon. and learned Gentleman suggested that the Writ in question should issue at the end of the present Session; but could he guarantee that his Colleagues would be in favour of the proposal when the time came? The House ought seriously to consider the position in which it was placed. Two courses were open to the Government in dealing with this question; but they had adopted neither of them. They might have asked the House to rescind the Resolution to which it came last year, but they did nothing of the sort; they might have scheduled Wigan with the other boroughs in the Corrupt Practices Bill; but they preferred to leave it to be dealt with separately. The result, therefore, was the proposal of the Attorney General that the borough should be punished on its own ipse dixit. With respect to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cheltenham (Baron De Ferrieres), he confessed that he could not understand it. The hon. Member asked the House not to issue the Writ for Wigan until the Corrupt Practices Bill had been disposed of. It seemed to him, as the Corrupt Practices Bill in no way affected Wigan, that the hon. Member might with equal relevancy have referred to the Boiler Explosions Bill, or the Churchwardens' Admission Bill. But the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite had said that the borough might, perhaps, be included in the Schedule of the Corrupt Practices Bill. He had heard of Governments fishing for a policy; but for the Government to invite other Members to insert Wigan in the Bill when they themselves had not the courage to include it was without parallel in the history of Parliament. The Bill had more relation to the larger Corrupt Practices Bill, which had been called a Bill for the prevention of Ministerial defeats at bye-elections. The course followed seemed to be adopted for the purpose of preventing constituencies from expressing their opinion of the Government of the day. He was convinced it was not guided by the calm and judicial mind of the Attorney General, but would more appropriately have emanated from the guiding spirit of the Caucuses. He trusted that before the debate closed some responsible Minister of the Crown would announce some definite course which the Government were prepared to submit to Parliament.

MR. WARTON said, that the right tone had been given to the discussion by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross), who would not have brought forward the matter, but held that it had now become a grave Constitutional question. After what the Attorney General had said, it would be well, perhaps, if on another occasion the hon. and learned Gentleman simply announced, without giving reasons, the decision to which the despotic Government had come. The hon. and learned Gentleman had mentioned the case of Gloucester as a precedent; but he held that if Wigan was to be punished at all, it could not possibly be punished in a more undesirable manner. It was not necessary to punish Wigan, because they had no power to punish Wigan. They were living now in times when they had a despotic Prime Minister and a despotic Attorney General; and he would ask the latter hon. and learned Gentleman, in view of the small allowance for election expenses provided in his Bill, whether it would be wrong for the popular candidate at Wigan to hire a single committee-room, or appoint a single agent, or to issue a statement to the effect that he intended to come forward?

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT cordially supported the Motion, observing that the Motion for issuing a Royal Commission had been defeated last year, almost at the close of the Session, on a Saturday afternoon, by a majority of only 6, in a House of no more than 80 Members; and its decision on that occasion, therefore, did not carry with it very great weight. Since then nothing had been done by the Government, although eight months had elapsed since the hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) had moved to issue the Writ last August. The constituency of Wigan had, consequently, had no opportunity of defending itself against the charges of corruption made against it; and he (Sir Eardley Wilmot) considered it unjust, under these circumstances, to deprive it of the privilege of returning a Member. It looked as if the Government were applying a Coercion Act to Wigan; and he, therefore, while he considered that a Royal Commission ought to have been again moved for at the beginning of the present Session, should cordially support the Motion of the hon. Member for Londonderry.

MR. LEWIS, in reply, observed, that surprise had been expressed that he should have moved the issue of this Writ. The despotism of the Liberal Party, which had been displayed on so many occasions, now came to this—that a Member of that House was to be told by Members on the other side in bringing forward a grave Constitutional question—"Oh, you are only Member for so-and-so." He was aware that certain Members of the House usually moved the issue of new Writs; but there never was a Rule which prevented any Member of that House, if he thought a particular constituency was being ill-treated by the manner in which its rights were being disregarded by the House, or any Member of the House, from presenting himself as a supporter and upholder, not of a constituency, but of Constitutional Law. The hon. Member for Cheltenham thought it quite right that Cheltenham should interfere, but not Londonderry, though Wigan was on the way to Londonderry. The hon. Gentleman interfered, it would seem, because he (Mr. Lewis) had postponed his Motion from Monday week; but he did that because he did not want to stand in the way of the Budget; and yet the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, in his opening statement, while making pointed reference to the courtesy of another, took no notice of what he had done. He would tell the House very frankly why he had taken up these election cases; and he should take them up until he drove the Government to bring forward the Corrupt Practices (Disfranchisement) Bill. It was this, and he would say it in the face of the House. The Attorney General had deliberately kept that Bill back. Instead of producing that Bill, he had brought forward a general one relating to the future. The truth was, the hon. and learned Gentleman did not like to produce the Bill; but, until the Government did so, he should avail himself of every possible opportunity of challenging their conduct. The whole subject-matter of the Attorney General's speech amounted to this—that he quoted one precedent, a precedent which was totally inapplicable to the circumstances of the case, for which he was obliged to go to a time anterior to the period when Commissions proved to be no precedent at all. It seemed to him that what they had to consider on the present occasion were the rights of the Wigan constituency and the question of Constitutional representation; and consequently, under the circumstances, he should consider it his duty to go to a division.

Mr. Warton

Question put.

The House divided:—

The Tellers being come to the Table, Lord Kensington, one of the Tellers for the Noes, informed Mr. Speaker that an honourable Member had remained in the Right Lobby without voting.

Mr. Arthur Vivian thereupon came to the Table, and said that not having heard the Question put, he had not voted.

Whereupon Mr. Speaker stated to him the Question, and he declared that he voted with the Noes.

The Tellers accordingly declared the numbers Ayes 142; Noes 220: Majority 78.—(Div. List, No. 75.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he hoped, now that the views of the Attorney General had been made known, the Amendment would be withdrawn.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) joined in this appeal. The moment was inopportune for pressing the subject.

MR. SPEAKER said, that, by leave of the House, the Amendment might be withdrawn.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

STATE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS — THE IRISH POLICY OF THE GOVERNMENT.—MINISTERIAL STATEMENT.

MR. GLADSTONE: Mr. Speaker, it had been my intention, on the Motion of the right hon. and gallant Member opposite (Sir John Hay), and as most conformable to the liberty and practice of the House, to advert, during the debate which I believe to be impending, to several matters of importance connected with the condition of Ireland, rather than to touch them in answer to a Question, or still less to seek an opportunity of making a short explanation. In consequence, however, of the difference of the Rules in "another place," and of proceedings which I understand are likely to take place there, it has appeared to me it would be most for the convenience of the House, especially in view of the Notice standing in the name of the right hon. and gallant Baronet, that I should ask permission of the House to make a very short statement, for the purpose of giving to it, I think, in brief compass, all the information which is in my power. Sir, I do not, I may say, on this occasion intend to make any reference to changes in the Land Act, because I have already partially and generally opened the views of the Government on one of the most important points which we think it our duty to open—namely, the question of arrears, a point, I may say, of the most pressing and immediate importance; and I also stated that an early opportunity would arise for touching on another point of great importance and interest—the question of the Purchase Clauses. With regard to other matters, although they are important also, I need not say anything of them. Other opportunities will offer for dealing with them more properly. But the three questions upon which I wish to give some information to the House are, the resignation of the Viceroy, the course which the Government have taken with respect to certain persons imprisoned in Ireland—particularly and primarily the three Members of this House—and the consequence it has entailed upon us (the Government); and, lastly, the intentions we entertain, so far as time permits us at present, to declare and exhibit those intentions in respect to legislation in Ireland. The House already is aware that my noble Friend (Earl Cowper), the loss of whose services we greatly regret, has resigned the Office of Viceroy of Ireland. I was asked yesterday whether he had resigned on political or on personal grounds; and I could not adopt with accuracy, or at least without fear of misapprehension, either of those grounds, for if I had said that my noble Friend had resigned on political grounds, I should have been understood to imply that he had resigned on the ground of policy, and because he differed in view from the Government and his Colleagues on public questions. That is not so, and neither has he resigned, I may say, upon personal grounds. It was his desire to give up his Office; but that desire did not take effect without reference to other considerations, and the consideration which induced the Government to recommend to Her Majesty that my noble Friend's resignation should be accepted was the desire they felt to have the advantage of carrying on the operations of the Executive

Government in Ireland, in the present critical circumstances of the country, with the highest degree of authority that could possibly be made to attach to them—namely, under the direct action and the full responsibility of a Member of Her Majesty's Government. That, I think, is all that I need say on the subject of the resignation of my noble Friend. I proceed to another subject—indeed, to two subjects, both of which are embraced by the Notice which stands on the Paper for to-night. I have to state that directions have been sent to Ireland for the release forthwith of the three Members of this House who have been imprisoned since October last, under the powers given by the Protection of Person and Property Act. The list of persons similarly imprisoned will be carefully examined further, with a view to the release, in accordance with like principles and considerations, of all persons who are not believed to be associated with the commission of crime. This measure has been taken by the Government on its own responsibility—[Laughter from the Opposition Benches]—after gathering all the information which it was in their power to extract, either through the medium of debate in this House, or by availing themselves of such communications as were tendered to them by Irish Representatives, and this without the slightest reference to their previous relations to those Irish Representatives, but simply with relation to what they believed to be the public interest. But they deemed it to be a part of their duty to ascertain, so far as might be in their power, the views and intentions of those hon. Gentlemen who are chosen to represent Ireland in this House with reference to the present position of public affairs in that country. I observed that when I said that this action was taken upon the responsibility of Her Majesty's Government, there appeared to be Gentlemen in this House who thought that to be an announcement of very trivial importance. In my view, it is far otherwise. The responsibility is serious, and the responsibility is undivided. Were that release a release determined upon in concert with, or in negotiation with, others, I should not have been able to use, in the full and plenary sense of the view which I have used, the phrase that I have employed and employ again, when I say, Sir, that this is an act taken on our own responsibility alone, and done in the strict pursuance of the principles on which our policy has been founded all along—[Renewed laughter]—with reference, and with paramount reference, to the maintenance of law and order in Ireland, which we believe it will promote—a belief in which I can assure hon. Gentlemen we are not likely to be shaken. And, finally, it is, as I have already said, an act done without any negotiation, promise, or engagement whatsoever. This act, Sir, has entailed upon us a lamentable consequence—namely, the resignation of my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant (Mr. W. E. Forster), who declines to share our responsibility in this matter, and who, in consequence, has tendered his resignation of the high Office which he has held and discharged with such unwearied diligence, and marked ability, and such unfailing patriotism. It is not for me to explain, before my right hon. Friend does so himself, the view by which he has been actuated; and he will not be in a position to explain that view until he obtains the sanction of Her Majesty to his resignation; but he hopes to be able to offer his personal explanation not later than upon Thursday next. Sir, in conjunction with this subject, I think it is right that I should advert to the legislative intentions which Her Majesty's Government entertain—in few words, but, I hope, in words which will not be found deficient in clearness, having regard to the time at which, and the circumstances under which, they are spoken. In the first place, we do not at present contemplate asking Parliament to renew the Protection of Person and Property Act; but it is my duty to point out that no final judgment can be formed at the present date upon a question of this paramount character, with regard to which the contingency immediately embraced in it is still placed at a considerable distance. The second statement I have to make is that, so soon as the necessary Business of the House of Commons will permit, we shall ask leave to introduce a Bill to strengthen the ordinary law, and to meet difficulties such as have been experienced in the administration of justice, and in defending and securing private rights in Ireland. By the necessary Business of the House of Commons, perhaps I ought to say that I mean the Resolutions upon Procedure, which, in our view, lie at the very root and threshold of the whole performance by the House of Commons of its duty, and the transaction of Business in relation to money, with regard to which, as the House well knows, legal necessities are laid upon us. Anything, in fact, which could not fairly be called of that exceptional character, I do not include in necessary Business. But what I meant to convey to the House is this—that of all the legislation which we have hoped and desired to undertake, and which we have engaged, as far as it is in our power, to undertake, by the Speech delivered from the Throne at the commencement of the Session, no part will be allowed to interfere with the prosecution of the purpose which I have just described—namely, to satisfy what we conceive to be the demands of the necessity with regard to future legal provision for peace and tranquillity, and the enforcement of law in Ireland. I may add that we are now engaged in considering the details of the measure; and it should be clearly understood, after what I have said, that the Business of optional legislation will not be allowed to interfere with our proceedings in this respect. I ought, perhaps, to say, after the expectation that I have expressed—the sanguine expectation, or, at any rate, the very anxious expectation, with regard to the Protection of Person and Property Act—I ought, perhaps, to make one special reservation, not in contradiction, nor even, perhaps, in limitation of what I have said. It has relation to secret societies; and should it unhappily appear to us that the peace and security of Ireland are put in jeopardy by the members of secret societies, in that case, whatever might be our view as to the Protection of Person and Property Act in general, we should think it our duty to propose, as against their members, either a continuance of the present powers, or the enactment of any other powers which we might believe to be more effectual for the securing of life and property. I have only, I think, one word more to say. In expressing the hope and expectation that we may not be called upon to ask the House to re-enact the Protection of Person and Property Act, I do not intend to suggest, on the part of the Government retrospectively, any change in their view. We have no authority, more than others, to speak upon this subject, and many hon. Members in that quarter of the House (the Home Rule Benches)—perhaps some on this side of the House—may differ from us in the opinion we entertain; but we do not agree with those who hold that the Act has failed, for we think that it has served a most important purpose, in enabling us to confront a great crisis, which, without that Act, we do not see in what way we could have had adequate opportunities of meeting. That, I think, is all it is my purpose at present to say, and I hope I have clearly conveyed to the House the intentions we entertain, and I thank the House for the great and kind attention which I have received during this statement from the great body of the House.

Mr. Gladstone

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Mr. Speaker, I am well aware that it is most irregular to address any observations to the House upon the statement we have just heard, yet I think the House will, under the circumstances, extend its indulgence to me for a very short time. The Prime Minister has, in the closing words of his very important statement, expressed his acknowledgment to the House for the patience and the manner with which it has listened to him, and I can hardly imagine that any statement could have been possibly made that would have more thoroughly have arrested the attention, the breathless attention, of hon. Members on both sides of the House. From word to word, and from passage to passage of the Prime Minister's speech we necessarily hung upon his words, absolutely ignorant of what might be coming next, and feeling that his communication had reference to one of the most important subjects that could possibly be brought before us. I must frankly say that, having listened to the statement that has just been made, I am still more surprised than I was before that that statement was not previously made, and made in a manner independently of the Motion of which Notice has been given. Surely the reasons which have led to that statement being made to-night might have been foreseen, and might have led the Government to take this into its consideration in a more direct manner than they proposed to do, but not, I admit, more frankly than they have now done. There are several parts of that statement on which it would be premature at present for anyone to offer an opinion. We require more information. We require to know the reasons upon which the Government have proceeded in some of the very important steps upon which they have decided, as they tell us, on their own responsibility. The Prime Minister seemed to wonder that there should have been any sensation in the House on his making use of the expression that the Government had taken upon themselves to release certain hon. Members of this House, and to consider the case of certain other persons who are at present imprisoned under the Protection of Person and Property (Ireland) Act, and that they had made that decision on their own responsibility. The House, I think, would have been puzzled to know upon what other shoulders to lay the responsibility. However that may be, the feeling of the House now, I think, is that we should know the grounds on which the decision was arrived at. But there was a very strange light, or rather a very important light, thrown upon the expression used by the Prime Minister by almost the next following words of the right hon. Gentleman, which were to the effect that the late Chief Secretary for Ireland, as I am sorry to say we must now call him, had refused to share that responsibility; and that circumstance, I need not say, intensifies in the most remarkable manner the importance of the step on which the Government have decided. Under any circumstances, to be told, and told without reasons given for the decision, that the Government have decided to make so vital a change, so important a change, in the policy which they have been pursuing for a considerable time, and upon which they have from time to time appealed for the support of the House, would have been startling, and would have required consideration; but when they tell us that a Minister—not only one of their Colleagues, but the special Colleague who has been responsible for the administration of the Act in Ireland, who has had the most intimate knowledge of the state of the country, and who knows not only what the state of the country has been hitherto, but what it is at the present moment—when they tell us that he declines to share that responsibility, they really present to us a condition of affairs so grave that it is quite impossible to exaggerate it. The right hon. Gentleman has said, with perfect truth, that it would but be in accordance with the usual Parliamentary practice and the proper courtesies of official life to give the right hon. Gentleman who has now resigned his Office an opportunity of stating to the House the reasons which have led him to separate himself from his Colleagues; and he has also mentioned, what is perfectly well known to all, that the right hon. Gentleman cannot make such a statement until he has obtained Her Majesty's permission, and we are promised that such statement shall be made on Thursday. At present, therefore, it would be clearly premature for us to come to any final decision or opinion with regard to the conduct of Her Majesty's Government in this matter until we have heard the promised statement on Thursday, that will then be made, and which we shall await with the greatest interest and anxiety; but even now there are one or two points upon which, in the absence of that statement, I think, perhaps, I may be allowed to make one or two remarks. The right hon. Gentleman has told us that it is intended not only to release the three imprisoned Members of this House, but to consider the other cases of persons who are imprisoned under the Act, and who are not associated in the commission of crime. [Mr. GLADSTONE: Not believed to be.] Well, not believed to be. I suppose that is intended to point to the distinction that is to be drawn between a number of persons who are imprisoned on charges of being reasonably suspected of murder, or inciting to murder, or other outrages, and those who are guilty of intimidation or inciting others to desist from the payment of rent. But I should like to know another point with regard to that. There are certain persons in prison on a charge of being suspected of treasonable practices, and I should like to know what category they come under? I should like to know whether that is a charge that is to be treated lightly, or is to be treated seriously? Is it to be treated like a charge of using violent language, or is it to be treated as one of a very serious character? I cannot help observing that that charge is made against two of the Members of this House who are to be liberated; and, therefore, I presume that the mere fact of being reasonably suspected of treasonable practices is not to be held as a ground for retaining those persons in prison; but I shall be glad to know whether the serious charge is to be passed over, or whether any especial notice is to be taken of persons who are so charged; because, when considering the question of law and order, we should know whether that is to be regarded as a serious charge. It is all very well for the Prime Minister to say that the Government are proceeding on the principles which they have always proceeded. In respect to a great many matters, I have no doubt but it will strike many persons as most probable that the Government are making a very serious and extraordinary change—they are, to use an expression that has become familiar to us, swapping horses while crossing the stream in a very strange and inconvenient manner; still, I am bound to say that, to a certain extent, I do admit they are proceeding on the principles on which it seems to me they have all along proceeded. Those principles are somewhat those of a pendulum which swings sometimes to the one side and sometimes to the other. I can conceive nothing more likely to weaken the authority of the Government, in the very difficult and important task on which they have entered in dealing with the state of things in Ireland, than the impression which is likely to be conveyed that they are hesitating and uncertain in their policy—that they are pursuing a policy which they have not themselves thought out to its ultimate issues. Even the manner in which the announcement is made to-day all tends in the same direction. They would not announce it until they had an opportunity—until some independent Member of the Opposition brings forward a proposal to serve as a convenient peg on which they might make their statement. They would not state all their proposals on the Land Act until they had an opportunity of which they could take advantage, and so forth. They are, apparently, without a policy which they have themselves sought and decided on, and which they are prepared to recommend on their own responsibility to the House. They are casting about for opportunities which are offered to them from one quarter and another. I am sorry that is the line they take, for I do not think it is to the advantage of the country. I think we ought to have some further information from the Government. I should like to impress upon the Government, and I think we ought all to press upon them, that they should lose no time in this matter, and that they should take up a decided attitude, and not allow the grass to grow under their feet. The Government, I believe, have been weakened, as I believe we have weakened ourselves, by making demonstrations, and by holding out expectations, and even using threats, and then hanging the matter up for a considerable time until the force of the thing had worn itself out. If the policy is to release not only the large number of persons who are imprisoned under the Coercion Act without any statement to justify it, but with such authority against it as their own Chief Secretary, I say they ought to come forward and make their statement as a whole, and not in piecemeal fashion, pressing it forward in the most vigorous and rapid manner, and in a manner which would give the House an opportunity of considering it fully while they have time and opportunity. Undoubtedly I make that observation with reference to the extraordinary statement of the right hon. Gentleman, when, after he told us he would take the measure to which he refers as the very first measure after those which were of a necessary character, he tells us that among these necessary measures he includes the Resolutions for altering the Procedure of the House. Of course, if that is intended to be a mode of putting pressure upon the House with regard to forcing through the Rules on Procedure, it is very clever. If it is the idea of the right hon. Gentleman that that is a Business which it is necessary to proceed with and to get through with before he can make this statement of the full intentions of the Government, I think the prospect before us is of a very unsatisfactory kind. I apologize to the House for speaking at all. I am sorry to trespass on its time; but I do feel that we require further information on this subject, and I hope that on Thursday an opportunity will be given us of very fully considering the statements which have been made. There is one question which I do not know if I have the right to ask; but which, if I am not wrong in asking it, I should be glad to be informed upon. I was struck with the statement which was made by the right hon. Gentleman with reference to Lord Cowper. Lord Cowper is a Nobleman for whom everyone has the highest respect, and of whom, as a man who is patriotic and thoroughly conscientious, we should all speak with respect and admiration. But the right hon. Gentleman told us that Lord Cowper had resigned the high Office of Lord Lieutenant upon this ground—that he wished that operations in Ireland should be carried on under—

Sir Stafford Northcote

MR. GLADSTONE: No, no.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Because he wished that the Government should have the opportunity of making—

MR. GLADSTONE: No, no.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Well, I have no right to ask on what grounds Lord Cowper gives up his Office, unless the right hon. Gentleman volunteers some statement on the subject. I am not questioning Lord Cowper's conduct; but the point to which I am coming is this—that either Lord Cowper desired, or the Government accepted, his resignation of Office, on the ground that it was desirable they should carry on their operations in Ireland with the highest degree of authority that could be attached to them, by having them under the direct control of the Members of the Cabinet. Well, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland had some share in the deliberations of the Cabinet. The point I wished to remark upon was this—Was Lord Cowper's resignation sent in, or accepted, before or after the resignation of the Chief Secretary for Ireland? As long as the Chief Secretary for Ireland held Office he was a man in the highest authority, holding a Cabinet Office in connection with the discharge of his duties. Are we to understand that the object of Lord Cowper's resignation was to supply the way for a Cabinet Minister, consequent upon the loss of one by the intended resignation of the Chief Secretary? [MR. GLADSTONE: No.] I should think not. Then, is it thought desirable—really I do not like to ask many questions about it; but we really ought to know whether it is thought necessary that there should be two Members of the Cabinet—is it thought necessary, for the future administration of Ireland, there should be both the Chief Secretary for Ireland and the Lord Lieutenant in the Cabinet? I need not say that it is a very novel arrangement; but it is so important that we ought to have some explanation on the subject, and I should really be glad to know whether it is intended that the right hon. Gentleman's (Mr. Forster's) place should be filled by the appointment of some other Cabinet Minister, or whether it is intended to dispense with the Chief Secretary in the Cabinet, or dispense with the Chief Secretary altogether? These are matters that I ask about, and I should think they are matters that the House, interested as it is in the maintenance of law and order in Ireland, ought to be informed upon.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, he was well aware that the Forms of the House did not permit them to discuss the important statement made by the Prime Minister; but even if those Forms had allowed discussion now, it did not appear to him that there was anything in that statement calling for immediate debate—at least, so far as the Irish Members were concerned. It appeared to him that the right hon. Baronet the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote) had gone either a little too far, or not quite far enough, in the discussion. It seemed to him quite plain that if a full and satisfactory debate on the statement of the Prime Minister could not be entered upon now, it would be better to leave the question undebated altogether for the present. They had had from the Prime Minister what were merely suggestions of legislation—they had no material upon which to form any opinion. The right hon. Gentleman told them he intended to deal with the question of the arrears, and with the Purchase Clauses of the Land Act; but, as a matter of course, until they knew what his propositions were, it would be idle to anticipate and discuss them. Then, as regarded his dealings with Coercion, they only knew that, under certain conditions, he would propose certain measures. They did not know whether these measures were to be more sharp or less sharp than those now in existence. Under such circumstances, it would be vain to discuss the subject. But he would take the liberty of asking the right hon. Gentleman three questions. One was in reference to the resignation of the late Chief Secretary for Ireland. He might say for himself and for those around him that they were not disposed to indulge in any unseemly exultation over the fall of the right hon. Gentleman; but he would like to ask the Prime Minister whether a successor had yet been nominated? He would like to ask, also, as the second question, whether the Government intended to attempt the complete re-organization of what he might call the mechanism of administration in Ireland, beginning with Dublin Castle, and going down through all the hierarchy of the magistracy and police? In the third place, he should like to ask, in reference to the announcement which had just been made of that act of mere justice, propriety, and prudence—namely, the release of the State prisoners—he should like to ask whether Her Majesty's Government would not extend the same release to Michael Davitt?

Sir Stafford Northcote

Earl PERCY rose to address the House, when——

MR. SPEAKER, interposing, said, the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government had made a Ministerial Statement; but, there being no Motion before the House, a debate upon that statement could hardly be allowed.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I beg to notice very briefly the questions that have been put to me by right hon. and hon. Gentlemen on the opposite side. I think it is part of my duty to answer the questions which have been put on behalf of a Party or section of this House. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir Stafford Northcote) asks me whether the date of Lord Cowper's resignation was anterior or posterior to the resignation of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster). It was anterior to that resignation, and the two resignations are totally disconnected the one from the other. The right hon. Gentleman, I think, also asked whether we had any reasons to give for the release of the "suspects." Defined as it was defined in my statement, we have given the reason which, we think, is the only and the sufficient reason—namely, that, in our belief, it is conducive to the interests of law, order, and security in Ireland. When that proposition is challenged, I shall be prepared to defend it. With respect to the questions of the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. Justin M'Carthy), I may state that no Chief Secretary has yet been named as successor to my right hon. Friend. With respect to the release of Michael Davitt, that is a question totally distinct from the release of the "suspects;" and it is one which it may be right for Her Majesty's Government to consider; but it is one which they have not taken into consideration as a portion of the same subject. In respect to the total and complete re-organization of the Government of Ireland, beginning with Dublin Castle and going down to the magistrates and police, I must confess that when I heard that question put by the hon. Member I blessed the simplicity of mind which could suppose, as I have no doubt he did, in perfect good faith, that the total re-organization of the Government in Ireland is a thing that can be dealt with by the stroke of a pen, or by a particular Resolution. In my opinion, and I think I may say in the opinion of my Colleagues, there is a great deal to be done in regard to the re-organization of the Government of Ireland; and I feel that, without working in that direction and in that sense, we shall not permanently attain the object we have in view; but I cannot state the degree and the time any operation can be made in a matter so difficult and multiform, and I am sure the hon. Member will not press me upon it.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I wish to remind the right hon. Gentleman of the Question which I put to him, as to whether there was to be a Chief Secretary in the Cabinet?

MR. GLADSTONE: I will make the announcement about the Chief Secretary as soon as possible. I have made the announcement of the resignation of my right hon. Friend; but that is a very recent and extraordinary event indeed. The directions that went to Ireland on this subject only went to-day; and, of course, all I can say is, that it will be our duty, in the present situation of Irish affairs, if on no other account, to proceed with all expedition that the state of Business will allow, and to make what may be deemed to be, on the whole, the best arrangements.

MR. CHAPLIN begged leave to move the adjournment of the House, in order that he might put a few questions to the Prime Minister. Substantially, the announcement of policy just made was to a certain effect, and he could well fancy how that new hope would be raised in Ireland, and the people would most appropriately sing—

“Sound the loud timbrel o’er Ireland’s blue sea :

The Land League has triumphed, the ‘suspects’ are free.”

Such information would be astounding if it came from any Government except the present Government of never-ending vacillation. The question he wished to ask was, if the “suspects” were to be released now, why were they imprisoned at all? He thought he could throw some light upon the question by referring to the authority of the Prime Minister himself. The Prime Minister, speaking at the Guildhall on October 14, 1881, said, in reference to the arrest of Mr. Parnell—

“Within these few moments I have been informed that towards the vindication of law, of order, of the rights of property, of the freedom of the land, of the first elements of political life and civilization, the first step has been taken in the arrest of the man who has made himself beyond all others prominent in the attempt to destroy the authority of the law, and to substitute what would end in being nothing more nor less than anarchical oppression exercised upon the people of Ireland.”

He asked the right hon. Gentleman to consider this question. Had law and order, had the rights of property, was the freedom of the land, had the first elements of political life and civilization been vindicated, or had they not? Had the purpose of that arrest been fulfilled or not? Was the state of things in Ireland better or worse than when that arrest received the commendation of the right hon. Gentleman? If not, then, why were the “suspects” to be released? He did not wish to enter upon a debate now; but he pressed the Government—and after the right hon. Gentleman’s assertion that there was other necessary Business standing in the way he had a right to press the Government—for an explicit and early reply to those questions. That answer could not be, and must not be, long delayed, because the Government must remember that, as must be apparent to every section of the House, their policy of to-day was an absolute condemnation of their policy in October, and their policy in October was no less an absolute condemnation of their policy of to-day. He trusted, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman would reconsider his decision. And, really, when the right hon. Gentleman talked of other necessary Business, he (Mr. Chaplin) asked what Business could be more necessary than the preservation of life in Ireland? To talk of proceeding with those Procedure Resolutions of the Government, when such issues of life and death were at stake in Ireland, was like Nero fiddling when Rome was burning. He hoped that the right hon. Gentleman, before they separated that evening, would give them a distinct assurance that, on the earliest possible opportunity, that complete and absolute reversal of the whole Irish policy of the Government would be submitted, as submitted it ought to be and must be, to the judgment of the House of Commons.

Mr. Chaplin

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That this House do now adjourn.”—
(Mr. Chaplin.)

MR. HUSSEY VIVIAN said, he wished to ask the right hon. and gallant Member for the Wigton Burghs (Sir John Hay) whether, after the statement which had been made to the House by the Prime Minister that afternoon, he intended to proceed with the Motion which stood on the Paper in his name with regard to the administration of Ireland?

SIR JOHN HAY said, that, so far as he was at present advised, his intention was to proceed with the Motion at 9 o’clock, if he found a House there at the Evening Sitting willing to listen to him.

MR. SEXTON said, he could not share in any attempt which might be made to draw from the Government, at the present moment, a more explicit explanation than the Premier had made. The Government had had, in a very difficult crisis, to consider a subject embracing many branches, and one of extreme delicacy and importance; and he could not help declaring his personal conviction that the First Minister of the Crown, in his statement made that day, had been as explicit as could fairly be expected, considering all the circumstances of the case. It might be true, as had been said, that the present policy of the Government was one which was in condemnation of that which they pursued in October last. He was not concerned to drive the comparison home. It was enough for him if the policy which they now foreshadowed was a better policy for his country than that which they had adopted before, and he most certainly believed it was so; and, while following the example of the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition (Sir Stafford Northcote), he left in reserve and undiscussed the various branches of the Irish Question that would presently come up for discussion and settlement, he said with all the emphasis in his power that he believed that the one act which had been specifically announced—the release of the three Members of that House who had been kept for six months in gaol—was an act well calculated, in the language of the right hon. Gentleman, to advance the interests of law and order in Ireland. The statement of the right hon. Gentleman on that subject had been received with marked demonstrations of approval in that part of the House; but it had been received with demonstrations of another kind by those whose policy in regard to Ireland was coercion alone. But the right hon. Gentleman, in his long life, and in the many and varied scenes and achievements in which he had taken part, had never spoken truer words than when he said that the release of those three hon. Gentlemen would tend to the advancement of law and order in Ireland. He (Mr. Sexton) invited the right hon. Gentleman to look forward with confidence to the future consequences of that act; he invited him to consider what would be its effect on the minds of the Irish people. He invited him to consider that every day that they detained those hon. Gentlemen in prison was a day added to the inflamed passions and deepening hatred towards the British Government which existed in the breasts of the Irish people; and he asked any man, with the mind of a statesman, what would be the effect of keeping in force such an influence? Unquestionably, the effect of that announcement—though it was a limited and partial one—which had been made that afternoon would, he believed, be immediate and salutary. And he would further say that, for his part, he believed, if the Government only courageously continued in the path in which they had taken the first step that day—if, instead of relying upon repressive laws, opposed to the sympathies of the people, they followed up the axiom long since delivered by the right hon. Gentleman, that this was an Empire which did not rest on repression, but on free opinion; if they applied that axiom to Ireland, if they advanced boldly in regard to the matter of arrears, in regard to the Land Question, and also in the recognition of the national claims of the Irish people, the Government would find that they had taken the first step in a policy that would crown the Ministry which had begun in disgrace with glory, and that would create ties of affection and mutual interest between nations which had been long separated in feeling.

EARL PERCY said, he wished to ask the Prime Minister whether the Business referred to in his statement included the whole of the Resolutions, or only the 1st Resolution; and whether the Corrupt Practices Bill was one of the measures?

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF also wished to ask the Prime Minister whether the release of the three Members of the House who had been confined as “suspects” was entirely unconditional, or whether any condition had been made for the withdrawal of the “no rent circular?”

MR. NEWDEGATE wished to warn the House of the possibility of the released Irish Members renewing their system of Obstruction to the Resolutions as to Procedure now under the consideration of the House.

MR. SPEAKER: I am bound to call the attention of the hon. Gentleman to the fact that the right hon. Gentleman's Resolutions in regard to Procedure are not now under consideration. They are appointed for consideration by-and-bye; but they are not now under consideration.

MR. NEWDEGATE proceeding, said, he hoped hon. Members on that side of the House would take care that they were not involved in the penal consequences of Obstruction, in which two of the hon. Members, who were to be released, rendered themselves particularly conspicuous. He trusted that they would see such a change in the manipulation of the Rules for insuring Order as would secure the House from the annoyance which compelled it to appoint the Committee of 1878. While guarding against the perpetual Obstruction of a small minority, they ought to be careful that they did not involve in the penal consequences of that Obstruction Members who had no responsibility for it.

SIR JOHN HAY said, the hon. Member for Glamorganshire (Mr. Hussey Vivian) had, a short time before, put a question to him (Sir John Hay) which he was unable to answer fully at the time. After consideration, however, and looking to the fact of the resignation of the late Chief Secretary for Ireland, he believed it would not be occupying usefully the time of the House were he to proceed with the Motion of which he had given Notice. He thought it would be more convenient for the House to wait until the late Chief Secretary could make his statement on Thursday; and, recognizing, as he did, the integrity and honour of that right hon. Gentleman, he thought it fair to allow him to make that statement to the House, and not call attention to facts which it would be his duty otherwise to have replied to. Under these circumstances, he thought it would be convenient to the House that he did not proceed at 9 o'clock to the Notice of Motion on the Paper.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, that perhaps the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister would state in what form this question would come up for consideration on Thursday? Of course, he quite agreed it would be undesirable that any debate should occur at the present time. On the announcement that the right hon. Gentleman had made, he (Mr. J. Lowther) did not care to say anything, for he had thought that was not the opportunity on which it could be done. He would only say that, altogether apart from the substance of his announcement with regard to the release of certain persons now in custody, he thought the conditions under which that release had taken place must be viewed apart from the release. He believed the general impression that would be produced throughout the country, when the two simultaneous announcements of the throwing overboard by Her Majesty's Government of one of their Colleagues, the release of these men, and of those other acts to which the right hon. Gentleman had referred were put together, would be that there had been an abdication of the Government de jure in favour of the Government de facto in Ireland. The matter would be regarded as nothing less than an ignominious surrender to the forces of disorder and crime.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, certain questions have been put to me, and I think it due to these hon. Gentlemen to make an answer. Earl the Member for the County of Wick (Earl Pease) spoke of the Resolution on the Resolutions.

The Corrupt Practices Bill included in the Bill, I think I have a question by a measure to the commencement of the Bill which belong to legislation in important and would be allowed consideration of relating to Ireland that answer the Member for Newdegate) as the Government more immediate announcement mediate as we announcement, The hon. Genl. Portsmouth (Genl. Portman) asks me, whether I have been directed to and I thought I answered that at stated that it is a promise, The hon. Genl. Mid Lincolnshire (Genl. Mid Lincolnshire) right hon. Genl. East down (Mr. East down) proached the manner, and I think they have to what and will be proposed to take. We have stated before the House this release is claiming the fulfilment of a promise of a Having done this I have done it for the specially for the and security is that is a fair claim hon. Gentlemen sitting opposite glove, if they are proceeding is a we will defend taken up. Will of the hon.]

Sir John Hay

Sexton), we shall certainly contend that this is no new departure on our part; but that is a question infinitely unimportant, and we shall contend that instead of being an ignominious surrender of the authority of the law, it is the true, wise, and effectual way for its vindication. If the House of Commons does not think so, let it pronounce upon us the condemnation which, in its judgment, it has a perfect right to do.

MR. PLUNKET: Sir, I should not have troubled the House at the present time, if it were only that the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government has thrown down to us this challenge. The right hon. Gentleman thinks he can safely indulge in such gallant and valorous words with his great majority at his back, swelled, as it will be, for the moment, by an accession of Irish Members from below the Gangway. [Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT: Hear, hear!] The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department loudly cheers that observation—he who, amongst others around him, has spent so many moments and hours in this House, during the present Session and the last, in denouncing those very men whom they now propose to conciliate and to release from prison; but I think the Prime Minister will find by-and-bye some difficulty—not, perhaps, in bringing forward a majority to support what he has challenged us to make a question in this House, but in explaining to the country the consistency of the conduct of the Government. But I desire to ask one question of the Government—a very serious one for one who is a Representative in this House of those loyal men in Ireland whose lives and property have been so long endangered. It is a question which will not bear delay. It is not a question with regard to the “suspects” who are now to be released. They were imprisoned on very solemn grounds, that were stated to this House and the country. They were kept in prison in spite of very solemn appeals that were made to the Government by those Members who call themselves the Irish Party in the House, whose advice was not then taken; but whose advice, apparently, is now alone to be considered. And why are the “suspects” to be released now? No explanation is given. The Prime Minister is asked—“What about the charge of treason?” And no answer is given. There is one answer that might be given in the words of an old and well-known couplet—

“Treason ne’er prospers: what’s the reason?
That when it prospers, none dare call it treason.”

I shall say but one word upon any other topic. As regards the resignation of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, the hon. Member who spoke on behalf of his Irish Colleagues (Mr. Sexton)—on behalf of those who are called the Irish Party—showed, I must say, the generosity to abstain from glorying in the triumph they have succeeded in achieving by the sacrifice of the Minister who has borne the brunt of the day in administering the Act and the policy by which the Prime Minister has admitted that he was alone able to confront—and to what extent he has confronted it we know—the tremendous crisis of affairs with which he had to deal in Ireland. But there was one admission made by the Prime Minister, in reply to the hon. Member for Sligo, which sank into my heart with feelings of the gravest alarm. He has made many sudden and wonderful statements to-day; great surprises have been urged upon us, one after another, until we can hardly say in what position we now really stand as regards those great questions; but on one subject he did exhibit, to an extreme degree, that characteristic of his speeches we have so often before seen proving dangerous to the best interests of the country, in being at once encouraging and indistinct. A question was put to him by the hon. Member who spoke for those who are now to be the main advisers of the Ministry with regard to Ireland—namely—“What are you prepared to do with regard to the re-organization of Irish Administration, beginning with Dublin Castle, and going down through the whole hierarchy of magistrates and Constabulary and other authorities in Ireland?” And what was the answer of the Prime Minister? One would have thought, knowing the dangers to life and all that is dear to the dignity of Government and the well-being of the country which had so long existed in Ireland, that on that subject, at least, there would have been no paltering and no hopes held out. For what is it that maintains law and order at this moment in Ireland? Is it not that very "hierarchy of magistrates and Constabulary" to which the hon. Member referred? I say that those magistrates and Constabulary are entitled to the strongest support of the Government in the position that they are placed. But the Prime Minister passed it off as a joke, saying, in effect—"He wondered at the simplicity of mind that could imagine that all this could be done by a stroke of the Resolution," and holding out the hope that the time would come when it would be necessary to deal with this question. But I want to know what is the present opinion of the Prime Minister, whatever may be his ultimate intentions, with regard to the so-called "Irish Administration, beginning with Dublin Castle, and going down through the whole hierarchy of magistrates and Constabulary."

MR. GLADSTONE: I have heard no such words, and I do not believe they were spoken.

MR. PLUNKET: My recollection is different. I distinctly heard them. The meaning of those words, "hierarchy of magistrates and police," is well known. What I want to ask now is not as to the particular manner in which the Prime Minister may by-and-by propose to deal with the question, but in the interest of those whom I represent—my constituents—I have a right to put it to the right hon. Gentleman, that in the meantime this hierarchy—call it what you please—those who represent the powers of the Government shall remain until you have invented something that you can substitute in their place, and shall be maintained, vindicated, and justified in their efforts to maintain law and order in Ireland.

MR. MACARTNEY said, he rose for the purpose of asserting that the proposals of the Government would not satisfy the people of Ireland. Every movement made by the late Chief Secretary for Ireland in the administration of Irish affairs was supported by the other Members of the Cabinet, and now he was allowed to retire because his policy was disapproved. He (Mr. Macartney) had been a long time a Member of the House; and he must say he never heard an announcement that made him tremble more for his country than the announcement of the agreement into which the Prime Minister had entered with the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) as to the principle upon which Ireland was to be governed. If that was to be the principle upon which Ireland was to be governed, the sooner the Government made up their minds to provide for the departure of the loyal inhabitants of Ireland to some other portion of Her Majesty's Dominions the better. He believed that the late Chief Secretary ever acted with the best and most honest intentions; and he was sorry to see hon. Gentlemen sitting behind him join in the hue and cry against the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman had been "baited"—most unmercifully he had been "baited"—a short time ago, and not one single Member on the Treasury Bench stood up and said a word in his favour. He (Mr. Macartney) had heard men in that House use words which he would not repeat. He did not wish to use an un-Parliamentary expression; but he could not help saying that it was not courageous, and that it was an un-English proceeding for a Government to allow their Colleague to be treated as the late Chief Secretary had been. The right hon. Gentleman, he believed, would carry into his retirement the respect of every right-minded man in Ireland. He meant of every right-minded man who feared God, who respected the law, who honoured the King, and who supported the Constitution. The right hon. Gentleman would carry into his retirement the respect of every right-minded man, although they did not agree with the policy of the Government which he carried out. During the time the right hon. Gentleman was in Office he (Mr. Macartney) believed he had two foes to fight, one in front and the other behind—one the rebellious people of Ireland, and the other his Radical Colleagues in the Government.

MR. T. A. DICKSON said, he had listened to no statement in the House of Commons for many years which had given him so much pleasure as that made by Her Majesty's Government; and he had no hesitation in saying that that announcement would do more to restore order in Ireland than a dozen Coercion Acts. He had often said that coercion might repress crime in a temporary manner; but he thought, on the other hand, it was a power that begot crime. He represented as many loyal men in Ulster as the hon. Member who had just sat down (Mr. Macartney); and he would say that the men of Tyrone and Ulster would receive the news with the utmost satisfaction. In September last, in conjunction with the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Givan), he waited on the Chief Secretary for Ireland, representing the loyal farmers of Ulster, to urge the release of the "suspects;" and he thought it would have been better if that advice had then been taken. If that advice had been taken, he believed the best results would have followed. He rejoiced that at last the Government were "clothed and in their right mind;" and he could say that he hoped it was the last time that ever a Liberal Government would be identified with a coercion policy in Ireland. He believed they had burnt their fingers with it that time; and he would ten times rather see the Liberals go to the other side of the House and sit in Opposition, than see them again identify themselves with coercion in Ireland. He had no fear of challenging the loyal men of Ulster, and he could only say that he could await with confidence their verdict upon the policy which Her Majesty's Government had just announced.

Mr. Plunket

MR. GOSCHEN: Sir, I think the House is drifting into a most unsatisfactory position, seeing that we are now having a debate which is no debate. We have not sufficient information before us to pronounce any opinion, and yet some hon. Members have risen and expressed their satisfaction at the announcement; while others have pronounced their disapprobation at the course which the Government proposed to pursue. But what will be the effect of the silence of those who think, like myself, that without sufficient information it is impossible that we can judge of the scheme of the Government? We have much to think over. Till yesterday it was our duty, as it was our pleasure, to deal with the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, who represented, not his own policy, but the policy of the Government. Time after time it was our duty to maintain the policy pursued by the right hon. Gentleman—a policy which, so far as we are aware, may be the policy of the right hon. Gentleman at the present moment. He was in communication with the police all over Ireland, and he was in communication with the magistrates of Ireland; and the right hon. Gentleman has not yet had any opportunity of stating in the House the grounds upon which he thinks the release of the "suspects" is impolitic. I think, in justice to the right hon. Gentleman, we ought to restrain the expression of our opinion on the course Her Majesty's Government have thought fit to pursue. My right hon. Friend at the head of the Government has stated his reason for the adoption of that course—namely, that he believes it to be for the maintenance of law and order in Ireland, a reason which will be established in debate. [MR. GLADSTONE: When challenged.] I do not know whether my right hon. Friend will think he is challenged by the statements which will be made by his late Colleague. I do not know whether Her Majesty's Government intend the Gentleman who has been charged with the administration of Ireland in concert with his Colleagues to state his reasons against the course, and to accept them as a challenge, or to let those reasons pass in silence. For myself, I may say this—that, to my mind, the effect of the release of the "suspects" will depend, in a great measure, upon the fuller arguments which the Government may advance or sustain in defence of that course. ["No, no!"] I do not know whether hon. Members who say "No, no!" are prepared to think that, under all circumstances, and whatever explanations are given, the release of the "suspects" has been desirable. I do not think that there are many on this side of the House who would agree that the release of the "suspects" would be advantageous and expedient, if it had been a surrender prompted by the fear of the Party in Ireland to whom the "suspects" belong. I think a release upon such grounds would clearly be unsatisfactory to those who sit on this side of the House; and, to my mind, it is clear that the language that may be held with regard to the reasons for the release of the "suspects" is an element in the case which we are bound to consider and cannot overlook. We shall hope, in any case, that the anticipations of the Government may be realized, and that the course taken will, as the right hon. Gentleman hopes, tend to increase the prospects of law and order in Ireland. We know that he believes that a social revolution exists in Ireland; and it will have to be proved to us how the release of social revolutionists will increase the prospects of successful resistance to social revolution. It may be so ; but that must depend, in a great part, upon the legislation by which the release of the "suspects" is to be accompanied. Will it be thought in Ireland that this is a new departure, in the sense that there will be less security—legal security—taken for the maintenance of law and order and the protection of life and property? It will, I say, depend upon those measures what will be the effect of the release of the "suspects." I am speaking hypothetically when I say that it is possible that the release of the "suspects" will have a beneficial effect in Ireland ; but it cannot have a beneficial effect on the fortunes of the Empire, unless all parts of the Empire are convinced that the Executive is strong enough to be able to govern Ireland notwithstanding such concessions. My hon. Friend below me (Mr. T. A. Dickson) has said that he hoped the Liberal Party would never again burn its fingers with a policy of coercion. But if there be in Ireland revolution, agitation, and disorder, it would be the duty of any Party, Liberal or Conservative, again to introduce a policy of coercion. The Liberal Party cannot exist if the idea is to be fostered that we are not powerful enough and not strong enough for the suppression of disorder, and for grappling with these disturbances, and that it is only by retreating, and by concession after concession, that we can govern. Sir, I have occupied the House too long, after what I have stated—that we have not the whole facts before us, and I may have been too warm ; but as my right hon. Friend at the head of the Government spoke in warm language when he felt that a challenge had been thrown out to him by the other side, so I may be pardoned if in the face of events as stirring as any that for many days have happened—if in view of the fact that in the midst of the troubles in Ireland, the resignation of the right hon. Gentleman who has been charged with the maintenance of law and order in Ireland should take place, and the release of the "suspects" be announced—I may be pardoned, I hope, if I also speak with some warmth. I need not assure the House that in what I have said I am not animated by the slightest disregard for

Mr. Goschen

Her Majesty's Government. I think they will do me the credit of believing that it is not my motive to attack them, and that if I have spoken with feeling, it is because we are in the middle of an important crisis, when we must not mince our words. My hon. Friends around me will not, I am sure, mince theirs, when we all shall be afforded an opportunity of stating, at the proper time, our opinions upon events which must have most grave and important consequences to the country at large.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL said, it might be quite right of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen), who had been a consistent supporter of what he would call the coercive policy of the Government, to assume a judicial frame of mind, and say he would prefer to postpone uttering a final expression of opinion upon the announcement made by the Prime Minister until further information was before the House ; but, for his (Mr. Charles Russell's) own part, believing, as he and those who acted with him did, that the policy of coercion in Ireland was not an aid to law and order—was not in reality suppressive of crime, but really provocative of crime—he did not require to wait, and would not hesitate at once to express his satisfaction at the announcement that the Government did not intend to continue that policy of coercion. He agreed with the hon. Member for Tyrone (Mr. T. A. Dickson) that the Prime Minister's statement would be hailed with satisfaction in Ireland ; and he believed it would do more to render the task of governing Ireland easy to the Executive than whole regiments of soldiers and troops of Constabulary. He also cordially agreed with the senior hon. Member for Tyrone (Mr. Macartney) in what he had said with reference to the late Chief Secretary for Ireland. He fully believed that the right hon. Gentleman went to Ireland with the best intentions, and that he spared no effort to discharge his duty according to his sense of what that duty was ; but he felt bound emphatically to say that in a material part of his policy the right hon. Gentleman was acting on a mistaken view, though he was also bound to say that his policy was the policy of the Government, who had made no attempt to shelve it upon the right hon. Gentleman. He was utterly at a loss to understand what was the cause of the exceeding vehemence of the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Plunket). The hon. Member for Longford (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) asked a question of importance, he (Mr. Russell) admitted, and of significance; but what was it? It was—whether there was to be a change in what the hon. Member called the mechanism of the government of Ireland? Did the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin desire to say that the existing form of government in Ireland in its administration was satisfactory? Did the right hon. and learned Gentleman mean to say that if he was in Office he would not admit that there were grave and serious questions as to the Executive Government in Ireland? Was it not a confessed fact that there was not on the face of the world such a centralized and bureaucratic form of Government as that which existed in Ireland, and that there was no country where things were so ordered as to cast so little responsibility on the people? He (Mr. Russell) recognized as an important and necessary principle that the government of Ireland must rest mainly with the Irish people, and that before the Irish people could be expected in their utterances or their public acts to show a due sense of responsibility, they must have the power which brought with it a sense of responsibility. The right hon. and learned Gentleman made another complaint—forsooth, that the Irish Representatives had been consulted in this matter. Who were to be listened to, he (Mr. Charles Russell) would like to know, unless the Representatives of the people? Irish Members below the Gangway might not represent the opinions of his right hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Plunket), or, indeed, what he (Mr. Charles Russell) himself in all respects wished; but those Gentlemen were, de facto, the Representatives of the great bulk of the people of Ireland. Was the government of Ireland to be carried on by the shutting of eyes and ears to facts, and to the opinions, statements, and information of the Representatives of the people? That did not seem to him to be statesmanship. There were other Irish Members besides those opposite; and he (Mr. Charles Russell) would say it was a happy augury if it was the fact that they were consulted—which he did not know. It was a happy augury if the Government were to take into consultation the Members sitting upon all sides of the House, representing all shades of opinion in Ireland—not, indeed, necessarily for the purpose of acting on the opinions of particular Members, but of gathering the sense of those who occupied the responsible position of the Representatives of the people. He believed that it would be found that the announcement of the Prime Minister, if carried out in its spirit, and in the meaning which the House had attributed to it, would work truly for the pacification of Ireland.

MR. GIBSON: Sir, it is not my intention at all to criticize the remarkable statement which has been made to the House this afternoon by the Prime Minister at any great length. The proper time for doing that will be when we shall have an opportunity of considering the reasons which have induced the grave announcement that has been made—that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland would no longer be answerable for the peace and government of Ireland under the altered condition of affairs. The hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell) has introduced an element which will be jealously scanned—namely, how far and what Irish Members were consulted so as to arrive at an understanding upon this matter. My object in rising now is to elicit a few words from the Government which will enable loyal people in Ireland to feel some sentiment of safety. In the remarkable utterances of the Prime Minister, to which I have listened with a painful interest and close anxiety, I failed to hear one solitary word which would indicate that the Government, although they were about to make a remarkable change in their procedure, would steadily, firmly, and courageously protect the magistrates of Ireland in the discharge of their duties. I failed to hear anything in that direction even, when my right hon. and learned Colleague (Mr. Plunket), in warm and generous words, drew the attention of the Prime Minister to the matter, and asked that he would support the Irish Constabulary in the discharge of their difficult duties, rendered all the more difficult in consequence of the action of the Government. I am entitled to demand from the Prime Minister, before this Sitting closes, that he will, in a few strong, plain words, indicate to the loyal classes in Ireland that they will still be supported by the efforts of the Government, that law will be preserved, that terrorism will be struggled with, and that by what has been announced to-day it is not meant that the efforts of the Government to secure the first ends of government will be weakened or abandoned.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, I absolutely deny that there is any occasion for the assurance which has just been demanded from my right hon. Friend; but I rise for the purpose of saying two or three words in reply to the challenge which has been thrown out by the two right hon. and learned Gentlemen who represent the University of Dublin. The right hon. and learned Gentlemen complained that the Prime Minister, in the important statement which he has made, said nothing about the intention of the Government to support the magistrates and Constabulary in the discharge of the arduous duties which fell to their lot. Sir, why was it necessary that my right hon. Friend should make any statement upon a subject which is absolutely obvious? Who denies—who has ever doubted—that the support of the magistracy and Constabulary in the discharge of their duties is the first duty of the Government? And what is there in what fell from my right hon. Friend to-night which can make any Member of this House doubt for one moment that the Government are alive to the duty, and intend to perform it? On the contrary, my right hon. Friend has done more—he has admitted that the existing powers of the law are not, as they stand, sufficient to give to the magistrates, the Constabulary, and the authorities engaged in the preservation of peace all the power they ought to have in dealing with the question of the suppression of crime. He has announced the intention of the Government to appeal, at the very earliest opportunity, to this House to strengthen the law in these respects. Sir, can it be supposed by anyone who is not animated—I do not want to use strong language—but who is not animated by a strong Party feeling, that the Government, in coming forward and announcing their intention to strengthen the hands of the Constabulary and the magistrates in the discharge of their duty, are, in the meanwhile, going to omit the primary and Constitutional duty of giving them every support which the existing powers of the law will enable them to do? I am not going to enter into any discussion as to the policy which has been announced to the House to-night. Some hon. Gentlemen who have spoken, including, I think, my right hon. Friend the Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen), seem to consider that a duty fell upon the Government not only to make a statement of their policy, but also to defend it. I venture to think it is not the duty of the Government to defend its policy until it is attacked. ["Oh, oh!"] I may hold an erroneous opinion in that respect, but that is the opinion I hold. Some hon. Members seem to think it is the duty of the Government first to formulate an attack upon themselves, and then to state the reasons which may be urged against their defence. I can hardly doubt that, after the gallant words which we have heard from hon. Members on the Opposition Benches this afternoon, we shall have that opportunity. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the senior Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket) seemed to make it a matter of some complaint that we challenged him and his Party to attack and impeach our policy if they thought it worth impeachment. I cannot imagine that such an attack will be presented on the part of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, because the circumstances are such that he is no longer to be supported by hon. Members below the Gangway, who have, on previous occasions, connected themselves with the Party opposite so constantly. I do not suppose that it is only an occasion when a majority is expected, or, at all events, a large minority, that the conduct of the Government may be impeached by the Opposition. I conceive that the decision of whether a Motion of Censure is to be brought forward or not would not depend on the number of Members by which such a Motion would be supported, so much as by the justice of the cause. Therefore, I conceive that if the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues think what we have announced to-night worthy of the censure of the House and the country, they will not shrink from the obvious duty of an Opposition, and challenge our policy. I will only say further that I venture to think it is not the duty of the Government to formulate excuses which would throw any doubt on the wisdom of the course they have adopted.

Mr. Gibson

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, that he should be sorry if the tepid speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen) should go forth as representing in any manner the general feeling of Members on the Liberal side of the House. The Prime Minister had said that the course they had taken would promote law and order. He (Mr. Arnold) felt that the Prime Minister had established a new claim to their confidence by the policy he had now announced.

MR. SPEAKER announced that, according to the Rules of the House, only one minute remained in which to dispose of the Question before the Chair. If it were not withdrawn a difficulty would arise.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

The House suspended its Sitting at Seven of the clock.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

M O T I O N .

OXFORD UNIVERSITY (JESUS COLLEGE STATUTES).

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

MR. HUSSEY VIVIAN, in rising to move—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty that She will be graciously pleased to withhold her consent from the Statutes proposed by the University of Oxford Commissioners for Jesus College, which Statutes were laid upon the Table of this House on the 7th of February last,”

said, that Jesus College had always been an essentially Welsh College; and the Government, in the Speech from the Throne, had announced their intention of dealing with the question of Intermediate and Higher Education in Wales. He thought, therefore, that that was an inopportune moment for disposing of the revenues of that College, because they ought to be dealt with as a portion of the scheme which the Government was going to bring forward. The large endowment of the College would form an important element in the question of Higher Education in Wales. It was not easy to state what the income of the College was. But from the Report of 1873 it would appear to fall little short of £15,000. The Statute as it now stood proposed that some of the Fellowships should be exclusively Welsh; but with the Scholarships it was different. Formerly there were 20 Welsh and 2 open Scholarships. The Statute proposed that there should be only 12 Welsh Scholarships and 8 open Scholarships, thus 40 per cent were to be open, and no longer Welsh. But there was a provision that, when the funds would admit of it, there should be 24 Scholarships, so that Wales would then only have half the Scholarships. Then there were 30 Exhibitions, which were formerly confined to Wales. Those Exhibitions were now to be in the discretion of the Principal and Fellows, and were in no way confined to Wales. No doubt, it would be said that most of the Colleges in Oxford and Cambridge were originally confined to particular counties, and that it had been found beneficial to throw them open. But the case was not parallel; for the same language was spoken in all the counties of England, whereas in Wales a language prevailed more different from English than any European language, except, perhaps, Slavonian. It was, therefore, unjust to deprive young Welshmen of the advantage of competing only among themselves for prizes, founded exclusively for their benefit. Jesus College was founded in Queen Elizabeth's Reign on the petition of Dr. Hugh at Rhys, for the benefit of Wales. It was largely endowed by Sir Leoline Jenkins, a great lawyer and a Welshman, born near Cowbridge, in the county of Glamorgan. Sir Leoline Jenkins, who at one time was Principal of Jesus College, endowed Cowbridge School, where he had been educated, and at his death, in 1685, left his property to Jesus College, subject to a large provision for Cowbridge School. By his will Sir Leoline Jenkins had given priority among his bequests to those which referred exclusively to Cowbridge School. Although, in consequence of a decree of the Court of Chancery, Jesus College had legally taken the whole of the surplus money bequeathed under that will, there could be no doubt that morally Cowbridge School was entitled to its fair share; the College had no moral right to deprive the School of its fair proportion of the bequests. The income of the estate of Sir Leoline Jenkins was at the time of his death £407, and of that amount the School was entitled to 21 per cent. The income was now, however, £6,600 a-year, and the estate itself was a largely increasing one. There were minerals under the land of considerable value, and there was also land in London increasing in value. After paying the charges created by the testator, the School ought to receive £1,260 a-year; but it was at present only receiving £100 a-year. It was proposed by the Statutes to empower the Principal and Fellows of Jesus College to give £200 a-year more to Cowbridge School—£100 to the Master, and £100 to deserving boys. This was only a permissive power. The Statutes inflicted a great hardship on the School, for they proposed to perpetuate the injustice of the last 200 years. The Home Secretary would, no doubt, say the School was only entitled to the sum originally left to it. That might be law, but it was not justice; and it was not the testator's intention. He appealed to the House of Commons as a Court of Justice, and not of law. It was from that House alone that redress could be sought. It was as great a case of hardship as had ever come before the House, and if the Statutes were allowed to pass they would be continuing a great injustice. Nothing would benefit Wales, and especially South Wales, more than the erection of this School into a first-class Grammar School in the county which he had the honour to represent. The Welsh desired not to confine their education to technical subjects, but to have the benefit of a sound classical education, which was a matter the Government would have to deal with before long, and it would be advisable to weld this Institution into any measure they proposed. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty that She will be graciously pleased to withhold her consent from the Statutes proposed by the University of Oxford Commissioners for Jesus College, which Statutes were laid upon the Table of this House on the 7th of February last."—(Mr Hussey Vivian.)

Mr. Hussey Vivian

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT was understood to say that upon the general question of Welsh Education he agreed with his hon. Friend behind him, though upon the question before the House he had expressed opinions at which, if they had proceeded from the Benches opposite, now rather empty, he should have felt no surprise. In these cases a good deal was often said about the intentions of the pious Founder; and no doubt Sir Leoline Jenkins, the Founder of this School, was a man of note, for he was the greatest international lawyer of his day. He thought, however, his hon. Friend had given undue development to the wishes of the pious Founder. The Liberal Party had proceeded on the principle of abolishing close Colleges and close Fellowships; but they were now asked, practically, to adopt an opposite course. He asked on what ground they could keep the Fellowships of this College for a particular part of the country? He was not a particular admirer of the work of the Commission; but it was not possible to review it without destroying it altogether. It was to be deplored that such was the case. He was bound to say that in this matter he did not think the Commissioners were to be blamed. Jesus College was only a constituent part of the Colleges of Oxford; and if one College was thrown out of the whole contributory machine, it would be exempt from any scheme of University reform, and that was not a reasonable proposition. He hoped the House, therefore, would reject the proposal of the hon. Member.

MR. THOROLD ROGERS said, that something, after all, was to be said for local Scholarships, &c., in connection with the Universities. The system ought to be judged by its results; and he did not hesitate to say that the Welsh endowments in Jesus College had been of considerable advantage both to the College and the University. It not unfrequently happened that persons of humble origin, who would otherwise have been unable to obtain an academical education, were enabled, by means of those endowments, to achieve a distinguished University career; and at present there were two striking instances of the service which the endowments of Jesus College had done. Of course, the present question was only the prelude to a more important one. As a matter of fact, Parliament passed an excellent Bill in 1877, by which at least £250,000 a-year was placed at the disposal of the Commissioners. How the Commissioners discharged their office would not then be proper to mention; but of all the Colleges which had come under their notice, Jesus College was the greatest sinner in the whole University. That College proposed to establish one Tutorial Fellow to every seven undergraduates. Each was to have, at least, £600 a-year; in addition to that he was to have, under certain conditions, a capitation fee of £5 per head on undergraduates, which was to come out of the funds for the advancement of Higher Education, so that £4,300 a-year would be absorbed by the Tutorial Fellows. These gentlemen would be engaged in delivering more or less vapid lectures, more vapid as they got older. The Commissioners had established 131 of these abominations, and there was every prospect of the whole University in time becoming absorbed by them. But, to turn to the particular case of Cowbridge School, it might, perhaps, be hard for the Fellows of Jesus to make any contribution to their funds, as was usually the case when the Foundation was rich; but that was not the question. Parliament had dealt thus with Eton College and the Dean and Chapter of Westminster in relation to Eton and Westminster Schools. It had been done in the case of the Regius Professor of Greek at Christ Church, and it was for the House to say whether it should not be done in the case of Cambridge. The present system inaugurated by the Commissioners, who had aimed at establishing a Body of Tutorial Fellows and enlarging the Professoriate, did not work well. The Tutorial Fellows "Boycotted" the Professors. He had lately spoken to Mr. Stubbs, a gentleman who had a reputation beyond the walls of his College, upon the subject. Mr. Stubbs told him some time ago that he had prepared a course of lectures on the Secular and Social Causes of the Reformation, and that the only audience he had consisted of three Masters of Arts and one lady. He believed that the Statutes which the Commissioners had framed for the University of Oxford would involve the irremediable ruin of the interests of Higher Education. He considered that if his hon. Friend carried his Motion—in which he supported him—they would set an example of how they should deal with Statutes like those in which the general interests of local education were sacrificed, and in which the best future of the highest education was, as he believed, not only brought into peril, but irretrievably doomed.

MR. BRYCE said, he must protest against the language which the last speaker had used with regard to some persons at Oxford, and more particularly in regard to certain Heads of Colleges. Those Heads of Colleges who had been masters of schools were among the ablest and most energetic of the Oxford residents. No one among them was more generally respected than the Head of Jesus College, nor had any one shown a more sincere desire to do the best he could for the education of the Principality. The real question, however, now before the House was whether those Statutes should pass or not. The hon. Member for Glamorganshire (Mr. Hussey Vivian) had complained that those Statutes did not do as much for education in Wales as ought to be done, and that the right of natives of the Principality to Scholarships and Fellowships was not sufficiently recognized. Now, he thought there was a very strong case for attaching certain special privileges to Welsh schools and Welsh students, and for making grants of money to a country which had been so much neglected, and which was so much in want of those endowments. But if they looked at the Statutes of Jesus College they would find that a good deal was done for Wales and for Welsh students, a considerable proportion of the Fellowships and Scholarships being restricted to natives of Wales or of Monmouthshire. If it was said that more ought to have been done, and that these Statutes ought to have reserved nearly the whole of the Scholarships and Fellowships for the Welsh schools, he replied that that would not be a real benefit to Welsh students themselves. It was far better for them that they should mix in the society of what, more or less, was an ordinary College, and that they should come into contact with young Englishmen, than that they should be confined to a purely Welsh atmosphere while their minds were being formed. In the interests of Wales itself, then, he thought that the Commissioners would have made a mistake if they had given a larger share than they had done of the College endowments to the students from Wales. With regard to the share to which Cowbridge School was entitled out of the endowments of Jesus College, the hon. Member asked them to disturb an arrangement which had existed for 200 years. Under that arrangement, based upon a decree in Chancery made in the Reign of James II. — a decree which was evidently right in law — Jesus College had enjoyed the property given it by Sir Leoline Jenkins without interruption or adverse claim. When the Commissioners came to deal with Jesus College they found certain property; they ascertained that that property belonged to the College in exactly the same way as any other property held by the College; and though they might have thought it would have been a good thing if Cowbridge School could get a larger share of them, they had to carry out an Act of Parliament, and they could not legally do what it did not authorize. There was not a single word in the Act of 1877 which would justify the appropriation of any property belonging to the College to any external Body or person. There was a discussion in that House in 1877 as to whether the Commissioners should have the power to devote a portion of the revenues of any College to purposes not directly connected with such College or with the University, and it was decided that they should have no such power. The Commissioners had done all that they legally could, and one might almost be surprised that they should have been able to go as far as they had gone in favour of Cowbridge School.

SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY, as a Member of the Commission, said, that he should have been content to have rested their defence upon the speech of the Home Secretary, for what had been said appeared to him to be conclusive. There was nothing that would have enabled them to give money to Cowbridge School; and, therefore, there was no case to answer. It was not their fault that the Act did not enable them to do more. If it was desired that more should be done, as in the case of other public schools, let a Bill be brought in to divert some of the endowments of Jesus College to practical education in Wales, and he would promise all the assistance he could in developing the project; but it was not fair to attack these Statutes or the Commissioners for that which they were unable to do. The result of rejecting these Statutes would be to leave things in the position in which they stood previous to the Act of 1877, and to deprive Cowbridge and other schools of endowments they now had, and to restore the former close and clerical character of the Foundation. Unquestionably, the action of the Commissioners, so far as regarded Jesus College, had not been an unfriendly one towards Wales or towards the School at Cowbridge. For his purpose it did not matter what the figures were; the Commissioners had gone to the full extent of their legal rights in doing what they could to improve and aid Higher Education in Wales. Not very much had been said as to the College Exhibitions; but he supposed that those to which allusion had been made were the Leoline Jenkins Exhibitions, which had been thrown into the general Exhibition fund. He believed, but was not certain, that there was a specific application of part of that fund; but, however that might be, the general policy of the Commissioners had been to enable the Governing Bodies of the Colleges to assist needy and deserving students. Many hon. Members who took an interest in this question would, perhaps, have been glad if some of the money which now brought Welsh students compulsorily to Jesus College had been diverted so as to help them to enter other Colleges; but the Commissioners had not the power of making any such change, and were obliged to confine the school and College endowments to the several schools and Colleges. If there was one set of Statutes which were practically unassailable, it was the Statutes of Jesus College, with respect to which the Commissioners had here and there stretched a point, in the belief that the circumstances of Wales were exceptional, and demanded that the Scholarships and Fellowships should be kept close. In any case, however, the hon. Member for Glamorganshire (Mr. Hussey Vivian) was mistaken in supposing that Wales would be benefited by the rejection of the new Statutes. Not only was there no authority now in existence which had the power of re-casting them, but no future Commissioners were likely to relax them in a manner more favourable to the claims of Wales. The Commissioners had made an honest attempt, supported by the Principal of the College, to satisfy the legitimate wants of Welsh Education. If it was alleged that the Church of England religious teaching given in the College kept away Nonconformist students, he could only say that there was now less teaching of that kind than there used to be; that attendance at chapel was voluntary; and that nothing was done to prevent Nonconformists from being on an equality with the other members of the College. The hon. Member for Southwark (Mr. Thorold Rogers), who, as was well known, had his own views about the University, had made several complaints, but had not made sufficient allowance for the difficulties the Commissioners had had to meet. He (Sir Matthew Ridley) held that, on the whole, they had done their duty well; but it was not easy for them to impress their policy on all the Colleges; and so, wherever they had apparently failed to make reforms, it was to be remembered that they had not been free to act apart from the general feeling of the University. For the sereasons, he could not support the proposal to reject the Statutes of this College.

SIR EDWARD REED said, that the speech of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce) was very unsatisfactory; but a more extraordinary answer than that of the Home Secretary to the statement of the hon. Member for Glamorganshire (Mr. Hussey Vivian) he had never heard. If Liberal principles were what the right hon. and learned Gentleman stated that night, Welsh Members had a good deal to learn. He (Sir Edward Reed) objected to the alienation of the revenues of Jesus College merely for the sake of bringing the English and the Welsh students into more intimate association with each other. According to the admitted facts of the case, in the original bequest in the 16th century of certain properties in Lambeth, it was provided that two-thirds of the income thence derived should go to Jesus College, and the other one-third to Cowbridge Grammar School. That being the case, the same ratio should be now observed when the property had increased seventeen-fold in value. If that rule were followed, Cowbridge School, instead of being pushed aside with £400 per annum, would be entitled to nearly £2,000 per annum. Within three years of the bequest coming into operation a question arose about a certain small residue, and the Court of Chancery decided that it should become the property of the College to which the whole had been bequeathed in trust, partly for the benefit of Cowbridge School, and now the College appropriated the larger part of the increased value. His contention and that of his hon. Friends was that Cowbridge Grammar School was as much before the mind of the testator as Jesus College. But because, 200 years ago, the Court of Chancery decided that the miserable residue then in question should go to the College, they were told that it was not only legally right that this College should go on appropriating nearly the whole of the property, but that it was absolutely wrong for them to ask that the case should be reconsidered.

SIR JOHN MOWBRAY said, he could not enter into the controversy which had arisen between the hon. Member for Pembroke (Sir Edward Reed) and the Home Secretary as to what were Liberal principles. Nothing could be more difficult than for that House to consider the complicated legal question. The was asked to enter upon that inquiry upon an ex parte statement, and to set aside the decisions come to by the Commissioners after the most minute and careful examination; but there was really nothing which the House could do. This money could not be touched without the consent of Jesus College, inasmuch as the legal right of the College to the surplus of the property had been settled and established by law for two centuries. The Statutes could not be altered in part, but must be accepted or rejected as a whole. The hon. Member for Southwark (Mr. Thorold Rogers) had spoken in so vague and discursive a manner that it was difficult to meet his remarks; but as regarded his observations on dogmatic schoolmasters, he (Sir John Mowbray) could say confidently that the present Principal of Jesus College was an able and accomplished scholar, who had been a successful schoolmaster, and was now an energetic Head of a College. He was one of the few Members now in the House who recollected the prolonged discussion which took place upon the University Bills in 1854 and 1877; he remembered the difficulty then experienced in interesting the House, or maintaining its attention to the subject; and he thought even a Select Committee would experience the same difficulty now. If he might venture to make a suggestion, he thought that the University required rest. They had had University Commissions and University Acts in 1850, 1854, and again in 1874 and 1877; and it was most important that the new Statutes should have a fair trial, after which they might, if necessary, be revised. But, if they were to be revised, it would be proper to intrust the task to some Body more competent to deal with the question than that House—and that Body was the Universities Committee of the Privy Council, which ought to be strengthened and made efficient for the work.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD said, that their case was that Jesus College was a Welsh College, founded and endowed for Welshmen; and the Commissioners, in failing to recognize that fact, had failed to satisfy any class in Wales. Jesus College, though locally situated in Oxford, was as much a Welsh College as Trinity College, Dublin, was an Irish College; and as all the endowments were intended for the Welsh people, and were, in justice, the property of the Welsh people, the Commissioners had no right to divert any portion of those endowments towards any other object. He believed the Commissioners had taken pains to form a fair scheme; but they had adopted a wrong principle, and had dealt with the College revenues as if they had not been the special property of the people of Wales.

MR. RATHBONE said, he well remembered that the House was assured they might trust the Universities to deal with the Commission in a much more liberal way than they had done. The practical question was how they could best remedy the evil. The hon. Baronet opposite (Sir John Mowbray) had referred them to future legislation as the only means of gaining what was due. They would probably have an opportunity of dealing with the subject when the question of Welsh Education came on; and he would suggest that it would be well to leave this matter to that opportunity.

MR. J. G. TALBOT said, there had not been a single opportunity for the discussion of the important Statutes connected with the Universities and Colleges, which in a very few days would become law. The intention of Parliament, in providing that they should lie on the Table for a certain time before they became law, would thus be defeated. There was an important Body—the Universities Committee of the Privy Council—to which alone hereafter would belong the revision of any of these University Statutes. Some proposition should be made by the Government for the reconstitution of that Committee before the Session ended. The matter had been brought before Parliament at the end of last Session; but, owing to a disagreement between the two Houses, nothing was done. It was the duty of the Government not to delay in that matter. He hoped that the hon. Member for Glamorganshire (Mr. Hussey Vivian) would be satisfied with the discussion, and would not press his Motion to a division.

MR. HUSSEY VIVIAN said, he could not avoid thanking his right hon. and learned Friend (Sir William Harcourt) for his kind lecture upon Liberalism. His right hon. and learned Friend appeared to be greatly in love with any arrangement, however unjust, which had the prescription of 200 years in its favour. Now, certainly, he (Mr. Hussey Vivian) had learned his Liberalism in a different school. He had always been under the impression that no prescription gave any right to the continued existence of an abuse, if it were an abuse, and he could not help thinking that it was an abuse, when they had a College which educated some 60 students, and which spent in doing so a sum of £15,000 a-year. He did not think that Institutions of that kind could be defended, or that anyone who took exception to Institutions of that kind should be accused of a want of Liberalism. He thought that true Liberal principles would rather lie in the proper use of ancient endowments to develop and extend, as far as possible, the benefits of education in the present day. His right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary said that no property would be safe if a prescription of 200 years was to be attacked. This property was not private property, but a public endowment left for the benefit of the public. That was a doctrine he was astonished to hear come from his right hon. and learned Friend; and it was very much in contrast with the calm and excellent statement made by the hon. Baronet the Member for North Northumberland (Sir Matthew White Ridley). He (Mr. Hussey Vivian) had no wish whatever to attack the Commissioners, nor did he think he had said anything which could be construed into an attack upon the Commission. He had simply taken an exception to a Statute proposed for Jesus College. He did not say that the Commissioners could have proposed a larger provision for Cowbridge School, because he believed that their powers in that respect were limited. He had taken exception to that one Statute becoming the law of the land, because he thought that it was absolutely necessary that they should protest in the strongest manner against the perpetuation of what he still held to be one of the grossest cases of injustice which had ever come under his notice. Certainly, the matter should not rest where it was. It was probable that if he went to a division now, with the combined opposition of the Government and the Conservatives, he would be left in a small minority; but he thought that it would not have been consistent with his duty, if he allowed this Statute to become law without protesting in the strongest manner against it, and bringing forward publicly the gross injustice which had existed for the last 200 years. He was sensible that it was of no use whatever to put the House to the trouble of a division after the declaration of Her Majesty's Government that they did not intend to support him in this Motion. But, at the same time, he wished to state that, whenever an opportunity occurred of redressing this grievance, he should undoubtedly endeavour, to the best of his ability, to do so, and especially when they were afforded an opportunity of discussing the question of Higher and Intermediate Education in Wales. He begged distinctly to give Notice that when that question was brought on he would revert to this subject, and that he would do his very best to obtain for the ancient Grammar School at Cowbridge the full enjoyment of the endowment left to it 200 years ago. He begged now to withdraw the Motion.

Sir John Mowbray

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

—o—

DISTRESS AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL 73.]

(Sir Henry Holland, Sir Walter B. Barttelot, Mr. Joseph Pease, Mr. Cropper.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND said, that in moving that the Speaker should leave the Chair, in order that the House might go into Committee on this Bill, he wished to explain that, as the whole subject of distress was now under the consideration of a Committee upstairs, he did not propose to ask for more than that the Speaker should leave the Chair. What he proposed was that, when the House got into Committee, the formal Motion for postponing the Preamble should be agreed to, and after Clause 1 had been passed he would move to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair,"—(Sir Henry Holland,)—put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Preamble postponed.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Sir Henry Holland,)—put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Tuesday next.

METROPOLIS MANAGEMENT AND BUILDING ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

(Sir James M'Garel-Hogg, Admiral Sir John Hay, Sir Andrew Lusk.)

[BILL 107.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Sir James M'Garel-Hogg.)

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE said, he thought that, at that hour of the night, it was impossible for the House to discuss the Bill with any advantage. The Bill was a very important one, and the second reading of it was passed without any statement having been made by the hon. Baronet who was in charge of it; and who still, without making any statement with regard to it, now proposed to go into Committee. There were very important matters affecting the City of London raised in the Bill, which he was quite sure the hon. Baronet would consider when his attention was called to them. Therefore, it was probable that they would really gain time by postponing the Committee, because the opposition now raised to the Bill might be disarmed if certain alterations were made in it affecting the Metropolis generally, but affecting also, very materially, the City of London. If the Bill were carried in its present shape those who had the direction of improvements in the City would be prevented from acting, and from using the powers already possessed by them under special Acts of Parliament. The clauses of the Bill certainly required more consideration than could be devoted to them at that hour of the night. There were altogether 25 clauses in the Bill, and most of them affected the City of London. In the City of London, a Body called the Commissioners of Sewers had the management and direction of the laying out of the streets, and the street improvements; but if the Bill passed as it now stood they would be entirely deprived of their authority. That authority was conferred upon them by more than one Act of Parliament, and the passing of this new Bill would prevent them from carrying out those Acts for the benefit of the inhabitants of the City and of the Metropolis generally. It was well known that the City of London still retained many of the peculiarities of all old cities; many of its streets were very narrow, and when improvements were being effected, it would be impossible, in many cases, to make streets where streets were most urgently required, because, under this Bill, no street was to be made that should be less than 40 feet in width. It was well known that in many parts of the City, where new streets and thoroughfares had been most advantageously opened out, it would have been altogether impossible to provide that they should be 40 feet wide. Consequently, if the Commissioners of Sewers were to be controlled by the provisions of the present Bill, many of the improvements, which it was still desirable to carry out, would be prevented. He was afraid that the Bill had been drawn up without proper thought; and it would be improper to call upon the House to consider all the important details at such an hour of the night, when it was impossible to examine them thoroughly. Then, again, as to the question of making thoroughfares. There were many thoroughfares in the City of London that were simply footways, and the Commissioners were constantly extending these footways and opening up new communications; but their future action in that respect would be prevented by one of the provisions of the Bill. As the Bill stood, it would be necessary for the authorities in the City to apply for permission to the Metropolitan Board of Works. Such a provision might be all very well where they were dealing with new districts—where the land had not been built upon already. It was essential that in such a case the streets authorized to be constructed should be wide, and laid out with due regard to all modern sanitary requirements, and to the communication proposed to be effected with existing thoroughfares. But it was impossible to do that in the City of London. The circumstances of the City were exceptional; and, therefore, the City ought to be exempted from the operation of the provisions of the Bill. Hon. Members might feel some surprise that the City should ask for exemption from a measure which was introduced for the general advantage of the Metropolis; but the City already possessed Parliamentary powers fully adequate to enable them to carry out their own improvements, and the authorities ought not to have their efforts crippled by the intervention of another public Body. The Corporation of London were not backward in carrying out necessary improvements. Notwithstanding the difficulties they had to contend with, they had not been deterred by any question of expense from undertaking any improvement that the interests of the public demanded. The present Bill, under the circumstances he had pointed out, would require careful consideration, clause by clause; many of its provisions would require material alterations, fresh clauses would have to be brought up, and the whole framework of the Bill would require reconsideration and considerable discussion. No statement was made by the hon. Baronet the Member for Truro (Sir James M'Garel-Hogg) on the second reading of the Bill, beyond a short explanation that it was merely a formal measure to carry out an Order of the House. In moving that the House should go into Committee upon it, the hon. Baronet still refrained from making a full explanatory statement, and moved its committal as a mere matter of form. But he (Mr. Alderman W. Lawrence) was satisfied that when the Bill got into Committee, and the clauses came up for consideration, they would be found to be anything but a mere matter of form; and certainly the hon. Baronet would not have expedited matters by having abstained from making any preliminary statement. In introducing a Bill of this nature, some understanding ought to have been come to between the Metropolitan Board of Works and the authorities of the City of London. There ought to be a mutual good understanding between the two Bodies. It was the duty of both to carry out improvements for the benefit of the Metropolis; but it was not necessary that either should interfere with the action of the other. Both of them had different spheres of action, and both possessed very large powers. Hitherto such powers had been used beneficially for the inhabitants of the Metropolis; and this was not the first time that the Metropolitan Board of Works had introduced clauses into a Bill which would give them the right of interfering materially with the powers possessed by the City. But the House had always declined to sanction such clauses; and he must say that he looked upon the action of the Board of Works, in the present instance, with some surprise and astonishment. The second reading was obtained at the close of the Day Sitting on Wednesday last, and it was obtained rather as a matter of surprise. There were three Motions on the Paper against it; but the hon. Gentlemen who had given Notice of such Motions were not in their places between a quarter to 6 and 6 o'clock, and the second reading was moved and carried without opposition, the hon. Baronet being in his place to watch the interests of the Bill. But the second reading having been accomplished in that way, surely it became all the more necessary that the principle and objects of the Bill should be explained and discussed on the Motion for going into Committee. The hon. Baronet, however, had not considered it his duty to take such a course, and had contented himself with moving, as a matter of form, the committal of the Bill. Some of the provisions were admirable ones. It provided, very properly, that no temporary or permanent erections should be constructed within the district under the control of the Metropolitan Works without an application, in the first instance, to the Board. But was it right that the City of London should be placed in the same position as a private individual in regard to the Board of Works, and that the Board should have power to control and regulate the proceedings of the City in regard to all questions affecting street improvements? At the present moment the City of London was engaged in the erection of additional Courts in connection with their Court of Common Council, and they were carrying out other public buildings. Was it to be tolerated that in regard to similar works in future they were to be precluded in the first instance, they applied to, and obtained the sanction of, the Metropolitan Board. Such an intention was never put forward when the Board of Works was established. He was satisfied that his hon. Friend the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board would say that if that was the meaning of the Bill it was not his intention; but, unfortunately, the House could not take his hon. Friend's intentions. They could only take the provisions they found in the Bill, and in regard to those provisions it was highly essential that so important a Body as the Corporation of the City of London should be fully protected, and should have an opportunity of going thoroughly into the matter. The Bill consisted of three parts, and it raised a great variety of questions. Clause 7 related to the construction of new streets; and as the hon. Baronet had not made any statement whatever in reference to the provisions of the Bill, it was necessary that he (Mr. Alderman W. Lawrence) should do so, in order to justify the course he was now taking. Clause 7 proposed that after the passing of the Act, any person forming a road passage or footway, which did not form a direct communication between two streets, should be required, in the first instance, to obtain the approval and sanction of the Metropolitan Board of Works. [Cries of "Divide!"] The impatience displayed by the House to enter into the question at all showed the impropriety of the course pursued by the promoters of the Bill, and quite justified his assertion that this was not the time when the House should be required to go into a discussion of the Bill clause by clause. But he wanted to know if it was more likely, when the Speaker was out of the Chair, that a Committee would feel itself in any better condition to go into the Bill clause by clause? The clause to which he was now referring was one of the most important parts of the Bill. It stated that where any road, passage, or way would not afford a direct communication between two streets, the persons by whom it was proposed to be made should, at least three months before such road, passage, or way was commenced or laid out, make an application to the Board of Works giving notice of the intention, and setting out a plan of the proposed street, with such particulars as the Board might direct; and that the Board might, within such period of three months, lay down any conditions it considered necessary, or might altogether decline to sanction the laying out of such road, passage, or way. The existence of such a clause would prevent the Commissioners of Sewers for the City of London from carrying out any new street improvements, or laying out any road, passage, or way between one street and another, without being delayed in commencing their works for a period of three months. If the clause were carried, the City of London would be required to pray the Board of Works to permit them to make a new street; and if the Board contested the matter, the interests of the public would suffer, and street improvements which, under existing powers of the City authorities, were now making day by day would be entirely stopped. The Commissioners of Sewers met for this very purpose once a fortnight, and their committees weekly, and it was very rarely that a sitting was held without some suggestion being made for opening out a communication between one street and another, and for carrying out other improvements to facilitate the traffic from one part of the City to another. Most hon. Members would be acquainted with the neighbourhood of Throgmorton Street and Drapers' Hall. Large improvements had been carried out there by certain of the City Companies, who possessed the whole of the land between Throgmorton Street and London Wall. The new street

Mr. Alderman W. Lawrence

—Throgmorton Avenue—was open for carriages between two-thirds or three-fourths of its length, and then came another portion that was not open for carriages, but only as a footway. This large improvement, forming a new communication between the Bank and London Wall, and the Liverpool Street Railway Station, had been effected without any expense whatever to the City, at the cost of two of the City Companies acting under the direction and permission of the Commissioners of Sewers. This important improvement could not have been made under the present Bill. Surely the Commissioners of Sewers were fully adequate to be intrusted with the carrying out of such improvements, which involved the expenditure of large sums of money, and the general convenience of the public, without the interference of the Metropolitan Board of Works. Towards the cost of some of the improvements in the City the Board of Works had themselves contributed, because they believed that they were improvements not for the advantage of the City only, but for that of the whole of the Metropolis. The question, then, was whether the Commissioners of Sewers were to be deprived, by a Bill in which their names were not even mentioned, of the powers which they already possessed under Parliamentary sanction, and which they had exercised for many years to the advantage of the inhabitants of London? Seeing that the second reading of the Bill was carried by a surprise at the close of a Wednesday's Sitting, he did not think his hon. Friend the Member for Truro should persist, at such a late hour of the night, in forcing it through Committee. He believed he (Mr. Alderman W. Lawrence) had made out a sufficiently strong case, at any rate, for the postponement of the Motion, until an opportunity could be afforded for the full and complete discussion of its provisions. He did not deny that many of the clauses contained in the measure were necessary for the Metropolis generally; but what he contended was that the City of London ought not to be included within them, as they would act most detrimentally in hampering the future action of the City, so far as new street improvements were concerned. They would necessarily occasion great delay in the execution of new works, and would assuredly give rise to a considerable amount of friction between two important public bodies—the Corporation of London and the Metropolitan Board of Works. They had already received from the Secretary of State (Sir William Harcourt) an intimation that great changes with regard to both Bodies were looming in the distance, that the Metropolitan Board was not to be placed on a permanent footing, and that the Corporation of London was to be got rid of altogether. The Chairman of the Metropolitan Board, now omnipotent, was hereafter to be placed in a subordinate position. Was it right, then, under the guise of a Bill of this nature, to initiate great and important changes in the management of the affairs of the City. It would be most inconvenient to pass a clause such as that which he had indicated, and to pass it, also, in the absence of anything in the nature of explanation. He had no wish to attribute motives to the Metropolitan Board, or to allege that there was any desire on their part to take advantage of the City of London; but what he wished to point out in reference to this clause was that, in reference to street and footways within the City, it would materially cripple the future beneficial action of the Commissioners of Sewers; and he would leave the House to say whether this was the right time for depriving the Commissioners of the powers they possessed and handing them over to the Board of Works. At the present moment, when the City contemplated important improvements, it was customary to inform the Metropolitan Board, and very frequently the Board were asked to contribute towards the expense. The consequence was that great harmony prevailed between the two Bodies, which would be materially disturbed, if not entirely destroyed, by a proposal to place the Corporation under the control and authority of the Board. The Bill provided that hereafter any proposal to form a roadway should be subject to such conditions as the Metropolitan Board might think it necessary to prescribe; and until the sanction of the Board was given no such road, passage, or way should be laid out or proceeded with. It was also provided that any person infringing the Act should, for such offence, be liable to a penalty not exceeding 40s. He would simply ask upon what principle of justice or propriety the House of Commons were to be asked to place the Commissioners of Sewers under the authority of the Metropolitan Board, and to subject them to penalties, for merely carrying out important public improvements to their own satisfaction? He did not think the hon. Baronet the Member for Truro could be aware how the clauses of the Bill would affect the City of London, because, if he were, he would scarcely dream of forcing them through Committee at that hour of the night. Clause 8 said—

Mr. Alderman W. Lawrence

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member appears to me to be going through the Bill clause by clause. In so doing he is anticipating the functions of the Committee.

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE said, he had no wish to transgress, or to go through the Bill clause by clause; but he must say that the Bill, in many of its clauses, contained provisions that materially affected the City of London; and he did not think the House ought to allow it to go into Committee until some arrangement was arrived at, or, at any rate, until the hon. Member for Truro explained the objects of the measure. [Cries of "Divide!"] It might be wise to prevent persons from laying out thoroughfares in other parts of the Metropolis; but regulations that were adapted for the Metropolis generally would not apply to the City.

CAPTAIN MAXWELL-HERON rose to Order. He wished to ask if the hon. Member was not trespassing upon the indulgence of the House, and really wasting intentionally the time of the House?

MR. SPEAKER: I have already pointed out to the hon. Member that it is irregular, at this stage of a Bill, to go through the measure clause by clause, and I trust that the hon. Member will observe the intimation I have made to him.

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE said, he would certainly endeavour to comply with the intimation conveyed by the right hon. Gentleman. The Bill dealt not only with the questions he had pointed out, but with the amount of space to be left in the City when new buildings were contemplated. It was not a Bill to give additional powers to the Metropolitan Board of Works to those which they now possessed; but it was an attempt to bring in a Bill to interfere with and obstruct the action of the Corporation of London, and to prevent them from carrying out their own wishes in instituting improvements for relieving the traffic of the City, and to meet the growing wants of the public. It must be borne in mind that the City of London contributed very largely towards the cost of the improvements made outside the City by the Metropolitan Board of Works. For every sovereign expended the City contributed half-a-crown; but towards the improvements effected in the City itself, if the Metropolitan Board of Works considered them local improvements, they did not contribute a farthing. They were made and completed not out of the income from the estates of the City, but out of funds collected by taxes levied on the inhabitants living within the City. Consequently, the Metropolitan Board of Works were not asking for authority over funds which they contributed themselves, but over funds contributed solely by occupiers within the City. The rest of the Metropolis was in a different position, and the two portions of the Metropolis were on a distinct and separate footing. All the City demanded was that they should be allowed to carry out their own improvements without being interfered with by the Metropolitan Board, in the same way as they had carried them out hitherto, at the expense of the citizens themselves. He begged to move, as an Amendment to the Motion of the hon. Member for Truro, that the House should resolve itself into Committee on that day six months.

MR. BOORD said, that, after the exhaustive speech they had just listened to, he did not propose to address many words to the House. He had no doubt that the hon. Member had very forcibly conveyed his views to the House. At any rate, if he had not done so, it was not the hon. Member's fault. He merely rose now to second the Amendment of the hon. Member, in order that, as a Metropolitan Member, he might be able to express to the House the really serious objections that were entertained towards the Bill. He believed that many weighty objections would be urged to it by the Local Boards of the Metropolis. No doubt, the hon. Baronet (Sir James M'Garel-Hogg) would attempt to make capital out of the fact that the Bill had already passed a second reading, and, therefore, its principle had already been accepted by the House; but, as the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Alderman Lawrence) had explained, the second reading was obtained at a Wednesday Sitting, between a quarter to 6 and 6 o'clock, when, unfortunately, he (Mr. Boord), and other hon. Members who had given Notice of opposition to the Bill, were accidentally absent. The Local Boards in his district objected very strongly to the Bill, because it altered the Metropolis Management Act of 1862, in a sense injurious to them, and conferred large additional powers upon the Metropolitan Board of Works. It enabled the Board, among other things, to annex conditions to the erection of buildings, which were not required, and which the Local Boards entirely objected to. It prevented the City of London from making a roadway under 40 feet in width. In the suburbs of London that, no doubt, was a moderate restriction; but it ought not to apply to the narrow streets and passages of the City. After what had taken place, he would not weary the House with any further remarks; but he would content himself with seconding the Amendment of the hon. Member opposite, that the Bill be committed on that day six months.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day six months, resolve itself into the said Committee."—(Mr. Alderman W. Lawrence.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the discussion, which had occupied the last hour, illustrated two things—first, the mode in which Public Business was conducted in the House; and, in the second place, what chance the Metropolis had of any improvement in its management. In the first place, they saw the manner in which a Bill—not a mere Private Bill, but a Bill introduced by an important local Body—was dealt with. The House might have gone into Committee upon it, and might have made valuable progress with its details. But the worthy Alderman had occupied the greater part of an hour in saying what might have been said in five minutes. [Mr. WARREN: Only 20 minutes.] It appeared that the City of London were prepared to object to any Bill brought in by the Metropolitan Board of Works which in any way affected the City of London; and the position was one with which the House had long been familiar. His hon. Friend behind him (Mr. Alderman Lawrence) stated that the Bill might be of advantage to the rest of the Metropolis, and that the whole of the Metropolis, except the City, would be benefited by the adoption of the main part of the Bill.

Mr. Alderman W. Lawrence

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE said, he had stated that there were certain clauses in the Bill which might be of advantage to the Metropolis generally.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he thought that was a good reason why the House should go into Committee upon it. He believed that out of the 4,000,000 people contained in the Metropolis, the City of London only represented about 50,000; and for the great majority of the 4,000,000 the Bill was, in many respects, a good Bill. Therefore, if they were to have the time of the House occupied in resisting that which was admitted to be for the good of 4,000,000 people, because it was considered possible that in some way or other it might affect the prerogatives of 50,000, they might as well give up the work of legislation altogether. This was a sample of the manner in which the Corporation of London were prepared to deal with legislation for the Metropolis, and to take up the time of the public. There might be objections to some of the clauses of the Bill, as the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Boord) stated; but what was the character of those objections? The hon. Gentleman said the limit of 40 feet was not a limit which ought to be laid down for the construction of streets within the City. But surely that was a matter for the consideration of a Committee. As far as he could learn, no ground of objection had been raised against the Bill which might not easily be disposed of in Committee. He did not intend to follow the irregularity committed by his hon. Friend behind him, and discuss the Bill clause by clause. Anyone could see that the measure was essentially one of details; and if they were to say that at 12 o'clock at an Evening Sitting, upon a private Member's night, they would not go into a Bill of this kind, they might just as well give up doing any Business at all. Nothing, in his opinion, could be more unreasonable than that an hon. Member should get up at 12 o'clock at night and object to proceeding with a Bill in Committee. He expressed no opinion as to the merits of the Bill generally, except that it was a Bill introduced into the House and promoted by a responsible authority, and that it was admitted by his hon. Friend who moved the Amendment to be a Bill which contained many clauses that would be of advantage to the Metropolis generally, and to 4,000,000 people who lived outside the City. Nothing could be more unreasonable than to say that the measure could not be discussed at that hour because the City was affected by it. No question whatever had been raised upon the principle of the measure; and it would be perfectly competent for his hon. Friend, when they got into Committee, to state his objection to the clauses. His hon. Friend could, if he chose, introduce a single clause, stating that the Bill should not in any way affect the prerogatives or rights of the City of London. By that means the whole object for which he sought to throw out what he admitted to be a valuable measure would be accomplished. That seemed to him to be the business-like way of dealing with the matter, and the whole object desired by the Members representing the City of London would be attained by adopting it. It must not be forgotten that the Bill was introduced by an hon. Member filling the responsible position of Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works. He should, therefore, support the hon. Baronet in getting the Bill into Committee, so that the House might proceed at once to consider its details.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS would only say one word. He had been waiting anxiously in the House all night in the hope that he might get a chance of proceeding with the Settled Land Bill—a much more important measure than that which was now under discussion. If he could have obtained the opportunity, he should gladly have welcomed it, in the hope that they might have made some progress. In regard to the present Bill, he agreed with the observations of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary (Sir William Harcourt), that the observations of the hon. Member for the City of London (Mr. Alderman Lawrence) might have been compressed into very much less space, and perhaps the speech itself might have formed a proper subject for the clôture. He would not say more upon that subject; but he thought his hon. Friend the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board was entitled to go into Committee upon the Bill. The measure was essentially one of detail, and as the only object of the hon. Member (Mr. Alderman Lawrence) was to amend the provisions of the Bill, he could easily accomplish that object by introducing fresh clauses.

SIR JAMES M'GAREL-HOGG appealed to the House to assist him in the trying difficulties of his position, in endeavouring to bring in measures for the benefit of the Metropolis. He was most grateful to the right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite, the present Home Secretary (Sir William Harcourt), and to his right hon. Friend the late Home Secretary (Sir R. Assheton Cross), for the assistance they had given to him on the present occasion. His hon. Friend opposite, the worthy Alderman, who so admirably defended the interests of the City of London (Mr. Alderman W. Lawrence) complained that he (Sir James M'Garel-Hogg) had not, on the second reading of the Bill, entered at length into any of the details of the measure. His reason for that was that the Bill contained a number of clauses which had already been introduced in a Private Bill. He had explained that those clauses would be withdrawn and included in a Public Bill. It was to give effect to this understanding that the present measure had been introduced. In point of fact, the provisions of the Bill had been before the House for the last six months, because, having been originally contained in a Private Bill, it was necessary that previous Notice of them should be given. [An hon. MEMBER: The Session has not yet lasted six months.] He was quite aware of that fact; but the hon. Member seemed to forget that in the case of a Private Bill it was necessary to give Notice of what was intended to be done. The details of the measure had, consequently, been a long time before the public, and everybody knew what was proposed. He had not, therefore, felt it necessary to enter into a discussion as to the details of the Bill; and he certainly hoped that when any person occupying the position he did came forward with a measure for the improvement of the Metropolis Management Act he would receive the assistance of the House. It was not the first time that the question had been under discussion, and he hoped the House would allow the Bill to go into Committee. It was simply a matter of detail, and if his hon. Friend the Member for the City would bring up a clause it should be fairly considered.

MR. R. N. FOWLER said, he certainly thought that the right hon. Gentleman below him (Sir R. Assheton Cross) had shown some ingratitude towards the City of London. He would remind the right hon. Gentleman that when he sat as a Minister upon the Benches opposite, and appealed to the country, the City of London was the only place which gave him a generous and unwavering support. Yet the reward they now received was that the right hon. Gentleman, now sitting on the Front Opposition Bench as the Representative of the Conservative Party, turned against the only constituency that gave him continued support on that occasion. Under those circumstances, he thought he had some reason to complain of the course taken by the right hon. Gentleman on this occasion. It was quite evident that the right hon. Gentleman cared nothing about the City of London. [Cries of "Order!" and "Question!"] He would turn now to the remarks which had been made by the right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Sir William Harcourt). They all knew that he was going to bring in a Bill to abolish the Corporation of the City of London. Of course, he had no claim upon the right hon. and learned Gentleman. The City of London did not support the Government of which the right hon. and learned Gentleman was so distinguished a Member. ["Question!"] He believed that he was speaking to the question. He was speaking upon a Bill which very much concerned the interests of his constituents; and, therefore, he thought he had a right to ask the indulgence of the House. He could not appeal to the Home Secretary to support any Bill which interfered with the ancient duties of the City of London; but he wished to make a remark on the statement which the right hon. and learned Gentleman had made.

Sir R. Assheton Cross

The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that the population of the City of London only represented about 50,000 persons. That might be perfectly true so far as regarded those who slept within the City; but he believed that the right hon. and learned Gentleman, before he filled the high and distinguished position he now so worthily held, occasionally went into the City of London, and he must be aware that there was another City altogether by day, and that the number of those who traversed its streets in the day time was very much larger than those who slept in it by night. Therefore, he did not think it was fair to throw in the teeth of the City of London the circumstance of the comparatively small number of persons who slept there. They ought rather to look at the question of the importance and wealth of the City of London, and the large number of persons who entered it for business purposes during the day. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman would only look round the House—not, perhaps, at that particular moment, but when it was fuller than it was now—he would see how very much larger a number of Members of the House were ratepayers of the City of London than of any other constituency of the country. He did not suppose that so large a number of Members of that House were represented by any other hon. Members as those who were represented by his hon. Colleague and himself. Under these circumstances, he thought they were entitled to complain of the way in which the City of London was treated on this occasion. His hon. Colleague had gone very fully into the arguments against the Bill, and he had no wish to repeat what his hon. Friend had so well said; but, at the same time, he thought it was their duty, in the interests of their constituents, to enter a protest against the provisions of the Bill. It had been said that they ought to allow the Bill to go into Committee, and that they could then raise any question in regard to the clauses of the Bill. But he would remind the House of what was well said by an hon. Friend of his—whom he did not at present see in his place—the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Lewis), in regard to another Bill—namely, that when they got into Committee the Government of the day were absolute. He gathered from the remarks which had been made by the right hon. and learned Gentleman that he intended to support the clauses of the Bill; and he felt that it was only the duty of himself (Mr. R. N. Fowler) and his hon. Colleague (Mr. Alderman W. Lawrence) to make representations against the character of the legislation proposed to be introduced. He had no wish to detain the House longer. He concurred cordially in all that had fallen from his hon. Friend. His hon. Friend had ably put the arguments against the Bill; and he would appeal to the House to consider carefully before they passed a measure the effect of which would be to place very great difficulties in the way of those who might hereafter be required to make street improvements within the City of London.

MR. DIXON-HARTLAND said, that, before the Bill went into Committee, he should be glad to receive some sort of pledge from the hon. Gentleman the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works (Sir James M'Garel-Hogg) that the question of the safety of the theatres would be dealt with. He thought it might be possible to introduce a clause into the Bill giving the Board of Works the power of dealing effectively with the exits of the theatres. In the Act of 1878, which it was proposed by the Board of Works to amend by the present Bill, the word "moderately" was introduced in relation to any structure dedicated to purposes of public amusement; but the law would hold that the word was to be regarded according to the reasonable interpretation of the word, and not in regard to what the public might require. Therefore, before the Bill went into Committee, he should like to have some pledge that it was intended to deal with the exits of the theatres.

SIR JAMES M'GAREL-HOGG said, he was afraid that his hon. Friend could not have read the Bill. This subject had been dealt with in a Bill which had already gone up to the House of Lords, and in which he had inserted the clause he had promised. In due course he hoped that that Bill would become an Act of Parliament.

MR. WARTON said, that in the peculiar circumstances under which the Bill had been brought in, seeing that its provisions had not been explained, and that there was no discussion upon the second reading, the other stages ought not to be hurried through. [Cries of "Divide!"] He intended, in spite of the cries he heard, to make a protest on this occasion. They had been taunted by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary in the most supercilious style. ["Order!"] He believed that the word was quite Parliamentary, although the word "bare" might not be. They had been taunted as to the way in which the Public Business of the House was carried on; and he presumed that the right hon. and learned Gentleman proposed to found upon what had taken place a fresh argument in favour of the clôture; but even the clôture, when introduced by Her Majesty's Government, would not apply to a case like this, because there were not 100 Liberal Members calling out for it. ["Question!"] If hon. Members opposite would only remember that fact they would see that their efforts to silence a Member under the clôture might be as little successful then as it was now. Of course, it was not for him to dispute any ruling of the Chair; but he thought it was right he should know what the Rules of the House were. It was extremely inconvenient, when it was proposed that the House should go into Committee upon a Bill, to be told that they were not able to discuss the clauses of the measure. They had often been told that they must not, upon such a question, go back upon the principle of the Bill, and therefore it was difficult to discover what it was they ought to do. He could not for the life of him see what the principle of the Bill was, except that it was to do away with the authority and rights of the Corporation of the City of London. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary was always fond of doing everything in his power to injure the prestige and destroy the rights of the Corporation of London. It was perfectly certain that at the last General Election nothing gave more umbrage to the Leader of the Government than the fact that the great and important constituency of the City of London, by an overwhelming majority, asserted their belief in Conservative principles. He hoped hon. Members would give due Notice when Bills of this kind were coming on, so that he might take care to be in the House. The opponents of the measure had been misled by the fact that certain of the clauses to which objection had been taken had been struck out of the Private Bill, the officers of the House having stated that they could not be allowed to remain in a Private Bill. They had not anticipated that those clauses would be inserted in a Public Bill. The opponents had, therefore, been misled, not that he was hinting at anything like a breach of faith on the part of the promoters.

SIR JAMES M'GAREL-HOGG: I beg leave to state most distinctly—

MR. WARTON claimed to be in possession of the House. He said again that he was not, in the slightest degree, attributing anything like impropriety to the promoters. One danger might pass and another might crop up, it seemed; and whilst this was very inconvenient he did not say there was anything wrong in it. No doubt, the Chairman of Committees or the Clerks at the Table had told the promoters of the Private Bill that the clauses could not be introduced. He did not blame those in charge of the Public Bill for taking advantage of every opportunity they had for advancing it; but, in the present instance, the result of that course had been that there had been no statement made as to what the measure was. Was it a trifling Bill or an important one? It was a long one, having no fewer than 26 clauses, some of them 30 or 40 lines in length. It was not, therefore, a measure to hurry through Parliament. He should recommend the opponents to the Bill to divide, not because he thought there was any chance of their being successful, but as a protest against the measure. He trusted those in charge of the Bill would be satisfied with moving the Speaker out of the Chair, and the House into Committee, and that he would say he would not go on with the Bill until the House had had reasonable time to consider it. If they would adopt this course, no doubt the opponents of the Bill would be equally reasonable, and would give ample and fair consideration to the clauses, and amongst the "opponents" he clearly ranked the Home Secretary, who gloatingly delighted in seizing every opportunity that presented itself for showing hostility to the City of London.

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE said, it was not his intention to trouble the House to divide.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Warton

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clauses 1 to 3, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 4 (Metropolis Management Acts and Part II. of Act to be construed as one Act).

MR. WARTON said, he wished to put a question to the highest legal authority of the Government at present in the House—namely, the Attorney General for Ireland, whose experience and knowledge of the City of London was not extensive. ["Order!"] He meant no disrespect. He had always admired the right hon. and learned Gentleman's statements in regard to Ireland; but it was not to be expected that the Attorney General for Ireland should be familiar with the law relating to the City of London, and he had made the allusion to which exception had been taken because there was no English Law Officer in the House. He would ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman if he could inform the Committee, before they passed this clause, whether "Metropolis Act" included the City?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): Yes, Sir; it does.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Warton.)

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE said, he did not wish to impede the progress of the Bill in Committee. He did not object to this clause passing; but he put it to the hon. Baronet (Sir James M'Garel-Hogg) whether it would not be well, after passing Clause 5, to agree to Progress being reported? He felt convinced that when the Bill came into Committee again—if the course he suggested were adopted—that all differences would be arranged, and there would be no opposition. ["No, no!"] He was only suggesting a means by which the Bill could be got through. There was no disposition, at any rate on his part, to impede the Bill.

SIR JAMES M'GAREL-HOGG said, that if Clauses 4 and 5 were passed, he would agree to Progress being reported on Clause 6, which, he thought, was objected to.

MR. WARTON said, that, on the understanding that they did not go beyond Clause 5, he would withdraw the Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 5 agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday.

MOTION.

—o—

SUNDAY CLOSING (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. RICHARDSON, Bill to renew and amend the Sunday Closing (Ireland) Act, ordered to be brought in by Mr. RICHARDSON, Mr. EWART, Mr. CORRY, Mr. REDMOND, Mr. THOMAS DICKSON, Mr. MELDON, Mr. LEWIS, Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR, and Mr. BLAKE.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 148.]

House adjourned at a quarter before One o'clock.

[INDEX.]

INDEX

TO

HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES,

VOLUME CCLXVIII.

THIRD VOLUME OF SESSION 1882.

EXPLANATION OF THE ABBREVIATIONS.

In Bills, Read 1^o, 2^o, 3^o, or 1^a, 2^a, 3^a, Read the First, Second, or Third Time.—In Speeches, 1R., 2R., 3R., Speech delivered on the First, Second, or Third Reading.—Amendt., Amendment.—Res., Resolution.—Comm., Committee.—Re-Comm., Re-Committal.—Rep., Report.—Consid., Consideration.—Adj., Adjournment or Adjourned.—cl., Clause.—add. cl., Additional Clause.—neg., Negatived.—M. Q., Main Question.—O. Q., Original Question.—O. M., Original Motion.—P. Q., Previous Question.—R. P., Report Progress.—A., Ayes.—N., Noes.—M., Majority.—1st. Div., 2nd. Div., First or Second Division.—l., Lords.—c., Commons.

When in this Index a * is added to the Reading of a Bill, it indicates that no Debate took place upon that stage of the measure.

When in the Text or in the Index a Speech is marked thus *, it indicates that the Speech is reprinted from a Pamphlet or some authorized Report.

When in the Index a † is prefixed to a Name or an Office (the Member having accepted or vacated office during the Session) and to Subjects of Debate thereunder, it indicates that the Speeches on those Subjects were delivered in the speaker's private or official character, as the case may be.

Some subjects of debate have been classified under the following "General Headings:"—
ARMY—NAVY—INDIA—IRELAND—SCOTLAND—PARLIAMENT—POOR LAW—POST OFFICE—METROPOLIS—CHURCH OF ENGLAND—EDUCATION—CRIMINAL LAW—LAW AND JUSTICE—TAXATION, under WAYS AND MEANS.

Africa (South)

LORDS

Basutoland, Question, Viscount Bury; Answer, The Earl of Kimberley Mar 30, 272

Africa (South)

COMMONS

Basutoland, Question, Sir Wilfrid Lawson; Answer, Mr. Courtney Mar 30, 309

The Transkei War Expenses, Questions, Sir George Campbell; Answers, The Chancellor of the Exchequer April 3, 551

Natal—Alleged Massacre by Boers, Question, Mr. R. N. Fowler; Answer, Mr. Courtney April 24, 1268

Zululand, Question, Mr. R. N. Fowler; Answer, Mr. Courtney April 27, 1572

Cetewayo, ex-King of Zululand—Visit to England, Question, Sir Henry Holland; Answer, Mr. Courtney April 4, 663; Question, Mr. Onslow; Answers, The Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Courtney May 2, 1942

Africa, South (Zululand)—Cetewayo (Release from Captivity)

Amendt. on Committee of Supply April 17, To leave out from "That," and add "an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to release Cetewayo, the Zulu King, from the unjust captivity in which he is now held" (Mr. Gorst) v., 756; Question proposed, "That the words, &c.;" after long debate, Amendt. withdrawn

Agricultural Holdings, Notices of Removal (Scotland) Bill (Sir Alexander Gordon, Mr. M'Lagan, Mr. Barclay)

c. Read 2^o, after debate Mar 29, 223 [Bill 5]

Agriculture, Report of the Royal Commission on

Question, Mr. James Howard; Answer, Mr. Gladstone Mar 27, 34

Army Annual Bill—cont.

- l. Read 1st (Earl of Morley) April 21 (No. 65)
 Read 2nd, after short debate April 24, 1236 Committee; Report, after short debate
 April 25, 1371
 Read 3rd April 27, 1555
 Royal Assent April 28 [45 Vict. c. 7]

ARNOLD, Mr. A., Salford

- Ecclesiastical Commission, Motion for a Select Committee, 495, 518
 India—Rajputana Railway, 803
 Public Affairs, State of—Irish Policy of the Government, Ministerial Statement, 1997
 Royal Passengers—"Albert Victor" Channel
 Steamer, 1564
 Slave Trade in Asia and Africa, 1718
 Ways and Means—Financial Statement, Comm.
 1312

Artillery Ranges Bill

(*Mr. Secretary Childers, The Judge Advocate
 General, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman, Mr.
 Trevelyan*)

- c. Ordered; read 1st April 3 [Bill 125]
 Order for 2R. discharged April 17
 Read 2nd April 21

ASHLEY, Hon. E. M. (Secretary to the Board of Trade), Isle of Wight
 Private (Hybrid) Bills—Forth Bridge Railway
 Bill, 1101

ASHMEAD-BARTLETT, Mr. E., Eye

- Crime (Ireland), 718
 Cyprus—Election of Members to Legislative Assembly, 308, 1262, 1264
 Parliament—Business of the House (Putting the Question), Res. 351, 353, 494, 495

Asia (Central)—Russian Advance

Question, Sir Eardley Wilmot: Answer, Sir
 Charles W. Dilke April 28, 1865

ATTORNEY GENERAL, The (Sir H. JAMES) Taunton

- Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment, Consid.
 118, 120, 122, 127, 133, 134
 Charity Commission—Parochial Charities of the City of London, 670
 Corrupt Practices at Elections Act—The Magistracy—Mr. Cheney Garfit, 296
 Law and Justice—"Gurney v. Bradlaugh," 1033
 Parliament—Business of the House, 554, 876
 Parliament—Gloucester Writ, Res. 1577, 1578, 1579
 Parliament—Wigan New Writ, Res. 1951,
 1952, 1965
 Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal
 Practices), 2R. 1341, 1358, 1585, 1607,
 1613, 1630
 Protection of Person and Property (Ireland)
 Act, 1881—Mr. Parnell, 733

Australia (Western)—Free Emigration

Question, Sir James Lawrence; Answer, Mr.
 Courtney April 21, 1103; Question, Mr.
 Alderman W. Lawrence; Answer, Mr.
 Courtney April 27, 1558

AYLMER, Captain J. E. F., Maidstone

- Army—Royal Warrant, 1881, 1105
 Egypt—Robbery of British Subjects, 485
 Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal
 Practices), 2R. 1335

BAILEY, Sir J. R., Herefordshire

- Army Organization (Auxiliary Forces)—Militia Uniforms, 284
 Turnpike Roads (South Wales), 3R. 1905
 Wales (South)—Road Acts—Maintenance of Main Roads, 307

BALFOUR, Right Hon. J. B. (Lord Advocate for Scotland), Clackmannan,
 &c.

- Agricultural Holdings, Notice of Removal
 (Scotland), 2R. 239
 Civil Imprisonment (Scotland), 2R. 254
 Herring Brand Committee, Res. 530
 Judgments (Inferior Courts), Comm. cl. 2,
 Amendt. 1682; cl. 5, Amendt. 1633; cl. 8,
 Amendt. ib.; add. cl. ib., 1634
 Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices), 2R. Motion for Adjournment, 1357
 Scotland—Miscellaneous Questions
 Entail Bill, 1256
 Landlord and Tenant—Disturbances in the Island of Skye, 1032, 1565;—Evictions in, 1246, 1822, 1823
 University Reform, 1827

BALFOUR, General Sir G., Kincairdine-shire

- Army (Annual), 2R. 566
 Army Estimates—Provisions, &c. 811
 Cooper's Hill College, Res. 1116
 Harbours of Refuge (Scotland), 1242
 Herring Brand Commission, Res. 522

BALFOUR, Mr. A. J., Hertford

- Gibraltar (Religious Dissensions)—Dr. Canilla
 —The Papers, 644
 Municipal Corporations, Comm. 1202
 Parliament—Business of the House (Putting
 the Question), Res. 1861
 Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal
 Practices), 2R. 1421
 Turnpike Roads (South Wales), 3R. 1910
 Ways and Means, Report, 1416

BALFOUR, Mr. J. S., Tamworth

- Customs Department—New Warehousing
 Scheme, 486

Bankruptcy Bill (Mr. Dixon-Hartland, Mr. Gerst, Sir Edmund Lechmere)

c. Read 2nd April 26, 1554

[Bill 37]

BIENNERHASSETT, Mr. R. P., Kerry

Contagious Diseases (Animals) Acts—Foot-and-Mouth Disease, 1936

Parliament—Business of the House (Putting the Question), Res. 348

BOLTON, Mr. J. C., Stirling

Private (Hybrid) Bills—Forth Bridge Railway Bill, 1101

BOORD, Mr. T. W., Greenwich

Metropolis Management and Building Acts Amendment, Comm. 2019

Rating—Valuation of Government Establishments, 1270

BOURKE, Right Hon. R., Lynn Regis

Cyprus, Island of—Grant of a Constitution—The Despatch, 1103

Egypt—The Bay of Assab, 982

Ireland, State of—Murder of Mr. A. E. Herbert, 490

BRAND, Right Hon. Sir H. B. W., (see SPEAKER, The)

BRAND, Mr. H. R., Stroud

Supply, Report, 186, 187, 189, 190

BRIGHT, Right Hon. J. (Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster), Birmingham

Parliament—Business of the House (Putting the Question), Res. Motion for Adjournment, 107, 314, 337, 1887, 1892

BRINTON, Mr. J., Kidderminster

Burial Fees, 2R. 258

Ecclesiastical and Mortuary Fees, Motion for a Select Committee, 213

BRISE, Colonel S. B. RUGGLES-, Essex, E.

Army—Auxiliary Forces—Militia Uniforms, 539

BROADHURST, Mr. H., Stoke-on-Trent

Coal Mines—Weardale Colliery Explosion, 886

Factory Acts—Lead Poisoning, 667

Inland Revenue—Railway Passenger Duty—Cheap Trains Act, 1844, 1830

Parliamentary Elections Expenses, 2R. 954

Prisons (England)—Tothill Fields Prison, 1942

Supply—Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens, 1161, 1179

BRUCE, Hon. R. P., Fifeshire

Agricultural Holdings, Notices of Removal (Scotland), 2R. 234

BRUCE, Hon. T. C., Portsmouth

Navy—Portsmouth Dockyard—Discharge of Workmen, 27

BRUCE, Sir H. H., Coleraine

Army—Auxiliary Forces—Militia Uniforms, 540

BRYCE, Mr. J., Tower Hamlets

Commonable Rights, Comm. add. cl. 1682

Oxford University (Jesus College Statutes), Motion for an Address, 2002

Parliament—Business of the House (Putting the Question), Res. Amendt. 1860

BUCHANAN, Mr. T. R., Edinburgh

Educational Endowments (Scotland), 544

Judgments (Inferior Courts), Consid. add. cl. 1786

BULWER, Mr. J. R., Cambridgeshire

Ecclesiastical and Mortuary Fees, Motion for a Select Committee, 218

Geological Survey (Scotland), 1261

Lynn and Fakenham Railway, 2R. 473

Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices), 2R. 1612, 1613, 1614

Burial Fees Bill

[Bill 24]

(Mr. Brinton, Sir Alexander Gordon)

a. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^o"
Mar 29, 258

Amendt. to leave out "now," and add "upon this day six months" (Mr. John Talbot);
Question proposed, "That 'now,' &c.;"
after debate, Debate adjourned

BURNABY, General E. S., Leicestershire, N.

Army Estimates—Provisions, &c. 862

BURT, Mr. T., Morpeth

Factory Acts—Lead Poisoning, 666

Law and Police (Metropolis)—Alleged Detective Conspiracy, 284

Mines (Coal) Regulation Act, 1872—Recent Colliery Explosions, 1034 ;—Abram Colliery Explosion, 1929

Vaccination Act (1867)—Sec. 31, 479

BURY, Viscount

Africa (South)—Basutoland, 272

Army (Annual), 2R. 1238 ; Comm. 1372

Army (Auxiliary Forces)—Easter Volunteer Review, 460, 1639, 1642

BUXTON, Mr. F. W., Andover

Inland Revenue—Railway Passenger Duty—Cheap Trains Act, 1844, 1830

£1 Bank Notes, Res. 1709

Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices), 2R. 1362

Supply—Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens, 1171

BYRNE, Mr. G. M., Wexford Co.

Supply—Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens, 1181

CAINE, Mr. W. S., Scarborough

Law and Police—The Salvation Army, 544,
1271, 1841, 1941
Walton Vicarage, 2R. Amendt. 1084, 1086
Ways and Means, Report, 1417

CAIRNS, Earl

Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881 (Sec. 8, Sub-sec.
9)—“Adams v. Dunseath,” 1216
Married Women's Property, Comm. 136

CALLAN, Mr. P., Louth

Cornwall (East) Election—Speech of Mr.
Courtney, 311, 312
H.M. the Queen, Attempt upon the Life of—
The Prisoner M'Lean, 543
Ireland—Miscellaneous Questions
Address of the Dominion House of Commons, 1832, 1833
Crime, 729
Criminal Law—Charge of Conspiracy to Murder, 1819, 1820
Irish Land Commission—The Galway Sub-
Commissioners, 1666
Mr. Clifford Lloyd—Circular by the Inspector of Police, Co. Clare, 1014, 1027
Peace Preservation Act, 1881—Search for Arms, 1809
Royal Irish Constabulary—Co. Monaghan,
1818
Municipal Corporations, Comm. 114, 116, 1774 Parliament—Order—The Precincts of the House—The Home Secretary and Mr.
Anderson, 556, 557
Parliament—Business of the House (Putting
the Question), Res. 108
Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal
Practices), 2R. 1359, 1445, 1581, 1585,
1587, 1588
Poor Law Guardians (Ireland), 2R. 942
Post Office (Telegraph Department)—Telegraph Service in Ireland, 672
Supply, Report, 170, 175, 198

CAMERON, Dr. C., Glasgow

Civil Imprisonment (Scotland), 2R. 241, 245,
251, 256
Inland Revenue Stamping Department (Scotland), 477, 478
International Law—Spanish Steamer “*Leon
XIII.*,” 480
Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal
Practices), 2R. 1588, 1589

CAMPBELL, Sir G., Kirkcaldy, &c.

Africa (South)—Transkei War Expenses, 551
Agricultural Holdings, Notices of Removal
(Scotland), 2R. 239
Cooper's Hill College, Res. 1128
England and France—The Channel Tunnel
Scheme, 1823
India—The Labourers' Act, 546
Papal See (Diplomatic Communications), Res.
905
Parliament—Business of the House, 493
Supply—Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens,
1172

CAMPBELL, Mr. J. A., *Glasgow, &c. Universities

Agricultural Holdings, Notices of Removal
(Scotland), 2R. 237
Civil Imprisonment (Scotland), 2R. 252
Parliament—Business of the House (Putting
the Question), Res. 65

CAMPERDOWN, Earl of

Army (Auxiliary Forces)—Easter Volunteer
Review, 460
Oxford and Cambridge Universities Commission
—Statutes—Religious Teaching and
Worship, 1794, 1795
Lincoln College (Oxford) Statutes, 1918

Canals

Select Committee appointed, “to inquire into the condition and the position of the Canals and internal navigation of the Country, to report thereupon, and to make such recommendations as may appear necessary” (*Mr.
Salt*) April 20

CANTERBURY, Archbishop of

Oxford and Cambridge Universities Commission
—Statutes—Religious Teaching and Worship, 1792
Lincoln College (Oxford) Statutes, 1919

CARBUTT, Mr. E. H., Monmouth, &c.

Cooper's Hill College, Res. 1114
Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal
Practices), 2R. 1336
Supply—Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens,
1171

CARLINGFORD, Lord (Lord Privy Seal)

Ireland—Miscellaneous Questions
Evictions—The Return to December 31, 1881, 1637
Jury Laws, 444
Land Law Act, 1881 (Sec. 8, Sub-sec. 9)
—“Adams v. Dunseath,” 1212 ;—Working of the Act—Petition, 1382
Ireland—Police Protection, Motion for Papers, 276

CARLISLE, Bishop of

Payment of Wages in Public-houses Prohibition, 2R. 1927

CARNARVON, Earl of

Oxford and Cambridge Universities Commission
—Statutes—Religious Teaching and
Worship, 1788, 1795
Lincoln College (Oxford) Statutes, 1919
Public Affairs, State of—Irish Policy of the
Government, Ministerial Statement, 1924

CAVENDISH, Lord F. C. (Secretary to the Treasury), *Yorkshire, W.R., N. Div.

Arklow Harbour, Comm. cl. 5, 1365, 1366
Board of Manufactures and Fisheries (Scotland), 877
Civil Service Appointments—Private Secretaries to Ministers, 1740, 1743, 1744

CAVENISH, Lord F. C.—cont.

Customs Department—New Warehousing Scheme, 486, 1253, 1261
 Penalties for Smuggling, 1560
 Friendly Societies—Quinquennial Return—Report of the Registrar, 1664
 Inland Revenue—Income Tax—Schedule B—English and Scotch Farmers, 1036
 Stamping Department (Scotland), 478
 Ireland—Crown Rents, 11, 12
 Medical Grant (Scotland), 1407
 Metropolis—Thames Embankment, 294
 Militia Storehouses, Comm. 1915
 Official Salaries—Mr. Algernon West, 985
 Parliament—Business of the House, 493, 1840
 Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices), 2R. 1365
 Return No. 88 (Revenue, Taxation and Population)—Parliamentary Representation, 980
 Revenue and Expenditure—Finance Department, 1939
 Royal Passengers—"Albert Victor" Channel Steamer, 1564
 Supply—Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens, 1168
 Ways and Means, 1784
 Financial Statement—Revenue, 1565 ;—Coffee, 1818
 Ways and Means—Financial Statement, Comm. 1326 ; Report, 1418, 1420

CECIL, Lord E. H. B. G., Essex, W.
 Army—Revised Army Warrant, Article 23, 732
 Army Estimates—Provisions, &c. 824, 858, 859

Central Metropolitan Railway Bill (by Order)

c. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^o" (Mr. Dodds) April 28, 1844
 Amendt. to leave out "now," and add "upon this day six months" (Mr. W. H. Smith); Question proposed, "That 'now,' &c.;" after short debate, Question put, and negatived; words added; main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to; 2R. put off

CHAMBERLAIN, Right Hon. J. (President of the Board of Trade), Birmingham

Bankruptcy, 2R. 1554
 Bankruptcy Law Amendment, 2R. Motion for Adjournment, 1367
 Electric Lighting, 2R. 867
 England and France—The Channel Tunnel Scheme, 1682, 1824
 Crown Rights to the Foreshore, 307
 Forth Bridge Railway Bill—Board of Trade Report, 1029, 1030, 1668
 Harbours of Refuge (Scotland), 1243
 International Fishery Conference—Police of the North Sea, 1809
 Mercantile Marine—"Albert Edward," The Recent Accident to, 1267, 1815
 Proposed Shipping Council, 297
 Merchant Shipping Acts—Miscellaneous Questions
 "City of Limerick," 978

CHAMBERLAIN, Right Hon. J.—cont.

Collisions at Sea, 1258
 Emigrant Ships, 1405, 1816
 Lodging-house Touts at Queenstown, 293
 Rating—Valuation of Government Establishments, 1271
 Sale of Food and Drugs Act—Coffee and Chicory, 548

CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER—See GLADSTONE, Right Hon. W. E.

CHANCELLOR, The LORD (LORD SELBORNE)

Criminal Law—The Condemned Convict Lamson, Motion for an Address, 1389
 Ireland, State of—Threatening Letters, 1393
 Married Women's Property, Comm. 136
 Oxford and Cambridge Universities Commission—Statutes—Religious Teaching and Worship, 1795
 Lincoln College (Oxford) Statutes, 1919
 Representative Peers of Ireland, Res. 4
 Stolen Goods, 1R. 1082

Channel Tunnel Scheme, The

Questions, Mr. Gregory, Mr. O'Shea ; Answers, Mr. Gladstone Mar 27, 82 :—Crown Rights to the Foreshore, Question, Mr. Hicks ; Answer, Mr. Chamberlain Mar 30, 307 :—Observations, Lord Strathnairn, Lord Waveney ; Reply, The Earl of Morley Mar 31, 457 ; Questions, Mr. E. W. Harcourt, Sir Harry Verney ; Answers, Mr. Gladstone April 18, 882 ; Question, Mr. Arthur Vivian ; Answer, Mr. Gladstone April 24, 1270 ; Question, Mr. O'Shea ; Answer, Mr. Chamberlain April 28, 1682 ; Question, Sir George Campbell ; Answer, Mr. Chamberlain May 1, 1823

Chaplains to Workhouses, &c. Bill

(Mr. Byrne, Mr. O'Donnell, Mr. Richard Power, Mr. Redmond)

c. Bill withdrawn * Mar 31 [Bill 10]

CHAPLIN, Mr. H., Lincolnshire, Mid

Contagious Diseases (Animals) Aots—Foot-and-Mouth Disease, 1936
 Crime (Ireland), 728
 Ireland, State of—Police Protection—Murder of a Caretaker, 1034, 1252
 Municipal Corporations, Comm. Amendt. 1183, 1752, 1756, 1773, 1781
 Parliament—Business of the House—Tuesday Sitzings, 1681
 Parliament—Business of the House (Putting the Question), Res. 375, 1893
 Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices), 2R. 1363
 Public Affairs, State of—Irish Policy of the Government, Ministerial Statement, Motion for Adjournment, 1978
 Ways and Means—Financial Statement, Comm. 1809

Charity Commission—Parochial Charities of the City of London

Question, Mr. John HOLLAND ; Answer, The Attorney General April 4, 689

CHEETHAM, Mr. J. F., Derbyshire, N.
Commonable Rights, 2R. 256; Comm. cl. 2,
Amendt. 1631, 1632; add. cl. ib.

CHELMSFORD, Lord
Army (Annual), 2R. 1238
Army (Auxiliary Forces)—Easter Volunteer
Review, 1643
Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1831 (Sec. 8, Sub-sec. 9)—“Adams v. Dunneath,” 1230
Stolen Goods, 2R. 1371

CHILDERS, Right Hon. H. C. E. (Secretary of State for War), *Pontefract
Army—Miscellaneous Questions

Army Enlistment—Re-Engagements, 17, 1245

Auxiliary Forces—Camps of Instruction, 1932

Battalion Establishments, 298

Chelsea Hospital, Rumoured Abolition of—Admission of the Public to the Gardens,
292

Clothing Contracts (Army and Post Office), 302

Militia Regulations, 1880—Brevet Pay, 1242

Payment of Pensions, 988, 1106

Revised Army Warrant—Article 23, 732

Royal Warrant, 1881, 1106

Senior Majors—Extra Pay, 1244

Staff Appointments, 1563

Army Organization—Miscellaneous Questions
Auxiliary Forces—Militia Uniforms, 284, 540

Colonels of the Ordnance Corps, 731

Royal Artillery and Royal Engineers—
Officers' Retirement, 986

Uniforms of Scotch Regiments, 733

Army (Annual), 2R. 565, 568, 575; Comm.
add. cl. 736, 737, 738, 739, 753

Army Estimates—Provisions, do. 831, 853, 858, 859, 862

Vote 23—Pensions, 876

Ireland, State of—Military Riots at Galway, 35

Military Manœuvres, 2R. 1901

Municipal Corporations, Comm. 1201

National Defences—Chatham Dockyard, 1558

Navy—Payment of Naval Pensions, 1260

Parliament—Public Business, Arrangement of, 1631

Woods and Forests—Fires in Woolmer Forest, 802

China—Opium Trade—*The Chefoo Convention

Question, Mr. Puleston; Answer, Sir Charles
W. Dilke April 24, 1944

Civil Imprisonment (Scotland) Bill

(Dr. Cameron, Mr. Ramsay, Mr. Mackintosh)

c. Read 2^o, and committed to a Select Committee, after debate Mar 29, 241 [Bill 19]

Committee nominated April 27; List of the Committee, 1636

Civil Service A

Private Secreta-
tions, Mr. Ar
Answers, Mr
ponement of
April 24, 11
O'Connor; R
debate there;
Mr. R. S. Mi
Answer, Sir
Mr. Healy;

CLARKE, Mr.

Bankruptcy La
Parliament—W
Parliamentary
Practices), 2

Coal Mines Re-

Abram Collic
Burt; Answ
1929

The Weardale

Mr. Broadhu court *April

Tudhos and I
tion, Mr.
April 20, 194

CODDINGTON, J

India—Convey

COLERBROOKE, J

Agricultural L
(Scotland), 2
Parliament—B
the Question

COLLINGS, Mr.

Parliamentary
Practices), 2
Provincial Art
576, 582

COLLINS, Mr. J

Burial Fees, 21
Lunacy Laws, 1
Parliament—G
Parliament—W
Parliamentary
Practices), 2

COLTHURST, C

Army Enlistme
Army Estimate
Gibraltar (Reli
1861

Land Law (Ire

2R. 1545

Prisons (Engla
ing Prisoners

Commonable I

(Mr. Chastka

c. Read 2^o, after a Committee; R

Considered A

Read 3^o May

t. Read 1^o (Lore

Commons Regulation Provisional Orders Bill(Mr. Hibbert, Mr. Dodson, Secretary Sir William Harcourt)c. Ordered; read 1^o Mar 30 [Bill 117]
Read 2^o April 28Consolidated Fund (No. 2) Bill

(Earl Granville)

l. Read 2^a; Committee negatived; read 3^a
Mar 25
Royal Assent Mar 29 [45 Vict. c. 4]Contagious Diseases (Animals) ActsFoot-and-Mouth Disease*, Questions, Mr. Blennerhassett, Mr. Chaplin; Answers, Mr. Mundella May 2, 1886*Restrictions on the Movement of Cattle*, Question, Mr. Alderman W. Lawrence; Answer, Mr. Mundella April 24, 1886*Returns of Infected Areas*, Question, Mr. Hussey Vivian; Answer, Mr. Mundella Mar 27, 29*The Crowe Cattle Market*, Question, Mr. Knowles; Answer, Mr. Mundella Mar 30, 303Conveyancing Bill [H.L.]

(The Earl Cairns)

l. Read 3^a Mar 28 (No. 20)c. Read 1^o (Mr. Henry Fowler) Mar 31 [Bill 121]Cooper's Hill College

Amendt. on Committee of Supply April 21, To leave out from "That," and add "a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the working and expense of Cooper's Hill College, and to report if it is desirable, for the public service, to retain the present system, or whether any and, if so, what changes and modifications should be made" (Mr. Gibson) v., 1111; Question proposed, "That the words, &c.;" after debate, Question put; A. 78, N. 27; M. 51 (D. L. 68)

Copyright (Works of Fine Art, &c.) Bill

(Mr. Hastings, Viscount Sandon, Mr. Hanbury-Tracy, Sir Gabriel Goldney, Mr. Agnew)

c. Ordered; read 1^o Mar 30 [Bill 119]CORBET, Mr. W. J., Wicklow Co.

Clothing Contracts (Army and Post Office), 302

Ireland—Miscellaneous Questions

Local Contracts for Uniforms for Army and other Services—Manufacture of Uniforms in Ireland, 24

Peace Preservation Act, 1881—Proclamation of Co. Wicklow, 979

Poor Law—Death in Naas Workhouse, 1663;—Election of Guardians for Rathdrum Union, 1811

Protection of Person and Property Act, 1881—Messrs. Hely and Dowling, 978;—Transfer of Prisoners detained under the Act from Clonmel Gaol to Naas, 1031

State of—Co. Wicklow, 1406, 1663

[cont.]

CORBET, Mr. W. J.—cont.

Official Salaries—Mr. Algernon West, 984

Poor Law Guardians (Ireland), 2R. 942

Revenue and Expenditure—Finance Accounts, 1939

Turkey (Albania)—Death of Captain Selby, 5

Corrupt Practices at Elections Act—The Magistracy—Mr. Cheney Garfit

Questions, Mr. Labouchere, Sir H. Drummond Wolff; Answers, The Attorney General Mar 30, 296

Corrupt Practices (Disfranchisement) Bill

(Mr. Attorney General, Secretary Sir William Harcourt)

c. Ordered; read 1^o Mar 30 [Bill 118]
Suspended Boroughs, Question, Mr. Lewis; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington April 20, 1035; Question, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington April 28, 1784County Courts Act (1867) Amendment Bill

(Mr. Henry H. Fowler, Mr. Monk, Mr. Reid)

c. Ordered; read 1^o May 1 [Bill 146]County Government BillLocal Option*, Question, Sir Wilfrid Lawson; Answer, Mr. Gladstone April 28, 1678COURTNEY, Mr. L. H. (Under Secretary of State for the Colonies), Liskeard

Africa (South)—Miscellaneous Questions

Basutoland, State of Affairs in, 309

Cetewayo, Ex-King of Zululand—Visit to England, 663, 1943

Natal—Alleged Massacre, 1269

Zululand, 1572

Africa (South)—Zululand—Cetewayo (Release from Captivity), Motion for an Address, 781

Australia (Western)—Free Emigration, 1104

Crown Agents for the Colonies—Inspector of Coals at Cardiff, 1265

Cyprus, Island of—Election of Members to Legislative Assembly, 309, 1263, 1264, 1272

Grant of a Constitution—The Despatch, 1103

Gibraltar (Religious Dissensions)—Dr. Canilla—The Papers, 643, 1562

Papal See (Diplomatic Communications), Res. 907, 908

Slave Trade in Asia and Africa, 1724

Straits Settlements—Slavery in the Malay Peninsula, 489

COURTOWN, Earl of

Police Protection (Ireland), Motion for Papers, 273

COWEN, Mr. J., Newcastle-on-Tyne

Customs—Penalties for Smuggling, 1560

Fires in Theatres (Prevention), Res. 798

Ireland—Mr. Clifford Lloyd—Circular by the Inspector of Police, Co. Clare, 1024

[cont.]

COWEN, Mr. J.—cont.

Ireland—Protection of Person and Property Act, 1881—Miscellaneous Questions
 American Citizens detained under the Act, 1029
 Dillon, Mr. 493, 494
 Members of this House detained under the Act, 1679
 Parliament—Business of the House—Tuesday Sittings, 1681
 Interference of Peers in Parliamentary Elections, 1151
 Supply, Report, 180
 Ways and Means, Report, 1413

Criminal Law

Case of Jane M'Evoy, Question, Mr. Macfarlane; Answer, Sir William Harcourt Mar 27, 20
The Magistracy—Flogging, Question, Mr. P. A. Taylor; Answer, Mr. Hibbert April 25, 1400

Criminal Law—The Condemned Convict Lamson

Question, Sir R. Assheton Cross; Answer, Sir William Harcourt April 3, 551; Question, Sir R. Assheton Cross; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke April 4, 670; Questions, Mr. Lewis; Answers, Sir William Harcourt April 18, 872; Question, Observations, The Earl of Milltown, Earl Granville April 21, 1082
 Moved, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for copies of all the correspondence that has taken place with the United States Government on the subject of the postponement of the execution of the sentence passed upon the convict Lamson" (The Earl of Milltown) April 25, 1883; after short debate, Motion agreed to

CROPPER, Mr. J., Kendal

Parliamentary Elections Expenses, 2R. 967
 Slave Trade in Asia and Africa, 1727
 Walton Vicarage, 2R. 1096

CROSS, Right Hon. Sir R. A., Lancashire, S.W.

Civil Imprisonment (Scotland), 2R. 255
 Criminal Law—The Condemned Prisoner Lamson, 551, 670, 671
 Lunacy Laws, Res. 1469
 Metropolis Management and Building Acts Amendment, Comm. 2022
 Municipal Corporations, Comm. 1187
 Parliament—Business of the House, 1110
 Parliament—Business of the House (Putting the Question), Res. 84, 1869
 Parliament—Wigan New Writ, Res. 1960, 1965
 Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices), 2R. 1327, 1364, 1445, 1630
 Walton Vicarage, 2R. 1092, 1094, 1095
 Ways and Means, Financial Statement, Comm. 1326

CROSS, Mr. J. K., Bolton

Municipal Corporations, Comm. 1773

Crown Agents for the Colonies—Inspector of Coals at Cardiff

Question, Mr. Lewis; Answer, Mr. Courtney April 24, 1264

CURRIE, Sir D., Perthshire

Agricultural Holdings, Notices of Removal (Scotland), 2R. 288

Customs and Inland Revenue Bill

(Mr. Playfair, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Lord Frederick Cavendish)

a. Ordered; read 1^o April 25 [Bill 140]

Customs—Penalties for Smuggling

Question, Mr. Joseph Cowen; Answer, Lord Frederick Cavendish April 27, 1560

Customs Department

Recent Appointments—Mr. Walpole, Question, Mr. O'Donnell; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer April 4, 677

The New Warehousing Scheme, Questions, Mr. Spencer Balfour, Mr. Thorold Rogers; Answers, Lord Frederick Cavendish Mar 31, 486;—Surveyors, Question, Baron Henry De Worms; Answer, Lord Frederick Cavendish April 24, 1253; Question, Mr. Anderson; Answer, Lord Frederick Cavendish, 1260

Cyprus, Island of

Election of Members to Legislative Assembly, Question, Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett; Answer, Mr. Courtney Mar 30, 308

Grant of a Constitution—The Despatch, Questions, Mr. Bourke, Mr. Rylands; Answers, Mr. Courtney April 21, 1103

The New Constitution—Representation of the Mussulmans in the Legislative Council, Questions, Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett; Answers, Mr. Courtney April 24, 1262; Question, Mr. Mac Iver; Answer, Mr. Courtney, 1272

DALY, Mr. J., Cork

Supply, Report, 206

DAVENPORT, Mr. H. T., Staffordshire, N.

Provincial Art Galleries and Museums, Res. 596

DAVIES, Mr. D., Cardigan, &c.

Parliamentary Elections Expenses, 2R. 975

DAVIES, Mr. W., Pembrokeshire

Turnpike Roads (South Wales), 3R. 1910

DAWSON, Mr. C., Carlow

Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices), 2R. 1603

DE FERRIERES, Baron, Cheltenham

Parliament—Gloucester Writ, Res. 1580

Parliament—Wigan New Writ, Res. Amendt. 1955

Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices), 2R. 1605

DE LA WARR, Earl

Egypt—Assam, 1636
Highway Rates, 1377
Tunis—Cession of Esparto Grass Districts, 2
Tunis—Bombardment of Sfax—Indemnity to British Subjects, Address for Papers, 1801, 1806

DENMAN, Lord

Army (Alternative Punishment), 2R. 1555
Jury Laws (Ireland), 456

DE WORMS, Baron H., Greenwich

Customs Department—New Warehousing
Scheme—Surveyors, 1253
Egypt—Bay of Assab, 980, 982
Navy—Payment of Naval Pensions, 1260
Russia—Persecution of the Jews, 28, 1559,
1560, 1817

DICKSON, Mr. T. A., Tyrone

Ireland—Abolition of the Viceregal Office, 1656
Land Law Act, 1881—Arrears of Rent,
312, 1270
Land Law (Ireland) Act (1881) Amendment,
2R. 1546
Poor Law Guardians (Ireland), 2R. 936
Public Affairs, State of—Irish Policy of the
Government, Ministerial Statement, 1988

DILKE, Sir O. W. (Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs), Chelsea,
&c.

Asia (Central)—Russian Advance, 1665
Criminal Law—Lamson, the Condemned Prisoner, 671
Egypt—Bay of Assab, 981, 982
Robbery of British Subjects, 486
Factory Acts—Lead Poisoning, 667
France—Commercial Treaty—Renewal of Negotiations, 1272
International Law—Spanish Steamer "Leon
XIII.," 480
Land League Meetings (England), 669
Opium Trade—Chefoo Convention, 1244
Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal
Practices), 2R. 1618
Protection of Person and Property (Ireland)
Act, 1881—American Citizens arrested
under the Act, 874, 875, 1029, 1109, 1110, 1257, 1270
Revenue—Wine Duties, 1829
Russia—Persecution of the Jews, 28, 1560,
1818
Slave Trade in Asia and Africa, 1721
Spain—Commercial Treaty—Negotiations, 29
Supply, Report, 153, 157, 160
Theatres and Music Halls—Prevention of Fires, 666
Tunis—Compensation to British Subjects,
676, 1841
Turkey—Miscellaneous Questions
Administrative Reforms, 1829
Albania—Death of Captain Selby, 6
Harbour of Smyrna, 30 ;—The Papers,
679
Midhat Pasha, 1408
United States—Trial of British Subjects, 1406

DILKE, Mr. A. W., Newcastle-on-Tyne
Parliamentary Elections Expenses, 2R. 944

DILLWYN, Mr. L. L., Swansea

Army Estimates—Provisions, &c. 867
Lunacy Laws, Res. 1451
Municipal Corporations, Comm. 1197
Parliament—Business of the House (Putting
the Question), Res. 385
Post Office—Parcels Post—Obligations of British Shipowners, 875
Slave Trade in Asia and Africa, 1727

Distress Amendment Bill

(*Sir Henry Holland, Sir Walter Barttelot, Mr.
Joseph Pease, Mr. Cropper*)
c. Committee—R.P. May 2, 2010 [Bill 73]

DIXON-HARTLAND, Mr. F. D., Evesham
Bankruptcy, 2R. 1554

Fires in Theatres (Prevention), 666; Res.
788, 794, 801
Mercantile Marine—"Albert Edward," Recent Accident to the, 1257
Metropolis Management and Building Acts
Amendment, Comm. 2026
Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal
Practices), 2R. 1430

Documentary Evidence Bill

(Mr. John Holms, Lord Frederick Cavendish)
c. Ordered; read 1^o April 27 [Bill 143]

DODDS, Mr. J., Stockton

Ecclesiastical Commission, Motion for a Select Committee, 517
Ways and Means, Financial Statement, Comm.
1316

DODSON, Right Hon. J. G. (President of the Local Government Board), Scarborough

Lunacy Laws, Res. 1464
Main Roads (England), 1810
Metropolis—Carriage Roads, 1669
Parliament—Business of the House (Putting
the Question), Res. 44, 1869
Poor Law (England)—Oldham Board of Guardians, 1811
Protection of Person and Property (Ireland)
Act, 1881—Mr. Dillon, 494
Public Health—Sheffield Small-Pox Hospital, 1810
Turnpike Roads (South Wales), 3R. 1904,
1905, 1912
Vaccination Act (1867), Sec. 31, 479
Wales (South)—General Superintendent of Roads, 559, 646

Drainage (Ireland) Provisional Order
Bill

(Mr. John Holms, Lord Frederick Cavendish)
c. Read 3^o Mar 27 [Bill 94]
l. Read 1^o (Lord Thurlow) Mar 27 (No. 51)
Read 2^o April 21

Drainage (Ireland) Provisional Order Bill—
cont.

Committee* ; Report April 24

Read 3^a* April 25

Royal Assent April 28 [45 Vict. c. ii]

DUCKHAM, Mr. T., Herefordshire

Parliamentary Elections Expenses, 2R. 976

Turnpike Roads (South Wales), 3R. 1909, 1915

Ways and Means, Report, 1416

DUFF, Mr. R. W., Banffshire

Entail Bill (Scotland), 1256

Herring Brand Committee, Res. 518, 520

Navy, Strength of the, Res. 1075

Duke of Albany (Establishment) Bill

(Mr. Playfair, Mr. Gladstone, Secretary Sir William Harcourt, Lord Frederick Cavendish)

c. Read 2^a* Mar 27 [Bill 112]

Committee* ; Report Mar 28

Read 3^a* Mar 29l. Read 1^a* (The Earl Granville) Mar 30 (No. 58)Read 2^a Mar 31, 428

Committee* ; Report April 20

Read 3^a* April 21

Royal Assent April 21 [45 Vict. c. 5]

DUNMORE, Earl of

Steamship "Victoria," Motion for a Paper, 139

DUNRAVEN, Earl of

Army (Auxiliary Forces)—Easter Volunteer Review, 460

Ireland—Jury Laws, 451

Land Law Act, 1881 (Sec. 8, Sub-sec. 9)

—"Adams v. Dunseath," 1204

Royal Parks—Richmond Park—The Roehampton Gate, 281

DUNSANY, Lord

Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881—Working of the Act, Petition, 1881

DYKE, Right Hon. Sir W. H., Kent, Mid
Ireland, State of—Mr. Massy, of Suir Castle, 80

Parliament—Business of the House (Putting the Question), Res. 97

Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices), 2R. 1439

EARP, Mr. T., Newark

Ways and Means, Report, 1415

Ecclesiastical and Mortuary Fees

Moved, "That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the Law which authorizes the demanding of Mortuary Fees, and into the Ecclesiastical Fees levied by Ministers of Religion upon the occasion of Burials and the erection of Monuments in Cemeteries and Parish Churchyards; and to report to the House whether any legislation is desirable with a view to their regulation or reduction" (Sir Alexander Gordon) Mar 28, 211; after short debate, Question put, and agreed to; Committee nominated April 3; List of the Committee, 221

[cont.]

Ecclesiastical and Mortuary Fees—cont.

Ecclesiastical Commission

Amendt. on Committee of Supply Mar 31, To leave out from "That," and add "a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the position of the Ecclesiastical Commission with reference to the Lands and other Property vested in the Commissioners, and also into the work, in connection with real property, of the Church Estates Commissioners and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for England and Wales" (Mr. Arthur Arnold) v., 495; Question proposed, "That the words, &c.;" after debate, Amendt. withdrawn

ECROYD, Mr. W. F., Preston

Ways and Means, Report, 1419

Educational Endowments (Scotland) Bill

(Mr. Mundella, The Lord Advocate, Mr. Solicitor General for Scotland)

c. Motion for Leave (Mr. Mundella) May 1, 1916; after short debate, Motion agreed to; Bill ordered; read 1^a* [Bill 147]

Education DepartmentThe New Code

Question, Sir H. Drummond Wolff; Answer, Mr. Mundella Mar 30, 308; Observations, Sir John Lubbock; Reply, Mr. Mundella; debate thereon April 3, 598

Education Grants under the New Code, Question, Lord George Hamilton; Answer, Mr. Mundella Mar 27, 16

Schedule VI.—Pupil Teachers, Question, Mr. Salt; Answer, Mr. Mundella Mar 31, 481

Article 109, G. IV., Questions, Lord George Hamilton; Answers, Mr. Mundella Mar 31, 485

Board School Grants, Question, Mr. Charles Phipps; Answer, Mr. Mundella Mar 30, 295

Education (Wales)—Report of Departmental Committee, Question, Mr. Puleston; Answer, Mr. Mundella April 24, 1245

Phonetic System in Board Schools, Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Mr. Mundella April 3, 544

Science and Art—"Hall of Science—Notice of Motion, Question, Mr. P. A. Taylor; Answer, Sir Henry Tyler Mar 30, 294; Question, Sir Henry Tyler; Answer, Mr. Mundella April 3, 543

Endowed Schools Acts—The Charity Commission, Question, Mr. Arthur O'Connor; Answer, Mr. Mundella April 28, 1669

Egypt—Robbery of British Subjects

Question, Captain Aylmer; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke Mar 31, 485

Egypt and Italy—The Bay of Assab

Questions, Baron Henry De Worms, Mr. Bourke; Answers, Sir Charles W. Dilke April 20, 1880; Question, Earl De La Warr; Answer, Earl Granville April 28, 1880

Electric Lighting Bill

(Mr. Chamberlain, Mr. Ashley)

c. Ordered; read 1st April 3 [Bill 122]
Read 2nd, and committed to a Select Committee April 17, 1887
Committee nominated April 19; List of the Committee, 868

Elementary Education Provisional Orders Confirmation (Finchley, &c.) Bill [H.L.]

(The Lord President)

l. Presented; read 1st, and referred to the Examiners April 20 (No. 63)
Read 2nd May 2

Elementary Education Provisional Order Confirmation (London) Bill [H.L.]

(The Lord Sandhurst)

l. Presented; read 1st, and referred to the Examiners Mar 30 (No. 56)
Read 2nd April 24

Elementary Education Provisional Orders Confirmation (West Ham) &c. Bill [H.L.]

(The Lord Sandhurst)

l. Presented; read 1st, and referred to the Examiners Mar 30 (No. 55)
Read 2nd April 24

EMLYN, Viscount, Carmarthenshire

Lunacy Laws, Res. 1463
Turnpike Roads (South Wales), 3R. 1903, 1905, 1911, 1915
Wales (South)—General Superintendent of Roads, 559, 645

Entail Bill (Scotland)

Legislation, Question, Mr. Duff; Answer, The Lord Advocate April 24, 1886

EWART, Mr. W., Belfast

£1 Bank Notes, Res. 1688

EWING, Mr. ORR-, Dumbarton

Agricultural Holdings, Notices of Removal (Scotland), 2R. 239

Factory Acts—Lead Poisoning—Legislation

Questions, Mr. Burt, Mr. Broadhurst; Answers, Sir Charles W. Dilke April 4, 1886

FARQUHARSON, Dr. R., Aberdeenshire, W

Agricultural Holdings, Notices of Removal (Scotland), 2R. 233
Lunacy Laws, Res. 1454

FAWCETT, Right Hon. H. (Postmaster General), Hackney

Ireland—Local Contracts for Uniforms for Army and other Services—Manufacture of Uniforms in Ireland, 24

Parliamentary Elections Expenses, 2R. 968, 974

Post Office—Miscellaneous Questions

American Mails, 659, 1946

Australian Mails, 873

Bank Holidays, 545

Contracts—Mails between London and Dublin, 665

Parcels Post, 6, 298, 542;—Obligations of British Shipowners, 876

Post Office Annuities, 1665

Transmission of Land League Portraits, 1099

Post Office (Telegraph Department)—Miscellaneous Questions

Disclosure of Telegrams, 546

Telegraph Extension, 543

Telegraph Service in Ireland, 673

Post Office (Ireland)—Miscellaneous Questions

Belfast Post Office, 533

Milford Post Office, 1563

"Pat," 987

Postmistress of Arran Island, 980

FOLKES, Sir W. H. B., Lynn Regis

Lynn and Fakenham Railway, 2R. 475

FINDLATER, Mr. W., Monaghan

Poor Law Guardians (Ireland), 2R. 941

Post Office (Contracts)—Mails between London and Dublin, 665

FIRTH, Mr. J. F. B., Chelsea

Army—Chelsea Hospital, Rumoured Abolition of—Admission of the Public to the Gardens, 292

Northampton Borough, 1678

Fisheries

Trawling—Legislation, Question, Mr. Sykes; Answer, Sir William Harcourt April 28, 1884

International Fishery Conference—Police of the North Sea, Question, Mr. Birkbeck; Answer, Mr. Chamberlain May 1, 1889

FITZMAURICE, Lord E., Calne

Land Law (Ireland) Act (1881) Amendment, 2R. 1512, 1520

Municipal Corporations, Comm. 1758

Parliament—Business of the House (Putting the Question), Res. 1871, 1872, 1873, 1875

FITZPATRICK, Hon. B. E., Portarlinton

Land Law (Ireland) Act (1881), Sec. 10, 1815

FLETCHER, Sir H., Horsham

Army (Annual), 2R. 567

Army Estimates—Provisions, &c. 834, 862

Education Department—New Code, 638

FOLKESTONE, Viscount, Wilts, S.
Municipal Corporations, Comm. 1199, 1203

FORSTER, Right Hon. W. E. (Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland), Bradford

Ireland—Miscellaneous Questions

Crime — Arson, 1935 ;—Co. Limerick — Alleged Outrages, 1940

Criminal Law—Death of a Woman through a Refusal to Visit her Son in Prison, 534
Dublin City Market Company, 476

Irish Land Commission — Sub-Commissioners, 984, 1103, 1108, 1152, 1153, 1154, 1155, 1156, 1666

Irish Policy of the Government—Alleged Negotiations, 1939

Land League and Fenianism—Mr. Arnold Forster and the "Pall Mall Gazette," 1272

Landlord and Tenant—Marquess of Ely's Estate—Interference of Police, 1931 ;—Earl of Kenmare's Estate, 1944

Law and Justice — Messrs. Crotty and others, 476

Mr. Clifford Lloyd—Circular by Inspector of Police, Co. Clare, 989, 993, 999, 1002, 1004, 1007, 1008, 1247, 1672, 1932, 1933

Potato Crop Committee, 1880, 1408, 1409

Young Ireland Literary Society (Dublin)—Alleged Intrusion of Police, 152, 299

Ireland—Evictions—Miscellaneous Questions

Carnacum, Co. Mayo, 534

Evicted Labourers at Rhode, King's Co. 1667, 1828, 1829

The Return for Quarter to 21st March, 983

Ireland—Land Law Act, 1881—Miscellaneous Questions

Constabulary, Interference of, 1262

Labourers' Cottages, 1817

Sub-Commissioners—Mr. Headech, 1656

Tenantry, 1269

Ireland—Magistracy—Miscellaneous Questions

Captain Plunket, R.M., 1824

Major Bond, R.M., 984

Major Traill, R.M., 1667, 1668

Major Waller Ashe, 1100

Ireland—Peace Preservation Act—Miscellaneous Questions

Arms for Self-Defence, 536

Gun Licences, 533

Rev. T. Feehan, 1822

Search for Arms, 1809 ;—Co. Kerry, 1935 ;—Sub-Inspector Ball, 1146, 1150

Wicklow County, Proclamation of, 979

Ireland—Poor Law—Miscellaneous Questions

Death in Naas Workhouse, 1663

Election of Guardians—Cavan Union—Charge against a Returning Officer, 1244

Gort Board of Guardians, 985

Manorhamilton Union—Election of Guardians, 1403

Rathdrum Union—Election of Guardians, 1812

Relief of Distress—Swinford Union, 1401

Superannuation of Dr. Alexander Smiley, Medical Officer at Ballycurry, 481

Ireland—Prisons—Miscellaneous Questions

Clonmel Gaol—Outbreak of Fever, 487

FORSTER, Right Hon. W. E.—cont.

Limerick Gaol — Governor Eagar, 1404, 1930

Omagh Gaol, 305

Prisons Board—Captain Barlow, 1842

Ireland—Protection of Person and Property Act, 1881—Miscellaneous Questions

Abraham, Mr. William, 1673

Alleged Proselytism among Persons Imprisoned under the Act, 149

Armstrong, Mr. Luke, 1827

Arrest of Employés of "United Ireland," 538

Arrests under the Act, 1102, 1938, 1939

Brennan, Mr. Thomas, 483

Dillon, Mr., 494

Dooley, Mr. J., 479

Editors of Newspapers arrested under the Act, 986, 987

Fitzgerald and Begley, Messrs., 147

Gallagher, Andrew and Patriok, 1102

Gibbons, Mr. Patrick, 147

Hodnett, Mr. Richard, 480

Hubon, Mr. Martin, 146

Investigation of Cases of Prisoners detained under the Act, 1404

Kenny, Mr., and Mr. Cantwell, 1399

Maloney, Mr., 1254

Messrs. Allis, Cullinane, Flood, and Dalton, 487

Messrs. Dowling, Denis, Somers, & Co., 982

Messrs. Hely and Dowling, 979

Messrs. G. O'Keane and others, 1097

Messrs. Nally and O'Kane, 1264

Messrs. Rea, O'Connor, Synan, Murphy, O'Brien, and O'Gorman, 537

Miss Kirk, 1109, 1670, 1671

Molloy, Mr., 1824

Murphy, Mr., 1256

O'Mahony, an American Citizen detained under the Act, 1808, 1809

O'Sullivan, Mr. Martin, 488

Persons arrested under the Act, 285, 286

Police Protection in Ireland, 299

Release of Prisoners detained under the Act, 1241, 1400, 1658, 1659, 1660, 1661, 1662, 1929

Ryan-Wall, Mr. Michael, 1812

Scanlan, Martin, and others, 1251

Smyth, Joseph, 1242

Transfer of Prisoners detained under the Act from Clonmel Gaol to Naas, 1031

Treatment of Prisoners under the Act, 287, 288, 289, 290, 291, 532, 1255

Visits to Prisoners under the Act, 1098, 1821

White, Mr. P. L., 1946

Whittaker, Michael, and Thomas Dunphy, 1818

Ireland—Royal Irish Constabulary—Miscellaneous Questions

Appointments of County and Sub-Inspectors at Londonderry, 1399

Constable Molloy, 535

Co. Monaghan, 1813

Duty of Protecting "Emergency Men," 983

Pension to Widow of Sergeant Kavanagh, 1252

Pensions, 1814

Sergeant Maguire, 1240

"United Ireland"—Alleged Excess of Duty by a Constable at Waterford, 1266

[cont.]

[cont.]

FORSTER, Right Hon. W. E.—cont.

Ireland, State of—Miscellaneous Questions
 Alleged Murders, 1842
 Ballintubber, Disturbances in, 1928
 Boylan, Mr., Alleged Assault on, 535
 Compensation for Malicious Injuries, 286
 Drogheda Town Council—Intrusion of the Police, 149
 Dynamite, Use of, 1239
 Frankfort, King's Co.—Alleged Riot, 1841
 Ladies' Land League—Judge Barry and Miss M'Cormack, 151
 Limerick—Prohibited Public Meeting, 539
 Londonderry, Outrages at, 477, 1241
 Murder of Mr. A. E. Herbert, 491
 Occupation of Huts by Persons Evicted—Interference of the Police, 1247, 1250
 Police Protection—Murder of a Caretaker, 1034, 1252
 Removal of Placards by the Constabulary, 1250
 Wicklow Co., 1407, 1664
 Land Law (Ireland) Act (1881) Amendment, 2R. 1549
 Parliament—Business of the House—Opposition to Motions, 305
 Supply, Report, 195, 196, 199, 209

FORTESCUE, Earl

Army (Annual), Comm. 1376
 Jury Laws (Ireland), 454
 Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881 (Sec. 8, Subsec. 9)—"Adams v. Dunseath," 1222

Forth Bridge Railway Bill

Board of Trade Report, Questions, Mr. Anderson; Answers, Mr. Chamberlain April 20, 1029

FOWLER, Mr. H. H., Wolverhampton

Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment, Consid. 126
 Ways and Means, Report, 1417

FOWLER, Mr. R. N., London

Africa (South)—Natal—Alleged Massacre, 1268
 Africa (South)—Zululand, 1572
 Africa (South)—Zululand—Cetewayo (Release from Captivity), Motion for an Address, 786
 Law and Police—Crimes of Violence, 1657
 Metropolis Management and Building Acts Amendment, Comm. 2024
 Municipal Corporations, Comm. 1199; Motion for Adjournment, 1766
 Parliament—Business of the House, Arrangement of, 1631;—Tuesday Sitings, 1680
 Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices), 2R. Amendt. 1332, 1445, 1630
 Parliamentary Elections Expenses, 2R. 961
 Places of Worship (Sites), Comm. add. cl.
 Motion for reporting Progress, 1477
 Prisons (England) Act—Gaol Dietary, 1657
 Ways and Means, 1784
 Ways and Means—Financial Statement, Comm. 1322

FOWLER, Mr. W., Cambridge

Africa (South)—Zululand—Cetewayo (Release from Captivity), Motion for an Address, 764
 £1 Bank Notes, Res. 1682, 1710

France—The Commercial Treaty—Renewal of the Negotiations

Question Mr. Magniac; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke April 24, 1271

Friendly Societies—The Quinquennial Returns—Report of the Registrar

Question, Mr. W. H. James; Answer, Lord Frederick Cavendish April 28, 1664

GALLOWAY, Earl of

Ireland, State of—Threatening Letters, 1390

Gas Provisional Orders Bill

(Mr. Ashley, Mr. Chamberlain)

c. Ordered; read 1^o* April 20 [Bill 136]
 Read 2^o* May 2

General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Bill

(The Earl of Camperdown)

l. Read 2^a* April 21 (No. 48)
 Committee*; Report April 24
 Read 3^a* April 25
 Royal Assent April 28 [45 Vict. c. 6]

Gibraltar (Religious Dissensions)—Dr. Canilla—The Papers

Question, The Earl of Milltown; Answer, The Earl of Kimberley Mar 31, 461; Question, Sir H. Drummond Wolff; Answer, Mr. Gladstone April 3, 555; Observations, Sir H. Drummond Wolff; Reply, Mr. Courtney; short debate thereon, 641; Questions, Sir H. Drummond Wolff, Colonel Colthurst; Answers, Mr. Courtney April 27, 1561

GIBSON, Right Hon. E., Dublin University

Cooper's Hill College, Res. 1111, 1119, 1121
 Ireland—Miscellaneous Questions
 Crown Rents, 11
 Ejectments—The Returns—Civil Bill Courts, 1571
 Protection of Person and Property Act, 1881—Arrests under the Act, 1938
 State of—Riot at Frankfort, King's Co., 1840, 1841
 Land Law (Ireland) Act (1881) Amendment, 2R. 1535
 Municipal Corporations, Comm. 1768
 Public Affairs, State of—Irish Policy of the Government, Ministerial Statement, 1994

GIFFARD, Sir H. S., Launceston

Parliament—Business of the House (Putting the Question), Res. 36, 48
 Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices), 2R. 1615
 Turnpike Roads (South Wales), 3R. 1914

GLADSTONE, Right Hon. W. E. (First Lord of the Treasury and Chancellor of the Exchequer), Edinburghshire

- Africa (South)—Transkei War Expenses, 551
Zululand—Cetewayo—Visit to this Country, 1943
Africa (South)—Zululand—Cetewayo (Release from Captivity), Motion for an Address, 769
Agriculture, Royal Commission on—Report, 34
Cornwall (East) Election—Speech of Mr. Courtney, 310, 311, 312
County Government Bill—Local Option, 1678
Customs Department—Recent Appointments—Mr. Walpole, 678
Ecclesiastical Commission, Motion for a Select Committee, 496, 507
England and France—Channel Tunnel Scheme, 32, 33, 882, 1270
Gibraltar (Religious Dissensions)—Dr. Canilla—The Papers, 555
Inland Revenue—Miscellaneous Questions
Beer Licences (Ireland), 150, 549
Duty on Silver Plate, 306
Grocers' Licences (Ireland), 550
Income Tax and Brewery Licences, 550
Railway Passenger Duty—Cheap Trains Act, 1844, 1831
International Law—Protection of Person and Property (Ireland) Act, 1881—Intervention of the American Government, 675
Ireland—Miscellaneous Questions
Address of the Dominion House of Commons, 1832, 1833
Crime, 689, 690, 696
Evictions—Arrears, 1677
General Prisons Act—Conveyance of Prisoners, 1679
Mr. Parnell—Representation of Liverpool, 677
Protection of Person and Property Act, 1881—Members of this House arrested under the Act, 31, 1679 ;—Treatment of Persons arrested under the Act, 25
State of—Ladies' Land League—Judge Barry and Miss M'Cormack, 21 ;—Recent Murders, 881
Ireland—Land Law Act, 1881—Miscellaneous Questions
Arrears of Rents, 313, 1270
Decision under the Act, 1834
Labourers, 675
Land Courts—Legal Expenses, 33
Sec. 8—"Adams v. Dunseath," 490, 884
Land Law (Ireland) Act (1881) Amendment, 2R. 1488, 1504
Landlord and Tenant (Scotland)—Evictions in the Island of Skye, 1675, 1676
Liberal Association of Ipswich and Irish Landlords, 1839
Mineral Leases—Insecurity of 'Tenants' Capital, 151
Minister of Agriculture and Commerce, 1409
Navy—Roman Catholic Chaplains for Troopships, 32, 33
Northampton Borough, 1678
Official Appointments—Private Secretaries to Cabinet Ministers, 300, 302
£1 Bank Notes, Res. 1694
Oxford and Cambridge Universities Commission—Oxford Statutes, 1840

GLADSTONE, Right Hon. W. E.—cont.

- Papal See—Diplomatic Communications, Res. 894, 898, 910, 911
Parliament—Business of the House—Miscellaneous Questions
492, 493, 553, 1840, 1945
New Rules of Procedure, 1269
Tuesday Sittings, 1680, 1681
Parliament—Business of the House (Putting the Question), Res. 71, 113, 400, 404, 409 ;
Personal Explanation, 492, 495, 1849, 1853, 1870, 1883, 1899
Provincial Art Galleries and Museums, 581
Public Affairs, State of—Irish Policy of the Government, 1835, 1836, 1837 ; Ministerial Statement, 1965, 1972, 1975, 1977, 1978, 1983, 1987, 1990
Lord Lieutenant of Ireland—Earl Cowper, 1838
Public Worship Regulation Act—The Rev. Mr. Green, 674
Supply, Report, 169, 170, 174, 176
Wales (South)—Road Acts—Maintenance of Main Roads, 307
Ways and Means—Financial Statement—Carriage Duties, 1676, 1677
Local Taxation, 308
Ways and Means—Financial Statement, Comm. 1273, 1284, 1305 ; Report, 1412

GOLDNEY, Sir G., Chippenham

- Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices), 2R. 1606, 1607

GORDON, General Hon. Sir A. H. Aberdeenshire, E.

- Agricultural Holdings, Notices of Removal (Scotland), 2R. 223
Board of Manufactures and Fisheries (Scotland), 876
Ecclesiastical and Mortuary Fees, Motion for a Select Committee, 211
Herring Brand Committee, Res. 525

GORST, Mr. J. E., Chatham

- Africa (South)—Zululand—Cetewayo (Release from Captivity), Motion for an Address, 756, 783
Army—Payment of Pensions, 987, 988
Crime (Ireland), 680, 689, 690
Land Law (Ireland) Act (1881) Amendment, 2R. 1553
Municipal Corporations, Comm. 1191
Navy—Miscellaneous Questions
Chatham Dockyard Workmen, 1030
Dockyards—Bank Holidays, 18, 19
Payment of Naval Pensions, 1259
Parliament—Business of the House, Arrangement of, 1108
Tuesdays, 1037
Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices), 2R. 1358, 1609
Public Affairs—Irish Policy of the Government, 1835, 1836
Straits Settlements—Slavery in the Malay Peninsula, 488
Supply—Buildings of the Houses of Parliament, 1182
Report, 208, 209
Turnpike Roads (South Wales), 3R. 1913

GOSCHEN, Right Hon. G. J., Ripon
 Ecclesiastical Commission, Motion for a Select Committee, 505
 Ireland—Mr. Clifford Lloyd—Circular by the Inspector of Police, Co. Clare, 1016
 Municipal Corporations, Comm. 1763
 £1 Bank Notes, Res. 1699
 Public Affairs, State of—Irish Policy of the Government, Ministerial Statement, 1989

GOURLY, Mr. E. T., Sunderland
 Mercantile Marine—Proposed Shipping Council, 297
 Metropolis—Street Accidents, 306
 Navy, Strength of the, Res. 1048

GRANT, Mr. A., Leith, & Co.
 Army (Auxiliary Forces)—Camps of Instruction, 1931
 Civil Imprisonment (Scotland), 2R. 253

GRANTHAM, Mr. W., Surrey, E.
 India—Bengal Staff Corps—Captain J. B. Chatterton, 555
 Parliament—Business of the House (Putting the Question), Res. 57, 1895

GRANVILLE, Earl (Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs)
 Criminal Law—The Condemned Convict Lamson, 1083; Motion for an Address, 1886, 1887
 Duke of Albany (Establishment), 2R. 428
 Egypt—Assam, 1636
 Highway Rates, 1378
 Ireland, State of—Threatening Letters, 1397
 Public Affairs, State of—Irish Policy of the Government — Ministerial Statement, 1920, 1922, 1924
 Lord Lieutenancy of Ireland, 1788
 Tunis—Cession of Esparto Grass Districts, 3
 Tunis—Bombardment of Sfax—Indemnity to British Subjects, Address for Papers, 1805, 1806
 Turkey—Passage in the Bosphorus—Russian Armed Ships, 280, 281

GRAY, Mr. E. D., Carlton Co.
 Poor Law Guardians (Ireland), 2R. 925, 930

GREGORY, Mr. G. B., Sussex, E.
 England and France—The Channel Tunnel Scheme, 32, 33
 Judicature Act—New Rules of Procedure, 15
 Lunacy Laws, Res. 1453
 Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices), 2R. 1600
 Parliamentary Elections Expenses, 2R. 950
 Supply—Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens, 1180

GURDON, Mr. R. T., Norfolk, S.
 Lunacy Laws, Res. 1450

HAMILTON, Lord C. J., Liverpool
 Navy—Troopship "Assistance," 27

VOL. COLXVIII. [THIRD SERIES.]

HAMILTON, Right Hon. Lord G. F., Middlesex
 Education Department — Education Grants under the New Code, 16, 485
 New Code, 616, 634
 Municipal Corporations, Comm. 1764
 Parliament—Business of the House, 493
 Parliament—Business of the House (Putting the Question), Amendts. 313, 314; Res. Amendt. 1847, 1848, 1873, 1899
 Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices), 2R. 1360, 1425
 Supply — Public Education (England and Wales), 653
 Science and Art Department, &c. 657

HAMILTON, Mr. I. T., Dublin Co.
 Ireland, State of—Mr. Carter, J.P.—Police Protection, 19, 299

HARCOURT, Right Hon. Sir W. G. V. (Secretary of State for the Home Department), Derby
 Burial Fees, 2R. 267
 Civil Imprisonment (Scotland), 2R. 255, 256
 Commonable Rights, 2R. 256
 Criminal Law—Jane M'Evoy, Case of, 20;—Lamson, The Condemned Prisoner, 551, 878
 Fires in Theatres (Prevention), Res. 794
 Fisheries —Trawling, 1665
 H.M. the Queen, Attempt upon the Life of—The Prisoner M'Lean, 541, 542
 Judicature Act—New Rules of Procedure, 15
 Law and Justice—Cases of Suspected Poisoning, 5
 Magistracy — Newcastle-on-Tyne — Severe Sentence, 292
 Law and Police—Miscellaneous Questions
 Camborne, Riots at, 1107, 1267, 1268, 1674
 Crimes of Violence, 1657
 Metropolis—Alleged Detective Conspiracy, 284
 Salvation Army, 544, 1271, 1826, 1941
 Mines (Coal) Regulation Act, 1872—Abram Colliery Explosion, 1930
 Weardale Colliery Explosion, 886
 Metropolis—Street Accidents, 306
 Metropolis Management and Building Acts Amendment, Comm. 2020, 2021
 Municipal Corporations, Comm. 1755, 1756, 1760
 Official Appointments—Mr. R. S. Mitford, 1104, 1105
 Oxford University (Jesus College Statutes), Motion for an Address, 2000
 Parliament—Order—The Precincts of the House — The Home Secretary and Mr. Anderson, 557
 Parliament—Business of the House (Putting the Question), Res. 39
 Police Protection to Public Servants, 1133
 Post Office—Detention of Land League Letters, 1099
 Prisons (England)—Gaol Dietary, 1657;—Tot-hill Fields Prison, 1942

HARCOURT, Mr. E. W., Oxfordshire
 England and France—The Channel Tunnel Scheme, 882
 Ways and Means, Report, 1410

HARTINGTON, Right Hon. Marquess of (Secretary of State for India), Lancashire, N.E.

Cooper's Hill College, Res. 1117, 1121

Corrupt Practices (Disfranchisement)—Suspended Boroughs, 1035, 1784

India—Miscellaneous Questions

Army—Promotion of Cavalry Officers, 1258 ;—Quartermasters Serving in India, 485

Bengal—Mortality in Prisons, 304

Bengal Staff Corps—Captain J. B. Chatterton, 555

Conveyance of Stores, 30

Finance, &c.—Import Duties on Indian Products, 7

High Court of Justice—Salaries of the Judges, 559

Indian Council—The Vacancy, 16

Rajputana Railway, 303

Roorkee College, 1104

Tea Labourers' Act, 546

Ireland—Mr. Clifford Lloyd—Circular by the Inspector of Police, Co. Clare, 1016, 1022

Municipal Corporations, Comm. 1188, 1191, 1202, 1203, 1770, 1783

Parliament—Business of the House—Arrangement of Business, 1108, 1109 ;—Tuesdays, 1036, 1037

Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices), 2R. 1361, 1364

Public Affairs, State of—Irish Policy of the Government, Ministerial Statement, 1995

Supply—Buildings of the Houses of Parliament, 1182

HAY, Admiral Right Hon. Sir J. O. D., Wigtown, &c.

Crime (Ireland), 706

Municipal Corporations, Comm. 1195, 1202

Navy, Strength of the, Res. 1050

Parliament—Business of the House, 553

Public Affairs—Irish Policy of the Government, 1837, 1838 ;—Ministerial Statement, 1980, 1982

Return, No. 88 (Revenue, Taxation and Population)—Parliamentary Representation, 979

Supply—Public Education (England and Wales), 654

HEALY, Mr. T. M., Wexford

Army (Annual), Comm. cl. 4, 734 ; add. cl. 737

Education Department—Phonetic System in Board Schools, 544

H.M. the Queen, Attempt upon the Life of—The Prisoner M'Lean, 541

Ireland—Miscellaneous Questions

Crime, 696, 724

Evictions—Erection of Huts for Evicted Labourers at Rhode, King's Co. 1829 ;—Mrs. Irwin, of Brootally, Co. Armagh, 662

Irish Land Commission—Decision under the Land Act, 1883, 1835 ;—Sub-Commissioners, 984, 1107, 1108, 1109, 1151, 1152, 1153, 1154, 1156, 1656, 1665, 1666

Land League and Fenianism—Mr. Arnold Forster and the "Pall Mall Gazette," 1272

HEALY, Mr. T. M.—cont.

Magistracy—Captain J. Bolton Jones, 868, 869 ;—Major Bond, R.N., 984

Mr. Clifford Lloyd—Circular by the Inspector of Police, Co. Clare, 999, 1007, 1008, 1009, 1017, 1933

Poor Law—Election of Poor Law Guardians—Mr. O'Halloran, a Suspect, 870 ;—Manorhamilton Union—Election of Guardians, 1403

Post Office—Convention of Paris—Seizure of the "Irish World" Newspaper, 148

Prisons—Clonmel Gaol—Outbreak of Fever, 487, 558, 559, 679 ;—Limerick Gaol—Governor Eagar, 1403, 1930

Young Ireland Literary Society, Dublin—Alleged Intrusion of Police, 152

Ireland—Land Law Act, 1881—Miscellaneous Questions

Labourers' Cottages, 1817

Sec. 8—"Adams v. Dunseath," 489, 883, 885

Tenantry, 1269

Ireland—Law and Justice—Miscellaneous Questions

Admission of Solicitors, 142, 143

Cork Grand Jury, 9, 10, 11

Expenses of Crown Witnesses, 1099

Ireland—Peace Preservation Act, 1881—Miscellaneous Questions

Arms for Self Defence, 536

Gun Licences, 532, 877, 878

Returns as to Number and Cost of Arms Surrendered, 647

Ireland—Protection of Person and Property Act, 1881—Miscellaneous Questions

Abraham, Mr. W., 1873

Alleged Proselytism among Persons Imprisoned under the Act, 149

Arrest of Employés of "United Ireland," 537

Dillon, Mr., 494

Fitzgerald and Begley, Messrs. 147

Hodnett, Mr. Richard, 480

Holden, Mr. J., 660

Investigation of Cases of Prisoners detained under the Act, 1404

Members of this House arrested under the Act, 31

Messrs. Allis, Cullinane, Flood, and Dalton, 487

O'Mahoney, an American Citizen detained under the Act, 1808, 1809

O'Sullivan, Mr. Martin, 488

Persons arrested under the Act, 285

Prisoners detained under the Act—John M'Carthy and others, 1658, 1659, 1661, 1662, 1663 ;—Mr. Ryan, 1572

Release of Prisoners detained under the Act—Limerick Gaol, 1241

Transfer of Prisoners detained under the Act from Clonmel to Naas Gaol, 1031

Treatment of Persons arrested under the Act, 25, 286, 287, 288, 290

Ireland—Royal Irish Constabulary—Miscellaneous Questions

Co. Monaghan, 1814

Sub-Constable Walsh, 21

Telegrams to Coroners, 1573

HEALY, Mr. T. M.—cont.

Ireland, State of—Miscellaneous Questions
Ballintubber, Disturbances in, 1928
Compensation for Malicious Injuries, 286
Drogheda Town Council—Intrusion of Police, 148, 149
Juries in the King's Co. 668
Occupation of Huts by Persons Evioted, 1248
Police at Cappoquin, 1573, 1574
Police Visits, 878, 879
Wexford Co., Alleged Outrage in, 872
Judgments (Inferior Courts), Consid. add. cl. 1786
Land Law (Ireland) Act (1881) Amendment, 2R. 1497, 1504, 1520
Law and Police—Riots at Camborne, 1268
Municipal Corporations, Comm. 115, 1198, 1753, 1777, 1779
Official Appointments—Mr. R. S. Mitford, 1105
Parliament—Miscellaneous Questions
Order—Precincts of the House—The Home Secretary and Mr. Anderson, 556
Palace of Westminster—Clock Tower, 29
Public Business, Arrangement of, 1631
Parliament—Business of the House (Putting the Question), Res. 113, 325, 409, 418
Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices), 2R. 1589, 1623, 1631
Post Office—American Mails, 1946
Public Affairs, State of—Irish Policy of the Government, 1837
Supply—Buildings of the Houses of Parliament, 1182
Report, 173, 187, 188, 189, 195, 196, 197, 199
Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens, 1159, 1160, 1171; Amendt. 1176, 1181

HENEAGE, Mr. E., Great Grimsby
Ireland—Abolition of the Viceregal Office, 1656

HENRY, Mr. Mitchell, Galway Co.
Ireland—Miscellaneous Questions
Mr. Clifford Lloyd—Circular by the Inspector of Police, Co. Clare, 1006
Potato Crop Committee, 1880, 1409
Protection of Person and Property Act, 1881—American Citizens detained under the Act, 1110
Royal Irish Constabulary—Pension to Widow of Sergeant Kavanagh, 1252
Land Law (Ireland) Act (1881) Amendment, 2R. 1553
Parliament—Business of the House—Debate of Tuesday last, Personal Explanation, 309
Order—Precincts of the House—The Home Secretary and Mr. Anderson, 557
Parliament—Business of the House (Putting the Question), Res. 354
Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices), 2R. 1587
Supply, Report, 204, 205

HERBERT, Hon. S., Wilton
Crime (Ireland)—Arson, 1935

Herring Brand Committee

Amendt. on Committee of Supply Mar 31, To leave out from "That," and add "in the opinion of this House, effect should be given without delay to the recommendations of the Report of the Herring Brand Committee" (Mr. Duff) v., 518; Question proposed, "That the words, &c.;" after debate [House counted out]

HIBBERT, Mr. J. T. (Parliamentary Secretary to the Local Government Board), Oldham

Coal Mines—Recent Colliery Explosions, 1035
Criminal Law—Magistracy—Flogging, 1400
Lunacy Laws, Res. 1456, 1460, 1470
Municipal Corporations, Comm. Motion for Adjournment, 114, 115
Parliament—Public Business, 1571
Parliamentary Elections Expenses, 2R. 962, 965, 966
Places of Worship (Sites), Comm. add. cl. 1477; Amendt. 1635
Poor Law Guardians (Ireland), 2R. 943
Turnpike Roads (South Wales), 3R. Motion for Adjournment, 1911

HICKS, Mr. E., Cambridgeshire

England and France—The Channel Tunnel Scheme—Crown Rights to the Foreshore, 307
Parliament—Business of the House (Putting the Question), Res. 1895

Highway Rates

Observations, Question, Earl De La Warr; Answer, Earl Granville April 25, 1377

HILL, Lord A. W., Downshire

Protection of Person and Property (Ireland) Act, 1881—Arrests under the Act, 1938

HOLLAND, Sir H. T., Midhurst

Africa (South)—Cetewayo—Visit to England, 663
Africa (South)—Cetewayo (Release from Captivity), Motion for an Address, 776, 781 Distress Amendment, Comm. 2010; cl. 1, Motion for reporting Progress, ib.
Slave Trade in Asia and Africa, 1718

HOLLOND, Mr. J. R., Brighton

Charity Commission—Parochial Charities of the City of London, 669

HOME, Lieutenant-Colonel D. Milne, Berwick-on-Tweed

Army Organization—Uniforms of Scotch Regiments, 732

HOPK, Right Hon. A. J. B. Beresford, Cambridge University

Burial Fees, 2R. 266
Ecclesiastical and Mortuary Fees, Motion for a Select Committee, 220

HOPK, Right Hon. A. J. B. Beresford—cont.

Lunacy Laws, Res. 1458

Provincial Art Galleries and Museums, Res. 585, 591

HOPWOOD, Mr. O. H., Stockport

Army (Annual), Comm. add. cl. 755

HOWARD, Mr. G. J., Cumberland, E.

Provincial Art Galleries and Museums, Res. 595

Science and Art—H.B.'s Caricatures, 547

HOWARD, Mr. J., Bedfordshire

Agriculture, Royal Commission on—The Report, 34

Ecclesiastical Commission, Motion for a Select Committee, 504

HUBBARD, Right Hon. J. G., London

Ecclesiastical Commission, Motion for a Select Committee, 516

Public Worship Regulation Act—Rev. Mr. Green, 673

Ways and Means, Report, 1418

ILLINGWORTH, Mr. A., Bradford

Burial Fees, 2R. 261

Provincial Art Galleries and Museums, 596

Walton Vicarage, 2R. 1088, 1094, 1095, 1096

INOHIQUIN, Lord

Jury Laws (Ireland), 2R. 450

Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881 (Sec. 8, Subsec. 9)—"Adams v. Dunseath," 1235

Inclosure (Ashleside) Provisional Order Bill

(Mr. Hibbert, Secretary Sir William Harcourt)

c. Ordered; read 1° April 19 [Bill 128]

Read 2° May 2

Inclosure (Bettws Disserth) Provisional Order Bill

(Mr. Hibbert, Secretary Sir William Harcourt)

c. Ordered; read 1° April 19 [Bill 127]

Read 2° May 2

Inclosure (Cefn Drawen) Provisional Order Bill

(Mr. Hibbert, Secretary Sir William Harcourt)

c. Ordered; read 1° April 19 [Bill 126]

Read 2° May 2

INDIA

MISCELLANEOUS QUESTIONS

Bengal—Mortality in Prisons, Question, Mr. O'Donnell; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington Mar 30, 304

Bengal Staff Corps—Captain J. B. Chatterton, Question, Mr. Grantham; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington April 3, 555

Conveyance of Stores, Question, Mr. Coddington; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington Mar 27, 30

INDIA—cont.

Finance, &c.—Import Duties on Indian Products, Question, Mr. O'Donnell; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington Mar 27, 7

Rorkee College, Question, Mr. Pugh; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington April 21, 1104

Tea Labourers' Act, Question, Sir George Campbell; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington April 3, 546

The High Court of Justice—Salaries of the Judges, Question, Mr. Pugh; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington April 3, 559

The Indian Council—The Vacancy, Question, Mr. Onslow; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington Mar 27, 15

The Rajputana Railway, Question, Mr. Arthur Arnold; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington Mar 30, 303

Interments (Felo de se) Bill

(Viscount Ebrington, Sir John Amory, Sir John Kennaway)

c. Read 2° April 26

[Bill 98]

International Fishery Conference—Police of the North Sea

Question, Mr. Birkbeck; Answer, Mr. Chamberlain May 1, 1809

International Law

Protection of Person and Property (Ireland) Act, 1881—Intervention of the American Government, Question, Sir H. Drummond Wolff; Answer, Mr. Gladstone April 4, 674

The Spanish Steamer "Leon XIII.", Question, Dr. Cameron; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke Mar 31, 480

IRELAND

MISCELLANEOUS QUESTIONS

Abolition of the Vice Regal Office, Notice, Mr. Heneage; Question, Mr. R. Power; Answer, Mr. Speaker April 23, 1656

Address of the Dominion House of Commons, Questions, Mr. Callan, Sir H. Drummond Wolff; Answers, Mr. Gladstone May 1, 1832

"Boycotting"—The Debate of Tuesday Last, Personal Explanations, Mr. Mitchell Henry, Mr. Raikes Mar 30, 309

Civil Service—Appointment of Mr. Croker, Question, Mr. Sexton; Answer, The Solicitor General for Ireland April 4, 671

Crown Rents, Questions, Mr. Gibson, Mr. O'Donnell, Mr. Arthur O'Connor; Answers, Lord Frederick Cavendish Mar 27, 11

Dublin City Market Company, Question, Mr. Sexton; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster Mar 31, 476

General Prisons Act—Conveyance of Prisoners, Questions, Mr. O'Connor Power; Answers, Mr. Gladstone April 28, 1678

Imperial Taxation, Observations, Sir Joseph M'Kenna April 18, 912 [House counted out]

Irish Fisheries—French Fishing Vessels, Questions, Mr. O'Shaughnessy, Mr. Arthur O'Connor; Answers, The Attorney General for Ireland April 27, 1568

[cont.]

[cont.]

IRELAND—cont.

Irish Policy of the Government—Alleged Negotiations, Question, Colonel Walrond; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster May 2, 1939

Irish Political Prisoners—Sir John Hay's Motion, Question, Colonel Nolan; Answer, Mr. Speaker May 2, 1945

Jury Laws, Observations, Question, The Marquess of Lansdowne; Reply, Lord Carlingford; short debate thereon Mar 31, 429

Local Contracts for Uniforms for Army and other Services—Manufacture of Uniforms in Ireland, Question, Mr. W. J. Corbet; Answer, Mr. Fawcett Mar 27, 24

Mr. Parnell—Representation of Liverpool, Question, Mr. Sexton; Answer, Mr. Gladstone April 4, 676

Potato Crop Committee, 1880, Questions, Colonel Nolan, Mr. Healy, Mr. Mitchell Henry; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster April 25, 1408

State of Public Affairs—The Irish Policy of the Government—The Lord Lieutenancy of Ireland—Earl Cowper, Observations, The Marquess of Salisbury; Reply, Earl Granville May 1, 1787; Questions, Mr. Gorst, Mr. J. Lowther, Mr. Healy; Answers, Mr. Gladstone; Observations, Sir John Hay 1835; Question, Mr. Onslow; Answer, Mr. Gladstone 1838; Questions, The Marquess of Salisbury, The Earl of Carnarvon; Answers, Earl Granville May 2, 1919; Ministerial Statement, Mr. Gladstone 1965; after debate, Moved, "That this House do now adjourn" (Mr. Chaplin); after further debate, Motion withdrawn

The Land League and Fenianism—Mr. Arnold Forster and the "Pall Mall Gazette", Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster April 24, 1272

Post Office

Belfast Post Office, Question, Mr. Biggar; Answer, Mr. Fawcett April 8, 533

Milford Post Office, Question, Mr. Leamy; Answer, Mr. Fawcett April 27, 1562

"Pat"—Alleged Stoppage, Question, Mr. Lalor; Answer, Mr. Fawcett April 20, 987

The Postmistress of Arran Island, Questions, Mr. Redmond; Answers, Mr. Fawcett April 20, 980

Poor Law

Ballycary Dispensary District and Larne Workhouse, Question, Mr. Biggar; Answer, The Solicitor General for Ireland April 4, 664; Question, Mr. Biggar; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland April 18, 880

Death in Naas Workhouse, Question, Mr. W. J. Corbet; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster April 28, 1668

Election of Poor Law Guardians—Mr. O'Halloran, a Suspect, Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland April 18, 870;—Cavan Union—Charge against a Returning Officer, Question, Mr. Biggar; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster April 24, 1243;—Rathdrum Union, Question, Mr. W. J. Corbet; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster May 1, 1811—Manorhamilton Union, Questions, Mr. Healy; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster April 25, 1403

IRELAND—Poor Law—cont.

tions, Mr. Healy; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster April 25, 1403

Relief of Distress—Swinford Union, Question, Mr. O'Connor Power; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster April 25, 1401

Superannuation of Dr. Alexander Smiley, Medical Officer at Ballycurry, Questions, Mr. Meldon, Mr. Biggar; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster Mar 31, 481

Prisons

Outbreak of Fever in Clonmel Gaol, Questions, Mr. Healy; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster Mar 31, 487; Questions, Mr. Healy; Answers, The Solicitor General for Ireland April 3, 558; April 4, 679

Prisons Board—Captain Barlow, Question, Mr. Sexton; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster May 1, 1841

Enniskillen Gaol—Regulation as to Visitors to Prisoners on St. Patrick's Day, Questions, Mr. Redmond; Answers, The Attorney General for Ireland April 18, 871

Limerick Gaol—Governor Eagar, Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster April 25, 1403; Questions, Mr. O'Sullivan, Mr. Healy; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster May 2, 1930;—Putting untried Prisoners to Work, Question, Mr. O'Sullivan; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland April 27, 1557

Omagh Gaol, Question, Mr. Redmond; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster Mar 30, 305

Law and Justice

Admission of Solicitors, Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland Mar 28, 142

Case of Peter Dunne—Mr. Justice Fitzgerald, Observations, Mr. Arthur O'Connor; Reply, The Attorney General for Ireland; short debate thereon April 21, 1138

Case of Robert Webster, Question, Mr. Redmond; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland Mar 30, 294

Expenses of Crown Witnesses, Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland April 21, 1099

Juries in the King's County, Questions, Mr. Tottenham, Mr. Healy; Answers, The Solicitor General for Ireland April 4, 668

Messrs. Crotty and Others, Question, Mr. Sexton; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster Mar 31, 476

The Cork Grand Jury, Questions, Mr. Healy, Mr. Sexton; Answers, The Attorney General for Ireland Mar 27, 9

Law and Police

The Ladies' Land League—Judge Barry and Miss M'Cormack, Questions, Mr. J. R. Yorke, Mr. Redmond; Answers, The Attorney General for Ireland, Mr. Gladstone Mar 27, 20; Question, Mr. J. R. Yorke; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster Mar 28, 150

Mr. Massy, of Suir Castle, Question, Sir William Hart Dyke; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland Mar 27, 30

Military Riots at Galway, Question, Mr. Sexton; Answer, Mr. Childers Mar 27, 34

IRELAND—Law and Police—cont.

- Riot at Ballyragget*, Questions, Mr. Patrick Martin; Answers, The Attorney General for Ireland Mar 31, 483
- Alleged Riot at Frankfort, King's Co.*, Question, Mr. Gibson; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster May 1, 1840
- Compensation for Malicious Injuries*, Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster Mar 30, 286
- Outrage at Londonderry*, Questions, Mr. Redmond; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster Mar 31, 477; April 24, 1240
- Alleged Outrage in Wexford County*, Question, Mr. Redmond; Answer, The Solicitor General for Ireland April 4, 664; Questions, Mr. Barry, Mr. Healy; Answers, The Attorney General for Ireland April 18, 871
- Alleged Assault on Mr. Boylan*, Questions, Mr. Redmond; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster April 3, 535
- Prohibited Public Meeting at Limerick*, Questions, Mr. Justin McCarthy, Mr. Redmond; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster April 3, 538
- The "Emergency" Men—Case of James Carson*, Question, Mr. Biggar; Answer, The Solicitor General for Ireland April 4, 661;—Assault at Manulla Station—Decision of Major Bond, Question, Mr. Biggar; Answer, The Solicitor General for Ireland April 4, 662
- Land League Huts—Mr. Clifford Lloyd, R.M.*, Questions, Mr. Sexton; Answers, The Attorney General for Ireland April 18, 885
- Use of Dynamite*, Questions, Mr. Redmond, Mr. J. N. Richardson; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster April 24, 1239
- Occupation of Huts by Persons Evicted—Interference of the Police*, Questions, Mr. Sexton, Mr. Redmond; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster; Observations, Sir John R. Mowbray; Reply, Mr. Speaker April 24, 1247
- Threatening Letters*, Observations, Question, The Earl of Galloway; Answer, The Lord Chancellor; short debate thereon April 25, 1390
- County Wicklow*, Questions, Mr. W. J. Corbet; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster April 25, 1406; April 28, 1663
- Imprisonment of Miss Kirk*, Questions, Mr. Sexton; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster April 21, 1109; April 28, 1670
- Disturbances in Ballintubber*, Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster May 2, 1928

Crime

- Observations, Mr. Gorst April 4, 680
- Alleged Outrages, County Limerick*, Question, Mr. Tottenham; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster May 2, 1940
- Arson*, Question, Mr. Sidney Herbert; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster May 2, 1935
- Murder of Mrs. H. M. Smythe and others*, Question, Sir Eardley Wilmot; Answer, The Solicitor General for Ireland April 3, 554; Question, Sir Eardley Wilmot; Answer, Mr. Gladstone April 18, 881

Criminal Law

- Charge of Conspiracy to Murder*, Question, Mr. Callan; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland May 1, 1819

IRELAND—Criminal Law—cont.

- Death of a Woman through refusal of Admission to her Sons in Prison*, Question, Mr. Biggar; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster April 3, 534
- The Late Riot at Kilross—Sentences upon the Prisoners*, Question, Mr. O'Sullivan; Answer, The Solicitor General for Ireland April 3, 540
- The Magistracy*
- Captain T. Bolton Jones*, Questions, Mr. Healy; Answers, The Attorney General for Ireland April 18, 868
- Captain Plunket, R.M.*, Question, Mr. Redmond; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster; Question, Mr. Arthur O'Connor [no answer] May 1, 1824
- Major Bond, R.M.*, Questions, Mr. Healy; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster April 20, 984
- Major Traill, R.M.*, Questions, Mr. Justin McCarthy, Mr. O'Donnell; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster April 28, 1667
- Major Waller Ashe*, Question, Mr. Sexton; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster April 21, 1100
- Mr. Clifford Lloyd, R.M.*, Question, Mr. Sexton; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster April 28, 1671;—Circular by the Inspector of Police, Co. Clare, Question, Mr. Sexton; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster April 24, 1247; Questions, Mr. Sexton, Mr. Healy, Mr. Redmond; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster May 2, 1932
- Summary Jurisdiction*, Question, Mr. Sexton; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland May 2, 1934

Landlord and Tenant

- The Earl of Kenmare's Estate*, Question, Mr. Sexton; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster May 2, 1944
- The Marquess of Ely's Estate—Interference of the Police*, Questions, Mr. Redmond; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster May 2, 1931
- The Mercers' Company and their Tenants*, Question, Mr. Leamy; Answer, The Solicitor General for Ireland April 4, 669

State of Ireland

- Ejectments—The Returns—The Civil Bill Courts*, Question, Mr. Gibson; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland April 27, 1571

Evictions

- Carnacun, County Mayo*, Question, Mr. O'Connor Power; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster April 3, 533
- Case of Mrs. Irwin, of Brootally, Co. Armagh*, Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, The Solicitor General for Ireland April 4, 662
- Return for Quarter ending 21st March*, Question, Mr. Lalor; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster April 20, 983
- Return, to December 31, 1881*, Question, Observations, Lord Monteagle of Brandon; Reply, Lord Carlingford; Observations, Lord Oranmore and Browne April 28, 1637
- Longford Workhouse*, Question, Mr. Justin McCarthy; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland April 27, 1568

[cont.]

[cont.]

IRELAND—State of Ireland—Evictions—cont.

The Evicted Labourers at Rhode, King's County—Erection of Huts. Question, Mr. Molloy; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster April 28, 1866; Questions, Mr. Molloy, Mr. Healy; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster May 1, 1827
Arrears. Question, Mr. Biggar; Answer, Mr. Gladstone April 28, 1877
Murder of Mr. A. E. Herbert. Question, Mr. Bourke; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster Mar 31, 496
Alleged Murders. Question, Mr. Lewis; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster May 1, 1842
Protection of Person and Property (Ireland) Act, 1881
Michael Conolly. Question, Mr. O'Donnell; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland Mar 27, 8
Mr. Martin Hubon. Question, Mr. Sexton; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster Mar 28, 146
Mr. Patrick Gibbons. Question, Mr. Sexton; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster Mar 28, 147
Messrs. Fitzgerald and Begley. Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster Mar 28, 147
Mr. James Dooley. Questions, Mr. Redmond; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster Mar 31, 478
Mr. Richard Hodnett. Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster Mar 31, 480
Mr. Thomas Brennan. Questions, Mr. Sexton; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster Mar 31, 482
Messrs. Allis, Cullinane, Flood, and Dalton. Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster Mar 31, 487
Mr. Martin O'Sullivan. Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster Mar 31, 488
Mr. Dillon. Questions, Mr. Joseph Cowen; Mr. Sexton; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster Mar 31, 493
Messrs. John Rea, D. Hayes O'Connor, and others. Question, Mr. Sexton; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster April 3, 537
Mr. John Healy. Question, Mr. Biggar; Answer, The Solicitor General for Ireland April 4, 660
Mr. James Holden. Questions, Mr. Healy, Mr. Redmond; Answers, The Solicitor General for Ireland April 4, 660
Messrs. Gannon and John Reynolds. Question, Mr. Biggar; Answer, The Solicitor General for Ireland April 4, 661
John O'Brien. Question, Mr. Biggar; Answer, The Solicitor General for Ireland April 4, 663
Messrs. Cullen and Lynott. Question, Mr. Biggar; Answer, The Solicitor General for Ireland April 4, 665
John Hoolihan. Question, Mr. Arthur O'Connor; Answer, The Solicitor General for Ireland April 4, 667
Mr. Parnell. Question, Mr. Lewis; Answer, The Attorney General April 17, 733; Question, Mr. Lewis; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland April 18, 877
Mr. John O'Connor. Question, Mr. Redmond; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland April 18, 879

IRELAND—Protection of Person and Property Act, 1881—cont.

Messrs. Hely and Dowling. Question, Mr. W. J. Corbet; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster April 20, 978
Messrs. James Dowling, Denis Somers, and others. Questions, Mr. Lalor; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster April 20, 982
Mr. J. O'Keane and others. Question, Mr. Biggar; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster April 21, 1097
Andrew and Patrick Gallaher. Question, Mr. Lalor; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster April 21, 1101
Miss Kirk. Questions, Mr. Sexton; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster April 21, 1109; April 28, 1670
Mr. Joseph Smyth. Question, Mr. Justin M'Carthy; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster April 24, 1241
Martin Scanlan and others. Question, Mr. Labouchere; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster April 24, 1250
Mr. Moloney. Question, Mr. Redmond; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster April 24, 1254
Mr. Murphy. Question, Mr. Redmond; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster April 24, 1255
Messrs. Nally and O'Kane. Question, Mr. Biggar; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster April 24, 1264
Mr. M. P. Kenny and Mr. Cantwell. Question, Mr. Redmond; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster April 25, 1399
Enniskillen Gaol—Mr. J. P. Quinn. Question, Mr. Justin M'Carthy; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland April 27, 1569
Mr. William Abraham. Questions, Mr. Sexton, Mr. O'Shea; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster April 28, 1672
Mr. Henry O'Mahony, an American Citizen detained under the Act. Questions, Mr. Healy; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster May 1, 1808
Mr. Michael Ryan-Wall. Question, Mr. Redmond; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster May 1, 1812
Michael Whittaker and Thomas Dunphy. Question, Mr. Lalor; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster May 1, 1818
Mr. Molloy. Question, Mr. Redmond; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster May 1, 1824
Mr. Luke Armstrong. Question, Mr. Sexton; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster May 1, 1826
Mr. P. L. White. Question, Mr. Biggar; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster May 2, 1945
Treatment of Persons arrested under the Act
Question, Mr. Justin M'Carthy; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland Mar 27, 14; Questions, Mr. Healy, Sir Wilfrid Lawson; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster Mar 30, 285; Questions, Mr. Healy, Mr. Redmond, Mr. Sexton, Mr. O'Connor Power; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster, Mr. Speaker, 286; Question, Mr. Redmond; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster April 3, 532
Galway Gaol. Questions, Mr. Sexton; Answers, The Attorney General for Ireland Mar 27, 8
Limerick Gaol. Question, Mr. Arthur O'Connor; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland Mar 27, 17

IRELAND—Protection of Person and Property Act, 1881—Treatment of Persons arrested under the Act—cont.

Armagh Gaol, Question, Mr. Redmond; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland April 27, 1866

Mr. P. Cahill, Questions, Mr. Arthur O'Connor, Mr. Sexton; Answers, The Attorney General for Ireland Mar 27, 19

Michael Veal, Questions, Mr. R. Power, Mr. Healy; Answers, The Attorney General for Ireland, Mr. Gladstone Mar 27, 24

Members of this House arrested under the Act, Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Mr. Gladstone Mar 27, 31; Question, Mr. Joseph Cowen; Answer, Mr. Gladstone April 28, 1679

Grangegorman Prison, Question, Mr. Redmond; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster April 24, 1254

Arrest of Employés of "United Ireland," Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster April 3, 537

Arrest of Miss O'Connor, Question, Mr. O'Donnell; Answer, The Solicitor General for Ireland April 3, 558

Arrests in the County of Wexford, Question, Mr. Redmond; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland April 18, 872

Persons claiming to be American Citizens detained under the Act, Questions, Sir H. Drummond Wolff, Mr. Sexton; Answers, Sir Charles W. Dilke April 18, 874; Questions, Mr. Sexton, Mr. Joseph Cowen; Answers, Sir Charles W. Dilke April 20, 1029; Questions, Sir H. Drummond Wolff, Mr. Mitchell Henry; Answers, Sir Charles W. Dilke April 21, 1109; Question, Sir H. Drummond Wolff; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke April 24, 1256

Foreign Subjects detained under the Act, Question, Sir H. Drummond Wolff; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke April 24, 1270

Editors of Newspapers arrested under the Act, Questions, Mr. Lalor; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster April 20, 986

Arrests under the Act, Question, Mr. Leamy; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster April 21, 1102; Questions, Mr. Gibson, Lord Arthur Hill; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster May 2, 1938

Arrests in Co. Tipperary, Question, Mr. Redmond; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland April 27, 1567

Transfer of Prisoners detained under the Act from Clonmel Gaol to Naas, Questions, Mr. Healy, Mr. W. J. Corbet; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster April 20, 1031

Release of Prisoners detained under the Act—Limerick Gaol, Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster April 24, 1241; Questions, Mr. O'Sullivan; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster April 25, 1399; Question, Mr. O'Connor Power; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster May 2, 1929

Investigation of Cases, Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster April 25, 1404

Prisoners detained under the Act—P. and W. M'Quinlan, Question, Mr. Arthur O'Connor; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland April 27, 1566;—Mr. P. Arnold, Question, Mr. Edward Sheil; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland April 27, 1570;—Mr.

IRELAND—Protection of Person and Property Act, 1881—Treatment of Persons arrested under the Act—cont.

T. Ryan, Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland April 27, 1572;—Mr. John McCarthy and others, Questions, Mr. Healy, Mr. Justin McCarthy, Mr. Redmond, Mr. Sexton; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster; Question, Mr. O'Donnell [no answer] April 28, 1658

Alleged Proselytism among Persons detained under the Act, Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster Mar 28, 149

Police Protection—Mr. Carter, J.P., Question, Mr. Ion Hamilton; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland Mar 27, 19; Question, Mr. Ion Hamilton; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster Mar 30, 299;—Murder of a Caretaker at Pallas, Questions, Mr. Chaplin, Mr. Lewis; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster April 20, 1034;—Caretakers—Case of Richard Roche, Question, Mr. Chaplin; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster April 24, 1252

Rules relating to Visits to Persons detained under the Act, Questions, Mr. Redmond; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster April 21, 1098; May 1, 1821

Chairman of the Gort Board of Guardians, Question, Colonel Nolan; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster April 20, 985

Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act, 1881

Arms Licences, Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster April 3, 532; Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland April 18, 877; Questions, Mr. Edward Sheil; Answers, The Attorney General for Ireland April 27, 1570

Arms for Self-Defence—Major Traill, Questions, Mr. Healy; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster April 3, 536

Returns as to Number and Cost of Arms Surrendered, Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, The Solicitor General for Ireland April 3, 647

Proclamation of County Wicklow, Question, Mr. W. J. Corbet; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster April 20, 979

Search for Arms—Sub-Inspector Ball, Observations, Mr. O'Connor Power; Reply, Mr. W. E. Forster; short debate thereon April 21, 1144;—Search for Arms at Dundalk, Question, Mr. Callan; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster May 1, 1809;—Co. Kerry, Question, Sir Walter B. Barttelot; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster May 2, 1935

Rev. Thomas Feehan, Question, Mr. Marum; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster May 1, 1821

The Royal Irish Constabulary

Conduct of the Police, Tipperary, Question, Mr. Sexton; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland Mar 27, 12

Sub-Constable Walsh, Questions, Mr. Healy; Answers, The Attorney General for Ireland Mar 27, 21

Constable Forbes, Question, Mr. Metge; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland Mar 27, 25

Sub-Inspector Rogers, Questions, Mr. Sexton, Mr. Redmond; Answers, The Attorney General for Ireland Mar 28, 143

IRELAND—The Royal Irish Constabulary—cont.

The Drogheda Town Council—Intrusion of the Police, Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster Mar 28, 148

Young Ireland Literary Society, Dublin—Alleged Intrusion of the Police, Questions, Mr. Redmond, Mr. Healy; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster, The Attorney General for Ireland Mar 28, 152; Question, Mr. Redmond; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster Mar 30, 298

Charge against Constable Molloy, Question, Mr. Redmond; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster April 3, 535

Domiciliary Visits, Questions, Mr. Healy, Mr. Leamy; Answers, The Attorney General for Ireland April 18, 878

House Searches by the Constabulary, Question, Mr. Redmond; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland April 18, 879

Duty of Protecting "Emergency Men," Question, Mr. Lalor; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster April 20, 983

Sergeant Maguire, Question, Mr. Redmond; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster April 24, 1240

Removal of Placards by the Constabulary, Question, Mr. Redmond; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster April 24, 1250

Pension to Widow of Sergeant Kavanagh, Question, Mr. Mitchell Henry; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster April 24, 1252

"United Ireland"—Alleged Excess of Duty by a Constable at Waterford, Questions, Mr. Leamy, Mr. Sexton; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster April 24, 1265

Appointments of County and Sub-Inspectors at Londonderry, Question, Mr. Redmond; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster April 25, 1398

Telegrams to Coroners, Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland April 27, 1573

The Police at Cappoquin, Questions, Mr. Healy; Answers, The Attorney General for Ireland April 27, 1573

Co. Monaghan, Questions, Mr. Lewis, Mr. Callan, Mr. Sexton; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster; Questions, Mr. Macfarlane, Mr. Healy [no answers] May 1, 1813

Pensions, Question, Mr. Lewis; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster May 1, 1814

Ireland—Police Protection (Caretakers)

Moved for, "Correspondence between the Irish Executive and the Director of the Property Defence Association on the subject of police protection to caretakers" (The Earl of Courtown) Mar 30, 273; after short debate, Motion agreed to

Irish Land Commission

Estate of Mr. Talbot-Crosbie, Questions, Mr. Sexton, Mr. O'Donnell; Answers, The Attorney General for Ireland Mar 27, 13

The Appeal Court, Question, Mr. Macartney; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland Mar 30, 285

The Sub-Commissioners, Questions, Mr. Healy; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster April 20, 984

The Assistant Commissioners, Question, Mr. Molloy; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster April 21, 1102

Irish Land Commission—cont.

Appointment of a Sub-Commissioner (Mr. Hedigan), Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland April 21, 1109

The Galway Sub-Commissioners, Questions, Mr. Healy, Mr. Callan; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster April 28, 1665

Irish Reproductive Loan Fund Act (1874) Amendment Bill

(Mr. Blake, Colonel Colthurst, Colonel Nolan, Mr. O'Shea, Mr. O'Connor Power, Mr. Collins)
c. Ordered; read 1^o April 19 [Bill 183]

JAMES, Sir H. (see ATTORNEY GENERAL, The)

JAMES, Mr. C. H., Merthyr Tydfil
Turnpike Roads (South Wales), 3R. 1905

JAMES, Mr. W. H., Gateshead

Friendly Societies—Quinquennial Returns—Report of the Registrar, 1664

National Defences—Chatham Dockyard, 1558
Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices), 2R. 1438

Supply—Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens, 1162, 1166, 1169

JOHNSON, Right Hon. W. M. (Attorney General for Ireland), Mallow

Ireland—Miscellaneous Questions

Criminal Law—Charge of Conspiracy to Murder, 1820

Ejectments—The Returns—Civil Bill Courts, 1572

Evictions—Longford Workhouse, 1569

Irish Fisheries—French Fishing Vessels, 1568

Magistracy—Captain T. Bolton Jones, 869

Mr. Clifford Lloyd—Circular by the Inspector of Police, Co. Clare, 994, 1027

Peace Preservation Act, 1881—Arms Licences, 877, 878, 1570, 1571

Poor Law—Ballycary Dispensary District and Larne Workhouse, 880;—Election of Poor Law Guardians—Mr. O'Halloran, a Suspect, 870

Post Office—Convention of Paris—Seizure of the "Irish World" Newspaper, 148

Prisons—Enniskillen Gaol—Regulation as to Visitors on St. Patrick's Day, 871;—Limerick Gaol—Putting Untried Prisoners to Work, 1557

Young Ireland Literary Society, Dublin—Alleged Intrusion of Police, 152

Ireland—Irish Land Commission—Miscellaneous Questions

Appeal Court, 285

Estate of Mr. Talbot-Crosbie, 13, 14

Sub-Commissioners, 1109

Ireland—Land Law Act, 1881—Land Court, New Ross, 870;—Sec. 8, 882, 885

Ireland—Law and Justice—Miscellaneous Questions

Admission of Solicitors, 143

Cork Grand Jury, 10, 11

Expenses of Crown Witnesses, 1169

Magistracy—Summary Jurisdiction, 1934

[cont.]

[cont.]

JOHNSON, Right Hon. W. M.—cont.

- Peter Dunne, Case of—Mr. Justice Fitzgerald, 1140, 1141, 1142
 Robert Webster, Case of, 295
 Ireland—Protection of Person and Property Act, 1881—Miscellaneous Questions
 Enniskillen Gaol—Mr. J. P. Quinn, 1569
 Michael Conolly, 8
 O'Connor, Mr. J., 880
 Parnell, Mr., 877
 Prisoners detained under the Act—Arnold, Mr., 1570 ;—P. and W. M'Quinlan, 1566 ;
 —Ryan, Mr., 1572
 Tipperary Co., Arrests in, 1567
 Treatment of Persons arrested under the Act, 8, 9, 15, 17, 19, 24, 25, 1567
 Wexford Co., Arrests, 872
 Ireland—Royal Irish Constabulary—Miscellaneous Questions
 Constable Forbes, 26
 Sub-Constable Walsh, 21, 22
 Sub-Inspector Rogers, 145
 Telegrams to Coroners, 1573
 Ireland, State of—Miscellaneous Questions
 Ballyragget, Riot at, 485
 Carter, Mr. J. P.—Police Protection, 20
 House Searches by the Constabulary, 879
 Ladies' Land League—Judge Barry and Miss M'Cormack, 21
 Land League Huts—Mr. Clifford Lloyd, 886
 Massy, Mr., of Suir Castle, 81
 Police at Cappoquin, 1578, 1574
 Police Visits, 878, 879
 Tipperary—Conduct of the Police, 12
 Wexford Co., Alleged Outrage, 872
 Judgments (Inferior Courts), Consid. add. cl. 1785, 1786
 Metropolis Management and Building Acts Amendment, Comm. cl. 4, 2029
 Poor Law Guardians (Ireland), 2R. 931
 Prisons (England) Act, 1877—Cost of Conveying Prisoners, 1402

Judgments (Inferior Courts) Bill

(Mr. Monk, Mr. Norwood, Mr. Anderson, Mr. Corry, Mr. Reid, Mr. Serjeant Simon)

- c. Committee*—R.P. April 25 [Bill 44]
 Committee ; Report April 27, 1632
 Considered April 28, 1785 ; after short debate, further consideration deferred

KENNAWAY, Sir J. H., Devon, E.

- Army—Battalion Establishments, 298
 Lynn and Fakenham Railway, 2R. 466

KIMBERLEY, Earl of (Secretary of State for the Colonies)

- Africa (South)—Basutoland, 272
 Gibraltar (Religious Dissensions)—Dr. Canilla—The Papers, 461
 Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881 (Sec. 8, Subsec. 9)—“Adams v. Dunseath,” 1226

KNOWLES Mr. T., Wigan

- Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act—Crewe Cattle Market, 303
 Parliament—Wigan New Writ, Res. 1958

LABOUCHERE, Mr. H., Northampton

- Army Estimates—Provisions, &c. 847
 Corrupt Practices at Elections Act—Magistracy—Mr. Cheney Garfit, 296
 Ireland—Mr. Clifford Lloyd—Circular by the Inspector of Police, Co. Clare, 1024
 Protection of Person and Property Act, 1881—Martin Scanlan and others, 1250
 Parliament—Business of the House (Putting the Question), Res. 1893, 1894
 Parliament—Gloucester Writ, Res. 1574
 Parliamentary Elections Expenses, 2R. 972
 Slavery—Slave Trade in Asia and Africa, 1711
 Supply—Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens, 1160 ; Amendt. 1163, 1170

LAING, Mr. S., Orkney, &c.

- £1 Bank Notes, Res. 1703

LALOR, Mr. R., Queen's Co.

- Ireland—Miscellaneous Questions
 Evictions—Return for Quarter to 21st March, 982
 Land Law Act, 1881—Interference of the Constabulary, 1261
 Post Office—“Pat,” 987
 Royal Irish Constabulary—Duty of Protecting “Emergency” Men, 983
 Ireland—Protection of Person and Property Act, 1881—Miscellaneous Questions
 Editors of Newspapers arrested under the Act, 986
 Gallaher, Andrew and Patrick, 1101
 Messrs. Dowling, Somers, &c. 982
 Whittaker, Michael, and Thomas Dunphy, 1818

Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881MISCELLANEOUS QUESTIONS

- The Land Courts—Legal Expenses*, Question, Mr. O'Donnell ; Answer, Mr. Gladstone Mar 27, 33
The Land Court, New Ross, Questions, Mr. Redmond ; Answers, The Attorney General for Ireland April 18, 869
Arrears of Rents, Questions, Mr. T. A. Dickson ; Answers, Mr. Gladstone Mar 30, 312 ; April 24, 1270
Sec. 8—“Adams v. Dunseath,” Question, Mr. Healy ; Answer, Mr. Gladstone Mar 31, 489 ; Questions, Mr. Leamy, Mr. Healy, Mr. Biggar ; Answers, The Attorney General for Ireland, Mr. Gladstone April 18, 882 ; Question, Observations, The Earl of Dunraven ; Reply, Lord Carlingford ; debate thereon April 24, 1204 ;—The Land Commission—Decision under the Land Act, Question, Mr. Healy ; Answer, Mr. Gladstone May 1, 1833
Sec. 10, Question, Mr. Fitz-Patrick ; Answer, The Solicitor General for Ireland May 1, 1815
The Labourers, Question, Mr. A. Moore ; Answer, Mr. Gladstone April 4, 675
Labourers' Cottages, Questions, Mr. Villiers Stuart, Mr. Healy ; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster May 1, 1817
The Sub-Commissioners (Antrim and Derry)—Mr. Headech, Question, Mr. Healy ; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster April 28, 1656

(cont.)

Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881—cont.

The Assistant Sub-Commissioners (Kerry and West Cork), Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster April 21, 1107; Observations, Mr. Healy; Reply, The Solicitor General for Ireland; Observations, Mr. O'Donnell April 21, 1151

Interference of the Constabulary, Question, Mr. Lalor; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster April 24, 1261

The Tenantry, Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster April 24, 1269

Working of the Act, Presentation of Petition, Observations, The Earl of Longford, Lord Dunsany; Reply, Lord Carlingford April 25, 1379

Land Law (Ireland) Act (1881) Amendment Bill [Bill 2]

(Mr. Redmond, Mr. Parnell, Mr. Healy, Mr. Sexton, Mr. Justin M'Carthy)

a. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^o" April 26, 1478

After long debate, Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned" (Mr. Justin M'Carthy); after further short debate, Question put, and agreed to; Debate adjourned

Land League Meetings (England)

Question, Mr. Biggar; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke April 4, 668

LANSDOWNE, Marquess of

Jury Laws (Ireland), 429

Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881 (Sec. 8, Sub-sec. 9)—"Adams v. Dunseath," 1232

Law and Justice

Cases of Suspected Poisoning, Question, Mr. St. Aubyn; Answer, Sir William Harcourt Mar 27, 4

The Judicature Act—The New Rules of Procedure, Question, Mr. Gregory; Answer, Sir William Harcourt Mar 27, 15

The Magistracy—Newcastle-on-Tyne—Severe Sentence, Question, Mr. P. A. Taylor; Answer, Sir William Harcourt Mar 30, 291

Law and Police

MISCELLANEOUS QUESTIONS

Alleged Detective Conspiracy, Question, Mr. Burt; Answer, Sir William Harcourt Mar 30, 284

Crimes of Violence, Question, Mr. R. N. Fowler; Answer, Sir William Harcourt April 28, 1657

Persons found Drowned in the Thames, Question, Mr. Alderman W. Lawrence; Answer, Sir James M'Garel-Hogg Mar 28, 146

Police Protection to Public Servants, Observations, Mr. Stanley Leighton; Reply, Sir William Harcourt; Observations, Mr. Roberts April 21, 1130

The Riots at Camborne, Cornwall, Questions, Mr. Leamy, Mr. Bellingham; Answers, Sir William Harcourt April 21, 1106; Questions, Mr. Leamy, Mr. Justin M'Carthy, Mr. Bellingham, Mr. Healy; Answers, Sir William Harcourt April 24, 1266; Question, Mr. O'Donnell; Answer, Sir William Harcourt April 28, 1678

Law and Police—cont.

The Salvation Army

The Salvation Army at Crediton, Question, Mr. Caine; Answer, Sir William Harcourt April 3, 544;—at Whitchurch, Question, Mr. Caine; Answer, Sir William Harcourt May 2, 1941

Attack upon the Salvation Army at Chester, Question, Mr. Caine; Answer, Sir William Harcourt April 24, 1271

Hampshire, Question, Mr. Caine [no answer] May 1, 1841

Riots at Oldham, Question, Sir Wilfrid Lawson; Answer, Sir William Harcourt May 1, 1826

LAWRENCE, Sir J. C., Lambeth

Australia (Western)—Free Emigration, 1103, 1104

LAWRENCE, Sir J. J. T., Surrey, Mid.

Lunacy Laws, Res. 1472

LAWRENCE, Mr. Alderman W., London

Australia (Western)—Free Emigration, 1558

Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act—Restrictions on the Removal of Cattle, 1251

Law and Police—Persons found Drowned in the Thames, 146, 147

Mercantile Marine—"Albert Edward," Recent Accident to the, 1257

Metropolis—Thames Embankment, 293

Metropolis Management and Building Acts Amendment, Comm. 2010; Amendt. 2018, 2021, 2028; cl. 4, 2029

Ways and Means, Report, 1418

LAWSON, Sir W., Carlisle

Africa (South)—State of Affairs in Basutoland, 309

County Government Bill—Local Option, 1678

Law and Police—Salvation Army—Riots at Oldham, 1826

Parliament—Order—The Precincts of the House—The Home Secretary and Mr. Anderson, 556

Protection of Person and Property (Ireland) Act, 1881—Persons arrested under the Act, 286

LEAHY, Mr. J., Kildare

Poor Law Guardians (Ireland), 2R. 924

LEAMY, Mr. E., Waterford

Ireland—Miscellaneous Questions

Landlord and Tenant—Mercers' Company and their Tenants, 669

Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, Sec. 8, 882

Mr. Clifford Lloyd—Circular by the Inspector of Police, Co. Clare, 1003, 1004

Post Office—Milford Post Office, 1562

Protection of Person and Property Act, 1881—Arrests under the Act, 1102

Royal Irish Constabulary—"United Ireland"—Alleged Excess of Duty by a Constable at Waterford, 1265

State of—Police Visits, 878

Law and Police—Riots at Camborne, 1106, 1107, 1266, 1268

Municipal Corporations, Comm. 1769

LECHMERE, Sir E. A. H., Worcestershire, W.
 Sale of Food and Drugs Act—Coffee and Chicory, 548

LEFEVRE, Right Hon. G. J. Shaw (Chief Commissioner of Works), Reading
 Metropolis—Street Traffic—Hyde Park Corner, 141
 Parks (Metropolis)—Richmond Park, 1819
 Parliament—Palace of Westminster—Clock Tower, 28, 29
 South Kensington Museum—Museum of Natural History, 881
 Supply—Royal Palaces, 1159
 Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens, 1162, 1166, 1170, 1171, 1172, 1173, 1174, 1175, 1178, 1181, 1182

LEIGHTON, Sir B., Shropshire, S.
 Inland Revenue—Income Tax and Brewery Licences, 550
 Parliament—Public Business, 1571
 Ways and Means—Financial Statement—Carriage Duties, 1676, 1677
 Ways and Means—Financial Statement, Comm. 1315

LEIGHTON, Mr. S., Shropshire, N.
 Lunacy Laws, Res. 1446, 1456
 Parliament—Business of the House (Putting the Question), Res. 1866, 1869, 1871
 Parliamentary Elections Expenses, 2R. 971
 Police Protection to Public Servants, 1130
 Supply—Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens, 1165, 1166

LENNOX, Right Hon. Lord H. G., Chichester
 Navy, Strength of the, Res. 1037, 1056, 1081

LEWIS, Mr. O. E., Londonderry
 Corrupt Practices (Disfranchisement)—Suspended Boroughs, 1035
 Criminal Law—The Condemned Prisoner Lamson, 872, 873
 Crown Agents for the Colonies—Inspector of Coals at Cardiff, 1264
 Ireland—Protection of Person and Property Act, 1881—Mr. Parnell, 733, 877
 Royal Irish Constabulary—Co. Monaghan, 1813;—Pensions, 1814
 Ireland, State of—Alleged Murders, 1842
 Police Protection—Murder of a Caretaker, 1034
 Parliament—Business of the House, 554, 876;—Rules of Procedure—Debate of Thursday, Personal Explanation, 491
 Parliament—Gloucester Writ, Res. 1574, 1575, 1577, 1578, 1580
 Parliament—Wigan New Writ, Res. 1946, 1952, 1963
 Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices), 2R. 1442
 Parliamentary Elections Expenses, 2R. 973, 974

Liberal Association of Ipswich, The—Violent Language
 Question, Mr. Bellingham; Answer, Mr. Gladstone May 1, 1838

LINDSAY, Colonel Sir R. J. Loyd, Berkshire
 Army Estimates—Provisions, &c. 802

LLOYD, Mr. M., Beaumaris
 Commonable Rights, 2R. 257
 Oxford University (Jesus College Statutes), Motion for an Address, 2007
 Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices), 2R. 1597

Local Government (Gas) Provisional Order Bill
 (Mr. Hibbert, Mr. Dodson)
 c. Ordered; read 1^o * May 1 [Bill 144]

Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 1) Bill
 (Mr. Hibbert, Mr. Dodson)
 c. Ordered * April 18
 Read 1^o * April 19 [Bill 131]
 Read 2^o * April 25

Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 2) Bill
 (Mr. Hibbert, Mr. Dodson)
 c. Ordered; read 1^o * May 1 [Bill 145]

Local Government Provisional Order (Highways) Bill
 (Mr. Hibbert, Mr. Dodson)
 c. Ordered * April 18
 Read 1^o * April 19 [Bill 129]
 Read 2^o * April 25

Local Government Provisional Orders (Poor Law) Bill
 (Mr. Hibbert, Mr. Dodson)
 c. Ordered * April 18
 Read 1^o * April 19 [Bill 130]
 Read 2^o * April 25

Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Order Bill (Mr. Herbert Gladstone, Lord Frederick Cavendish)
 c. Ordered; read 1^o * April 21 [Bill 138]
 Read 2^o * May 2

Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders (Ballymena, &c.) Bill [H.L.]
 (The Lord Privy Seal)
 l. Presented; read 1^o *, and referred to the Examiners Mar 30 (No. 57)
 Read 2^o * April 24
 Committee *; Report May 2

LONGFORD, Earl of

Army (Annual), 2R. 1236 ; 3R. 1555 Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881—Working of the Act—Petition, 1379

LOPES, Sir M., Devonshire, S.

Education Department—New Code, 639, 640
Minister of Agriculture and Commerce, 1409
Navy, Strength of the, Res. 1077
Parliamentary Elections Expenses, 2R. 958

LOWTHER, Right Hon. J., Lincoln, N.

Municipal Corporations, Comm. 1193
Parliament—Wigan New Writ, Res. 1961
Public Affairs, State of—Irish Policy of the Government, 1836 ; Ministerial Statement, 1983
Supply—Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens,
1168, 1180

LOWTHER, Hon. W., Westmoreland

Poor Law (England) — Oldham Board of
Guardians, 1811
Public Health—Sheffield Small-pox Hospital,
1810

LUBBOOK, Sir J., London University

Education Department—New Code, 598
Main Roads (England), 1810
£1 Bank Notes, Res. 1689
Patents for Inventions (No. 2), 2R. 1785

Lunacy Laws

Moved, "That all lunatics ought to be committed to the keeping of the State" (Mr.
Stanley Leighton) April 25, 1446 ; after debate, Question put ; A. 34, N. 81 ; M. 47
(D. L. 72)

Lynn and Fakenham Railway Bill (by Order)

c. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^o"
(Sir Charles Forster) Mar 31, 462

Amendt. to leave out from "That," and add
"it is not desirable to proceed with a Bill which unnecessarily interferes with the Cathedral Precincts at Norwich, and with the ancient historical gateway there" (Mr. E.
Stanhope) v. ; Question proposed, "That the words, &c. ;" after debate, Amendt. withdrawn

Main Question put, and agreed to ; Bill read 2^o

McARTHUR, Mr. A., Leicester

Slave Trade in Asia and Africa, 1723

MACARTNEY, Mr. J. W. E., Tyrone

Ireland—Irish Land Commission—The Appeal
Court, 285
Public Affairs, State of—Irish Policy of the Government, Ministerial Statement, 1987

M'CARTHY, Mr. Justin, Longford

Ireland—Miscellaneous Questions
Crime, 701
Evictions—Longford Workhouse, 1568
Magistracy—Major Traill, R.N., 1667
Mr. Clifford Lloyd—Circular by the Inspecter of Police, Co. Clare, 1002
State of—Prohibited Public Meeting, 588

[cont.]

M'CARTHY, Mr. Justin—cont.

Ireland—Protection of Person and Property
Act, 1881—Miscellaneous Questions
Enniskillen Gaol—Mr. J. P. Quinn, 1569
Prisoners detained under the Act—Mr.
M'Carthy and others, 1658
Smyth, Mr. Joseph, 1241
Treatment of Prisoners under the Act, 14
Land Law (Ireland) Act (1881) Amendment,
2R. Motion for Adjournment, 1549
Law and Police—Riots at Camborne, 1267
Municipal Corporations, Comm. 1195, 1765
Parliament—Business of the House—Tuesdays, 1036 Parliament—Business of the House (Putting
the Question), Res. 85, 1858
Public Affairs, State of—Irish Policy of the Government, Ministerial Statement, 1976
Supply, Report, 170, 178
Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens, 1178

M'COAN, Mr. J. C., Wicklow

Turkey—Midhat Pasha, 1407

MAOFARLANE, Mr. D. H., Carlow Co.

Criminal Law—Case of Jane M'Evoy, 20
Fires in Theatres (Prevention), Res. 800
Landlord and Tenant (Scotland)—Evictions in the Island of Skye, 1675
Land Law (Ireland) Act (1881) Amendment,
2R. 1509, 1535
Parliament—Business of the House—Tuesday
Sittings, 1680
Royal Irish Constabulary—Co. Monaghan,
1814
Theatres and Music Halls (Metropolis)—
Metropolitan Building Act, 1878—Sec. 11, 297

MCGAREL-HOGG, Sir J. M., Truro

Law and Police—Persons found Drowned in the Thames, 146, 147
Metropolis—Street Traffic—Hyde Park Corner, 141
Theatres and Music Halls—Prevention of Fires—Metropolitan Building Act, 1878,
Sec. 11, 297
Metropolis Management and Building Acts
Amendment, Comm. 2023, 2026, 2028 ; cl. 4, 2030

MAC IVER, Mr. D., Birkenhead

Cyprus, Island of—New Constitution—Representation of Mussulmen in the Legislative Council, 1272
Parliament—Wigan New Writ, Res. 1960
Supply, Report, Amendt. 153, 161
Ways and Means, Report, 1414

McKENNA, Sir J. N., Youghal

Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment, Consid.
121, 125, 130
Imperial Taxation, 912, 919
Inland Revenue—Duty on Silver Plate, 306 Parliament—Business of the House (Putting
the Question), Res. 112
Supply, Report, 168

MACKINTOSH, Mr. C. FRASER-, Inverness, &c.

Landlord and Tenant (Scotland)—Disturbances in the Island of Skye, 1032 ;—Evictions in, 1822, 1823

MCLAGAN, Mr. P., Linlithgowshire
Agricultural Holdings, Notices of Removal (Scotland), 2R. 235

MAOLIVER, Mr. P. S., Plymouth
Army—Payment of Pensions, 1106
Army Organization—Royal Artillery and Royal Engineers—Officers' Retirement, 985
Navy—Payment of Naval Pensions, 1260
Post Office—The Australian Mails, 873
Ways and Means, Res. 3 ;—Coffee, 1813

MAGNIAC, Mr. C., Bedford
France—Commercial Treaty—Renewal of Negotiations, 1271
£1 Bank Notes, Res. 1707, 1708

Main Roads (England)—Legislation
Question, Sir Massey Lopes ; Answer, Mr. Dodson May 1, 1810

MAKINS, Colonel W. T., Essex, S.
Burial Fees, 2R. 260
Lunacy Laws, Res. 1474, 1476
Parliament—Business of the House (Putting the Question), Res. 1898
Post Office—Parcels Post, 298

MARJORIBANKS, Mr. E., Berwickshire
Herring Brand Committee, Res. 527

Married Women's Property Bill [H.L.]
(The Lord Chancellor)

l. Committee Mar 28, 186 (No. 13)

MARTIN, Mr. P., Kilkenny Co.
Ireland, State of—Riot at Ballyragget, 483, 484
Municipal Corporations, Comm. 1767

MARTIN, Mr. R. Biddulph, Tewkesbury
Inland Revenue—Railway Passenger Duty—Cheap Trains Act, 1844, 1830

MARUM, Mr. E. P. M., Kilkenny Co.
Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act, 1881—Rev. Thomas Feehan, 1821

MAXWELL, Sir H. E., Wigton
Agricultural Holdings, Notices of Removal (Scotland), 2R. 229
Civil Imprisonment (Scotland), 2R. 251
Supply—Public Education (England and Wales), 654, 655, 656

MAXWELL-HERON, Captain J. M., Kirkcudbright
Metropolis Management and Buildings Acts Amendment, Comm. 2018

MELDON, Mr. O. H., Kildare

Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment, Consid. Motion for Adjournment, 119 ; Amendt. 130, 133

Ireland—Poor Law—Superannuation of Dr. Alexander Smiley, Medical Officer at Ballycurry, 481

Mercantile Marine

Accident to the "Albert Edward" Channel Steamer, Questions, Mr. Alderman W. Lawrence, Mr. Dixon-Hartland ; Answers, Mr. Chamberlain April 24, 1257 ; Question, Captain Price ; Answer, Mr. Chamberlain May 1, 1815

Proposed Shipping Council, Question, Mr. Gourley ; Answer, Mr. Chamberlain Mar 30, 297

Merchant Shipping Acts

MISCELLANEOUS QUESTIONS

Collisions at Sea, Question, Captain Price ; Answer, Mr. Chamberlain April 24, 1253

Lodging-House Touts at Queenstown, Question, Mr. A. Moore ; Answer, Mr. Chamberlain Mar 30, 293

Passenger and Emigrant Ships, Questions, Mr. A. Moore ; Answers, Mr. Chamberlain April 25, 1405 ; May 1, 1816

The "City of Limerick," Question, Mr. Rylands ; Answer, Mr. Chamberlain April 20, 978

METGE, Mr. R. H., Meath

Ireland—Royal Irish Constabulary—Constable Forbes, 25

METROPOLIS

MISCELLANEOUS QUESTIONS

Carriage Roads, Question, Sir Eardley Wilmot ; Answer, Mr. Dodson April 28, 1669

Street Accidents, Question, Mr. Gourley ; Answer, Sir William Harcourt Mar 30, 306

Street Traffic—Hyde Park Corner, Question, Sir James M'Garel-Hogg ; Answer, Mr. Shaw Lefevre Mar 28, 141

The Parks—Richmond Park—The Roehampton Gate, Question, The Earl of Dunraven ; Answer, Lord Sudeley ; Observations, Lord Oranmore and Browne Mar 30, 281 ; Question, Mr. Molloy ; Answer, Mr. Shaw Lefevre May 1, 1818

The Thames Embankment, Question, Mr. Alderman W. Lawrence ; Answer, Lord Frederick Cavendish Mar 30, 293

Metropolis—Fires in Theatres (Prevention)

Precautions in Case of Fire—Metropolitan Buildings Act, 1878, Sec. 11, Question, Mr. Macfarlane ; Answer, Sir James M'Garel-Hogg Mar 30, 297 ; Question, Mr. Dixon-Hartland ; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke April 4, 666

Amendt. on Committee of Supply April 17, To leave out from "That," and add "in view of the great danger to the Theatre-going public from the insufficiency of powers

Metropolis—Fires in Theatres (Prevention)—
cont.

under existing Acts relating to Theatres, and the laxity with which such powers, conferred by various Acts of Parliament, have been exercised, and that any day, unless some steps are taken to insure proper exits and necessary appliances against fire, a calamity may happen which may cause as terrific a loss of life as that which lately occurred at the Ring Theatre at Vienna, a Select Committee be appointed to investigate the state of the exits, and what appliances exist for the prevention or extinction of fires in Theatres and Music Halls, and to report the result of their investigations and recommendations thereon" (Mr. Dixon-Hartland) v., 788; Question proposed, "That the words, &c.;" after debate, Amendt. withdrawn

Moved, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for copies of the Report made to the Home Office by Captain Shaw, chief officer of the London Fire Brigade, with regard to the dangers to which the public are exposed from fire in the Metropolitan theatres, and as to the means of exit provided for them (The Earl of Milltown), May 1, 1806; after short debate, Motion withdrawn

Metropolis Management and Building Acts Amendment Bill

(Sir James M'Garel-Hogg, Admiral Sir John Hay, Sir Andrew Lusk)

c. Read 2° * April 26 [Bill 107]
Order for Committee read; Moved, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair" May 2, 2010
Amendt. to leave out from "That," and add "this House will, upon this day six months, resolve itself into the said Committee" (Mr. Alderman W. Lawrence) v.; Question proposed, "That the words, &c.;" after debate, Amendt. withdrawn; Committee—R.P.

Metropolis (Rating of Footways) Bill

(Mr. Torrens, Sir Andrew Lusk, Sir James Lawrence, Mr. William M'Arthur, Baron Henry De Worms, Mr. Boord)

c. Read 2° * Mar 29 [Bill 110]

Metropolitan Commons Supplemental Bill

(Mr. Hibbert, Mr. Dodson)

c. Read 3° * Mar 27 [Bill 92]
l. Read 1° * (Lord Rosebery) Mar 27 (No. 38)
Read 2° * April 24
Committee *; Report April 25
Read 3° * April 27
Royal Assent April 28 [45 Vict. c. iii]

MIDDLETON, Viscount

Criminal Law — The Condemned Convict Lamson, Motion for an Address, 1886
Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881 (Sec. 8, Subsec. 9)—"Adams v. Dunseath," 1285

Military Manœuvres Bill (Mr. Secretary Childers, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman)

c. Ordered; read 1° * April 19 [Bill 184]
Read 2°, after short debate May 1, 1900

Militia Acts Consolidation Bill

(Mr. Secretary Childers, The Judge Advocate General, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman)

c. Ordered; read 1° * April 8 [Bill 123]

Militia Storehouses Bill

(Mr. Hastings, Sir Matthew Ridley)

c. Ordered; read 1° * Mar 29 [Bill 116]
Read 2° * April 26
Committee; Report May 1, 1915
Read 3° * May 2

MILLTOWN, Earl of

Criminal Law — The Condemned Convict Lamson, 1082; Motion for an Address, 1383

Gibraltar (Religious Dissensions)—Dr. Canilla —The Papers, 461

Theatres and Music Halls (Metropolis)—Precautions in Case of Fire, Address for Papers, 1806, 1807

Mineral Leases—Insecurity of Tenants' Capital

Question, Mr. Rolls; Answer, Mr. Gladstone Mar 28, 151

Mines (Coal) Regulation Act, 1872—Abram Colliery Explosion

Question, Mr. Burt; Answer, Sir William Harcourt May 2, 1929

MINTO, Earl of

Precognitions (Scotland), 277

MOLLOY, Mr. B. O., King's Co.

Ireland (Evictions)—Evioted Labourers at Rhode, King's Co. 1866, 1827

Irish Land Commission—Assistant Commissioners, 1102

Parks (Metropolis)—Richmond Park, 1818

MONK, Mr. O. J., Gloucester City

Bankruptcy Law Amendment, 2R. 1370

Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment, Consid. 119, 125; Amendt. 126, 127, 128, 129, 130, 134, 135

Judgments (Inferior Courts), Consid. add. cl. 1786, 1787

Parliament—Gloucester Writ, Res. 1580

Post Office—Parcels Post, 6

MONTEAGLE, Lord

Ireland (Evictions)—The Return to December 31, 1881, 1637

MOORE, Mr. A. J., Clonmel

Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881—The Labourers, 675

Merchant Shipping Acts—Emigrant Ships, 1405, 1816

Lodging-house Touts at Queenstown, 293
Supply, Report, 207

MORGAN, Right Hon. G. Osborne (Judge Advocate General), Denbighshire
 Army (Annual), 2R. 560; Comm. cl. 4, Amendt. 734; add. cl. 744
 Burial Fees, 2R. 264, 267
 Ecclesiastical and Mortuary Fees, Motion for a Select Committee, 215, 219

MORLEY, Earl of (Under Secretary of State for War)
 Army (Auxiliary Forces)—Easter Volunteer Review, 460, 1641
 Army (Deserters), Motion for a Return, 137
 Army (Alternative Punishment), 2R. 1556
 Army (Annual), 2R. 1237, 1238; Comm. 1374
 England and France—The Channel Tunnel Scheme, 459

Moss, Mr. R., Winchester
 Ways and Means—Financial Statement, Comm. 1318

MOWBRAY, Right Hon. Sir J. R., Oxford University
 Burial Fees, 2R. 268
 Ecclesiastical Commission, Motion for a Select Committee, 512
 Ireland, State of—Occupation of Huts by Persons Evicted—Interference of the Police, 1248
 Oxford University (Jesus College Statutes), Motion for an Address, 2006
 Parliament—Business of the House (Putting the Question), Res. 50

MUNDELLA, Right Hon. A. J. (Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education), Sheffield
 Contagious Diseases (Animals) Acts—Miscellaneous Questions
 Crewe Cattle Market, 303
 Foot-and-Mouth Disease, 1936
 Restrictions on the Movement of Cattle, 1251
 Returns of Infected Areas, 29
 Education Department—Miscellaneous Questions
 Board School Grants, 296
 Education Grants under the New Code, 16, 485
 New Code, 308, 621, 624, 636, 640;—Schedule 6—Pupil Teachers, 482
 Phonetic System in Board Schools, 545
 Science and Art—"Hall of Science," 543
 Wales—Report of Departmental Committee, 1245
 Educational Endowments (Scotland), 544; Leave, 1916
 Endowed Schools Acts—Charity Commission, 1670
 Geological Survey (Scotland), 1261
 Parliament—Business of the House (Putting the Question), Res. 392
 Provincial Art Galleries and Museums, Res. 592
 Supply—Public Education in England and Wales, 648, 655, 656
 Science and Art Department, &c. 657

Municipal Corporations Bill

(Mr. Hibbert, Secretary Sir William Harcourt)

c. Committee; Report Mar 27, 114 [Bill 61]
 Order for Committee (on re-comm.) read;
 Moved, "That this House will, upon Tuesday next, at Two of the clock, resolve itself into the said Committee" (Lord Richard Grosvenor) April 21, 1183
 Amendt. to leave out "Two of the clock" (Mr. Chaplin); Question proposed, "That the words, &c.;" after debate, Question put; A. 100, N. 50; M. 50 (D. L. 70)
 Main Question proposed, 1202; Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned" (Earl Percy); Motion withdrawn
 Main Question put, and agreed to; Committee deferred
 Order for Committee (on re-comm.) read;
 Moved, "That this House will, upon Tuesday next, at Two of the clock, resolve itself into the said Committee" (Lord Frederick Cavendish) April 28, 1752
 Amendt. to leave out "at Two of the clock" (Mr. Chaplin); Question proposed, "That the words, &c.;" after debate, Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned" (Mr. R. N. Fowler); after further short debate, Question put; A. 36, N. 90; M. 54 (D. L. 73)
 Question again proposed, "That the words, &c.," 1777; Moved, "That this House do now adjourn" (Mr. Biggar); after short debate, Motion withdrawn Question, "That the words, &c.," put, and agreed to Main Question put, and agreed to; Committee deferred
 Committee* (on re-comm.)—R.F. May 2 [Bill 113]

NAVY

MISCELLANEOUS QUESTIONS

Chatham Dockyard Workmen, Question, Mr. Gorst; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan April 20, 1030
The National Defences—Chatham Dockyard, Questions, Mr. W. H. James, Colonel Stanley; Answers, Mr. Childers April 27, 1558
Portsmouth Dockyard—Discharge of Workmen, Question, Mr. T. C. Bruce; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan Mar 27, 27
The Dockyards—The Bank Holidays, Questions, Mr. Gorst, Sir H. Drummond Wolff; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan Mar 27, 18
Indian Troopships—Chatham, Question, Sir H. Drummond Wolff; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan April 18, 874
Troopships, Question, Colonel Nolan; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan Mar 27, 22
The Troopship "Assistance," Question, Lord Claud Hamilton; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan Mar 27, 27
Launch of H.M.S. "Colossus," Question, Sir H. Drummond Wolff; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan April 4, 676
Naval Barracks at Portsmouth, Question, Sir H. Drummond Wolff; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan Mar 27, 23

[cont.]

NAVY—cont.

Payment of Naval Pensions, Questions, Mr. Gorst, Mr. Puleston, Mr. MacIver, Baron Henry De Worms; Answers, Mr. Childers April 24, 1259

Roman Catholic Chaplains for Troopships, Question, Colonel Nolan; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Mar 27, 32

The "Satellite" Class, Question, Captain Price; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan Mar 30, 292

The Shipbuilding Programme, Question, Captain Price; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan April 27, 1563

Navy—Strength of the Navy

Amendt. on Committee of Supply April 20, To leave out from "That," and add "owing to the enormous increase in the Ironclad Navies of the World, the Trade and Commerce of the Empire is endangered, and that it is desirable that steps should be at once taken to make an adequate addition to the strength of the Navy" (Lord Henry Lennox) v., 1037; Question proposed, "That the words, &c.;" after long debate, Question put, and agreed to NEWDEGATE, Mr. C. N., Warwickshire, N.

Papal See—Diplomatic Communications, Res. 903

Parliament—Business of the House (Putting the Question), Res. 340, 409, 1882, 1892, 1894

Public Affairs, State of—Irish Policy of the Government, Ministerial Statement, 1982

NOLAN, Colonel J. P., Galway Co.

Ireland—Miscellaneous Questions

Irish Political Prisoners—Sir John Hay's Motion, 1945

Poor Law—Gort Board of Guardians, 985

Potato Crop Committee, 1880, 1408

Land Law (Ireland) Act (1881) Amendment, 2R. 1554

Navy—Troopships, 22;—Roman Catholic Chaplains, 32

Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices), 2R. 1355

Poor Law Guardians (Ireland), 2R. 940

Supply—Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens, 1168, 1170, 1173

NORTHCOTE, Right Hon. Sir S. H., Devon, N.

Ireland—Crime, 698

Mr. Clifford Lloyd—Circular by the Inspector of Police, Co. Clare, 1008, 1017

Parliament—Business of the House, 492, 1108, 1680, 1840, 1945

Parliament—Business of the House (Putting the Question), Res. 391, 393, 400, 1896

Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices), 2R. 1361

Public Affairs, State of—Irish Policy of the Government, Ministerial Statement, 1970, 1975, 1978

Supply, Report, 210

Ways and Means—Financial Statement, Comm. 1284, 1292, 1306; Report, Res. 1, 1411, 1417; Res. 2, 1420

NORTHCOTE, Mr. H. S., Exeter

Parliament—Business of the House (Putting the Question), Res. 77

O'BEIRNE, Colonel F., Leitrim

Army—Militia Regulations, 1880—Brevet Pay, 1242

Senior Majors—Extra Pay, 1244

Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices), 2R. 1607

O'BRIEN, Sir P., King's Co.

Supply—Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens, 1167, 1172

O'CONNOR, Mr. A., Queen's Co.

Civil Service Appointments—Private Secretaries to Cabinet Ministers, 299, 300, 1272, 1728, 1743, 1744

Endowed Schools Acts—Charity Commission, 1669

Ireland—Miscellaneous Questions

Crown Rents, 12

Irish Fisheries—French Fishing Vessels, 1568

Law and Justice—Peter Dunne, Case of—Mr. Justice Fitzgerald, 1138, 1140, 1141

Magistracy—Captain Plunket, R.M., 1825

Ireland—Protection of Person and Property Act, 1881—Miscellaneous Questions

Hoolihan, Mr. J., 667

Prisoners detained under the Act—P. and W. M'Quinlan, 1566

Treatment of Persons arrested under the Act—Cahill, Mr., 19;—Limerick Gaol, 17, 18

Municipal Corporations, Comm. 1201

Parliament—Business of the House (Putting the Question), Res. 109

Supply, Report, 162

Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens, 1173

O'DONNELL, Mr. F. H., Dungarvan

Army (Annual), 2R. 572, 574

Civil Service Appointments—Private Secretaries to Cabinet Ministers, 301, 1747

Customs Department—Recent Appointments—Mr. Walpole, 677, 678

India—Bengal—Mortality in Prisons, 304

Finance, &c.—Import Duties on Indian Products, 7, 8

Ireland—Miscellaneous Questions

Crime, 711

Crown Rents, 12

Irish Land Commission—Estate of Mr. Talbot-Crosbie, 14

Land Law Act, 1881—Assistant Sub-Commissioners (Kerry and West Cork), 1158;—Land Courts—Expenses, 33

Magistracy—Major Traill, R.N., 1668

Ireland—Protection of Person and Property Act, 1881—Miscellaneous Questions

Michael Conolly, 8

O'Connor, Miss, Arrest of, 558

Prisoners detained under the Act—Mr. M'Carthy and others, 1663

Land Law (Ireland) Act (1881) Amendment, 2R. 1553

Law and Police—Riots at Camborne, Cornwall, 1673, 1674

O'DONNELL, Mr. F. H.—cont.

Municipal Corporations, Comm. 1199, 1774
 Parliament—Business of the House (Putting the Question), Res. 110, 350; Amendt. 1843, 1872
 Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices), 2R. 1363, 1436
 Provincial Art Galleries and Museums, Res. 597
 Supply, Report, 183, 187
 Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens, 1173, 1174, 1175

Official Appointments — See title Civil Service Appointments

Official Salaries—Mr. Algernon West

Question, Mr. W. J. Corbet; Answer, Lord Frederick Cavendish April 20, 1884

One-Pound Bank Notes

Amendt. on Committee of Supply April 28, To leave out from "That," and add "in the opinion of this House, the prohibition of the issue of bank notes of £1 each in England and Wales is unreasonable and ought to be removed, and that all needful steps should be forthwith taken to authorise the issue of such notes" (Mr. William Fowler) v., 1682; Question proposed, "That the words, &c.;" after debate, Question put, and agreed to

ONslow, Mr. D. R., Guildford

Africa (South) — Cetewayo — Visit to this Country, 1942, 1943
 Cooper's Hill College, Res. 1124
 India—Indian Council—The Vacancy, 15
 Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices), 2R. 1594, 1614
 Public Affairs—Lord Lieutenantcy of Ireland — Earl Cowper, 1838

Opium Trade—The Chafoo Convention

Question, Mr. Puleston; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke April 24, 1244

ORANMORE AND BROWNE, Lord

Army (Annual), Comm. 1877
 Ireland (Evictions)—The Return, to December 31, 1881, 1637
 Royal Parks—Richmond Park — The Roehampton Gate, 281

O'SHAUGHNESSY, Mr. R., Limerick

Ireland — Irish Fisheries — French Fishing Vessels, 1568
 Mr. Clifford Lloyd—Circular by the Inspector of Police, Co. Clare, 1013
 Parliament—Business of the House (Putting the Question), Res. 338

O'SHEA, Mr. W. H., Clare

Army—Payment of Pensions, 987
 Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment, Consid. Amendt. 134, 135
 England and France—The Channel Tunnel Scheme, 33, 1682

O'SHEA, Mr. W. H.—cont.

Land Law (Ireland) Act (1881) Amendment, 2R. 1507
 Poor Law Guardians (Ireland), 2R. 938
 Protection of Person and Property (Ireland) Act, 1881—Mr. W. Abraham, 1673
 Spain—Commercial Treaty—Negotiations, 29
 Supply, Report, 160

O'SULLIVAN, Mr. W. H., Limerick Co.

Ireland—Miscellaneous Questions
 Criminal Law—Riot at Kilross—Sentences upon the Prisoners, 540
 Prisons—Limerick Gaol—Putting untried Prisoners to Work, 1557, 1930
 Protection of Person and Property Act, 1881—Release of Persons detained under the Act, 1899, 1400
 Poor Law Guardians (Ireland), 2R. 941
 Post Office—The Parcel Post, 542

Oxford and Cambridge Universities Commission

The Statutes—Religious Teaching and Worship, Observations, The Earl of Carnarvon; debate thereon May 1, 1788
The Oxford Statutes, Question, Mr. Thorold Rogers; Answer, Mr. Gladstone May 1, 1840
Lincoln College (Oxford) Statutes, Observations, Question, The Earl of Camperdown; Answer, The Lord Chancellor May 2, 1918

Oxford University (Jesus College Statutes)

Moved, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty that She will be graciously pleased to withhold her consent from the Statutes proposed by the University of Oxford Commissioners for Jesus College, which Statutes were laid upon the Table of this House on the 7th of February last" (Mr. Hussey Vivian) May 2, 1997; after short debate, Motion withdrawn

PAGET, Mr. R. H., Somersetshire, Mid

Lunacy Laws, Res. 1467
 Turnpike Roads (South Wales), 3R. 1908

PALMER, Mr. J. H., Lincoln

Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices), 2R. 1334

Papal See (Diplomatic Communications)

Moved, "That, while recognising the value of a good understanding between this Country and the Papal See, this House is of opinion that all communications between any of Her Majesty's Ministers and the authorities of the Vatican should be placed on official record in accordance with the constitutional practice in diplomatic affairs, and should be conducted with the cognizance of Parliament" (Sir Henry Wolf) April 18, 887; after debate, Question put, and negatived Parish Registers Bill (Mr. Borlase, Mr.

Bryce, Mr. Mellor, Mr. Cochrane-Patrick)
 c. Ordered; read 1st April 19 [Bill 132]

Parliament

LORDS—

Speaker of the House April 24, 1204

Claims of Peerage, &c., The Earl of Milltown, the Lord Kintore, and the Lord Oxenfoord added to the Select Committee in the place of the Marquess of Abercorn, the Earl of Mansfield, and the Lord O'Hagan

Parliament—Representative Peers of Ireland

Moved, "That the Clerk of the Crown and Hanaper do make a Return of the dates of the issue of the writs for the election of all Representative Peers of Ireland who have been elected since the year 1850; and also of the dates of the receipt of the latest return in each case which has been sent in to the Hanaper Office in obedience to such writs" (The Earl of Belmore) Mar 27, 4; Motion amended, and agreed to

The Lord Chancellor acquainted the House that the Clerk of the Parliaments had received (by post) from the Clerk of the Crown and Hanaper in Ireland (pursuant to order of Monday last) Return respecting the election of Representative Peers of Ireland: Ordered, That the said Return be printed (No. 54) Mar 30

COMMONS—

Order—The Precincts of the House—The Home Secretary and Mr. Anderson, Notice of Question, Mr. Callan; Questions, Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Mr. Healy; Answers, Mr. Speaker; Observations, Mr. Anderson, Sir William Harcourt April 3, 556

Private and Provisional Order Confirmation Bills

Ordered, That Standing Orders Nos. 92. and 93. be suspended; and that the time for depositing petitions praying to be heard against Private and Provisional Order Confirmation Bills, which would otherwise expire during the adjournment of the House at Easter, be extended to the first day on which the House shall sit after the recess Mar 30

Private Bills

Ordered, That Standing Orders 129 and 39 be suspended, and that the time for depositing Petitions against Private Bills, or against any Bill to confirm any Provisional Order, or Provisional Certificate, and for depositing duplicates of any Documents relating to any Bill to confirm any Provisional Order, or Provisional Certificate, be extended to Monday the 17th instant April 4

Standing Order 167

Select Committee appointed, to consider and report whether Standing Order 167, prohibiting the payment of interest or dividend on calls during the construction of a Railway, shall be retained or modified; List of the Committee April 4, 659

PARLIAMENT—COMMONS—cont.

Private (Hybrid) Bills—Forth Bridge Railway Bill, Question, Mr. Bolton; Answer, Mr. Evelyn Ashley April 21, 1101; Question, Mr. Anderson; Answer, Mr. Chamberlain April 28, 1668

Business of the House

Arrangement of Public Business, Questions, Sir Stafford Northcote, Lord George Hamilton, Sir George Campbell; Answers, Mr. Gladstone, Lord Frederick Cavendish Mar 31, 492; Questions, Sir Stafford Northcote, Mr. Gorst, Mr. Hussey Vivian; Answers, The Marquess of Hartington April 21, 1108; Questions, Mr. R. N. Fowler, Mr. Healy; Answers, Mr. Childers, Mr. Speaker, Lord Frederick Cavendish April 27, 1631; Question, Sir Stafford Northcote; Answers, Mr. Gladstone, Lord Frederick Cavendish May 1, 1840; Question, Sir Stafford Northcote; Answer, Mr. Gladstone May 2, 1945;—Opposition to Motions, Question, Mr. Rylands; Answer, Mr. R. Power; Question, Mr. R. Power; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster Mar 30, 304;—The "Count Out" on Friday, March 31, Question, Sir John Hay; Answer, Mr. Gladstone April 3, 553;—Tuesdays—Morning Sittings, Questions, Mr. Justin McCarthy, Mr. Gorst, Sir Stafford Northcote; Answers, The Marquess of Hartington April 20, 1036;—The Jesus College Statutes, Observations, Mr. Hussey Vivian April 21, 1110;—Corrupt Practices (Disfranchisement) Bill, Questions, Mr. Lewis; Answers, The Attorney General April 3, 554; April 18, 876;—The Settled Land Bill, Observations, Sir R. Assheton Cross April 21, 1110;—Rivers Conservancy and Floods Prevention Bill, Question, Sir Baldwin Leighton; Answer, Mr. Hibbert April 27, 1571;—Tuesday Sittings, Questions, Mr. Macfarlane, Mr. R. N. Fowler, Sir Stafford Northcote, Mr. Chaplin, Mr. Joseph Cowen; Answers, Mr. Gladstone April 28, 1680

East Cornwall Election—Speech of Mr. Courtney, Observations, Mr. Gladstone; Question, Mr. Callan; Answer, Mr. Gladstone Mar 30, 310

Interference of Peers in Parliamentary Elections, Postponement of Notice, Mr. Joseph Cowen April 21, 1151

Palace of Westminster—The Clock Tower, Questions, Mr. Spencer, Mr. Healy; Answers, Mr. Shaw Lefevre Mar 27, 28

Parliamentary Oath (Mr. Bradlaugh)—"Gurney v. Bradlaugh," Question, Mr. P. A. Taylor; Answer, The Attorney General April 20, 1033;—Northampton Borough, Question, Mr. Firth; Answer, Mr. Gladstone April 28, 1678

Parliamentary Representation—Return No. 88 (Revenue, Taxation and Population), Question, Sir John Hay; Answer, Lord Frederick Cavendish April 20, 979

The Easter Recess—Adjournment of the House, Moved, "That this House, at its rising, do adjourn until Monday 17th April" (Mr. Gladstone) April 4; after long debate, Motion agreed to

Parliament—Business of the House (Putting the Question)

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendt. proposed to Question [20th February], "That when it shall appear to Mr. Speaker, or to the Chairman of a Committee of the whole House, during any Debate, to be the evident sense of the House, or of the Committee, that the Question be now put, he may so inform the House, or the Committee; and, if a Motion be made 'That the Question be now put,' Mr. Speaker, or the Chairman, shall forthwith put such Question; and, if the same be decided in the affirmative, the Question under discussion shall be put forthwith: Provided that the Question shall not be decided in the affirmative, if a Division be taken, unless it shall appear to have been supported by more than two hundred Members, or unless it shall appear to have been opposed by less than forty Members and supported by more than one hundred Members" (Mr. Gladstone)

And which Amendt. was, to leave out from the first word "That," and add "no Rules of Procedure will be satisfactory to this House which confer the power of closing a Debate upon a majority of Members" (Mr. Marriott) v.; Question again proposed, "That the words 'when it shall appear to Mr. Speaker,' stand part of the Question;" Debate resumed Mar 27, 35; after long debate, Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned" (Mr. John Bright); after further short debate, Motion agreed to; Debate further adjourned Amendments, Question, Lord George Hamilton; Answer, Mr. Speaker Mar 30, 313; Debate resumed [Fifth Night] Mar 30, 314; after long debate, Question put, "That the words 'when it shall appear to Mr. Speaker,' stand part of the Question;" A. 318, N. 279; M. 39

Div. List, A. and N. 422

Main Question again proposed; Debate further adjourned

Observations, Mr. Lewis, Mr. Gladstone Mar 31, 491;—The Division on Thursday Night, Question, Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett; Answer, Mr. Gladstone Mar 31, 494; Question, Mr. Pemberton; Answer, Mr. Gladstone April 24, 1269

Debate resumed [Sixth Night] May 1, 1842 Amendt. in line 1, after the words "Mr. Speaker," to insert the words "after an appeal to his judgment by a Minister of the Crown" (Mr. O'Donnell); Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted"

Amendt. to said proposed Amendt. To add, at the end thereof, the words "or by the Member in charge of the subject under discussion" (Lord George Hamilton); Question proposed, "That those words be there added;" after long debate, Amendt. to proposed Amendt. withdrawn; Question put, "That those words be there inserted;" A. 164, N. 220; M. 56 (D. L. 74); Debate adjourned

Parliament—Gloucester Writ

Moved, "That Mr. Speaker do issue his Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown to make out a new Writ for the election of a Member to serve in this present Parliament for the City of Gloucester, in the room of Thomas Robinson, esquire, whose election has been declared to be void" (Mr. Lewis) April 27, 1574; after debate, Question put, and negatived

[cont.]

Parliament—Gloucester Writ—cont.

Parliament—Mr. Clifford Lloyd—Circular by the Inspector of Police, County Clare

Question, Mr. Sexton; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster April 20, 988; Moved, "That this House do now adjourn" (Mr. Sexton)

Mr. Redmond, Member for New Ross, having been named by Mr. SPEAKER as disregarding the authority of the Chair, after debate, Moved, "That Mr. Redmond be suspended from the service of the House during the remainder of this day's sitting" (The Marquess of Hartington), 1016; Question put; A. 207, N. 12; M. 195 (D. L. 66)

Mr. SPEAKER then directed Mr. Redmond to withdraw, and he withdrew accordingly

Parliament—Wigan New Writ

Moved, "That Mr. Speaker do issue his Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to make out a new Writ for the election of a Member to serve in this present Parliament for the Borough of Wigan, in the room of Francis Sharp Powell, esquire, whose election has been declared to be void" (Mr. Lewis) May 2, 1946

Amendt. to leave out from "That," and add "no Writ be issued to fill up any vacancy occasioned by corrupt practices until this House has disposed of the Corrupt Practices (Disfranchisement) Bill" (Baron de Ferrières) v.; Question proposed, "That the words, &c.;" after debate, Question put; A. 142 N. 220; M. 78 (D. L. 75)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added;" Amendt. withdrawn

PARLIAMENT—HOUSE OF LORDS

New Peer

April 24—The Right Honourable Sir George William Wilshire Bramwell, knight, late a Lord Justice of Appeal, created Baron Bramwell of Hever in the county of Kent

Sat First

April 20—The Lord Boston, after the death of his father

April 27—The Lord Hopetoun (The Earl of Hopetoun), after the death of his father

PARLIAMENT—HOUSE OF COMMONS

New Writs Issued

April 4—For the County of Meath, v. Michael Davitt, who, having been adjudged guilty of felony and sentenced to penal servitude for fifteen years,

[cont.]

PARLIAMENT — COMMONS — New Writs Issued—
cont.

and being now imprisoned under such sentence, is incapable of being elected or returned as a Member of this House

April 19—For Somerset County (Western Division), v. Vaughan Hanning Vaughan Lee, esquire, Chiltern Hundreds

New Members Sworn

Mar 30—Thomas Love Duncombe Jones-Parry, esquire, Borough of Carnarvon

April 3—Charles Thomas Dyke Acland, esquire, County of Cornwall (Eastern Division)

April 18—Edward Sheil, esquire, Meath County

April 27—Edward James Stanley, esquire, Somerset County (Western Division)

Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Bill

(Mr. Attorney General, Secretary Sir William Harcourt, Mr. Chamberlain, Sir Charles Dilke, Mr. Solicitor General)

c. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^o"
April 24, 1827

Amendt. to leave out from "That," and add "considering no corruption has been proved to exist in the larger town constituencies, or in any county constituency, it is inexpedient to adopt such uniform restrictions and punishments as will render the fair conduct of an election in a great constituency perilous and penal" (Mr. Robert Fowler) v.; Question proposed, "That the words, &c.;" after debate, Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned" (Mr. A. J. Balfour); after further debate, Question put, and agreed to; Debate adjourned

Debate resumed April 25, 1421; after debate, Debate adjourned

Debate resumed April 27, 1581; after long debate, Question put, and agreed to

Main Question put, and agreed to; Bill read 2^o

Parliamentary Elections Expenses Bill

(Mr. Ashton Dilke, Mr. Barran, Mr. Burt)

c. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^o"
April 19, 944; after debate, Question put; A. 87, N. 85; M. 2 (D. L. 65)

Partnerships Bill

(Mr. Monk, Mr.

Gregory, Mr. Barran, Mr. Lewis Fry)

c. Committee*; Report; re-committed to a Select Committee Mar 27 [Bills 27-114]

Select Committee nominated April 3; List of the Committee, 658

Patents for Inventions (No. 2) Bill

(Sir John Lubbock, Mr. William Henry Smith, Mr. Compton Lawrance)

c. Read 2^o April 28, 1785 [Bill 104]

Payment of Wages in Public-houses Prohibition Bill [H.L.]

(The Earl Stanhope)

l. Read 2^a, after short debate May 2, 1925 (No. 41)

PEASE, Mr. A., Whitby

Supply—Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens, 1165

PEASE, Mr. J. W., Durham, S.

Ecclesiastical Commission, Motion for a Select Committee, 516

PEDDIE, Mr. J. DICK-, Kilmarnock, &c.

Landlord and Tenant (Scotland)—Evictions in the Island of Skye, 1675, 1822

University Reform (Scotland), 1827

PELL, Mr. A., Leicestershire, S.

Ways and Means — Financial Statement — Local Taxation, 308

Ways and Means—Financial Statement, Report, Res. 2, 1419

PEMBERTON, Mr. E. L., Kent, E.

Harbours of Refuge (Scotland), 1242

Parliament — Business of the House — New Rules of Procedure, 1269

PENNINGTON, Mr. F., Stockport

Ways and Means—Financial Statement—Carriage Duties, 1677

PERCY, Right Hon. Earl, Northumberland, N.

Municipal Corporations, Comm. 1201; Motion for Adjournment, 1203

Public Affairs, State of—Irish Policy of the Government, Ministerial Statement, 1982

Revenue—Wine Duties, 1829

PHIPPS, Mr. C., Westbury

Education Department—Board School Grants, 295

Pier and Harbour Provisional Orders Bill

(Mr. Ashley, Mr. Chamberlain)

c. Ordered; read 1^o * April 27 [Bill 142]

Pilotage Provisional Order (Tees) Bill

(Lord Ramsay)

l. Royal Assent Mar 29 [45 Vict. c. i]

Places of Worship (Sites) Bill

(Mr. Summers, Mr. Richard, Mr. William M'Arthur, Mr. Alderman Cotton)

c. Committee deferred Mar 27, 185 [Bill 97]

Committee—R.P. April 25, 1476

Committee; Report April 27, 1635

Considered * May 1

Read 3^o * May 2

PLAYFAIR, Right Hon. Mr. Lyon (Chairman of Committees of Ways and Means and Deputy Speaker),
Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities

Army (Annual), Comm. 734; cl. 4, ib. 735
Central Metropolitan Railway, 2R. 1653, 1655
Herring Brand Committee, Res. 528
Lynn and Fakenham Railway, 2R. 475
Municipal Corporations, Comm. 114, 115, 116
Supply—Public Education (England and Wales), 655
Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens, 1166,
1171, 1173
Walton Vicarage, 2R. 1095, 1096

PLUNKET, Right Hon. D. R., Dublin University

Cooper's Hill College, Res. 1127
Parliament—Business of the House (Putting
the Question), Res. 1875
Poor Law Guardians (Ireland), 2R. 934
Public Affairs, State of—Irish Policy of the Government, Ministerial Statement, 1985,
1987

Pluralities Acts Amendment Bill [H.L.]
(The Lord Bishop of Exeter)

1. Presented; read 1st May 1 (No. 74)

Poor Law (England)—Oldham Board of Guardians

Question, Mr. W. Lowther; Answer, Mr.
Dodson May 1, 1811

Poor Law Guardians (Ireland) Bill
(Mr. Leahy, Mr. Gray, Mr. O'Sullivan)

c. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^o"
April 19, 924

Amendt. to leave out "now," and add "upon this day six months" (Mr. Tottenham);
Question proposed, "That 'now,' &c.;"
after debate, Question put; A. 95, N. 31;
M. 64 (D. L. 64)

Main Question put, and agreed to; Bill read 2^o

PORTER, Mr. A. M. (Solicitor General for Ireland), Londonderry Co.

Ireland—Miscellaneous Questions
Civil Service—Appointment of Mr. Croker,
671

Crime—Murder of Mrs. H. M. Smythe, 554

Criminal Law—Riot at Kilross—Sentences
upon the Prisoners, 541

Evictions—Mrs. Irwin, Case of, at Brootally,
Co. Armagh, 663

Land Law Act, 1881—Assistant Sub-Commissioners (Kerry and West Cork), 1156;
—Sec. 10, 1816

Landlord and Tenant—The Mercers' Company and their Tenants, 669

Peace Preservation Act, 1881—Returns as to Number and Cost of Arms Surrendered, 647

Poor Law—Ballycary Dispensary District and Larne Workhouse, 664

Prisons—Clonmel Prison—Outbreak of Fever, 559, 679

PORTER, Mr. A. M.—cont.

Ireland—Protection of Person and Property
Act, 1881—Miscellaneous Questions

Arrest of Miss O'Connor, 558

Healy, Mr. J., 660

Holden, Mr. J., 660

Hoolihan, John, 668

Messrs. Cullen and Lynott, 665

Messrs. Gannon and Rynolds, 661

O'Brien, Mr. J., 664

Ireland, State of—Miscellaneous Questions

"Emergency" Men—Assault at Maunulla Station—Decision of Major Bond, 662;

—Case of J. Carson, 661

Juries in the King's Co., 668

Wexford County—Alleged Outrage, 664

POST OFFICE

MISCELLANEOUS QUESTIONS

Bank Holidays, Question, Mr. Schreiber; Answer, Mr. Fawcett April 3, 545

Contracts—The Mails between London and Dublin, Question, Mr. Findlater; Answer,
Mr. Fawcett April 4, 665

Convention of Paris—Seizure of the "Irish World" Newspaper, Question, Mr. Healy;
Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland
Mar 28, 148

Post Office Annuities—Legislation, Question,
Mr. H. G. Allen; Answer, Mr. Fawcett
April 28, 1665

Parcels Post, Question, Mr. Monk; Answer,
Mr. Fawcett Mar 27, 6; Questions, Sir
Matthew White Ridley, Colonel Makins;
Answers, Mr. Fawcett Mar 30, 298; Question, Mr. O'Sullivan; Answer, Mr. Fawcett
April 3, 542;—Obligations of British Shipowners, Question, Mr. Dillwyn; Answer,
Mr. Fawcett April 18, 875

The American Mails, Question, Mr. Thorold
Rogers; Answer, Mr. Fawcett April 4,
659; Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Mr.
Fawcett May 2, 1946

The Australian Mails, Question, Mr. Stewart
Macliver; Answer, Mr. Fawcett April 18, 873

Transmission of Land League Portraits, Question, Mr. Redmond; Answer, Mr. Fawcett
April 21, 1098

Detention of Land League Letters, Question,
Mr. Redmond; Answer, Sir William Har-
court April 21, 1099

Telegraph Department

Disclosure of Telegrams, Question, Mr. Mon-tagu Scott; Answer, Mr. Fawcett April 3, 545

Telegraph Extension, Question, Mr. Round;
Answer, Mr. Fawcett April 3, 542

The Telegraph Service in Ireland, Question,
Mr. Callan; Answer, Mr. Fawcett April 4, 672

POWER, Mr. J. O'Connor, Mayo

Ireland—Miscellaneous Questions

Evictions—Carnacum, Co. Mayo, 553

General Prisons Act—Conveyance of Prisoners, 1678

Mr. Clifford Lloyd—Circular by the Inspector of Police, Co. Clare, 1018

POWER, Mr. J. O'Connor—cont.

Peace Preservation Act, 1881—Search for Arms—Sub-Inspector Ball, 1144
Poor Law—Relief of Distress—Swinford Union, 1401
Protection of Person and Property Act, 1881—Release of Prisoners under the Act, 1929;—Treatment of Prisoners under the Act, 290
Land Law (Ireland) Act (1881) Amendment, 2R. 1552
Prisons (England) Act, 1877—Cost of Conveying Prisoners, 1402

POWER, Mr. R., Waterford

Inland Revenue—Beer Licences (Ireland), 150
Ireland—Abolition of the Viceregal Office, 1656
Protection of Person and Property Act, 1881—Treatment of Persons arrested under the Act—Michael Veal, 24, 25
Municipal Corporations, Comm. 1777
Parliament—Business of the House—Opposition to Motions, 305

POWERS COURT, Viscount

Public Affairs—Irish Policy of the Government, Ministerial Statement, 1924

PRICE, Captain G. E., Devonport

Merchant Shipping Acts—"Albert Edward" Channel Steamer, 1815
Collisions at Sea, 1253
Navy—"Satellite" Class, 292
Shipbuilding Programme, 1563
Navy, Strength of the, Res. 1067
Official Appointments—Mr. R. S. Mitford, 1104, 1105

Prince Leopold, Duke of Albany

The Queen's Answer to the Address [March 21] reported April 24, 1204

Prisons (England) Act, 1877

Cost of Conveying Prisoners, Questions, Mr. O'Connor Power, Colonel Colthurst; Answers, The Attorney General for Ireland April 25, 1402
Gaol Dietary, Question, Mr. R. N. Fowler; Answer, Sir William Harcourt April 28, 1657
Tothill Fields Prison, Question, Mr. Broadhurst; Answer, Sir William Harcourt May 2, 1942

Provincial Art Galleries and Museums

Amendt. on Committee of Supply April 3, To leave out from "That," and add "in the opinion of this House, grants in aid of Art and Industrial Museums should not be confined to London, Edinburgh, and Dublin, but that a special grant should be made to the Science and Art Department, South Kensington, to enable them to supply Provincial Art Galleries and Museums with original examples and reproductions of Industrial Art adapted to their special local acquirements, and also to maintain and to still further develop the circulation system

[cont.]

Provincial Art Galleries and Museums—cont.

now administered by the Department; that gifts or loans of such articles and works as may be available from the National Art Collections, and from the British Museum, should be made to Provincial Art Galleries and Museums; and that such aid be confined to those towns or localities which are rated under the Free Libraries and Museums Act, and that the amount of such aid be proportioned to the sum raised and spent in each locality; and that, in order to give due effect to these proposals, it is desirable to place the whole of the National Art and other Collections, including the National Gallery and British Museum, under the direct control and administration of a Department of the Government" (Mr. Jesse Collings) v., 576; Question proposed, "That the words, &c.;" after debate, Question put, and agreed to

Public Health (Scotland) Act Amendment Bill (Dr. Cameron, Mr. James Cowan, Mr. Mackintosh)

c. Ordered; read 1^o Mar 29 [Bill 115]
Read 2^o May 1

Public Health—Sheffield Small-pox Hospital

Question, Mr. W. Lowther; Answer, Mr. Dodson May 1, 1810

Public Worship Regulation Act—The Rev. Mr. Green

Question, Mr. J. G. Hubbard; Answer, Mr. Gladstone April 4, 673

PUGH, Mr. L. P., Cardiganshire

Cooper's Hill College, Res. 1130
Ecclesiastical Commission, Motion for a Select Committee, Amendt. 515
India—High Court of Justice—Salaries of the Judges, 559
Roorkee College, 1104
Turnpike Roads (South Wales), 3R. 1901

PULESTON, Mr. J. H., Devonport

Education (Wales)—Report of Departmental Committee, 1245
Navy—Payment of Naval Pensions, 1260
Opium Trade—Chefoo Convention, 1244
United States—Trial of British Subjects, 1406

Queen, The

Attempt upon the Life of Her Majesty—The Prisoner M'Lean—Questions, Mr. Healy, Mr. Callan; Answers, Sir William Harcourt April 3, 541
Royal Passengers—The "Albert Victor" Channel Steamer—Question, Mr. Arthur Arnold; Answer, Lord Frederick Cavendish April 27, 1564

RAIKES, Right Hon. H. C., Preston

Parliament—Business of the House—Debate of Tuesday, Personal Explanations, 810

ISAY, Mr. J., Falkirk, &c.
Medical Grant (Scotland), 1407
Days and Means, Report, 1415

HBONE, Mr. W., Carnarvonshire
Oxford University (Jesus College Statutes),
Motion for an Address, 2007

ing—Valuation of Government Establishments question, Mr. Boord; Answer, Lord Frederick Cavendish April 24, 1270

MOND, Mr. J. E., New Ross

Ireland—Miscellaneous Questions

Crime, 715

Land Law Act, 1881—Land Court, New Ross, 869

Landlord and Tenant—Marquess of Ely's
Estate—Interference of Police, 1931

Law and Justice—Case of R. Webster, 294

Magistracy—Captain Plunket, R.M., 1824

Mr. Clifford Lloyd—Circular by the Inspector of Police, Co. Clare, 1014, 1016, 1938

Peace Preservation Act, 1881—Search for Arms—Sub-Inspector Ball, 1149

Post Office—Postmistress of Arran Island, 980

Prisons—Enniskillen Gaol—Regulation as to Visitors to Prisoners on St. Patrick's Day, 871;—Omagh Gaol, 305

Young Ireland Literary Society, Dublin—
Intrusion of Police, 152, 298, 299

Ireland—Protection of Person and Property
Act, 1881—Miscellaneous Questions

Dooley, Mr. James, 478, 479

Holden, Mr. J., 660

Kenny, Mr., and Mr. Cantwell, 1399

Molloy, Mr., 1824

Moloney, Mr., 1254

Murphy, Mr., 1255

O'Connor, Mr. J., 879

Prisoners detained under the Act—Mr.
M'Carthy and others, 1658, 1659

Ryan-Wall, Mr. Michael, 1812

Tipperary Co., Arrests in, 1567

Treatment of Prisoners under the Act, 287,
291, 542, 1254, 1566, 1567

Visits to Prisoners under the Act, 1098, 1821

Wexford County, Arrests in, 872

Ireland—Royal Irish Constabulary—Miscellaneous Questions

Appointments of County and Sub-Inspectors
at Londonderry, 1398

Constable Molloy, Charge against, 535

Sergeant Maguire, 1240

Sub-Inspector Rogers, 144

Ireland, State of—Miscellaneous Questions

Boylan, Mr., Assault on, 535

Dynamite, Use of, 1239

House Searches by the Constabulary, 879

Ladies' Land League—Judge Barry and Miss M'Cormack, 21

Limerick—Prohibited Public Meeting, 538,
539

Londonderry, Outrages at, 477, 1240

Occupation of Huts by Persons Evicted—Interference of Police, 1249

REDMOND, Mr. J. E.—cont.

Removal of Placards by the Constabulary,
1250

Wexford Co., Alleged Outrage, 664

Land Law (Ireland) Act (1881) Amendment,
2R. 1478

Post Office—Detention of Land League Letters, 1099

Transmission of Land League Portraits, 1098

REED, Sir E. J., Cardiff

Oxford University (Jesus College Statutes),
Motion for an Address, 2005

Regent's Canal, City, and Docks Railway
Bill

c. Select Committee nominated Mar 30; List of the Committee, 283

Reserve Forces Acts Consolidation Bill

(Mr. Secretary Childers, The Judge Advocate
General, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman)

c. Ordered; read 1^o * April 3 [Bill 124]

RICHARDSON, Mr. J. N., Armagh Co.

Ireland, State of—Use of Dynamite, 1239

RIDLEY, Sir M. W., Northumberland, N.

Oxford University (Jesus College Statutes),
Motion for an Address, 2003

Post Office—Parcels Post, 298

RITCHIE, Captain C. T., Tower Hamlets

Supply—Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens,
1168, 1169, 1170, 1172, 1174, 1180

Roads Provisional Order (Edinburgh) Bill

(The Lord Advocate, Mr. Solicitor General for Scotland)

c. Report * April 25 [Bills 93-139]
Considered * April 27

ROBERTS, Mr. J., Flint, &c.

Police Protection to Public Servants, 1138

ROGERS, Mr. J. E. Thorold, Southwark

Customs Department — New Warehousing
Scheme, 486

Inland Revenue—Railway Passenger Duty—
Cheap Trains Act, 1844, 1830

Lynn and Fakenham Railway, 2R. 465

Oxford and Cambridge Universities Commission—Oxford Statutes, 1840

Oxford University (Jesus College Statutes),
Motion for an Address, 2000

Parliament—Business of the House (Putting
the Question), Res. 63

Post Office—American Mails, 659

ROLLS, Mr. J. A., Monmouthshire

Mineral Leases—Insecurity of Tenants' Capital, 151

ROSEBERRY, Earl of (Under Secretary of State for the Home Department)
 Payment of Wages in Public-houses Prohibition, 2R. 1926
 Precognitions (Scotland), 278
 Theatres and Music Halls (Metropolis)—Precautions in Case of Fire, Address for Papers, 1807

ROUND, Mr. J., Essex, E.
 Lunacy Laws, Res. 1455
 Post Office (Telegraph Department)—Telegraph Extension, 542

RUSSELL, Mr. O., Dundalk
 Public Affairs, State of—Irish Policy of the Government, Ministerial Statement, 1992

RUSSELL, Mr. G. W. E., Aylesbury
 Army Organization—Colonels of the Ordnance Corps, 731
 Supply, Report, 161

Russia—Persecution of the Jews
 Questions, Baron Henry De Worms; Answers, Sir Charles W. Dilke Mar 27, 23; April 27, 1559; May 1, 1817

RYLANDS, Mr. P., Burnley
 Army (Annual), Comm. add. cl. 747
 Cyprus, Island of—Grant of a Constitution—The Despatch, 1103
 Merchant Shipping Acts—"City of Limerick," 978
 Parliament—Business of the House—Opposition to Motions, 304
 Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices), 2R. 1592
 Ways and Means, Report, 1410

ST. AUBYN, Sir J., Cornwall, W.
 Law and Justice—Cases of Suspected Poisoning, 4

Sale of Food and Drugs Act—Coffee and Chicory
 Question, Sir Edmund Lechmere; Answer, Mr. Chamberlain April 3, 548

SALISBURY, Marquess of
 Criminal Law—The Condemned Convict Lamson, Motion for an Address, 1387, 1388
 Ireland, State of—Threatening Letters, 1396
 Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881 (Sec. 8, Subsec. 9)—"Adams v. Dunseath," 1229
 Oxford and Cambridge Universities Commission—Statutes—Religious Teaching and Worship, 1799
 Public Affairs—Irish Policy of the Government—Lord Lieutenantcy of Ireland, 1787, 1788
 Ministerial Statement, 1919, 1920, 1922, 1923, 1924
 Turkey—Passage in the Bosphorus—Russian Armed Ships, 281

SALT, Mr. T., Stafford
 Burial Fees, 2R. 262
 Education Department—New Code—Schedule VI.—Pupil Teachers, 481
 Lunacy Laws, Res. 1452
 Supply—Science and Art Department, &c. 656

SAMUELSON, Mr. H. B., Frome
 Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices), 2R. 1429

SANDON, Right Hon. Viscount, Liverpool
 Education Department—New Code, 606
 Supply—Public Education (England and Wales), 648, 654

SCHREIBER, Mr. O., Poole
 Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices), 2R. 1432
 Post Office—Bank Holidays, 545
 Supply—Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens, 1181
 Ways and Means—Financial Statement—Carriage Duties, 1676

Science and Art—H. B's Caricatures
 Question, Mr. George Howard; Answer, Mr. Walpole April 3, 547

SOLATER-BOOTH, Right Hon. G., Hants, N
 Commonable Rights, Comm. add. cl. 1632
 Lunacy Laws, Res. 1465
 Municipal Corporations, Comm. 1753
 Parliament—Business of the House (Putting the Question), Res. 1864
 Supply—Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens, 1162
 Turnpike Roads (South Wales), 3R. 1912
 Wales (South)—General Superintendent, 647
 Woods and Forests—Fires in Woolmer Forest, 801

Scotland

MISCELLANEOUS QUESTIONS

Board of Manufactures and Fisheries, Question, Sir Alexander Gordon; Answer, Lord Frederick Cavendish April 18, 876 Educational Endowments—Legislation, Question, Mr. Buchanan; Answer, Mr. Mundella April 3, 544
Geological Survey, Question, Mr. Buchanan; Answer, Mr. Mundella April 24, 1261
Harbours of Refuge, Questions, General Sir George Balfour, Mr. Pemberton; Answers, Mr. Chamberlain April 24, 1242
Inland Revenue Stamping Department, Questions, Dr. Cameron; Answers, Lord Frederick Cavendish Mar 31, 477
Landlord and Tenant—Evictions in the Island of Skye, Question, Mr. Biggar; Answer, The Lord Advocate April 24, 1245; Questions, Mr. Macfarlane, Mr. Dick-Peddie; Answers, Mr. Gladstone April 28, 1675; Questions, Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh, Mr. Dick-Peddie; Answers, The Lord Advocate May 1, 1822;—Disturbances in the Island of Skye, Question, Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh; Answer, The Lord Advocate April 20, 1032; Question, Mr. Biggar; Answer, The Lord Advocate April 27, 1565

SCOTLAND—cont.

Medical Grant, Question, Mr. Ramsay ; Answer, Lord Frederick Cavendish April 25, 1407
Precognitions, Question, Observations, The Earl of Minto ; Reply, The Earl of Rosebery Mar 30, 277
University Reform, Question, Mr. Dick-Peddie ; Answer, The Lord Advocate May 1, 1827

SCOTT, Mr. M. D., Sussex, E.
 Post Office—Disclosure of Telegrams, 545

SEELY, Mr. C., Nottingham
 Army Estimates—Provisions, &c. 843

SELWIN-IBBETSON, Sir H. J., Essex, W.
 Fires in Theatres (Prevention), Res. 796

Settled Land Bill [H.L.]
 (The Earl Cairns)

l. Read 3^a • Mar 28 (No. 19)
 c. Read 1^o • (Sir R. Assheton Cross) Mar 31
 [Bill 120]

SEVERNE, Mr. J. E., Shropshire, S.
 Municipal Corporations, Comm. 1767

SEXTON, Mr. T., Sligo
 Army (Annual), 2R. 561 ; Comm. 733 ; cl. 4, 734 ; add. cl. 735, 739, 753
 Ireland—Miscellaneous Questions
 Civil Service—Appointment of Mr. Croker, 671
 Dublin City Market Company, 476
 Irish Land Commission—Estate of Mr. Talbot-Crosbie, 18
 Landlord and Tenant—The Earl of Kenmare's Estate, 1944
 Magistracy—Major Waller Ashe, 1100 ;—Mr. Clifford Lloyd, 1671
 Mr. Clifford Lloyd—Circular by the Inspector of Police, Co. Clare, 988, 990, 993 ; Motion for Adjournment, 994, 1000, 1001, 1002, 1026, 1028, 1247, 1932, 1933, 1934
 Mr. Parnell—Representation of Liverpool, 676
 Peace Preservation Act, 1881—Search for Arms—Sub-Inspector Ball, 1147
 Prisons Board—Captain Barlow, 1841, 1842
 Ireland—Law and Justice—Miscellaneous Questions
 Cork Grand Jury, 11
 Magistracy—Summary Jurisdiction, 1934
 Messrs. Crotty and others, 476
 Ireland—Protection of Person and Property Act, 1881—Miscellaneous Questions
 Abraham, Mr. W., 1672, 1673
 American Citizens arrested under the Act, 874, 875, 1029
 Armstrong, Mr. Luke, 1826
 Brennan, Mr. Thomas, 482
 Dillon, Mr., 494
 Gibbons, Mr. Patrick, 147
 Hubon, Mr. Martin, 146
 Messrs. Rea, O'Connor, Synan, &c. 537
 Miss Kirk, 1109, 1670, 1671

SEXTON, Mr. T.—cont.

Prisoners detained under the Act—Mr. M'Carthy and others, 1659, 1660
 Treatment of Persons arrested under the Act, 19, 287, 288, 289 ;—Galway Gaol, 8, 9
 Ireland—Royal Irish Constabulary—Miscellaneous Questions
 Co. Monaghan, 1813
 Sub-Inspector Rogers, 143, 145
 "United Ireland"—Alleged Excess of Duty by a Constable at Waterford, 1266
 Ireland, State of—Miscellaneous Questions
 Land League Huts—Mr. Clifford Lloyd, 885, 886
 Military Riots at Galway, 34
 Occupation of Huts by Persons Evicted—Interference of Police, 1247, 1248
 Tipperary—Conduct of the Police, 12, 13
 Land Law (Ireland) Act (1881) Amendment, 2R. 1522
 Municipal Corporations, Comm. 1782
 Parliament—Business of the House (Putting the Question), Res. 107, 108, 361, 1868
 Poor Law Guardians (Ireland), 2R. 937
 Public Affairs, State of—Irish Policy of the Government, Ministerial Statement, 1980
 Supply, Report, 161, 162, 176, 196

SHAFTESBURY, Earl of
 Payment of Wages in Public-houses Prohibition, 2R. 1927

SHAW, Mr. W., Cork Co.
 Ireland—Mr. Clifford Lloyd—Circular by the Inspector of Police, Co. Clare, 1011
 Land Law (Ireland) Act (1881) Amendment, 2R. 1532, 1535

SHEIL, Mr. E., Meath Co.
 Ireland—Peace Preservation Act, 1881—Arms Licences, 1570
 Protection of Person and Property Act, 1881—Prisoners detained under the Act—Mr. P. Arnold, 1570
 Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices), 2R. 1599
 Supply—Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens, 1178

SHERIDAN, Mr. H. B., Dudley
 Central Metropolitan Railway, 2R. 1649, 1652, 1655

SHIELD, Mr. Hugh., Cambridge
 Parliament—Business of the House (Putting the Question), Res. 1865

SIMON, Mr. Serjeant J., Dewsbury
 Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices), 2R. 1423
 Parliamentary Elections Expenses, 2R. 957

SLAGG, Mr. J., Manchester
 Provincial Art Galleries and Museums, Res. 589

Slate Mines (Gunpowder) Bill

(The Earl of Camperdown)

l. Royal Assent Mar 29 [45 Vict. c. 3]

Slavery—The Slave Trade in Asia and Africa

Observations, Mr. Labouchere; Reply, Sir Charles W. Dilke; debate thereon April 28, 1711

SMITH, Right Hon. W. H., Westminster

Arklow Harbour, Comm. cl. 5, 1866

Central Metropolitan Railway, 2R. 1644; Amendt. 1646, 1652

Civil Service Appointments—Private Secretaries to Cabinet Ministers, 1745

Municipal Corporations, Comm. 1771

Navy, Strength of the, Res. 1064, 1076

Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices), 2R. 1865

Turkey—Harbour of Smyrna, 30

Ways and Means—Financial Statement—The Revenue, 1564

South Kensington Museum—Museum of Natural History

Question, Mr. Birkbeck; Answer, Mr. Shaw Lefevre April 18, 880

Spain—Commercial Treaty—Negotiations

Question, Mr. O'Shea; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke Mar 27, 29

SPEAKER, The (Right Hon. Sir H. B. W. BRAND), Cambridgeshire

Army (Annual), 2R. 574

Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment, Consid. 125, 133

Central Metropolitan Railway, 2R. 1652

Cornwall (East) Election—Speech of Mr. Courtney, 312

Gibraltar (Religious Dissensions)—Dr. Canilla—The Papers, 555, 643

Ireland—Miscellaneous Questions

Abolition of the Viceregal Office, 1656

Law and Justice—Peter Dunne, Case of—Mr. Justice Fitzgerald, 1140, 1143

Mr. Clifford Lloyd—Circular by the Inspector of Police, Co. Clare, 993, 1009, 1016, 1017, 1933

Protection of Person and Property Act, 1881—Prisoners detained under the Act—J. M'Carthy and others, 1663;—Treatment of Prisoners under the Act, 287

State of—Occupation of Huts by Persons Evicted—Interference of the Police, 1248

Judgments (Inferior Courts), Consid. add. cl. 1786

Law and Police—Riots at Camborne, Cornwall, 1674

Metropolis Management and Building Acts Amendment, Comm. 2018

Municipal Corporations, Comm. 116, 1777

Parliament—Miscellaneous Questions

Business of the House, 1945

Order—Precincts of the House—The Home Secretary and Mr. Anderson, 556, 557

Public Business, Arrangement of, 1631

SPEAKER, The—cont.

Parliament—Business of the House (Putting the Question), Res. 108, 109, 113, 313, 353, 495, 1808, 1869, 1870

Parliament—Gloucester Writ, Res. 1575, 1577

Parliament—Wigan New Writ, Res. 1965

Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices), 2R. 1589, 1614

Poor Law Guardians (Ireland), 2R. 940

Public Affairs, State of—Irish Policy of the Government, 1838; Ministerial Statement, 1977, 1982, 1997

Supply, Report, 162, 176, 198

Turnpike Roads (South Wales), 3R. 1903

SPENCER, Hon. C. R., Northampton, N.

Parliament—Palace of Westminster—Clock Tower, 28

STANHOPE, Earl

Payment of Wages in Public-houses Prohibition, 2R. 1925

STANHOPE, Hon. E., Lincolnshire, Mid

Cooper's Hill College, Res. 1125

Lynn and Fakenham Railway, 2R. Amendt. 462, 472, 475

STANLEY, Right Hon. Colonel F. A., Lancashire, N.

Army (Annual), 2R. 574

Army Estimates—Provisions, &c. 851

National Defences—Chatham Dockyard, 1558

Parliament—Business of the House (Putting the Question), Res. 327

STANLEY, Hon. E. L., Oldham

Burial Fees, 2R. 269

Education Department—New Code, 612

STANLEY OF ALDERLEY, Lord

Payment of Wages in Public-houses Prohibition, 2R. 1927

STANTON, Mr. W. J., Stroud

Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices), 2R. 1431

Stationery Office—Controller's Report

Resolutions, Lord Thurlow Mar 30, 281

Steamship "Victoria"

Moved for, "Passenger certificate granted to the South-Eastern Railway Company's steamship 'Victoria' by the Board of Trade" (The Earl of Dunmore) Mar 28, 189; after short debate, Motion agreed to (No. 53)

Stolen Goods Bill [H.L.]

(The Lord Chancellor)

l. Presented; read 1st April 21, 1082 (No. 64)

Read 2nd, and referred to a Select Committee April 25, 1871

STORY-MASKELYNE, Mr. M. H. N., Crick-lads

Education Department—New Code, 806

[cont.]

Straits Settlements—Slavery in the Malay Peninsula

Question, Mr. Gorst ; Answer, Mr. Courtney
Mar 31, 488

STRATHEDEN AND CAMPBELL, Lord

Army (Auxiliary Forces)—Easter Volunteer Review, 460

Turkey—Passage in the Bosphorus—Russian Armed Ships, 279

STRATHNAIRN, Lord

England and France—The Channel Tunnel Scheme, 457

STUART, Mr. H. VILLIERS-, Waterford Co.

Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881—Labourers' Cottages, 1817

SUDELEY, Lord

Royal Parks—Richmond Park—The Roehampton Gate, 281

Steamship "Victoria," Motion for a Paper, 139, 140

SULLIVAN, Mr. T. D., Westmeath

Municipal Corporations, Comm. 1762, 1781
Supply, Report, 203, 206

SUMMERS, Mr. W., Stalybridge

Places of Worship (Sites) Comm. 185

Sunday Closing (Ireland) Bill

(Mr. Richardson, Mr. Ewart, Mr. Corry, Mr. Redmond, Mr. Thomas Dickson, Mr. Meldon, Mr. Lewis, Mr. Arthur O'Connor, Mr. Blake)

c. Ordered ; read 1^o • May 2 [Bill 148]

SUPPLY

Resolution [24th March] reported Mar 28, 152
Said Resolution read a second time

Amendt. to leave out "£3,631,600," and insert "£3,630,100" (Mr. Mac Iver) v. ; Question proposed, "That '£3,631,600' stand part of the said Resolution;" after short debate, Question put, and agreed to; Resolution agreed to

Considered in Committee April 3, 648—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—CLASS IV.—EDUCATION, SCIENCE, AND ART

Resolutions reported April 20

Considered in Committee April 17, 802—ARMY ESTIMATES, Vote 10 (Provisions, Forage, &c.)

Resolution reported April 19

Considered in Committee April 21, 1159—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—CLASS I.—PUBLIC WORKS AND BUILDINGS

Resolutions reported April 24

Army Estimates—Vote 23—Pensions, Question, Colonel Barne ; Answer, Mr. Childers April 18, 876

SYDNEY, Earl (Lord Steward)

H.R.H. Prince Leopold, Duke of Albany—Queen's Answer to the Address, 1204

SYKES, Mr. C., York, East Riding

Fisheries—Trawling, 1664

TALBOT, Mr. J. G., Oxford University

Burial Fees, 2R. Amendt. 259

Education Department—New Code, 636

Oxford University (Jesus College Statutes), Motion for an Address, 2007

Parliamentary Elections Expenses, 2R. 965, 966

TAYLOR, Mr. P. A., Leicester

Army (Annual), Comm. add. cl. 752

Criminal Law—Magistracy—Flogging, 1400

Hall of Science, Old Street, E.C., Notice of Motion, 294

Law and Justice—"Gurney v. Bradlaugh," 1033

The Magistracy—Newcastle-on-Tyne—Severe Sentence, 291

THURLOW, Lord

Stationery Office (Controller's Report), Res. 281

TILLET, Mr. J. H., Norwich

Lynn and Fakenham Railway, 2R. 469

TORRENS, Mr. W. T. M'C., Finsbury

Central Metropolitan Railway, 2R. 1654

Parliament—Business of the House (Putting the Question), Res. 1868, 1878, 1889

TOTTENHAM, Mr. A. L., Leitrim

Ireland—Crime—Alleged Outrages, Co. Limerick, 1940

State of—Juries in King's Co., 668

Poor Law Guardians (Ireland), 2R. 930 ; Amendt. 931

Tramways Provisional Orders Bill

(Mr. Ashley, Mr. Chamberlain)

c. Ordered ; read 1^o • April 27 [Bill 141]

TREVELYAN, Mr. G. O. (Secretary to the Admiralty), Hawick, &c.

Navy—Chatham Dockyard Workmen, 1030

Dockyards—Bank Holidays, 18, 19

Indian Troopships, Chatham, 874

Launch of H.M.S. "Colossus," 676

Naval Barracks at Portsmouth, 24

Portsmouth Dockyard—Discharge of Workmen, 27

"Satellite" Class, 292

Shipbuilding Programme, 1563

Troopship "Assistance," 28

Troopships, 22

Navy, Strength of the, Res. 1041, 1053, 1056, 1070

TRURO, Lord

Army (Auxiliary Forces)—Easter Volunteer Review, 460, 1640, 1642

Army (Deserters), Motion for a Return, 136

Tunis

Cession of Esparto Grass Districts, Question, Observations, Earl De La Warr; Reply, Earl Granville Mar 27, 2

Compensation to British Subjects, Question, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke April 4, 676

Tunis—Bombardment of Sfax—Indemnity to British Subjects

Moved, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for papers and correspondence relating to the International Commission held at Sfax in August 1881 to inquire into the pillaging and destruction of property after the entry of the French troops; also for the reports of M. Galea and M. Leonardi on the same subject; and for papers and correspondence relative to the affairs of Tunis since the last papers were presented" (The Earl De La Warr) May 1, 1801; after short debate, Motion withdrawn

Question, The Earl of Bective; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke May 1, 1841

Turkey

MISCELLANEOUS QUESTIONS

Administrative Reforms, Question, Sir H. Drummond Wolff; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke May 1, 1829

Albania—The Death of Captain Selby, Question, Mr. W. J. Corbet; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke Mar 27, 5

Asiatic Turkey—Smyrna Quay, Question, Mr. W. H. Smith; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke Mar 27, 30;—The Papers, Question, Mr. M'Coan; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke April 4, 679

Midhat Pasha, Question, Mr. M'Coan; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke April 25, 1407

Passage of the Bosphorus—Russian Armed Ships, Observations, Questions, Lord Strathe-den and Campbell, The Marquess of Salisbury; Answers, Earl Granville Mar 30, 279

Turnpike Acts Continuance Act, 1881

Select Committee appointed, to inquire into the Fourth and Fifth Schedules of "The Annual Turnpike Acts Continuance Act, 1881" Mar 30; List of the Committee, 427
Further Instruction April 20, 1081

Turnpike Roads (South Wales) Bill

(Mr. Dodson, Mr. Hibbert)

c. Report * Mar 28 [Bill 101]

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3^o" May 1, 1901

Amendt. to leave out "now read 3^o," and add "re-committed" v. (Mr. Hussey Vivian); Question proposed, "That the words, &c.;" after debate, Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned" (Mr. Hibbert); after further short debate, Question put, and agreed to; Debate adjourned

TYLER, Sir H. W., Harwich

Hall of Science, Old Street, E.C., Notice of Motion, 294, 543

Union of Benefices (London) Bill [H.L.]

(The Lord Bishop of London)

l. Presented; read 1^o * Mar 31 (No. 61)

United States—Trial of British Subjects

Question, Mr. Puleston; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke April 25, 1406

Vaccination Act (1867), Sec. 31

Question, Mr. Burt; Answer, Mr. Dodson Mar 31, 479

VERNEY, Sir H., Buckingham

Army (Annual), 2R. 567

Army Estimates—Provisions, &c. 832

Ecclesiastical Commission, Motion for a Select Committee, 517

England and France—The Channel Tunnel Scheme, 882

VIVIAN, Mr. A. P., Cornwall, W.

England and France—The Channel Tunnel Scheme, 1270

VIVIAN, Mr. H. Hussey, Glamorganshire

Contagious Diseases (Animals) Acts—Returns of Infected Areas, 29

Oxford University (Jesus College Statutes), Motion for an Address, 1997, 2008

Parliament—Business of the House—Arrangement of Business, 1109

Tuesdays—Jesus College Statutes, 1110

Parliament—Business of the House (Putting the Question), Res. 43

Public Affairs, State of—Irish Policy of the Government, Ministerial Statement, 1980

Turnpike Roads (South Wales), 3R. 1912

Wales (South)

Road Acts—Maintenance of Main Roads, Question, Sir Joseph Bailey; Answer, Mr. Gladstone Mar 30, 307

General Superintendent of Roads, Question, Viscount Emlyn; Answer, Mr. Dodson April 3, 559; Observations, Viscount Emlyn; Reply, Mr. Dodson; Observations, Mr. Selater-Booth, 645

WALPOLE, Right Hon. Spencer H., Cambridge University

Science and Art—H. B.'s Caricatures, 547

WALROND, Colonel W. H., Devon, E.

Army Estimates—Provisions, &c. 843

Ireland—Irish Policy of the Government—Alleged Negotiations, 1939

Walton Vicarage Bill (by Order)

c. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^o" (Sir Charles Forster) April 21, 1084

Amendt. to leave out "now," and add "upon this day six months" (Mr. Caine); Question proposed, "That 'now,' &c.;" after short debate, Question put; A. 160, N. 76; M. 84 (D. L. 67)

Main Question put, and agreed to; Bill read 2^o

WARTON, Mr. C. N., Bridport

Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment, Consid.
Amendt. 121, 127; 3R. 427
Burial Fees, 2R. 262
Civil Service Appointments—Private Secretaries to Cabinet Ministers, 1738
Fires in Theatres (Prevention), Res. 793 Judgments (Inferior Courts), Comm. add. cl.
Amendt. 1634; Consid. add. cl. 1785, 1786
Liberal Association of Ipswich and Irish Landlords, 1839
Lunacy Laws, Res. 1476
Metropolis Management and Building Acts Amendment, Comm. 2020, 2026, 2028; cl. 4, Motion for reporting Progress, 2029, 2030
Municipal Corporations, Comm. 1758
£1 Bank Notes, Res. 1709
Papal See (Diplomatic Communications), Res. 908, 909
Parliament—Business of the House (Putting the Question), Res. 47
Parliament—Wigan New Writ, Res. 1962
Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices), 2R. 1333, 1361
Poor Law Guardians (Ireland), 2R. 939, 940
Supply, Report, 169
Turnpike Roads (South Wales), 3R. 1915
Walton Vicarage, 2R. 1089

Water Provisional Orders Bill

(Mr. Ashley, Mr. Chamberlain)

c. Ordered; read 1^o April 20 [Bill 135]
Read 2^o May 2

WATNEY, Mr. J., Surrey, E.

Ways and Means—Financial Statement, Comm. 1811

WAVENEY, Lord

Army (Auxiliary Forces)—Easter Volunteer Review, 461
England and France—The Channel Tunnel Scheme, 459

WAYS AND MEANS

Considered in Committee April 24, 1273—
FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER on moving the first Resolution (Income Tax); after long debate, Resolution agreed to Other Resolutions moved, and agreed to Resolutions reported April 25, 1410; after debate, Resolutions agreed to Ordered, That a Bill be brought in upon the said Resolutions [See title Customs and Inland Revenue Bill]

WAYS AND MEANS

MISCELLANEOUS QUESTIONS

Revenue and Expenditure—The Finance Accounts, Question, Mr. W. J. Corbet; Answer, Lord Frederick Cavendish May 2, 1939

The Financial Statement

The Revenue, Question, Mr. W. H. Smith; Answer, Lord Frederick Cavendish April 27, 1564

WAYS AND MEANS—cont.

The Carriage Duties, Questions, Sir Baldwyn Leighton, Mr. Schreiber, Mr. Pennington; Answers, The Chancellor of the Exchequer April 28, 1676

Resolution 3—Coffee, Question, Mr. Stewart MacIver; Answer, Lord Frederick Cavendish May 1, 1813

Local Taxation, Question, Mr. Pell; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Mar 30, 808

Question, Mr. R. N. Fowler; Answer, Lord Frederick Cavendish April 28, 1784

Inland Revenue

Beer Licences (Ireland), Question, Mr. R. Power; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Mar 28, 150; Question, Mr. Biggar; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer April 3, 549

Duty on Silver Plate, Question, Sir Joseph M'Kenna; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Mar 30, 306

Grocers' Licences (Ireland), Question, Mr. Biggar; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer April 3, 549

Income Tax and Brewery Licences, Question, Sir Baldwyn Leighton; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer April 3, 550

Railway Passenger Duty—The Cheap Trains Act, 1844, Questions, Mr. Buxton, Mr. Broadhurst, Mr. Thorold Rogers, Mr. R. Biddulph Martin; Answers, The Chancellor of the Exchequer May 1, 1830

The Income Tax (Schedule B)—English and Scotch Farmers, Question, Mr. Biddell; Answer, Lord Frederick Cavendish April 20, 1086

The Wine Duties, Question, Earl Percy; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke May 1, 1829

WEBSTER, Mr. J., Aberdeen

Civil Imprisonment (Scotland), 2R. 251

WEDDERBURN, Sir D., Haddington Burghs

Africa (South)—Zululand—Cetewayo (Release from Captivity), Motion for an Address, 788

WHITBREAD, Mr. S., Bedford

Central Metropolitan Railway, 2R. 1647
Parliament—Business of the House (Putting the Question), Res. 79, 84

WHITLEY, Mr. E., Liverpool

Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment, Consid. add. cl. 117, 121, 124
Judgments (Inferior Courts), Consid. add. cl. 1787
Places of Worship (Sites), Comm. 135; cl. 2, 1477

WILLIAMS, Colonel O., Great Marlow

Army (India)—Promotion of Cavalry Officers, 1258

WILLIAMS, Mr. S. O. Evans, New Radnor
Ecclesiastical and Mortuary Fees, Motion for a Select Committee, 229

WILLIAMSON, Mr. S., St. Andrews, &c.
Arklow Harbour, Comm. cl. 5, 1865, 1866
£1 Bank Notes, Res. 1710

WILLIS, Mr. W., Colchester
Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment, Consid.
125, 126

WILLS, Mr. W. H., Coventry
Ways and Means—Financial Statement, Comm.
1806

WILMOT, Sir J. E., Warwickshire, S.
Asia (Central)—Russian Advance, 1665
Ireland — Crime — Murder of Mrs. H. M.
Smythe, 554
State of—The Recent Murders, 881
Metropolis—Carriage Roads, 1669
Parliament—Wigan New Writ, Res. 1963

WINCHESTER, Bishop of
Oxford and Cambridge Universities Commission — Statutes — Religious Teaching and
Worship, 1798

WODEHOUSE, Mr. E. R., Bath
Parliament—Business of the House (Putting
the Question), Res. 52

WOLFF, Sir H. D., Portsmouth
Corrupt Practices at Elections Act—Magistracy—Mr. Cheney Garfit, 296
Education Department—New Code, 308
Gibraltar (Religious Dissensions)—Dr. Canilla
—The Papers, 555, 641, 643, 1561
International Law—Protection of Person and Property (Ireland) Act, 1881—Intervention of the American Government, 674, 675
Ireland—Address of the Dominion House of Commons, 1833

[cont.]

WOLFF, Sir H. D.—cont.

Lynn and Fakenham Railway, 2R. 468, 473,
475

Navy—Miscellaneous Questions

Dockyards—Bank Holidays, 18

Indian Troopships, Chatham, 874

Launch of H.M.S. "Colossus," 676

Naval Barracks at Portsmouth, 23

Papal See (Diplomatic Communications), Res.
887, 897, 898, 910

Parliament—Business of the House (Putting the Question), Res. Motion for Adjournment, 1899

Protection of Person and Property (Ireland)
Act, 1881 — American Citizens arrested
under the Act, 874, 1109, 1256, 1270

Public Affairs, State of—Irish Policy of the Government, Ministerial Statement, 1982

Supply, Report, 156

Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens, 1166,
1171

Turkey—Administrative Reforms, 1829

Ways and Means—Financial Statement, Comm.
1820 ; Report, 1418

Woods and Forests—Fires in Woolmer Forest

Observations, Mr. Solater-Booth ; Reply, Mr.
Childers April 17, 801

WORTLEY, Mr. C. B. S., Sheffield

Burial Fees, 2R. 270

Ecclesiastical and Mortuary Fees, Motion for a Select Committee, 217

YORKE, Mr. J. R., Gloucestershire, E.

Ireland, State of—Ladies' Land League—
Judge Barry and Miss M'Cormack, 20, 150, 151

Parliamentary Elections (Expenses), 2R. 951

END OF VOLUME CCLXVIII., AND THIRD VOLUME OF SESSION 1882.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN

3 9015 03393 5316

